and he felt that there was a dark barrier between him and them, which would make it painful for him that the eyes of innocence should rest upon him. Then he plunged into a wide abyss of wild and troublous thoughts. We will not attempt to trace them, for it was a labyrinth without a clue, one branching into another, as if interminably; but their nature, and that to which they tended, may be judged by the words with which they closed, and which they actually uttered in a murmur. "It's no use," he said, "it's no use, I'm too far in now to go back, so why should I think of it?" and once more approaching the mouth of the cave, he looked out and listened. "Williams can't be long!" he thought, for his own reflections had been wearisome to him, and it seemed as if his companion had been gone for more than an hour, ere, in reality, he had been in the cave one half of that time.

At length a step sounded upon the path, and he drew back, for he felt sure that it was not that of Williams. It was lighter, quicker, more youthful; but the instant after, as he stood in the shadow, and looked out upon the trees, which concealed the entrance from the neighboring path, he saw Maltby come round and approach his retreat. Not knowing how far Williams had confided in him, he retired quite to the back of the hollow; but when the man came near the mouth, it soon became apparent to Alfred Latimer that the other was seeking him, for he set down a basket with which he was burdened, and looked in, saying, "D—n it! he is not here. Williams said he must be here long ago."

"Ah, Maltby, is that you?" said the young man, coming forward. "Is Williams coming?"

"Presently," replied Maltby. "He's gone to see Tom Brown, and he'll come as soon as he's arranged things with him; but he sent me up with this basket for you, as he thought you might want your breakfast, having had none when you left Sturton."

"I could have waited," replied Alfred Latimer, making his way into the basket, "but I'm devilish hungry, it is true."

"Take care, take care," cried Maltby; "there's a powder flask underneath; for he says that you did not bring any with your pistols."

"They are loaded," answered Alfred Latimer, with a nod of the head, "and I don't think any man who stands two shots from them, will ever have to stand another."

"Ay, but it's always as well to be ready and prepared," answered Maltby. "A man's hand shakes sometimes, you know."

"I don't think mine will," answered Alfred Latimer; "but what the mischief is this?"

"Some black crape for your faces, that's all," replied the other, "in case you should be seen."

"Ay, upon my soul, that's well thought of," said the young gentleman. "Under this they won't easily know one; and those two old women are too well acquainted with my face. Oh, here's the brandy! Bill, will you take a glass?"

"No, I thank you," answered Maltby. "I'll be off to Mallington again. I've got the horse and gig to see after, and I'm to bring them up to the back of the wood at eleven. Good day, Mr. Latimer;" and he turned back through the wood, leaving the young gentleman once more alone.

There had been something dry and bitter in his manner, which Alfred Latimer did not altogether like; but for about a quarter of an hour he occupied himself with the ample provision of food which the basket contained, and then examined the rest of its contents, which consisted of the powder flask already mentioned, a bundle of picklocks and skeleton keys, and a short bar of steel. When all this was over, however, his thoughts turned again to Bill Maltby's demeanor, and vague apprehensions began to take possession of him. "Williams has trusted him too far," he thought. "I should not wonder if he were to peach, and get us all into a trap. He was always a pitiful scamp, though a devilish good boxer. At all events, I'm sure, if he were hard up he would turn king's evidence, and hang us all."

In these pleasant reveries he passed another hour, till at length Williams himself appeared, and Alfred Latimer at once communicated to him the suspicions which Maltby's manner had inspired. His companion, however, easily quieted him on that score, saying that the youth was a little sulky on account of the quarrel they had had some days before; but that he would not peach for his own sake, as then he would lose all the money he was to have; and as to his turning king's evidence, he might do what he liked, for they would be out of the country before that could do them any harm. "It is only the fools who stay on in England," he continued, "who are nabbed. If a man takes all his measures beforehand, and bolts at once, he is quite secure."

These assurances quieted Alfred Latimer; but, nevertheless, the passing of that day was long and tedious. They sometimes talked, but more frequently remained plunged into deep fits of silence, and meditating the coming hour; but Williams was well pleased to see that, though his young companion had become unnaturally grave and stern, there was no sign of wavering, no apparent hesitation; not even a thought of shrinking from the enterprise before them. When he spoke it was almost always of what they were to do—how they were to act; and if he varied the topic, it was but to notice some passing sound; such as the bell of the distant village church, as it rang to summon the people to prayer and instruction.

Thus they saw noon and evening pass, and gradually the sun went down, leaving the sky all red and glowing for full half an hour after he had sunk from the sight. All then became darkness; the stars, indeed, appearing, first faint and then brighter, but the air below in the valley by the river becoming somewhat dull and misty as the sun went down.

"Tom Brown can't be long now," said Williams at length. "I'll go out and see if he be coming," and accordingly he walked away into the wood, while Latimer remained with his head resting on his hand, and his eyes half closed. It would have been a sad dark spectacle, if one could have looked into his bosom at that moment. At length he rose suddenly, went up to the basket, and drawing forth the bottle of brandy set it to his lips. He took a long draught, and had scarcely done, when Williams and the ruffian from the common came into the cave.

"We must wait an hour or two yet," said the former. "Tom here tells me, sir, that there are a number of the good folks about, and that Edmonds is out with his men, scouring all the place round; so we must be still. When does the moon rise, Tom?"

"She's up now, only you can't see her for the hill," replied the ruffian.

"Ay, but at what hour does she come up?" asked Williams. "I see she's risen plain enough, by the light, but I want to know what o'clock it is?"

"Oh! about ten," answered Alfred Latimer; "but if you wait a little you'll hear Mallington clock strike. I heard it a little while ago, but did not count. It must have been nine, however."

A few minutes after the clock was heard to strike ten, and it was then agreed to wait another hour, in order that all might be still, and the sober folks of the neighborhood retired to rest.

Eleven struck, and then, taking the keys, the powder-flask, and the bar out of the basket, with hardly a word spoken, they issued out into the wood, threaded the narrow paths, approached the scene of their destined crime from the side of Wenlock Common, and paused for an instant close to the park. A few words of final arrangement then passed, and one by one they leaped the wall, and Alfred Latimer stood within Mallington Park.

CHAPTER LXVI.

The fine old fable of the three warnings represents but too faithfully how the worldly and the gay shut their eyes and bar their understanding against every intimation of the approaching termination of existence, and how frequently such warnings are given and unattended to. Nor is conscience less constant or less varied in the various means she employs to admonish us of the end and tendency of every evil act we commit. Few men, if any, can say that they have fallen into crime unwarned, and most have heard the awakening voice raised in many different tones to call them back from evil unto right. The persevering monitor employs every method, neglects no inducement, and often, very often, at the very last moment thunders in our ears the tale of approaching retribution.

Alfred Latimer, as we have seen in the last chapter, sprang over the paling, and stood within the enclosure of Mallington Park. When he had done so he gazed around him for an instant, and a sudden change came over his countenance. It seemed to him as if he had awakened in a moment from a dream, as if all that had passed during the last week had been a troubleous vision, and that now for the first time he unclosed his eyes to the reality. He asked himself where he was, what he was doing, why he came thither; and he seemed confounded and bewildered as his heart answered the question, and he found himself hurrying forward to an act, the consequences of which might be discovery, apprehension, trial, and an ignominious death. He could scarcely believe it true. All the inducements, all the sophistry, all the passions that had hitherto prompted him seemed to have died away suddenly in the cold night air, and there he stood marked out as a mere robber, without the power of summoning up the evil spirit to support him with false reasonings, and palliate the extent of his guilt.

It was an awful moment, but it was quickly over, for Williams almost instantly touched his arm, saying "Come along, what are you stopping for? You are not going to show the white feather now?"

It might be that he spoke from having at some former time experienced such sensations himself; it might be that he divined what was passing in his young companion's heart by that intuitive perception which some men have into all the modifications of character. However that might be, he undoubtedly addressed himself to the thoughts which were present to Alfred Latimer's mind, and the words he used were those best calculated to negative the effect produced by the newly-raised voice of conscience. The young man merely replied "Oh dear, no!" and followed him instinctively through the nearer trees, across the warren, and towards the back of Mallington Hall. Often had he trod those paths, often had he traversed those woods in happier days. Sometimes he had watched for Lucy there, occasionally with angry feelings at her delay, occasionally with the natural impatience of an eager and impetuous spirit; but he had never felt as he did then—he had never known thought to be such a burden as it seemed during the next five minutes. The load, however, became intolerable, and he cast it off, forcing his mind away, and not daring to own even to himself that which he mentally called a stupid weakness. "Show the white feather!" he repeated to himself more than once. "Oh, no! that's out of the question; but I wish I had not got into this business—there's no use thinking of it, however. Here I am, and it must be done;" and advancing to Williams' side, who was a step or two before, he asked him something in a whisper.

"Hush!" said the depredator, in a low tone; "I thought I heard a whistle;" and creeping slowly on for about a quarter of a mile further, he looked out into the more open part of the park, still keeping himself beneath the shadow of the trees. At some two or three hundred yards' distance was a large clump of old elms, in advance of another portion of the wood, and Williams thought he saw something underneath them. After waiting for a minute he whispered to his companions, "Be ready to be off like a shot!" and then ventured a low whistle. It was answered the next minute, and the form of a man came out for a single instant into the moonlight, then retreated again, and was lost to the eye.

"That was like Maltby, wasn't it?" inquired Williams; and the gruff voice of the man Brown replied, "Ay, that's he."

After a short pause the whistle was repeated in the opposite wood, and Williams observed, "He is coming round. We must show him where we are." Thus saying, he uttered another whistle merely a single note, to which there was a reply somewhat nearer than before.

"Did you expect him here?" asked Alfred Latimer. "I thought he was to bring up the gig at the corner of the park."

"Ay, but he was to let me know if he heard anything fresh," was the ruffian's answer; and, after waiting for a few moments longer, they plainly heard a rustle in the wood, and the fall of a footstep. Williams put his hand in the pocket of his jacket, and drew out a pistol; but the next instant Malthy's voice was heard inquiring, "Where are you, Williams?"

"Here, here!" answered the other. "Is there any danger ahead?"

"No!" answered Maltby, coming up. "They are all gone quietly to bed; for I've been watching for this last half hour, and saw the lights put out in the different rooms."

"And what's the matter?" inquired Williams, sharply.

"Why, I thought you'd like to know," answered the young man, "that Edmonds sleeps at the house every night; so that unless you get hold of him first you may have a devil of a work."

"Ah!" said Williams, "how did you hear that, Bill?"

"Why, it was old Blackmore told me," answered the young man. "I went down this evening to ask where his son was, for he's never come back to the old place, and the old man took it kind, and was more civil than ordinary. I don't know whether he had any notion that I was in for the other affair that wouldn't answer, and mean't to give me a hint that it was no use to try again; but he told me quite of himself without my asking."

"Perhaps it isn't true," said Williams.

"Oh, yes, it is," rejoined the other, "for I went up afterwards to Mother Witherton at the lodge, and I found out from her that Edmonds sleeps in the little room near the library, where he can hear both ways what's going on at each side of the house."

"He shan't hear me till he sees me," answered Jack Williams, with a laugh; "but we must make him fast first, that's clear. I don't want to hurt him if he'll be quiet and hold his tongue; but, if not, I can't help it. Have you got the flint and steel, Brown? We may as well light the dark lantern, as there's likely to be more work than we thought."

A flint and steel were soon produced from the pocket of the worthy gentleman to whom he last spoke, and the dark lantern was speedily opened, lighted, and closed again.

"Now Bill, run and get the gig; quick, for I am determined this shall go through to-night," continued Williams.

"Hadn't you better cross the water with the punt, and start from the other side?" asked Maltby; "I left it on this side on purpose. There are some people still about at Mallington, and if I go rattling over the bridge in the gig I shall be sure to have folks looking at me."

"That's true," answered Williams; "and you're right, Master Bill. You can bring it down at the end of the lane, and then nobody will see it come or go."

This being agreed upon, Maltby slunk away through the woods again, and his three companions crept silently and stealthily on towards Mallington Hall. When they had reached the point of the wood nearest to the mansion they paused once more and gazed over the whole building. All was dark, however; no window showed a light; and, proceeding from one detached tree to another, they approached nearer and more near till they were within about fifty yards of the outbuildings and enclosed courts at the back of the house.

There was a large old walnut-tree grew close to the wall, and stretched its long and rugged arms over into the stableyard, and, once under its branches, their proceedings were quick and easy. Willams swarmed up the tree in a minute, walked along one of the thick overhanging boughs, and reached the top of the wall. He then aided his two companions to mount, and jumped lightly down upon a pile of straw and rubbish below. The other two descended as rapidly and noiselessly, and then, taking their way across the court, they approached a small door in the main building. Jack Williams had laid his schemes well. Applying the false key to the lock, he turned it with little or no sound, and then feeling for the latch, he raised it, pushed the door open, and listened. Every one held their breath; but all was as silent as the grave, and turning the shade of the lantern, Williams and his companion looked in. Nothing was seen, however, that could alarm them. A long narrow stone passage, with one or two empty tubs lying against the wall, was all that they saw, and Alfred Latimer, now plunged fully in, and knowing that all chance of retreat was out of the question, whispered to Williams, "I will show you the way. I know it well, and can find it in the dark, so you had better shade the lantern again."

"Not yet," said Williams in the same tone; "we may stumble over some of these d——d things in the passages. There is no one here to see, and in the great hall we shall get the moonlight through the windows, I should think."

Without reply, Alfred Latimer passed him and went on, drawing one of the pistols from his pocket, however, and cocking it.

"He's a bold young devil," murmured Jack Williams to himself as he followed, while Tom Brown came behind in silence. Thus proceeding they reached the end of that passage, turned into another at the left, and mounted three or four steps, for the house was built upon an irregular foundation. They then passed between the kitchen and servants' hall, the butler's pantry, and what was called the still-room, beyond which came a pair of folding-doors covered with baize, and having a stone staircase on the left hand. Here, however, they were brought to a sudden stop, for the folding-doors were bolted on the other side.

"Come up here," said Alfred Latimer. "This leads into the corridor above, then we can get down by the great stairs to the room where Edmonds sleeps."

"Better be at the plate-room at once," murmured Tom Brown.

"No, no!" replied Williams sharply, "that would ruin us altogether. We should have the women ringing the bell, and the man upon our backs. We must secure them all first; but let us put the crape over our faces, for there's no need of his knowing who we are."

This was soon done; and Alfred Latimer, when he gazed through the dull veil that was spread over his eyes and fastened behind his head at the countenances of his two companions, similarly disguised, fancied that it was impossible any one should recognize them. Then, after having taken off their shoes, the whole party mounted the stairs quietly, and passing along the corridor above, descended by the great staircase to the hall. All was still silent and tranquil, but when, passing through a passage at the back of the library, they approached a door at the end, they thought they heard a noise, and they stopped, Jack Williams approaching Alfred Latimer's side, ready to spring like a tiger upon any one who might come forth.

As they listened, however, the hard regular breathing of some one in a profound sleep was heard, and Williams whispered, "He's as sound as a hedgehog; but if he should wake, is there any other door to the room?"

"None that I know off," answered Latimer, without raising his voice.

"Then I'll soon send this one in if it should be fastened," rejoined Williams. "Here, Tom, hold the lantern while we try."

Poor Edmonds, however, had not taken the trouble to lock his door, and it opened easily at the first touch. The light of the lantern spread faintly round the chamber, showing to the eyes of the criminals the whole of the scene within. Edmonds was lying on the half tester bed on the other side of the room, partly but not wholly undressed, with his head pillowed on his arm, and still asleep. The slight sound of the opening door did not fully waken him; but either that noise or the light of the lantern caused him to turn somewhat on the bed and murmur a few indistinct words to himself. At this movement Williams suddenly drew a rope from his pocket, and sprang forward. Alfred Latimer followed, and both threw themselves upon the poor fellow, as he was starting up, roused by the noise they made. He was, as we have said, a powerful man, and he struggled for an instant vehemently with his assailants; but it was in vain he did so; and before he could put forth one half of his strength, he was overpowered, and his arms pinioned tightly behind. Not a word was spoken on either part; for Edmonds well knew that it was in vain to call for help, and the other two were not anxious that their voices should be heard. When the struggle was over, the park-keeper stood before his two opponents, gazing upon them sternly, while Alfred Latimer pushed the crape farther up over his forehead, from which it had been partly removed, and Williams laughed low, though perhaps with better feelings than might be supposed, for his triumph was more that he had succeeded without unnecessary violence, than that he had overcome in a contest where the odds were so greatly on his side. The man Brown stood dully at the door, with the lantern in one hand and a pistol in the other, quite ready to use the latter, if by any chance Edmonds had obtained even a temporary advantage.

"Well, my men, well!" exclaimed the park-keeper at length: but then suddenly he stopped, and, after a brief pause, added "But it's of no use—the game's up. It signifies not asking questions, or saying a word. I'm helpless now."

Neither Williams nor Alfred Latimer replied, but the former drew the latter aside, and whispered. "Stay you here and keep guard over him, sir," he said. "I can trust you, and you can trust me. But that fellow Brown, we cannot be sure of him, if our eyes are off him; and he is not unlikely to kick at us going over the house alone. Will you stay?"

He spoke eagerly and anxiously, and though the young man disliked the task, and would rather have had a share in anything more active, he replied, "Well, I will stay; but do not be long—you know where the women sleep. I should not wonder if all this noise had wakened them."

"No fear, no fear!" answered Williams; "but I will light the candle first;" and taking up the candlestick from the table, he carried it to the lantern, saying to Brown, after he had secured to Alfred Latimer the means of seeing while away, "come, my lad, we will go, while he remains on guard."

"Come along," answered Brown, in a louder tone than needful; and leaving the captive and his guard together, the two hurried along the passage and up the stairs to the top of the house. Williams had already made himself aware of the room in which the old housekeeper slept, and he was not long in finding it; but as he went he looked round for the rope of the alarum bell, which he at length found passing along the wall of the corridor through the flooring to the story below.

"Stand fast by that, Tom," he said; "and if the other woman comes while I am securing this one, seize her tight."

He then advanced to the door, and turned the handle; but it was locked, and a voice immediately demanded, in the accents of terror, "Who is there?"

"It's I—Edmonds," said the man, counterfeiting as well as he could the tone of the park-keeper; but without waiting for reply, he set his broad shoulder against the slight door, stretched his foot out to the other side of the narrow passage, and with this purchase pushed against the woodwork with all his strength. There came immediately a crashing sound, as of breaking wood, and then a shrill scream, evidently from two voices.

"Here, Tom!" exclaimed Williams, "they are both in here, bring the light!" and while Brown hurried up he applied his strength again with another effort, and the door was burst violently into the room.

Another shriek instantly succeeded; but Williams exclaimed fiercely, "Silence, or you shall pay for it with your lives! No one is going to hurt you if you keep still; but if either of you say a word more, or offer to stir, I will blow your brains out. Have you got any cord?" he continued, turning to his companion. "Tie that one while I do the same for this—silence, I say; if you would live a minute longer!" and calmly and deliberately he fastened the housemaid's arms behind her, while Brown, setting down the lantern, did the same office for the terrified old housekeeper.

"Now bring them along into another room," said Williams; "this door won't keep them in, and if they get out they'll be at the bell with their teeth, if not with their hands."

"I won't indeed, Mr. Robber," sobbed poor Mrs. Chalke; "that I won't. Take all I have, and spare my life. I'll do nothing at all, but be as quiet as a mouse."

"Silence!" said Williams, sternly; "bring them along, my lad. We'll make sure of them," and, dragged along the passage, the two trembling women were taken to a room looking to the park side of the house, where they were thrust in, and the door locked upon them.

"Now, Tom, to the plate-room," said Williams; so far all is right."

"Ha, ha!" cried Brown, with a joyful laugh, "this is capital!" and away they both hurried down the first flight of stairs to the large corridors and spacious rooms of the best sleeping floor.

"The room at the end," said Williams, thoughtfully, as if repeating a lesson he had learned. "It must be that one just over where the man slept;" and walking straight forward to the end of the long passage which ran between a long range of bed-chambers on either side, with occasional intervals to admit the light from the west, he paused opposite to a strong plated door at the further extremity.

"Here it is!" he said, gazing at it, and holding the lantern to the heavy lock. "It will be no easy job to get in, I fancy—I'll try the pick-locks first, however."

Thus saying, he took out the bunch of keys from his pocket, and tried one after the other without any success till the last was used, when the bolt of the lock was forced back. To the surprise of both the men, however, the door remained fast; and after some further examination, they discovered another keyhole higher up. On that the pick-locks proved ineffectual, and the small bar of steel which Williams had brought with him was next employed. Pressed between the door and the post, just opposite the refractory lock, it soon wrenched back a part of the iron plating, and tore off a portion of the wood. A large splinter was then forced away, showing the lock firmly shot into the plate opposite; but with the swallow-tailed end of the crow Williams contrived to push it back, and then, thrusting a hook into the keyhole, pulled the door open with ease. A number of large chests hooped with iron stood before them, but these offered no very serious impediment. Some were opened with the skeleton keys, others broken into with the crow-bar, and a far greater quantity of that sordid dross for which men so often risk their soul's salvation was exposed to their eyes than even their greedy hopes had ventured to expect.

"There, give me the bags," cried Williams; "he has got some more below, run and fetch them. We will only take what is most worth while, for there is more here than we can carry."

"Let us take all we can," said Brown; "I can carry a good deal, and we may as well fill our pockets and the bags, too," and thus saying he thrust his hand into a box where a number of guineas appeared piled up in regular rows, and grasped as many as he could.

"Hark!" cried Williams suddenly, and at the same moment the report of a pistol rang through the house. Williams snatched up the lantern; and, hurrying out, both ran down stairs as fast as they could.

CHAPTER LXVII.

We must now, dear reader, return for a short space to the room below, where we left Alfred Latimer and Edmonds, the park-keeper, in order to explain the cause of that unexpected sound which disturbed Williams and his companion in their course of pillage. No task, perhaps, could have been inflicted upon the unhappy young man more painful than that which he had undertaken to perform. Activity was at that moment a need; it was the only means of shutting out thought; it was the only veil which could hide from his own eyes the sight of what he had become. He felt that he was a felon; that the great moral Rubicon was passed; that the barrier had fallen behind him which for ever excluded him from a return to society; that all he had done before was light and venial compared with the deed of that night. But he would fain not have pondered upon his state; he would have hurried on in any course to escape reflection; he would even have willingly plunged into new crimes to escape from the dark impression of the one he had committed. It may seem strange that such should be the effect of remorse, but such is always the case when remorse is without repentance; and repentance is not either the fear of earthly punishment, or the consciousness of guilt; it is the deep and overpowering sorrow of the believer for having offended God. Remorse without repentance is despair. Such was what Alfred Latimer felt. He never thought of his offence to God. He was conscious of guilt; but he looked to no repentance—to no atonement—to no reformation. It was in relation to its effects upon himself, and in that alone he considered the crime he had committed; and with the spirit of Cain, he was ready to insult the Almighty by any new crime with sullen daring, from the very sense of the depth to which he had fallen. The hardening of the heart which so frequently follows wickedness, is surely a natural part of its punishment.

But there he stood condemned to inactivity, keeping guard over one whom he had already injured, and whom he hated because he had injured him. He glared at him through the black crape that covered his face with feelings difficult to describe—fierce, yet dull—ferocious, yet, in some degree, timid. He was angry with him for keeping him there, though it was not poor Edmonds's fault, and, with all the sophistry of the criminal heart, he went on in the same spirit to pile accusations in his own thoughts upon the other's head, striving to cast off a part of the burden of his guilt upon any other person in order to free himself from its overpowering weight.

"Ay," he thought, "curse him! if it had not been for him I should not have been what I now am. I should never have done this thing—I should not have been here at all. If he had not refused to let me marry Lucy when I offered honorably, all would have been right. My mother might have made a piece of work at first, but that would have soon blown by, and Louisa would have helped us—I know she would—and we should have all been comfortable. And now what has come of his cursed obstinacy and ill-temper. Here I shall very likely get hanged, and I dare say he would help to convict me. I wonder if he suspects anything? He looks at me devilish hard."

He longed to question the poor fellow, but did not dare to speak, though he thought once or twice that he could disguise his voice, so as not to sound familiar to Edmonds's ears. He hesitated, however, standing half way between the bed and the door, with the cocked pistol in his hand, and his eyes fixed upon his prisoner.

After waiting thus for about three or four minutes, while Edmonds remained sitting on the edge of the bed, still half bewildered with all that had just taken place, there came a crash as of breaking wood, and then a shrill scream. Voices were next heard speaking, and then some shrieks louder and more distinct than before. Edmonds started up, and advanced a step, exclaiming, "The bloody villains are hurting the poor women—a set of scoundrels!"

Alfred Latimer pointed the pistol at him, saying, in a feigned voice, "Keep back, or I'll blow your brains out;" and Edmonds paused, with his eyes fixed upon him, longing to spring forward and wrench the weapon from his hands, but feeling but too painfully how vain would be the attempt with his pinioned arms. The shrieks ceased, and all that could be heard was the sound of several voices speaking—some in the tones of supplication, some in those of menace or command. A woman's tongue, however, could be distinguished, and, as if relieved, the park-keeper sat down again, and bent his head thoughtfully. Alfred Latimer was well pleased with this change of attitude, for he did not like to have the eyes of Lucy's father fixed upon him; but still the question recurred to his mind, "I wonder if he suspects me?"

Shortly after, steps were heard above, and then, after a pause, came again a grating crash just over their heads, then another, and then a dull creaking sound, as of a door moving on hinges long disused. Edmonds seemed uneasy, and moved once or twice upon the side of the bed.

"They have broken into the plate room," he said at length, looking at Alfred Latimer again; "that's what they came for; and they've got it; but they'll all be hanged, that's one comfort."

The young man gazed at him fiercely; but remained silent, and after a minute or two had elapsed, during which time the various sounds of moving and breaking into the chests were heard below, the park-keeper spoke again—"They'll all be hanged, that's certain," he repeated, "for they are all known, and will be caught before to-morrow's over."

"Do you mean to say you know them, fool?" demanded Latimer, in a feigned voice, taking at the same time a step towards him.

"To be sure I do," replied Edmonds, rising, and confronting him boldly, and with a flashing eye. "It is you who are the fools, to think that a trumpery piece of crape would hide you."

Alfred Latimer trembled, but it was not with fear. "Who are they, then?" he demanded, grasping the pistol tighter in his hand.

"Why, Williams and the ruffian Brown," replied Edmonds at once, "they are clear enough."

"And I," said Alfred Latimer, in a very low tone, "who am I?"

"I know you well enough," answered the park-keeper, in a voice of deep sadness, "I wish to heaven I didn't."

"Speak! speak!" said the young man; "Who am I?"

"Why, one, bad as I believed him, whom I never thought to see at work like this," replied Edmonds; "the destroyer of my child."

The young man instantly raised the pistol as if to shoot him; but the sturdy park-keeper's eyes did not even wink, and he continued to gaze upon him sternly. Suddenly the youth dropped the muzzle again, saying, with an ill-feigned laugh, "You are mistaken. You have seen me often I know, but I am not the man you think. I am—I could tell you who; but I won't."

"It's no use, Mr. Latimer," answered Edmonds; "it's no use at all. I know you just as well as if your face were uncovered. I wish to heaven, I say, that I did not. You looked just now as if you were going to shoot me. I don't care a straw if you do. You have broken my heart, and made life a load; so finish all by taking it if you will. You have murdered my child's soul; you can but kill my body, as the Bible says."

The young man stared at him for an instant; then strode up to his side, and grasped him with his left hand by the shoulder, saying, in his natural voice, but low and stern, "Will you swear, so help you God, not to betray me?—will you, for Lucy's sake, if not for mine?"

"No!" replied Edmonds, in a resolute tone. "I think you as great a villain as ever lived, and far worse than the other two. Why should I punish them and not you?"

"Will you swear to give no information till this time to-morrow night?" asked Alfred Latimer, with a shaking voice. "Will you swear, man—will you swear? for if not, you must die, and my hand must stop your tongue."

Edmonds paused a single instant; but the next his own stout heart called him a coward even for that brief hesitation. "No," he said, "I will not. I will do my duty at once, and directly. I will neither tell a lie, nor consent to robbery, for any man on earth."

"But till to-morrow night," repeated Alfred Latimer, raising the pistol to the man's head. "Will you swear, till to-morrow night?"

"No, I won't," replied the park-keeper, setting his teeth close. "Make yourself a murderer if you will, as a robber and a deceiver."

The finger was pressed hard upon the trigger—the cock of the pistol fell—there was a flash and a report, and poor Edmonds staggered forward. "Oh, God!—Lucy!" he cried, and then fell forward upon the floor, with his feet beating the ground convulsively for a moment, after which all was still.

Alfred Latimer's arm dropped by his side the moment the deed was done; and there he stood gazing upon the dead man, while a stream of crimson blood flowed from amongst his hair and wandered slowly over the boards. Who that has not committed such a crime can tell the feelings which filled the murderer's bosom as he gazed? It was no rash blow, stricken in the midst of strife and rage—it was a calm deliberate act, perpetrated on one in his power, one who could not resist. There was no extenuating circumstance—nothing to palliate it—nothing to justify it, even to the lying heart of self. It was done from fear of discovery and punishment; it was cowardly as base, and base as cruel. He felt it all—all the magnitude of the offence, all its dark and terrible character—and for an instant his brain seemed to reel, his senses to be troubled, reason to be shaken on her throne. He would have fled anywhere; he would have done anything; he would have sought any refuge—the grave itself—to fly from that horrible consciousness. He thought suddenly of the other pistol, and drew it forth to raise it against his own life, but at that instant rapid steps were heard running down from above; he put the weapon up again, and it was just concealed when his two companions rushed into the room.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

The moment Williams entered the room he stopped short, gazing at the dead man; and Alfred Latimer instantly stepped up to him, saying, in a low tone, "I could not help it. He drove me to do it."

"Speak out, speak out!" cried Williams. "There's no use of whispering now. He can't hear you, man, that's clear enough. I'd have given a great deal, though, that this had not happened. What did he do?"

"He told me that he knew us all, and that he would inform."

"That might be all stuff," replied Williams, with a stern brow. "I don't think he could know us."

"Ay, but he named every one of us," answered Alfred Latimer, eager to palliate the deed even to his ruffian companions. "I could scarcely get him to name me, though he mentioned you and Brown outright at first. But he told me who I was plainly enough in the end."

"It could not be helped, then," said Williams. "It was his own fault; but I think I'd have tried to swear him to secrecy. He'd have kept his oath if he had taken it."

"I did try, I did try!" replied the young man, "but he refused—ay, even when the pistol was at his head he swore he would tell all the moment he was free. So I thought there was no use of waiting for you to do what I could do without you, and I fired."

"Served him devilish well right!" murmured Brown, but Williams was silent for several minutes, and he evidently regretted what had taken place, although he said, in the end, "Well, there was no help for it. If a man will be such a fool, he must take the consequences; and when a man's to be hanged for a robbery, they can't do worse to him for a murder. Yet I like the fellow's pluck, too; but the worst of pistols is, they make such a devil of a noise. It might be heard a good way off, in the stillness of such a night as this. 'Run to the round window, Tom; there's no shutter, and you can see well enough by the moonlight, over towards the keeper's cottage. Look out, and let us know if there's anybody coming."

"Don't go up to the plate-room till I'm back," answered Brown, always fearful of losing part of the money.

"No nonsense!" cried Williams, sternly. "Do as you are bid, and do not give me any of your insolence, or he shan't long lie there singly," and he pointed to the body of Edmonds.

The other ruffian was cowed and walked away, and Williams, turning towards Alfred Latimer, gazed at him for a moment as he stood with his arms folded, his brows knit, and a look of deep bitter gloom upon his face. The impression of his crime was spreading over him more and more darkly every moment. The heart of Cain was in his bosom, the curse of Cain upon his head. Some of the words of his companion, too, even in justifying the deed he had committed, had presented it in its blackest colors to his mind. He had heard it called murder. He had heard the courage and stern resolution, even to death, of the man he had slain applauded, and every thing seemed to force upon him the most horrible view of the act of his hands. He stood there brooding gloomily over his own crime, till at length Williams, who divined in some degree what was passing in his breast, interrupted his reverie by saying, "Come, Mr. Latimer, it can't be helped. It was his own fault. He would have it, and so he got it. It was very easy for him to say he wouldn't tell, and your life is as good to you as his, so you had no choice. Your only way now is to make poor Lucy all the better husband."

Alfred Latimer suddenly put his hand to his head, as if some terrible pang shot through his brain; but the moment after he answered, "So I will, so I will. But will she ever see me again after this?"

"Pooh! nonsense," cried Williams; "she will know nothing about it. Her father's death was necessary to her husband's safety, and if we are not fools ourselves there's no chance of how it happened ever reaching her ears. Come, let us be off, and get what we can. There's a devil of a deal more money than I thought for. So perhaps it will be better to leave the plate behind. I like your resolution, sir, in settling the affair with this poor fellow yourself. Many a man, and a brave man, too, would have waited for us to come down; but there's nothing like being decided in these matters. We won't leave him there, however. Let us put him on the bed."

Thus saying, he took the corpse by the shoulders, and, though unwillingly, Alfred Latimer did not like to refuse to bear a part; so, lifting the body of poor Edmonds between them, they laid him on the bed where he had been sleeping, and then turned towards the door.

"I wonder where that fellow, Brown, can be," said Williams. "Why, you have got your self all over blood, Mr. Latimer. But never mind, come along, you can have Brown's smock-frock till we change your things."

Thus saying, he led the way out of the room and up the stairs again towards the plate-room, where the lantern had been left burning on the floor. They found Brown at the door, and though some sharp words passed between him and Williams, they did not discover whether he had been in the room or not. They entered, however, and the sight of all the wealth that the late Earl of Mallington had there accumulated soon drove, from the thoughts of Williams at least, all memory of the deed that had been done below. Alfred Latimer, less accustomed to scenes of blood, was longer in recovering himself at all; but when a change did take place it ran into a greater extreme, and became the sort of wild intoxication of despair. He talked, he even laughed, when loading himself with the money and the trinkets they found. His words were wild and whirling, it is true, like those of a man half inebriated; but Williams encouraged him to go on, sometimes by a jest and a light speech, sometimes by representing the sort of fierce decision which he had shown as the brightest of all qualities in the course before them, so that at length the young man did not feel sure that the bloody deed he had committed was not a great act.

It was speedily decided that all the heavier articles of plate should be left, and in about a quarter of an hour after their return to the plate-room they had possessed themselves of even a larger booty than they expected. When this was done they descended to the hall again, and Williams said, "I will go and put out that light."

"A devil of a deal better just pop it to the curtains of the bed," said Brown; "then there would be one grand blaze, and the whole job would be over, and no one know anything about it."

"No," said Williams, sternly, "that's needless. The women don't know us, and there's no use of hurting them. No more of such stuff, Master Brown; you've made me devilish angry more than once to-night, and the next time you shall feel it."

There was a flashing of his eye that was not to be mistaken, and Brown remained silent, while the other entered the room where poor Edmonds lay, and blew out the candle. They then threaded the various passages of the house by the light they carried till they reached the door by which they had entered. There the lantern was also extinguished, and issuing out into the yard, they easily got over the wall into the open ground of the park. Taking for some way the course they had pursued in coming, they kept among the trees as far as possible, till, turning towards the river, they were obliged once or twice to cross the clear spaces in the park.

All was still and silent, however, the clear moon shining calm and peacefully over the glades and dells, not a sound but the whispering of the light breeze among the trees and the fern, no sight of a living thing but when they startled a herd of deer or roused a hare to scamper away in the moonlight. Nothing could form a stronger contrast than the scene without, in its clear, cool, lustrous tranquillity, with the fierce and agitating passions within the bosoms of those unhappy men. They seemed to feel it each in their degree, and they all remained perfectly silent, till at length, when they came among the trees by the river side, Williams stopped and proposed to Brown that he should give his smock-frock to Alfred Latimer. The inferior ruffian, however, did not choose to part with it without compensation, and exacted a guinea as the price of the garment. Williams swore at him, and Alfred Latimer felt inclined to strike him, for there was an insolent familiarity in his tone which showed him painfully how he himself had sunk. There was no help for it, however, and, paying the money, he took the smock-frock and drew it over his other dress, which had before been altered, as we have said, to make him look as much like a countryman as possible. Approaching the little creek where poor Lucy had been carried not long before, they now looked out for the punt, which they found lying quietly at the bank. As they got in, however, what between agitation and the load he carried, Alfred Latimer stumbled and his hat fell into the river. Brown, who was already in the boat, strove to catch it with the pole, but in so doing he pressed it down and it filled and sank.

"That's devilish unlucky!" cried Williams; "what's to be done now?"

"Why, I must go home," said Alfred Latimer, "and change my dress altogether. I can put these things away where nobody will find them, and one of the girls of the house, I dare say, will let me in—at all events, I can get up one of the windows; I know how, I've done it before."

"You must be quick, then," said Williams, as they pushed away into the stream, "for we must be far off before daylight, and it's past twelve now."

"Past twelve!" cried Alfred Latimer. "I thought it was two or three."

"Ay, but these things are sooner done than you think of," answered Williams. "There's Maltby, I fancy, standing on the shore. We'll wait for you at the cottage, by the common, where you took Lucy, if you will run up the back lanes to the house. Only don't be long, and mind you stow away the things where they can't be found."

"No fear, no fear," replied Latimer; and the boat pushed on to the bank, where the form of Bill Maltby became more and more distinct, as they approached. The horse and gig, however, were not to be seen, though at that spot the road which ran along that bank of the river came close to the water's edge; and Williams's first salutation to his accomplice was an inquiry as to the cause of this deficiency.

"Hush!" said Maltby; "don't speak loud. Harry Soames has got a warrant against you, Jack, and learning that you were at the Hog-in-Armour, farther down, he's gone to see if he can nab you. He doesn't want, that's the fact, but he was obliged to go down, and so he told me all about it, when I met him. I took the horse up to the back of the common, and there left him and the gig, because Harry must come back this way. He'll be half an hour first, however, so there's plenty of time; but still we had better be off as quick as possible."

"We're a match for him if he does come," answered Williams, stepping out of the boat; "but there's no use risking anything, or breaking a man's head if one can help it. So let us start. Fasten the boat, Tom—there, hook it on to that stump. That will do. Now, sir, don't be long, for we can't wait above three quarters of an hour."

"You had better not wait at all," said Maltby, "for the place is all in a bustle. They say there's a warrant out against that swell cove, Mr. Morton, too, who the fools fancy had a hand in the last business up at the hall. They say he's nothing but a lawyer's clerk, run away with his master's money."

"Pooh!" cried Williams—"come along—be quick, sir, be quick."

Alfred Latimer turned away without reply, and hurried up the lane towards Mallington House. He paused not for an instant, for dread and anxiety were behind and drove him on; but yet he could not go so fast that thought did not catch him. The scenes of his boyhood and his youth were all around him; and in a few minutes the house where all the brightest memories of early years were stored rose before his eyes. "What had he not cast away?" he asked himself, as he saw it standing out in the calm moonlight, "What had he not lost? Peace, station, friends, esteem, perhaps life, were all gone. Fury, passion, dark remorse, haggard despair were thenceforth to be the fell companions of his way, tearing his heart with their iron fangs as he went." Ere he could stop the reproachful voice from within memory seemed in a moment to present to his eyes all that he had done amiss through life; the waywardness of boyhood, the obstinacy and violence of after years, the vices and follies of early manhood. Oh! how he wished that he had been different—that he had listened to warnings—endured reproof—followed good counsel—seized the opportunity of amendment whenever it was offered—repented ere it was too late. So it is with every one who does wrong. Sooner or later a time comes when the better heart, plunged in dark despair, sums up the goodness of God cast away, and asks, with fruitless longing, "Can these things never come again?"

He was half frenzied at the thought; but still dread of detection, shame, punishment were even stronger than despair; and at a spot where he had often passed before on some wild frolic, he leaped the garden wall and approached the house.

The means that he employed to procure entrance have been already detailed; but, between the time of his seeing Louisa above, and of her coming down to give him admission, a dark and shameful scheme suggested itself to his mind, which he proceeded to put in execution. The fiend called Fear drives man but too frequently to darker crimes than any other passion, and as Alfred Latimer stood there by the door the words which Maltby had used in regard to Mr. Morton recurred to his remembrance. "I will put these clothes in his room," he thought, "if they fancied he had something to do with the other attempt upon the hall, they may suspect him about this, and that will give me time to get off." A consciousness of the terrible baseness of his design came over him, even while such ideas passed through his mind, but the means of glossing over any crime that Satan prompts are never wanting, and he went on to palliate that which he was determined to perform, saying, "He will soon be able to prove himself innocent. It can but be a day or two in prison to him, and it might be death and destruction to me."

At that moment the door was opened, and he went in, hurrying past Louisa, as we have said, and seeking his own room in the first place, when he stripped off the attire in which he had come thither, and clothed himself from head to foot in a fresh and unstained dress. Then, after disposing of the money somewhat better about his person than he had done before, he gathered up the bloody clothes, tied them together, and carrying them into Morton's room, put them cunningly away at the far back part of an open door. Crime never remembers every precaution, however, and in the trepidation and gloom of his mind he forgot more than one. But without pausing to do more than we have said, he hurried away, descended to Louisa's room, and held some conversation with her through the door, as we have before mentioned. Thence, descending to the hall, he issued out once again into the garden, whence, after walking through the shrubberies and leaping over the wall, he pursued his way to the common, where, at the appointed spot, he found his companions waiting with the horse and gig.

Williams had grown impatient, and was upon the very eve of setting off, when Alfred Latimer made his appearance. "Here, jump in," he cried. "There is room enough for us three, and it doesn't much signify if we break the horse's wind, for we must kill him, and break the gig to pieces, to prevent them telling tales of how we went. Maltby's got his money, Mr. Latimer, so you owe me a hundred pounds. I've paid him for all. He's to do the business with Levi, too, and has sworn upon his honor to send us the money when we tell him where, so you had better give him the rings and bracelets and stuff that you've got about you, for they only tell tales."

Alfred Latimer silently did what he was directed, and having placed himself somewhat inconveniently between Williams and Brown, the horse received a lash from the whip, and started off along the road over the hills. He was a strong, high-spirited, bony animal, who had been ill used, and rendered unfit for anything but the sort of work upon which he was now employed. But the goodness of his original breeding was still manifest, and he would have dropped down dead sooner than give up. On they went, then, at a furious pace, up hill and down dale for about seven miles, when at the side of the road they saw a post-chaise broken down, and with one of the wheels off, standing by the side of the road. The horses and the driver were gone, and as the party in the gig were not upon an expedition of pleasure, they paused not to examine what was the nature of the accident, but dashed past as fast as they could go. At length, upon the rise of the highest hill, which was about twelve miles from Mallington, Williams, who was driving, pulled in the horse a little, and let him take it more leisurely.

"They can't catch us now," he said; "and it would not do to have him break down before we are near the town."

The rest of their journey consequently occupied more time, so that it was nearly four o'clock in the morning when they came within three miles of the place to which their steps tended.

Williams then pulled up altogether, saying, "There should be a chalk-pit here, Mr. Latimer, I think."

"It's further on," answered the young man; "I've seen it once or twice as we have passed coming close to the side of the road."

"What the devil do you want a chalk-pit for?" asked Tom Brown. "I can't make out what you are up to?"

"To put the horse and gig in, to be sure," replied Williams. "What would you have us do with them, you fool. We can't send them back without showing which way we came; and if we were to leave them at the inn while we go on to the sea, it would soon set all the people talking."

"But how are we to get on?" asked Brown.

"Walk, to be sure," answered Williams. "Ay, and we must go all the way round, too, and come in by the other side. That will just fill up the time, for I don't want to come to the inn before daylight. Then we are to be a wedding party, you know. The marriage won't take above ten minutes; and then Mr. Latimer can set off in a chaise with his lady, and we can follow immediately after. It will be the best blind that we could have, so it all turns out lucky. But I'll tell you all about it, and what you are to do, Tom, when we get to the inn."

Alfred Latimer had remained as silent as the grave while his marriage was named; but after a pause, during which Williams whipped the horse on, he asked in a low voice, almost a whisper, "Won't all this marriage delay us too long? It can't take place till nine o'clock."

"Oh dear, no," answered Williams, carelessly. "They'll not find out anything of the job at the hall till seven or eight, then they'll have to carry the news to the magistrates, and then there will be all the fuss and bustle of taking evidence and examining the premises; so that they will not start after us till eleven or twelve, even if their suspicions lead them this way, which is not at all likely. I'd bet a crown they go to Sturton first, and spend half the day there. They know of your being here, sir; but as they have no reason to believe you have anything to do with it, and the only people left living to tell—I mean the old women—saw no one but Brown and me, there's every chance in life that they will take any road but the right one, especially if the horse and gig are not heard of for some time. Ay, there's the pit; I see the railing."

The chalk-pit, close by which Williams stopped the minute after, was a deep excavation which had been carried, as Latimer had said, close to the side of the road—even closer, indeed, than modern road surveyors would permit. When it could be brought no further in that direction, which was the one wherein the chalk was the best, the excavation had ceased, though, as the stratum was deep, not before it had been carried down some fifty or sixty feet perpendicular. The only thing which formed a barrier between this pit and the road was a frail old wooden railing, decayed with time and weather, and towards this slight obstacle Williams, as soon as he and his companions had got out of the gig, turned the back of the vehicle, then suddenly reining the horse back he jammed the two wheels violently against the bar. The rotton wood-work gave way in a moment, and the wheels rolling over the edge dragged the horse back upon his haunches. He made a violent effort to save himself, but a sudden jerk of the bridle in his mouth threw him back, and over he went sheer down to the bottom. A wild sort of scream came up as the poor animal fell, and Williams, saying coolly "there, that's done," walked on with his two companions.

CHAPTER LXIX.

It was in the pretty little church of St. Stephen the Martyr, in the town of ——, at nine o'clock in the morning precisely, that the clergyman of the place waited calmly in his surplice near the door of the vestry. He was a middle-aged man, with some appearance of good living about his well-filled close-shaven cheeks; and, to say the truth, as his usual breakfast hour was nine, and he had put it off for half an hour to perform the ceremony to which he was called, he heartily wished that the pair about to be united in holy matrimony would appear. I do not exactly know, and will not take upon me to say, that had he thought their eagerness would have rendered such a step expedient, he might not have been induced to give the hands of the clock a certain degree of uncanonical rapidity: thinking it a very venial sin, if "felons hang that jurymen may dine," to give a little acceleration to the hour which was to tie two people in a softer band, especially when his own breakfast was waiting.

It was a very pretty church, as I have said, built in the style of other days, with numerous round arches and deep mouldings, such as Normans loved; and the worthy rector was, indeed, somewhat proud of it, taking much pleasure in pointing out to occasional visitors the various grotesque figures which ornamented different parts of the building—tending certainly not much to edification in its usual sense—and descanting learnedly upon the styles which were to be remarked in this place or that, and sometimes moralizing a little over the dust of the many generations which had passed away since the hands that reared the edifice had mouldered in the grave. But, on the present occasion, with an empty stomach, the worthy clergyman was not at all disposed for such exercitations. He had royal authority for thinking that "it is bad talking between a full man and a fasting;" and therefore when, the minute after the clock of the church had struck the hour, he saw two gentlemen—one in clerical attire—enter through the half-open door, he immediately retreated into the vestry, saying to himself "They must be come to see the church; but they must wait if they want me to explain things to them."

As he stood within the vestry door, he heard a few words pass between the clerk and the strangers, and then the creaking of a pew. The rector was somewhat puzzled; but the minute after the clerk appeared and nodded his head with a solemn inclination, to announce that some, at least, of the wedding party had arrived. The rector then came forth and perceived nearest to the communion table a young man somewhat pale, and with a wild and haggard eye, dressed in fashionable attire, with an older man by his side, stout, dark, and apparently somewhat inferior in station to himself, while through the door of the church were seen coming a fair young girl, leaning on the arm of a respectable looking old man dressed in his best, in whom the rector instantly recognized one of his own parishioners. He was, as we have shown, in no humor for asking many questions; but still, as, upon the whole, he was a conscientious person, before he proceeded to perform his functions he drew the good gardener aside, and addressed some inquiries to him. What the other answered matters not much; but the rector was satisfied, and advanced again, saying, "Oh! very well." The clerk arranged the parties in order, and the ceremony proceeded. To those who looked on, and knew not what was passing in the breast of any there present, it presented few incidents at all remarkable. The rector, indeed, observed that the bridegroom acted as a mere automaton in the hands of those around him—that he sometimes made the responses aloud, sometimes murmured something, which might be assent or not, for no one could hear what it was—that his eye looked wild, and that once or twice he turned, and gazed over his shoulder. But as forced marriages, by parochial or other authority, were very common in those days, the clergyman concluded that in this case the young gentleman had been forced by the friends of the bride to do her justice, when he was otherwise inclined, and that the act was not at all a pleasant one to him. The only objection he could see to this supposition was a momentary indication of affection, which the bridegroom had displayed towards the fair trembling being who was so soon to be united to him by a holy tie, as they came near the communion table, when he suddenly grasped her hand, and murmured, "Dear Lucy," in a tone full of melancholy but of deep feeling. The rector also remarked that when he was reading the warning to confess if there were any impediment to their marriage, the bridegroom, at the words, "As ye will answer at the dreadful day of judgment, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed," turned deadly pale, and seemed to stagger where he stood. The concluding words, therefore, were pronounced in a more solemn and urgent tone; but they produced no further effect. The banns had been regularly published, and the ceremony went on to its close.

But had the eye of man been able to penetrate the human heart, and see all the dark things that it contains, what a terrible scene would have been disclosed by the bosom of Alfred Latimer. There he stood before the altar with the only woman he had ever loved, with the only woman towards whom, perhaps, he had ever entertained one purer or higher feeling. He had loved her notwithstanding all the wrong he had done her, notwithstanding all the evil he had inflicted, notwithstanding the misery and wretchedness which he was ready, either from caprice or passion, to inflict upon her afterwards; nay, more, he loved her still, and the very desolation of his heart, the feelings of despair that had seized upon him, made him cling to her affection—made him feel that it was the only thing left to him in existence—made him look upon it as a ray of comfort in the midst of the utter darkness that surrounded him. He stood with her before the altar, but under what circumstances? With her father's murder upon his head—his cold deliberate murder—with the blood of him who gave her being still hot and reeking upon his hand—with the image still present to his eyes of her parent lying before him, struggling in the agonies of death. When her hand clasped his it seemed as if it scorched him with the touch; the fire of hell seemed to spread along every nerve, and flow through every vein, and when the awful adjuration of the priest was pronounced, calling up the vague images of death and judgment, and eternal condemnation, and the opening of the book in which all the dire secrets of humanity stand recorded, it seemed as if the everlasting doom was already ringing in his ears—as if the Almighty fiat had gone forth of unchanging torture and despair.

Yet he went on, yet he struggled up, yet he would not abandon the purpose of making her his. It seemed to him as if for her sake he had done all this, as if for that consummation he had loaded his soul with guilt and brought down judgment on his head. It was but a vague impression that would not bear examination; but like one of those deep and heavy mists that do not exclude all light, but yet cut off the view of everything but themselves, it settled thick and obscure around him. He fancied it was so, and that was enough; that it was all to end in this—that all that had gone before was but as steps leading to this conclusion, and she seemed to grow dearer to him than she had ever been before from the contrast between her love and all that surrounded it.

The ceremony was as briefly got over as possible, not a word more was said than was absolutely necessary; but when it came to an end Alfred Latimer seemed scarcely to know that it had concluded. The monosyllable "Come!" from Williams's lips, however, roused him, and paying the fees, he led his bride to the church door. A chaise was there in waiting, packed with all the little articles which had been accumulated at the gardener's cottage, and the man Brown was standing by its side. Lucy got in, her husband followed, the door was closed, and the post-boy, according to his previous orders, drove off at a rapid rate towards the nearest seaport. Poor Lucy had not seen her lover since the Saturday before. She had received a hurried note from him that morning, dated at the time, telling her to pack up everything, and have all prepared, and he would join her at the church. The words were somewhat wild, and the hand-writing shaken and irregular, but yet the note had made Lucy very happy. When she saw him in the church, however, his pale and haggard look, his wild and abstracted manner alarmed her much; but still he had kept his promise; he had made her his wife; he had even testified his strong affection for her in so doing; and as they drove out of the town she laid her hand on his, and said, "Thank you, Alfred, thank you!"

Alfred Latimer cast his arms round her, drew her vehemently to his bosom, and pressed his lips on hers.

But we must return to the church.

Williams and Brown and the good gardener walked away together. The latter seemed inclined to stay and gossip with them; but Williams thrust a couple of guineas into the man's hand, saying, "There, my good friend. The gentleman left that for you, in case there should be anything broken, or out of order in your lodging. Good day;" and without further ceremony, he turned in another direction, and hurried off.

The rector hastened home to his breakfast, after speaking a word or two to the clerk; and the clerk, walking up to the door of a pew, opened it, to give exit to Mr. Quatterly and Dr. Western.

"Well, my dear sir, that's all over," said the worthy solicitor; "and so you are now satisfied on that score. She's bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh; so that account being put in order, we have nothing to detain us here for more than an hour, I should think; and, with your good leave, we will order a chaise, and be off for Mallington."

"Most willingly," replied Dr. Western, "for I am most anxious to be back;" and thus saying, he issued out of the church porch, crossed the little burying-ground around it, and entered the street.

"Ha! who have we got here?" cried Mr. Quatterly, "our sagacious Dogberry posting away as if for life. Good morning, Mr. Higginthorp, good morning; what news stirring, Mr. Constable? Anything from our young friend in quod? 'Pon my life you had better let him out, or you'll get into a scrape."

"Let him out!" cried Mr. Higginthorp, tapping the side of his nose sagaciously with his forefinger. "No, no; whatsomever any one says I shall keep him safe. Why, sir, he's confessed quite woluntary to being a cessory before the fack to an inhuman robbery as was to be committed by the notorious Jack Williams this here last night as was at Mallington Hall."

"Jack Williams!" exclaimed Dr. Western; "why that's the very man who was here not a minute ago. He turned the corner with the other fellow just as we came out."

"Thems the men! thems the men!" said Mr. Higginthorp. "Which way did they go, your worship?"

"Towards the High-street, I think," said Dr. Western.

"Then I'll be after them like winkey," rejoined the constable. "You, gentlemen, toddle off to Mr. Muzzlewell's house, as soon as I've got 'em I'll bring 'em down. If I can but get a grab of that feller's collar I'm a made man;" and thus saying, he set off running with a degree of activity which neither his bulk nor his peculiar conformation seemed at all to promise.

CHAPTER LXX.

The morning shone bright over Mallington Park and Mallington village. The river glistened in the early sunshine, the trees waved their leaves, touched with autumnal yellow, in the light air, as if seeking for refreshment; a cloud or two, thin, small, and high up, drifted away overhead on the quick breeze. All was gay and peaceful; but the windows of the hall remained closed, the chimneys gave forth no smoke, and the great door, which usually was flung back soon after daybreak, showing the glass door within, stood firm as it had been fastened the night before. These were unusual things, yet, strange to say, they remained without notice till near eight o'clock. It had been the common custom of poor Edmonds, the park-keeper, since he had made a practice of sleeping at the hall, to go upon his round straight from the house before he returned to his wife and son; the gamekeepers and workmen who had been lately taken into employment went their several ways, sure to meet him or be visited by him in the course of the morning; and old Blackmore, the gardener, with the man who assisted him, proceeded at once to the garden, which lay at a little distance from the mansion.

Mrs. Edmonds, who had charge of the cows, usually milked them at an early hour of the morning, and sent up what was wanted at the hall by her son; but for more than a fortnight she had been later than before, for hers was a heavy heart just then, and it is wonderful how slow a heavy heart will make the limbs. It was eight o'clock, then, when the boy, carrying a small can of milk and a basket of butter, walked leisurely up to the terrace and went round to the back door. He looked up to the windows, and marvelled to see them all shut; but his was not the period of fears and apprehensions, though he was a quick, clever, thoughtful boy, and he only said to himself, "The old folks have overslept themselves;" but when he found the back door fastened, his surprise became mingled with alarm, and, after trying another entrance on that side, he knocked hard with his hand, and rang the bell sharply, his heart beginning to beat with doubt and terror. Immediately there was a noise above, and looking up he saw the face of the housemaid at a window, pale, haggard, and wild. For a moment she did not seem disposed to open it, for fright had nearly deprived her of her senses; but when the boy moved a little way back so that she could see him fully, and shouted to her "What's the matter?—what's the matter?" she threw up the sash, exclaiming "They have broken into the house, and locked us all in."

"Where's my father?" demanded the boy, in terror. "I can't get in; where's my father?"

"I don't know, I don't know," answered the housemaid. "I heard his gun go off; but I don't know any more."

At the same moment the old housekeeper, Mrs. Chalke, appeared at the window, somewhat reassured by the sound of the boy's voice, for up to that moment they had not felt certain that the robbers were not still in the house. "Run and call somebody," she said, "run and call somebody, there's a good boy, and try and get in and let us out."

The boy pondered for an instant, for his first thought was to run home and tell his mother; but he was, as we have said, of a thoughtful and considerate mind; he was terrified himself for his father, and he immediately recollected that his news would alarm his other parent, before he had arrived at any certainty.

"I will go and call old Blackmore and Wilkins from the garden," he said, and setting down the milk and the basket with the butter, he ran off at full speed.

His news carried consternation and alarm to the gardeners. Each dropped the implement with which he was working, and gazed upon the boy as if utterly confounded; but old Blackmore recovered himself in a minute, and crying "Come along, Wilkins. Take a pickaxe, we'll soon get in. Run away, my dear, down to the lodge, and send up any of the people you can meet, especially the gamekeepers," he trudged off as fast as he could go, with a strong hoe in his hand, and was soon under the windows of the house. He found the task of breaking in, however, more difficult than he had anticipated. He first tried the back door, encouraged by the housekeeper and housemaid above, who continued to pour forth on him and his companion from the window the tale of the preceding night's terrible adventures—how their door had been burst open by men with their faces covered with crape; how they had been dragged from their beds, and locked up in the room where they then were; and how they had heard an awful smashing and breaking, and a gun fired below.

"Poor Edmonds!" said old Blackmore, shaking his head and working away with redoubled energy, "I doubt they've done him a mischief."

The door, however, resisted all his efforts; he tore a large splinter off the bottom with his pickaxe; but he was as far from his end as ever, when Mrs. Chalke called from above "Try one of the windows, John Blackmore, try one of the windows. You'll get in easier so."

The gardener was just about to follow her suggestion when two of the gamekeepers came running up, with young Edmonds following as fast as his lesser limbs would let him. Many were the questions asked and answered; but the old gardener worked away, and with their assistance soon effected an entrance by one of the windows. When they got into the room beyond, however, Mrs. Chalke's precautions acted to prevent them proceeding any further, for the door was locked, and they had to get out of the window again in order to commence operations in another quarter. It then struck him that the boy's account of all the doors being fast might not be quite accurate, and, some running one way and some another, all were tried, till at length one of the gamekeepers exclaimed "They must have got in some how. Perhaps the door in the stable yard is open. Here, hold my gun; I'll run and see."

He first tried the great gates, but they were shut, and then following exactly the course which Williams and his companions had pursued, he got into the yard, and almost immediately after his voice was heard exclaiming "Here, here! This is the way," and the whole party scrambled over, and found him at the entrance of the passage, with the door wide open.

All was dark within, and a feeling of awe even mastered curiosity, for none knew what they might meet with next. They paused for an instant; but then the boy passed them all, crying "Oh, my father! I wonder what they have done to father."

"Come along," cried Blackmore; "open some of the windows as we go, Wilkins. One of you fellows run and let the women out."

But, notwithstanding this desire, there were busy feelings among them that kept them altogether. The silence, the darkness of the house, had something terrible in it; but still they went on, opening the windows as they passed, till they reached the hall, where Blackmore paused; but the boy, becoming more and more terrified in regard to his father every moment, exclaimed "This way, this way, Blackmore. He used to sleep in the room up here."

"Stay a minute, my dear," said the gardener, laying his hand upon young Edmonds's head. "Tom, you come on with me; better let the men go on first, my dear," and walking forward with sad misgivings in his heart, he opened the door of poor Edmonds's room. The passage was obscure, the windows were closed, and the interior was quite dark; but there was no sound, and the old gardener, advancing cautiously, opened the shutters. "My God!" cried one of the men who was behind him, and, turning quickly round, the old gardener saw the floor covered with blood, and the dead body of his good friend lying on the bed. The four men gathered round, and it was long before any one ventured to speak; but in the midst of the deep silence a loud and wailing cry burst from behind them, and Blackmore, turning, threw his arms round the poor boy, while the tears dropped heavily from his own eyes.

"Better go away, my dear, better go away," he said. "Here, Wilkins, take him down to my cottage. Don't let him go home just yet. I'll to your mother, and comfort her as well as I can. Go away, there's a good boy; this is no sight for you."

The boy was quite passive in their hands, and, taking him by the arm, Wilkins led him away, while the old gardener whispered "As soon as you have taken him to my wife, run over and fetch Dr. Western. You had better get the constable, too, and send word to the other magistrates."

"Shall I bring the doctor?" asked Wilkins as he was going out of the door. But Blackmore took up poor Edmonds's hand, let it drop again stiff and cold upon the bed, and shook his head mournfully.

"You may as well, however," he said; "the poor widow may want him."

They then proceeded to examine the house and to release the two women who were shut up above. The object and proceedings of the robbers, as far as any traces of them remained, were soon discovered, and the story of Mrs. Chalke and the housemaid told over and over again. Edmonds's gun was found in the housekeeper's room; and as Mrs. Chalke and the housemaid both declared that the door leading into the yard had been locked when they went to bed the night before, it was clear that the lock had been picked, and entrance effected by that means. The whole party immediately applied themselves to look for footsteps, and, though they were somewhat puzzled by their own, which crossed the yard in a direct line, they found a number of others both going and coming.

"Here are three sizes clear enough," said Blackmore. "Take care, don't tread amongst them. This is a very big one, and here's one a little less, and then a small one, not much bigger than a woman's. Let us leave them till the magistrates come. I dare say we shall be able to trace them out in the park, for they must have crossed the road somewhere, and the gravel is soft."

Following his advice, they returned into the house, and endeavored to ascertain from the two women the appearance of the men they had seen; but, as usually happens in such cases, terror had very much troubled the vision of Mrs. Chalke and her companion; and though the description they gave somewhat resembled Brown, the picture they painted was anything but like Williams, to whom they gave at least three or four inches in height more than he could lay any claim to. They both agreed, however, that one was much taller than the other.

"There must have been three of them, at least, Mrs. Chalke," said Blackmore.

"We only saw two," answered the housekeeper.

"Ay, but I'm sure I saw a man's head at the end of the passage," exclaimed the housemaid.

"And I thought I heard people speaking below as they dragged me along," said Mrs. Chalke.

While this conversation was going on two or three people came hurrying up from Mallington, the news having been spread by Wilkins as he went down. No magistrates appeared, however; but at length the constable came, full of bustle and importance, in a case which he thought worthy of his genius. From him it was first learnt that Dr. Western was absent from Mallington, and that Mr. Middleton had been sent for; and in about half an hour after, that gentleman was seen galloping across the park at full speed. By this time the place was full of people, half the village having turned out as the news had been diffused from house to house, and from mouth to mouth; and it was with great difficulty that Blackmore and the constable could prevent them from running all over Mallington Hall before the magistrates arrived, for everybody was determined to see the body of poor Edmonds and the plate-room which had been broken into, and very much disappointed at even being delayed in gratifying their curiosity. Miss Mathilda Martin, who was amongst the first, had nearly forced her way over all impediments, and got into a serious dispute with Blackmore, when he stopped her, by gently insinuating in the heat of the moment that she dared say he had something to do with it himself, or he wouldn't try to prevent people from seeing with their own eyes. As soon as Mr. Middleton appeared, she was the first to attack him, approaching with an air of great familiarity and consequence, and shaking her head ruefully.

"Ah, sir," she said, "I knew what would happen—I was quite sure of it. I told you so. When such people are suffered to be about a place there is sure to be some mischief. He was not always hanging about here for nothing. He might have murdered us all in our beds, the bloody-minded villain. It's not my fault; I gave all the information I possessed."

"There, get out of the way," cried Harry Soames roughly, "and let his worship come in and examine. You had better go home and measure out your ribands, Miss Martin. This is no place for women or gossiping either."

The fair Mathilda was exceeding wroth; but she knew that it would not do to quarrel with the constable, and therefore governed her anger. In the meanwhile Mr. Middleton, under the guidance of Harry Soames, proceeded, step by step, to examine into the whole affair, and then, without expressing any opinion, asked for pen and ink, saying, "We had better wait for Sir Simon Upplestone; but, in the meantime, I will send a note."

The pen and ink were soon procured, and, sitting down at a table in the library, Mr. Middleton began to write the note he spoke of, while Harry Soames stood scratching his head before him, and looking wondrous wise. At first the magistrate did not remark him; or at least did not observe the peculiar expression of his countenance, for there was an immense gabble in the adjacent rooms; but immediately after, raising his eyes in search of a thought, of which he himself had not many to spare, he suddenly perceived the constable, and the constable's look. Now, Mr. Middleton was a man who, though of a decided tone, was not naturally of a decided character, and though he often led others who were a step weaker, still he was always led himself when he came in contact with any one stronger in mind. With such sort of people there is nothing so embarrassing as a doubtful expression of countenance. I have seen a whole congregation of strong resolutions put to flight in a moment by a shake of the head and an elevation of the eye-brows, and a shrug of the shoulders has discomfited many a grave purpose. Oratory may be combated, arguments refuted; but a look of doubt and admonition slightly tinged with a little pity is so intangible, expresses so many things more than the eloquence of Cicero or Demosthenes could ever have found voice to utter, that it is perfectly irrefragable, and Mr. Middleton, laying down the pen, demanded, "What's the matter, Soames?" Now he had a great respect for Soames's opinion.

"Why, please your worship, I was thinking that you might be writing about Mr. Morton," replied the constable.

"Well, so I was, Soames," answered the magistrate, "What of that?"

"Why, sir, it's all nonsense," answered Harry Soames.

"You mean to say what I've written is nonsense?" demanded Mr. Middleton, a good deal nettled at the uncereminious epithet.

"Oh dear, no, your worship; I meant that story of Matty Martin's," said the constable in haste. "Since I saw your worship last I've been putting that and that together, and I'm quite sure it's all stuff. He's a gentleman, every inch of him, from all that I can hear."

"Why you told me quite the contrary t'other day," answered Mr. Middleton. "I don't understand your shifting about in this way, constable."

"Why, you see, sir," answered Soames, "that I am certainly not likely to be right when your worship is wrong; but then I've had an opportunity of getting information when you havn't. Now, I find from good Mrs. Pluckrose that the very gentleman who came down on Saturday night, and was in such a fuss when he found out that Mr. Morton had disappeared, and in such a fright about him too, is no other than that very Mr. Quatterly, the solicitor, from whom the notes were stolen. So it can't be Mr. Morton that stole them."

"I don't know that," said Mr. Middleton, sagely; "a thousand things might have happened; but, however it is, I am determined to give Mrs. Charlton full warning, and to desire her to detain this man till the business is investigated."

Harry Soames was somewhat surprised and a good deal displeased to find that the magistrate did not follow his lead so readily as usual; but, while Mr. Middleton finished his note, by putting that and that together, as he termed it, he arrived very nearly at that gentleman's real motives. "Ay," he thought, "I know he wanted to marry his son to the young heiress, and he thinks this gentleman in the way; so he would do anything to floor him. But it won't answer, it won't answer."

"Don't you think, your worship," he continued, just as the magistrate, having signed, was sealing the note, "don't you think, sir, that while you are pursuing this game the real sort may get off. Now, I happen to know that Jack Williams was over here yesterday, and I saw Bill Maltby hanging about in the lanes down by the river as late as twelve o'clock at night."

"Why did you not execute your warrant against Williams then?" demanded the magistrate.

"Because I couldn't catch him," answered the constable; "I was out after him when I saw Maltby."

"Then Maltby must be taken into custody," said Mr. Middleton, abruptly; and at the same moment Sir Simon Upplestone, booted and spurred, strode into the library.

"There," said Mr. Middleton, handing the note to Soames, "let that be sent to Mrs. Charlton as fast as it can go, and you yourself see if you can get hold of Maltby, and let him be brought here on suspicion."

Harry Soames took the note with the intention of delivering it himself, thinking as he did so, "If I'm right about this here affair it may be as well to be civil to Mr. Morton," and away he went in consequence; but it may be as well to remark that by this time it was past ten o'clock, and the distance between the hall and Mallington House was not far short of two miles.

CHAPTER LXXI.

Without pursuing the course of Mr. Soames, the constable, which, to say the truth, was somewhat circuitous—for he thought fit to secure the person of Mr. William Maltby, in the first instance, before he delivered the note at Mrs. Charlton's—we must proceed to Mallington House, and see what its inmates were about from an earlier hour in the morning than that at which one part of our tale has already arrived. Mrs. Charlton rose somewhat earlier than usual, and this morning she was in a much more placable mood—at least, to all appearance—with everybody and everything. She was as civil as possible to Mrs. Windsor herself, who waited upon her, to speak about household affairs, while she was dressing; and the shrewd housekeeper said to herself, "Now she's going to execute her grand scheme, if Mr. Morton comes back, and that I don't doubt he will do before the day's over, from all I see and hear. I wish I could get speech of him for five minutes before he sees her. If not, I must talk to Miss Louisa, and let her know all about it; otherwise, she'll take them both in, for she's as cunning as the black gentleman."

All this was passing in Mrs. Windsor's mind while she was listening with profound respect to directions about custards and jellies and sundry sorts of preserves; and, having got her orders, she retired with a low courtesy, while Mrs. Charlton thought to herself, in reference to Mrs. Windsor, "She's as smooth as a piece of marble. As soon as this is all settled, I'll pay her her wages, and send her packing."

Shortly after, Mrs. Charlton proceeded to the drawing-room, where she found Louisa already up, but looking somewhat pale and sad. "Come, Louisa, my love," said the excellent lady, "do not be melancholy and anxious; I'm sure Mr. Morton is quite safe. Indeed, I had an intimation last night that such is the case from good Mr. Nethersole, who heard it at Dr. Western's from Mrs. Evelyn—nay, there's no use of coloring, you naughty girl. You did not suppose my eyes were blind all this time, did you?"

Had there been esteem, respect, or affection, Louisa would have cast herself upon Mrs. Charlton's breast, and given way to grateful tears; but as there was neither, she repressed them, and the good lady proceeded: "One thing I may well say,—that I never saw a more charming man, nor one whom I should more like, as far as I see at present, for a son-in-law. I am not one to care for high birth, or great expectations, any more than yourself, my dear—"

"Ma'am, the housemaid wants to speak to you," said a footman at the door; and Mrs. Charlton, wondering what a housemaid could wish to say to her, quitted the room.

After considering for a few minutes, not without both doubt and wonder, at her stepmother's conduct on the present occasion, Louisa took up a book to divert her thoughts from matters of unprofitable speculation, and a minute or two after the great bell of the door rang. A step was then heard upon the stairs which made Louisa's heart palpitate, and her color come and go. The next moment Mrs. Charlton's voice was heard welcoming somebody, and in another that lady and Mr. Morton entered the room together. Mrs. Charlton's face was all radiant with the brightest and best-arrayed smiles possible; and Morton, advancing towards Louisa at once, with very little restraint of the feelings of his heart, took her hand in his, and pressed his lips upon it.

"Come, no explanations now," said Mrs. Charlton, "we'll have breakfast first, for I am very hungry; and then, Louisa, myself, and our young friend will have a conference upon matters of importance. After that we will do anything you like."

With an easy grace, which bespoke the utmost composure, Mrs. Charlton led the way to the breakfast-room, leaving a sufficient space between herself on the one part, and Mr. Morton and Louisa on the other, to afford the lovers a few moments of private conversation as they descended the stairs. The whole evolution was performed very neatly, Mrs. Charlton speaking near the door, and then immediately taking her departure, so that it was impossible for Morton to be civil enough to attend at her side. Not the most discreet chaperon could have done it better. When, however, tea was made and coffee brought in, and all the principals and accessories of an English breakfast at the bar, the conversation of course became general, and naturally turned to the causes of the visitor's unexplained absence.

It was a somewhat difficult subject to deal with; but Morton had considered his position, and he generalized as much as possible, stating indeed the facts of his strange abduction, but withholding the names of the parties concerned in it. Mrs Charlton, however, was not to be so satisfied, and whether it was any particular spirit of inquiry, or only the general devil of curiosity which is supposed to afflict ladies without much to do, I cannot tell; but she inquired at once, first, whether Mr. Morton knew the persons implicated in so gross an outrage; and, next, what were their names.

"My dear madam," replied her guest, "my worthy solicitor, who was the first to come to my rescue, advises a prosecution, and says that some of the parties might be transported; but as I am very much disinclined to such harsh measures, and very much inclined to let the matter pass, I think it will be better perhaps not to mention any names till, after due deliberation, I have made up my mind to my course."

Mrs. Charlton merely replied, "Oh! very well," and breakfast proceeded to its close without any farther interrogatory.

When that important avocation was at an end, a slight and only momentary tremor seemed to come over the lady of the house; but immediately after she rose, saying in a clear sweet voice, "Now, my dear sir, I wish to speak with you for a few minutes; and, if you please, we will go into the library."

Mr. Morton, of course, acceded; Louisa remained where she was, with a somewhat unquiet heart, and Mrs. Charlton and her visitor proceeded through the doors on the left and were soon seated in two arm-chairs on the opposite side of the fireplace. A short pause ensued, but Morton, perversely, would not break silence first, and at length Mrs. Charlton commenced with a gay, short, merry laugh.

"Well, Mr. Morton," she said, "this is, perhaps, almost ridiculous to speak about; but yet I feel myself called upon to say something about our dear Louisa. You must feel that this cannot go on farther without some definite understanding between us upon the subject. Not, indeed, that I at all imagine you to be a man to trifle with any woman's affections; but people will make observations, and it is right that I should have something to answer to inquiries. In a word, then, you love Louisa—is it not so?"

"Most sincerely and devotedly, my dear madam," replied Morton. "I say at once I seek her hand, and am ready immediately to enter into explanations with both her guardians upon the subject."

This was not quite the reply that Mrs. Charlton either expected or desired. She had expected to hear of difficulties, to receive some excuses as to inferior fortune, and apologies for presuming to address a young lady of considerable wealth without equal advantages. She had thought it would be so; several things that she had seen, as well as the report of others, had made her imagine it; but yet her confidence in that result had been somewhat shaken by other circumstances. Nevertheless, she had a reserve, which she fancied quite secure. If Morton was not seeking Louisa for her wealth, he was evidently deeply attached to her—if it were love, it was love of a very intense and powerful kind; and she argued, if it be her money that is his object, she has enough to make a part a bait sufficiently tempting; if it be herself, the loss of a portion will be nothing in his estimation.

After a moment's pause, then, she answered, "Nay, my dear sir, I too must claim some say in the matter. In the first place as a mother—and I am sure I regard Louisa with the affection of one—and, in the next place, as one especially appointed by her dear father, the best and kindest man that ever lived"—and Mrs. Charlton took out a fine cambric handkerchief, embroidered in the corners—"appointed by her father, I say, to watch over her settlement in life. Perhaps you are not aware, Mr. Morton, that, by her father's will, my consent is absolutely necessary to her marriage, and therefore I am her guardian as far as that great step in a woman's life is concerned—nay, pray hear me—I mean not to say that I in the least object in the present case, far from it, I am strongly inclined to give my full approbation. All I mean is that the explanations must be to me, not to those who are merely her guardians and trustees till she is of age."

"My dear madam," replied Morton, "I have been fully made aware of the terms of Mr. Charlton's will—"

"Good!" thought Mrs. Charlton, "he has inquired into the matter. It is her fortune he seeks, and he is prepared to act like a man of sense."

But Mr. Morton proceeded, "I am quite ready to give every explanation to either yourself if you think fit, or to the actual guardians; but first—"

"Oh yes!" said Mrs. Charlton, interrupting him, "it may first be necessary, as you say, to explain all the circumstances of the case; for, of course, they do not exactly appear upon the face of the will; and, indeed, I have always felt that, in consequence of Mr. Charlton not stating his intentions clearly in that document, I am placed in a very delicate and unpleasant position. I wish to Heaven that he had acted with his usual habits of business; and I have always looked forward to this moment with apprehension and anxiety. It luckily happens now, however, that I have to deal with a man of high feeling and honor, who will understand my situation at once, and thus the task will be less difficult. It had better be undertaken at once, therefore; and thus the case stands:—Mr. Charlton and I had often talked over dear Louisa's prospects; and though he was at one time somewhat inclined—out of regard for me, I believe—that a marriage should take place between her and my son Alfred, I represented to him that the poor boy was in no degree fitted to make her happy, and induced him to put such a bar against it that it could never be thought of. He then, as you know, made his will, leaving all his property to Louisa, with my full consent and approbation; but, at the same time, he said to me, 'My dearest Emily, while Louisa remains with you, united as you are by the strongest ties of affection, there will be quite enough to maintain your household in the style in which you are accustomed to live; but it is my intention to render your consent to her marriage indispensable, both for her own sake and yours, in order that if she chooses to marry, which, perhaps, may not be the case, you may be secured such a share in what I leave as will compensate to you for her seeking another home'—"

Mrs. Charlton paused, and looked at Mr. Morton; but that gentleman sat with his fine eyes bent upon the ground, without any movement of lip, nostril, or eye-brow indicating what was passing in his mind; and she then went on in an easy, natural tone, saying, "I argued against this arrangement; but he still adhered to it, though he was somewhat shaken before he died, but that lamentable event was so sudden that he had not time to make the better arrangements which I believe he proposed, and, therefore, of course, we must abide by those that exist."

"Certainly, my dear madam," replied Morton, "and may I now ask what it is that you think those arrangements imply?"

Now was the tug of war. It was the most important event of all those campaigns which Mrs. Charlton had carried on against the poverty in which she was originally born. She had hitherto been a very successful general, but this was her Waterloo, and she felt all the weight of the occasion. Nevertheless she would not by the pause of one moment suffer Mr. Morton to see that she was calculating. It was her wish to impress him with the idea that all had been settled long before between her and Mr. Charlton, and she replied in an instant, "My dear husband's wish was that if Louisa married, such an arrangement should be made as to secure to me one half of the property, for which reason he placed the whole at my disposal if she married without my consent."

Morton had well nigh laughed. The murder was out, the whole scheme developed; but he restrained himself, and demanded, "Pray, my dear madam, is there any memorandum of this intention of Mr. Charlton, any document by which the matter may be defined?"

"No, sir, no!" answered the lady, beginning to grow angry at his coolness, and her cheek becoming somewhat flushed with a vague perception that he saw through her; "there is no memorandum—there is no document. But, surely, Mr. Morton," she added, in a less sharp tone, "you can trust to my word."

"Oh! undoubtedly," replied Morton; "but it would be much more satisfactory to me, my dear lady, to have something tangible to satisfy certain principles which I have within the last three days announced so distinctly that I fear I could not retreat from them without such written proofs of Mr. Charlton's intentions."

The lady was in a state of high consternation and anger. She had expected no such opposition; but what could she do? Her own case was urgent; money she must have; she had always calculated upon having it; and even delay would be ruinous. In these circumstances she lost her usual caution, exposing her game more and more. "Such as I have stated were Mr. Charlton's intentions," she replied; "but I do not say, Mr. Morton, that I am by any means disposed to exact the complete fulfillment of his wishes. A third of the property, fairly estimated, is all that I expect; but that I think I have a right to demand."

"My dear madam," replied Morton, in the same quiet tone, "according to your own showing, you have a right to demand half; and all I require is, that the fact of Mr. Charlton's intentions should be so clearly shown as to justify me in acceding, having, as I said, within these three days distinctly expressed an opinion on the subject, which I cannot retract."

"Within these three days!" exclaimed Mrs. Charlton, her cheek growing very red; "to whom, sir—who has a right to meddle with these matters but myself?"

"To your own son, my dear madam," answered her companion. "It is now necessary to inform you that Mr. Alfred Latimer, with a gang of not very respectable gentlemen whom he employed, was the person to carry me off from Mallington, and that his object was to drive a bargain with me to pay him certain thousand pounds on my marriage with Miss Charlton. He also hinted that you would have something of this kind to propose; but I told him distinctly, and at once, that I would never make a matter of merchandise of Miss Charlton's hand, nor be any party to any such transaction; that I would wed her with all that her father left her, or with none, and therefore—"

"Then, then"—cried Mrs. Charlton, with fury flashing from her eyes—but before she could finish the sentence, Wilkinson, the footman, entered the room with a note upon a salver, saying, "Soames, the constable, brought this, ma'am, and he is waiting to see you."

Mrs. Charlton took the note, and was twisting it round her fingers; but the man added, "He says it's very immediate, ma'am, and very important."

His mistress tore it open, and read. At the first words a malicious and triumphant smile crossed her angry countenance, and at the end she rose and hurried out of the room; while Morton, supposing their conference ended, passed through the side door into the breakfast-room in search of Louisa.

CHAPTER LXXII.

"Can you tell me where I shall find Miss Charlton?" demanded Morton, as he entered the dining-room, and saw Mrs. Windsor's head looking in at the opposite door.

"She is in the little drawing-room, sir," answered the housekeeper; "but I was looking for you, sir—I beg pardon for the liberty. I have something very particular to say to you, if you would be good enough to allow me five minutes' conversation."

"Very willingly, Mrs. Windsor," answered Morton, moving towards the door, "and I shall be happy to do anything I can for you, but I fear, if you desire any conversation with me, you must come down to the inn, as, in consequence of something that has just passed, I do not propose to trespass upon Mrs. Charlton's hospitality any longer. At present I must speak with Miss Charlton, immediately."

"I guess what has passed, sir," answered Mrs. Windsor, with a grave face, "and wish I could have spoken to you before, as it was just about that I desired to say a word or two, for Mrs. Charlton has in reality no more power over Miss Louisa, or her fortune either, than I have; and I do not like to see my poor young lady made unhappy. But by and by will do, if, as I suppose, you have refused her terms."

While she had been speaking she had accompanied Mr. Morton to the foot of the great stairs, as if to show him the way, though he knew it quite well; but here he turned to gaze at her face, with a good deal of surprise in his own to find her apparently so well acquainted with the nature of Mrs. Charlton's conversation with himself. He had heard a good deal of the various uses of keyholes and crannies, but in the present instance it was evident that Mrs. Windsor had not employed such channels of information, or she would have known his answer, as well as Mrs. Charlton's demand, and consequently he was puzzled. But that was not a moment to find out a puzzle, and therefore merely saying, "I have," he began ascending the stairs.

"Pray hold firm, sir," continued Mrs. Windsor, "for she has no power at all, as I will show you, whenever you have a moment's leisure;" and thus saying, she dropped a low and respectful courtesy and retired.

Morton, on his part, hurried on, and at once entered the little drawing-room, where he found his fair Louisa gazing out of the window, with the vacant look of deep and anxious thought, for she was well aware that what was taking place below while she was left alone, was matter deeply affecting her own peace. She sprang to meet him, however, as soon as she saw him, and we must forgive Morton if he took one embrace, ay, and one kiss.

"Listen, dearest," he said, "for we may be interrupted in a moment—I shall have to leave this house very soon. She wishes to make a matter of merchandise of your hand. I will consent to no such thing. It shall never be said I bought my Louisa. She has, she says, and so says your poor father's will, the power of depriving you of all he left if you marry without her consent, and for that consent she demands half your property. So be it — Louisa is to me a treasure which makes all other wealth valueless. I can settle upon you enough to compensate for what you lose. Will you, dear one, will you make this sacrifice for me; and be mine even at the risk of losing all that is now your own!"

"Oh, Morton!" cried Louisa sadly, "it is you that will lose what you had a right to expect."

"I win all that I desire if I win you, Louisa," answered Morton. "Do you consent? — Will you be mine at any risk!"

"At any, at every risk I will," replied Louisa earnestly, "and try to compensate by my love and gratitude for such noble conduct. But what must I do, Morton, if—"

"Go down as soon as possible to Dr. Western's," answered Morton, before she could finish her question. "Take up your abode with him and Mrs. Evelyn till you can be mine. He is your guardian, and his house is your proper place of refuge, dearest—some one is coming. Will you promise me to do so?"

"I will, Edmond," she said, "I will; nothing shall stop me, for I feel that after all this, the house where I have spent so many happy and so many unhappy hours would almost be unendurable."

Almost as she spoke, Mrs. Charlton entered the room; but the expression of that lady's countenance was so peculiar that it deserves a word or two for itself. There was still a touch of anger about it, but subdued and quieted, while a slight smile mingled an air of triumph with the bitterness of the expression, as if she had suddenly gained some advantage over an enemy. Her brow was slightly contracted, her lips close and drawn into good order, a very tolerable glow in her cheeks, and an expansion about the nostril, as if she struggled to keep down her emotions, whatever they were. Her tone, too, when she spoke, was cold and decided, though with an affectation of perfect ease, which showed the effort a little too plainly.

"So," she said, somewhat sarcastically, "you are consulting about it. Have you made up your minds yet?"

"You are mistaken, my dear madam," answered Morton; "we are not consulting upon it at all, and as to my mind, it is perfectly made up."

"Well, I have been thinking of other things," said Mrs. Charlton, "and we can talk of that afterwards, should it be necessary. Pray, be seated, Mr. Morton. You have heard, I suppose, of what has happened in our neighborhood?"

"No, indeed," answered her guest, "I have heard of nothing extraordinary, except what has happened to myself within this last two or three days."

The words would bear two interpretations, but Mrs. Charlton was in that irritable frame of mind in which persons always choose the worst and most offensive meaning that can be attached to anything that is said to them, and consequently she immediately contrived to think that Morton referred to her own conduct towards him. "Oh, yes," she answered, "there has been something both very extraordinary and very horrible happen last night. I thought you must have known it—Mallington Hall was broken into, the door of the plate room forced open, and everything it contained carried off."

Morton was considerably moved. His brow contracted, his cheek got a little heated, and his eye flashed. "This is too bad," he cried, "this is really too bad."

"It is, indeed," answered Mrs. Charlton coolly; "but that is not all. The worst yet remains to be told. However, the villains who did it are not likely to escape. They are pretty well known, I am told, and means have been taken for their immediate apprehension."

"I am very glad to hear it," answered Morton; "for the various outrages that have lately taken place in this neighborhood show that there are some desperate characters down here who ought to have been in prison long ago."

"Quite right, my dear sir—quite right," replied Mrs. Charlton, keeping her eye fixed upon his face. "The principal person suspected is a certain lawyer's clerk, who robbed his employer some time ago and absconded. There have been bills stuck up all about the place regarding him. Have you seen them, Mr. Morton?"

"Oh!—about that unfortunate fellow, Wilkins," replied the gentleman to whom she spoke. "But if he be suspected of a robbery last night, an error has been committed, as I happen to know that he was not in this neighborhood."

"Are you acquainted with him, then, Mr. Morton?" demanded the lady, in the quietest possible tone.

"I have seen him several times at Mr. Quatterly's," answered Morton, carelessly; "but I know that he could not have done this that is attributed to him, as he was not here."

"Oh, then, you know Mr. Quatterly?" rejoined the lady, with a smile.

"Extremely well," was Morton's reply; though he began to be a little surprised at Mrs. Charlton's tone. "Mr. Quatterly is my own solicitor, and the money stolen happened to be my own."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Mrs. Charlton. "Then it has not reached you."

"Oh, yes, it has!" answered Morton. "Mr. Quatterly, of course, made it good to me."

"Ahem!" said the lady; but Louisa, who by long and sad experience knew more of her stepdame than even Morton did—though he, considering the length of their acquaintance, had acquired an extraordinary insight into her character—saw very well that there was something kept back, which she expected to produce at last with great effect, according to her own purposes, and she demanded, "What is there more? You said that the worst remained to be told."

"Yes, indeed!" answered Mrs. Charlton; "the worst does remain to be told, and a horrible story it is. It seems that an attempt was made upon the house some time ago; and that ever since poor Edmonds, the park-keeper—as good a creature as ever lived—you know him, Mr. Morton, I think, for you've often been seen talking with him, they tell me?"

"I know him very well, madam," answered Morton; "a highly respectable and honest man. What of him?"

Mrs. Charlton paused for a moment, with a somewhat puzzled look; but then she answered, "Ever since that last attempt it seems poor Edmonds has slept in the house to protect it. The villains, whoever they were, must have made themselves thoroughly acquainted with all the particulars, must have known all the rooms and passages—and it is a difficult house, too—so they could have been no common burglars. However, they made their way in by picking the lock of a back door; and what were all their proceedings within we, of course, cannot yet tell; but the result was clear enough, when some of the people forced their way in this morning."

She paused for a moment; and it was evident, both to Morton and to Louisa, that for some purpose of her own she was drawing her story out to as great a length as possible. As Mrs. Charlton's purposes, however, were not always the most transparent, neither the lover nor the young lady could make out what they were; and Morton, who was somewhat anxious to get at the facts, inquired eagerly, "But what was that result, my dear madam? It is that we principally desire to hear."

"Why, that poor Edmonds was murdered," answered Mrs. Charlton. "He was found lying on his bed, shot through the head."

Both Louisa and her lover turned as pale as death. "Good God!" exclaimed Morton, starting up, "I must go down and see about it. This is horrible, indeed!"

"Stay a moment, Mr. Morton," said Mrs. Charlton; "we have, you know, some business to settle, and, as I hate talking frequently upon disagreeable subjects, we had better settle it at once."

"As far as I am concerned," answered Morton, somewhat abruptly, "the whole business is settled already. I think you could not mistake my meaning, my dear lady. We must both take our own course in this matter."

"Yet a moment," said the mistress of the house, beckoning him towards a window. "Louisa, you need not go; this business concerns you, too. Mr. Morton, you are in a dangerous situation, which will become more or less so according to your conduct to me."

"My dear madam, you are pleased to be enigmatical," answered Morton, indignation beginning to master him. "Will you have the goodness to explain yourself clearly, for, standing here comfortably upon the carpet of the drawing-room of Mallington House, I do not see how I can be in a dangerous situation at all."

Mrs. Charlton's fair round cheek flushed, and she answered, "I will explain myself clearly. It is supposed, my dear sir, that the name you have been pleased to assume in this place is not your real one." A slight smile came over Morton's face, and the lady went on. "I see I am right; but it is moreover suspected—mind, I don't say that it is so—that your name is more like Wilkins than Morton. Do you deny it?"

Morton paused for an instant, and then answered coolly, giving a glance of his eye at Louisa as he did so, "Perhaps it is, my dear madam."

Louisa, sad and distressed as she was, could not refrain from a smile; and Mrs. Charlton thought, as she observed the whole, "Then she has known it all the time. 'Pon my word, this is too bad! What creatures girls are in these days!"

She went on aloud, however, to say, "This is not all, Mr. Morton, or Mr. Wilkins—you are strongly suspected, as I insinuated before, of having some share in this dark deed at Mallington Hall. Mind, I don't say that it is so, but I tell you that I have the power of confirming those suspicions in a very strange manner." She spoke sternly and resolutely, fixing her eye upon him as if she would have searched his soul.

"Pooh, pooh!" exclaimed Morton, with his lip curling. "This is carrying the matter too far."

"Well, sir," said Mrs. Charlton, pointing with her finger through the window down the hill, up which was seen coming at considerable speed a gentleman on horseback followed by a servant. "You have two minutes to decide upon what I propose to you, and not more. What do you say?"

"Exactly what I said before," answered Morton, coolly; "and allow me to add, madam, that Mrs. Charlton does not raise herself in my opinion by being ready, for a sum of money, to give the hand of her husband's daughter to a man whom she believes to be a swindler, and suspects of being a murderer."

"I will have revenge at least," muttered Mrs. Charlton; and then, raising her voice, she exclaimed "Soames, Soames! come in."

Louisa had been gazing down upon the carpet as if she had been studying the gay flowers with which it was covered; but suddenly a look of horror and consternation more deep and intense by far than even that with which she had heard the news of poor Edmonds's murder, overspread her countenance, as if some startling and dreadful fact had suddenly presented itself to her mind, and starting forward, she caught Mrs. Charlton's arm, exclaiming, "Stay, stay—for Heaven's sake, stay! You do not know what you are doing. You are destroying yourself."

But as she spoke the constable entered the room, and Mrs. Charlton cried at once, "Take him in charge, Soames."

"What is the matter, dearest Louisa?" asked Morton in a tone of surprise, without taking any notice of the constable. "You cannot suppose for a moment—"

"Oh, no, no!" cried Louisa, wringing her hands, "but I fear she will bring down destruction on her own head."

"I am the best judge of my own acts, Miss Charlton," said the lady. "Take him in charge, Soames. He owns that his name is Wilkins, and not Morton."

"No, no, no!" exclaimed Morton, laughing. "Not exactly that, as Miss Charlton can bear witness. I said more like it, my dear madam. This is a very serious business," he continued, "and yet, pushed to this extremity, I cannot but feel that it becomes, in some degree, a jest."

"You will find it no jest, I suspect," replied Mrs. Charlton, not a little puzzled and embarrassed by Mr. Morton's demeanor, and only the more angry from a vague apprehension that she had already suffered rage and disappointment to carry her beyond the bounds of prudence; "however, the matter is not in my hands, but in that of the law, and it must deal with the case as it may be judged expedient—Louisa, you may as well retire, for Mr. Middleton must be already at the door, and the examination of this person will probably be proceeded with here. Such scenes are not fit for young ladies."

"You will excuse me, madam," replied Louisa. "I shall certainly remain here. No place can be more fit for me than by the side of my future husband, when a false, I might call it a ridiculous accusation is brought against him."

"Oh, oh! so bold?" said Mrs. Charlton; "but I have understood you long, young lady. Nevertheless, it is as well, perhaps, that it should be so, and that you should stay to witness what takes place regarding the man of your choice."

"There can be nothing to witness, madam, that I am afraid of," replied Louisa; but even while she was speaking, the door opened and Mr. Middleton was announced. The constable had been talking for some moments to Mr. Morton, towards whom he had advanced when called upon by Mrs. Charlton, and, as soon as the magistrate had entered the room, he spoke a few words to the servant in a low tone, to which the man replied, "I'll send down directly." Harry Soames nodded his head, and then returned quickly to the side of Mr. Morton, towards whom he seemed inclined to testify every sort of respect.

The air of Mr. Middleton was very grand and important indeed. He felt that he was a man of consequence—that his bosom was the temple of justice, and that J. P. was written on his forehead, or ought to be. With a self-satisfied smile and an active air, he crossed the room to shake hands with Mrs. Charlton, and would probably have conferred the same honor upon Louisa, had she not drawn a step back at his approach, and answered his salutation with a courtesy. Not meeting with due reverence in that quarter, he again turned to Mrs. Charlton, and conversed with her for a few minutes in a low voice, and then, observing that Miss Charlton and her lover were speaking together, though all that passed between them consisted of a few words, he exclaimed, in a highly authoritative tone, "No conversing with the prisoner. Constable, see that nothing of this kind takes place."

"Then I am to consider myself as a prisoner, sir?" demanded Morton, addressing the magistrate.

"Most assuredly!" answered Mr. Middleton, with a look of cold scorn.

"On what charge, and on whose authority?" asked the younger gentleman.

"On the charge of fraud, robbery, and murder!" replied Mr. Middleton; "and on my authority."

His tone was intended to be very laconic and decided, but Morton persevered. "May I beg to know who it is brings the charge," he next inquired. "Of course you do not act without information."

"Oh, no!" answered the magistrate; "I act upon very good information. You are in custody on suspicion, my good young man. You will hear more by and by."

"I wish I could venture to call you a good old one," answered Morton; "but, at all events, let me call to your remembrance that a person should always be looked upon as innocent till he is proved guilty, and that it is sometimes inconvenient to forget that you are a gentleman or that another is so, as you may have occasion afterwards to repent it."

"What, sir! do you venture to threaten me, sir?" exclaimed Mr. Middleton, in fury; "to threaten a magistrate in the execution of his duty!"

"Oh dear, no!" replied Morton, calmly; "I do not threaten you at all, Mr. Middleton. I only wish to call you back to a sense of propriety. I beg leave to say, sir, that I am not your good young man; for I am either your very bad young man indeed, or not your young man at all."

"This is foolish nonsense," replied the worthy gentleman; "but we shall soon have Sir Simon Upplestone here, and we can proceed to business on the spot. If you will have the kindness to let us use one of your drawing-rooms, Mrs. Charlton, I do not see why we should adjourn at all. Or we can go to the library, which, perhaps, will be more out of your way."

"Oh dear, no!" answered Mrs. Charlton; "let it be here, by all means. There stands a young lady who declares she will be present the whole time; and I rather imagine that I shall be forced to submit to examination as a witness."

Mr. Middleton raised his eyebrows at the announcement of Louisa's intention, and looked surprised at Mrs. Charlton's hint of her own testimony being important; but after a few moments' private conversation with that lady, he seemed still more surprised, and turning round, exclaimed aloud, "Is it possible! The whole seems so clear that we might, I think, commit him for trial at once—but here is Sir Simon, I suppose. Who has he got with him, I wonder?"

The last observations of worthy Mr. Middleton were produced by the sound of steps and voices coming up the stairs; but he was surprised, when the door opened, to see not only his friend Sir Simon Upplestone, but Dr. Western and another gentleman, with two or three persons of an inferior class, standing at the top of the staircase. The first who entered was the baronet, and without noticing Mrs. Charlton, or any one else in the room, he advanced straight towards his brother magistrate, and then said in a loud whisper, "I am afraid there has been a great mistake here, Middleton. You have been in too great a hurry."

"Not a bit, Sir Simon, not a bit," replied Mr. Middleton, in a determined tone. "You are not acquainted with all the circumstances, my good friend."

"Nor you either, Middleton," answered the other. "The prisoner is in custody, and the case must be investigated immediately."

While he was speaking Dr. Western walked slowly into the room, with a grave brow, and an expression both of pain and indignation on his countenance, and advancing at once to Morton, by whose side Louisa was still standing, he shook hands with them both, and then turning towards the other magistrates, demanded aloud, "What is all this folly, Mr. Middleton?"

"Hush, hush," said Morton, in a low tone. "Let the whole thing proceed, my dear friend. I wish particularly to see that worthy lady play her game out."

"She does not know what she is doing," said Louisa sadly. "She does not know what she is doing."

In the meantime Mr. Middleton was answering Dr. Western's question in an authoritative and a somewhat sarcastic tone, saying, "The folly, my reverend friend, happens to be no folly at all. A strong—an exceedingly strong case of suspicion has been made out against that gentleman standing there as accessory, if not principal, in the robbery of Mallington Hall, and the murder of poor Edmonds, the late earl's park-keeper; and since I have come here this morning, additional evidence has been tendered which must, I think, place his guilt beyond all manner of doubt, and require his immediate committal to the county jail. I am glad of the assistance of my two brother justices, but if they had not been present I should have taken the responsibility upon myself."

A clear merry laugh rang through the room, and a good round voice exclaimed, "Ay! if ifs, and ands were pots and pans, there would be no work for the tinkers. How do you do, my dear sir?—how do you do? You seem to have had a pleasant time of it since we parted yesterday evening; but it's a long lane that has never a turning, and when the cat's away the mice will play. As it seems clear we are to have larks for supper, I may as well get rid of my knife and fork;" and Mr. Quatterly, after having shaken hands with Morton, and given a gay sparkling glance from his face to that of Louisa Charlton, murmuring to himself, "Devilish pretty! devilish pretty!" pulled out of his pocket a note book, a pencil, and some papers, folded up and tied together with red tape.

At the same time Dr. Western was advancing to speak with the other magistrates and Mrs. Charlton, who were gathered together in a group on the opposite side of the room; but Morton at this moment took a step forward, and said aloud, "My dear Dr. Western, you must hear me for a moment. This business cannot and must not be stopped: a very serious and horrible charge, perfectly unfounded, as you well know, has been brought against me this morning, together with half-a-dozen other minor insinuations, partly proceeding from malice, and partly from stupidity, originating, I have no doubt, amongst the gossips of this little town, and fostered under the kind care of that lady and that gentleman," and he pointed to Mrs. Charlton and Mr. Middleton. "These charges and insinuations must at once be thoroughly and accurately investigated. Upon this I insist, and I have to beg you, my dear sir, and also my friend here on the left, not to bring forward any one particular to prove to the persons concerned the absurdity of the accusation, till all the charges themselves are fairly stated, and the evidence upon which they are grounded adduced. I would rather, if it were necessary, sleep a night in prison than that the whole of the business should not be made quite clear, and the conduct of those who take part in it be fully exposed."

Morton's coolness, and the determined tone in which he spoke—the whole conduct of Dr. Western towards him—the presence and the merriment of Mr. Quatterly, who, though his name had not yet been announced, was evidently no ordinary man—all struck and somewhat confounded both Mrs. Charlton and Mr. Middleton. The former somewhat regretting, perhaps, that she had gone so far, but with not a particle less venom in her heart than she had felt before, was only anxious to show a fair face to the world, and to prove that she was moved by none but the best of feelings, even whilst she pursued her own objects most virulently; and consequently in the sweetest possible tone she said, "The gentleman does me great injustice in supposing that I have fostered any slanders against him. I am sure Mr. Morton has no occasion to say that I have treated him with anything but unvarying kindness and hospitality ever since he first came into Mallington—too much so, indeed, I fear, from all that now appears, and from the undutiful conduct of that young lady, who seems to entertain the idea that any treatment of a step-mother is justifiable and right."

Mr. Middleton, who had heard Mrs. Charlton even with impatience, did not suffer Morton to reply; but, anxious to get a little farther insight into the business before he went on, he said aloud, although in a somewhat less pompous tone than before, "The case, the young gentleman says, must have full investigation. It is quite right that it should; but what he himself suggested, I think, would be the right course—namely, to remand him till to-morrow morning, at eleven, when the whole evidence can be gone into, and the case fully examined."

"Against that I most decidedly protest," said Dr. Western. "Mr. Morton proposed no such thing. He merely said that he would rather submit to a night's imprisonment than that the matter should not be made clear; but I will not consent to any such course, when it can be made clear in five minutes."

"But, my dear sir, you are not the only magistrate present," said Mr. Middleton; "and if the majority vote for remanding the prisoner, I think it must be done—what do you say, Sir Simon?"

But Sir Simon was already tired of the business, filled with many doubts as to whether they had not all got into a scrape, and rather anxious to see the unraveling of the clue. He, therefore, answered bluffly, "why, you know, Middleton, the fox-hounds meet at Burnley to-morrow, and that's twelve miles off, so I shall vote for going on to-day to a certainty."

"A cogent and irrefutable argument!" exclaimed Mr. Quatterly, rubbing his small fat white hands with great internal satisfaction at the various considerations of country justice. "Sir, I congratulate you upon such a high and equitable view of the case; but will you allow me to remind you all that the proceedings of the worshipful body here present, have hitherto been somewhat irregular, more resembling those of a corporation committee, or of a meeting of the various partners in a bankrupt bank, than of a body of gentlemen exercising high magisterial functions. Here are accused and witnesses, and magistrates and constables, and gentlemen and ladies—quot tot et omnes—all mixed up together in the same drawing-room, in a very indiscriminate manner, while some nine or ten other young ladies, who, I am told, are also witnesses, are assembled at the door, enjoying the benefit of our desultory conversation. Now, if this room is to be converted into a justice-room, and it is not your pleasure to adjourn to a more fitting place—"

"I think that would be much the best plan," said Mr. Middleton.

But Mrs. Charlton, who liked to fight her battle upon her own ground, strongly objected; and both Dr. Western and Sir Simon Upplestone, each for their own several reasons, were also opposed to such a step.

"Well, then," continued Mr. Quatterly, whose peculiarities gained for him considerable attention, though as yet no one but Morton and Dr. Western knew who he was—"Well, then, since it is to be a justice-room, you had better draw that sofa-table across the other side. Each justice can have an arm-chair, and then there will be one left for the clerk, who, by the way, had better be sent for. There are but two footstools, but, I dare say, another can be brought from another room; the witnesses had better be removed till they are needed; and if there is another drawing-room, as I take it, on that side, they can come in by those folding doors. Thus the whole proceeding can be conducted in the most delicate and lady-like manner possible, and whatever it may be in reality, it will have the appearance of justice, at least."

Mr. Middleton was not so obtuse as to be blind to the fact that Mr. Quatterly was quietly laughing at them all; and he asked, in an angry tone, "And pray, sir, who are you, who come here, quite a stranger, to set us all to rights or to wrongs, as the case may be?"

"A very humble individual, your worship," replied Mr. Quatterly, with a low bow, and a quiet smile; "but, I believe, an honest man, though I have had everything in the way of temptation against me, being a magistrate, a lawyer, and, moreover—sad to say—the managing governor of several charities. I was called to the bar, good lack! now more than forty years ago; but finding briefs few, and money likely to be scanty in that branch of the profession, for the pure lucre of gain—like Tommy Tucker, who turned a Turk for twopence—I stripped off my gown, and became an attorney. Thus, sir, I have the honor of presenting myself to your worship as Timothy Quatterly, attorney-at-law, by some persons termed Esquire, and a J. P. for the county of Herts. That, present by your permission, I appear to watch these proceedings on the part of my client here."

Mr. Middleton and Mrs. Charlton were both somewhat distressed in mind. One step had been taken to knock their foundation from below them. Mr. Morton was not Mr. Wilkins—that was evident. He was a man of some consequence, too, apparently, for he kept an attorney; and, as a consequence, he was more likely to be fool than knave. Mrs. Charlton asked for a glass of cold water, and spoke a few words to Mr. Middleton, to which Mr. Middleton replied in as low a tone as her own, "Why, after all, you know, my dear madam, many rich men commit great crimes, and we have instances of peers themselves being hanged for murder."

"True, true," said Mrs. Charlton, in a whisper; "and the proofs I can bring forward would convict any man."

"I may be permitted to observe," said Mr. Quatterly, in a dry tone, "that it is not usual for magistrates to whisper with witnesses, in which capacity I understand that lady is about to appear."

"Nor for witnesses to whisper with prisoners," said Mr. Middleton, pointing towards Louisa and Morton, who still stood side by side, and were speaking together somewhat eagerly, notwithstanding the injunction to prevent such communication which the magistrate had laid upon the constable.

"Is that lady about to be a witness?" demanded Mr. Quatterly; "I wasn't aware of the fact."

"I am afraid it will be absolutely necessary, sir," replied Louisa, "though I could much wish to avoid it."

"For or against the prisoner, madam?" demanded the solicitor.

"Oh, for him to be sure!" exclaimed Mrs. Charlton; "there can be no doubt of that!"

"Then all the witnesses had better retire, or all the witnesses had better be admitted," said Mr. Quatterly. "We can't make meal of one and malt of the other, you know, gentlemen."

"We have sent for our clerk, sir;" said Sir Simon Upplestone; "and we shall act by his opinion."

"A capital thing to get a man who has an opinion," said Mr. Quatterly, rubbing his hands again. "I didn't know there were any in the county—except our friend Mr. Higginthorp," he continued, turning towards Morton, and then looking to Dr. Western. "He, indeed, has an opinion, and a very decided one."

The moment after, Mr. Skinner appeared, and looked round the room with some surprise and amazement. His affections seemed to be rather divided, and his mind bewildered by the variety of persons he saw, and the variety of positions in which they had placed themselves. His eyes fell first, however, upon the group consisting of Louisa, Mr. Morton, and the constable, with Mr. Quatterly a step before them, as an outpost in advance of their camp; and, taking a step forward in that direction, he bowed low to the young lady, and still more low and reverently to the young gentleman. Mr. Quatterly, however, shook hands with him, saying, "Ah, Skinner! how do you do? These gentlemen are in a mess, I think;" and then, as he saw his fellow solicitor raise his eyes to the group on the opposite side of the room, where Sir Simon Upplestone, Mrs. Charlton, and Mr. Middleton stood together, with Dr. Western a little thrown out from the main body, he added, "There, Skinner, go across Tom Tickler's ground, and tell their worships what they're to do, for they don't know."

Mr. Skinner accordingly crossed over; and, after a brief consultation with the magistrates, decided that it was better all the witnesses should be admitted. It was their usual custom in that part of the county, he said, as it was merely a preparatory investigation, and truth might be generally better obtained by giving general publicity in this stage of the proceedings. Mr. Quatterly did not object, though he shook his head as if he had some doubts of the soundness of the doctrine; and the door having been opened, a mixed multitude entered, consisting of gamekeepers, gardeners, housekeepers, housemaids, Mr. Gibbs, and Miss Mathilda Martin. Mrs. Charlton, however, was somewhat surprised to see her friend Mrs. Windsor come in with the rest, and also Mrs. Windsor's still-room maid, a pretty little girl of about seventeen or eighteen, who, under the peculiar protection of the housekeeper, slept in a little bed-closet off her own room.

"What do you want here, Windsor!" said Mrs. Charlton, in a sharp key.

"To give my evidence, ma'am," said Mrs. Windsor, respectfully.

"Your evidence!" exclaimed her mistress. "You can know nothing about it."

"I think I do, ma'am," rejoined the housekeeper, dryly.

In the meantime the chairs and tables were arranged, under the direction of Mr. Skinner, very much in the way that Mr. Quatterly had proposed. The magistrate's clerk, however, contented himself with an ordinary chair, and, greatly to Mrs. Charlton's surprise and disgust, placed the fourth arm-chair for Mr. Morton with his own hands close to the table, and opposite to the one which he himself was about to occupy, while the magistrates were arranged on the other side. Pens, ink, and paper, having been procured, the clerk seated, and Dr. Western, as the senior magistrate, placed in the chair—the witnesses arranged, some seated, some standing, towards the sides of the room—the investigation commenced with some degree of regularity. But as this investigation is a great and momentous affair, much too important to our tale to be treated of at the fag end of a chapter, we shall ask the reader's kind permission to reserve it for another, which shall be devoted entirely to itself.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

Dr. Western looked around the circle; and then, with a glance at Mr. Quatterly, though his heart was very sad—for he was one of those true Christians who mourn over the crimes of their fellow-creatures—he could not forbear a faint smile at what he regarded as one of the most absurd farces he had ever seen played. Mr. Quatterly caught his eye and laughed merrily, rubbing his small fat white hands as if it were the best joke in the world; for he was more accustomed to such scenes, and had so long given up the hope of mending human beings that he thought he had a right to be amused at their follies, whether solemn or gay.

"Let them go on! Let them go on," said the worthy solicitor, with a nod to the clergyman; "even in a farce truths will come out unexpectedly."

Neither of them knew what serious truths were likely to come out; but Mr. Middleton and especially Mrs. Charlton were both nettled at Dr. Western's smile and Mr. Quatterly's laugh—surprised, indeed, and somewhat apprehensive that they were not quite right, but more te, " the notes I have taken of the state igton Hall and the adjacent premises examined them this morning, on receiv-mation of the crime that was committed st night."

ll means," answered Dr. Western ; " I t nearly ignorant of the whole circum-
"

t is clear," said Mr. Middleton, with a at sarcastic smile ; and he then pro-o read from a little note-book the mem-which he had taken on the spot, com-
, as it went, with that sort of routine on-places, which is a wonderful engine ing a reputation for sagacity—with the Dr. Western listened with horror and vering his eyes with his hands, as if that all he felt should appear ; and the urt, if it could be so called, heard the deep silence, the recital being well calo waken deep and painful feelings even w and callous.
detailing the appearance of the rooms d above, and giving an account of the of the body of poor Edmonds, and the ances in which it had been found, as the footmarks apparent in the stable-Middleton proceeded to read the deposi-he housekeeper and the housemaid, and all that he had heard from poor Edson, and from the people who had first an entrance into the house that morning.
e had done this, and, as he termed it, the case to that point, he paused and ound with the consciousness of having very neat and compact statement, g of some credit.
uatterly, however, stepped in to prevent oving his self-satisfaction too long.

" How so, sir," demanded Mr. Middleton, growing furious.

" By and by, by and by," said Mr. Quatterly, nodding his head ; " let us have the whole case first. Pray, read the deposition, Dr. Western, for, as the warrant I see is dated on that day, it may be of consequence."

Dr. Western put on his spectacles, and read, smiling when he came to the assertion that his young friend was known by another name than that of Morton, and saying, as a commentary, " I am well aware of that fact ; and am afraid I must plead guilty to being an accessory."

When he had gone on to the end, Mr. Middleton proceeded, explaining to his brother magistrates what had taken place, but very much in the tone of a public accuser, rather than that of a justice of the peace. " It is proved by numerous witnesses," he continued, " that this gentleman, whoever he may be, was constantly seen hanging about Mallington Park, and Mallington Hall—that he obtained admission more than once into the house, and examined it most curiously—that he made himself acquainted with the habits of the people upon the estate, and learned at what time they were least upon their guard. It was also proved, or can be proved, that he absented himself from Mallington without any apparent cause, or giving any notice of his departure, from the morning of Saturday till the morning of Sunday, in which interval the robbery and murder were committed. We have seen that the criminals who committed the act must have been well acquainted with the house, and must have gained information of all the usual proceedings of the servants ; that one set of footmarks was small and neat—very like those which would be left by the prisoner's feet : and that he has back of her chair, her two pretty little feet extended, and her head drooping a little forward, with an air of studied but graceful attention. Slight, very slight, indications of what was passing in her mind floated over her countenance from time to time; but now, when Mr. Middleton turned towards her, saying "Mrs. Charlton, I think —," she rose and advanced towards the table with a melancholy and reluctant air, "I have very little evidence to give, sir," she said, "myself; and as you all know what kindness and attention I have shown to Mr. Morton, and what esteem, and I may say regard, I once entertained for him, you will easily conceive how painful that evidence must be, especially as it is confirmatory of the worst suspicions that are entertained. Mr. Morton has been, as Mr. Middleton says, absent from my house, where he was on a visit, from Saturday morning till this morning at about a quarter to ten—at least, that was the first time I saw him, though I am afraid there is clear proof of his having been in the house previously, without my knowledge. Just before I met him coming up the stairs, and apparently freshly arrived, I was called out of the drawing-room by the upper housemaid, who informed me that she had found in Mr. Morton's room, wrapped up in a bundle, and thrust under the drawers, a sort of carman's frock, stained with blood, and a jacket in the same condition, with a good deal of mud and dirt upon it, but having the whole sleeve still wet with gore. Not having heard, at the time, of the barbarous murder of poor Edmonds, and never dreaming that there was any one in my house who could commit such an act, I took no particular notice, but said that it must be some accident, and ordered her to leave the things where she found them. She is here present, and can give her own testimony. These blood-stained clothes are, I suppose, where they were first discovered!"

"Yes, ma'am," said the housemaid, dropping a courtesy.

"The bloody-minded villain!" murmured Miss Mathilda Martin, giving a look of horror at Morton, whose face certainly testified some astonishment.

"A pretty little concatenation," said Mr. Quatterly. "Pray, sir, let us have the things down. You can take the evidence of the housemaid while they are being brought."

Mrs. Charlton immediately ordered one of the men servants to go up and fetch the bundle, describing where it was to be found, and laying particular stress upon the words "In Mr. Morton's room."

The housemaid was then called upon for her testimony, and fully confirmed Mrs. Charlton's account, adding that she had found the marks of some dirty footsteps up the stairs that morning. She was just concluding when the servant returned with the bundle, which was speedily spread out upon the table.

"Look to Miss Charlton," cried Dr. Western, "she is going to faint."

"No!" said Louisa, rising; "but I wish to give my evidence, terrible as it is."

"Stop a little, my dear," said Mr. Quatterly, patting her gently on the hand. "Do not alarm yourself; this will all be made clear."

"Not without dreadful consequences," said Louisa, taking her seat again, and covering her eyes with her hand.

Each of the magistrates examined the frock and jacket carefully; and then Mr. Middleton, rising, said in a solemn and pompous tone, "Sir Simon, I think this is quite sufficient, and that we are not only justified, but called upon by our duty to commit the prisoner for trial; is it not so, Dr. Western?"

"Oh dear, no!" answered the clergyman; "we can do no such thing, for I happen to know that it is utterly impossible that Mr. Morton can have had any share in this transaction."

Mrs. Charlton fixed her beautiful blue eyes upon him, with not the sweetest expression in the world, and Mr. Quatterly, advancing a step, remarked, "You are in a mighty hurry, worshipful sir. I should have thought it was to-day that the fox-hounds were to meet. One story is very good till another is told, and by your good leaves, you must now hear that other. You have made a very good story of it, and I must say that a capital special pleader was spoiled when nature turned you into a country squire; but now we will proceed in order, if you please, for you have made various assumptions, and thrown out various insinuations, of which I must clear the case."

"I beg, sir, that you would treat the court with respect," exclaimed Mr. Middleton, half rising.

"With the most profound," said Mr. Quatterly, "as deep as a draw-well, though not, perhaps, quite so clear. We will admit almost all your premises; but strip them, if you please, of your deductions. In the first place, the prisoner, for reasons of his own, did choose, in coming down here, to assume a name different from that by which he usually goes, though still one that he has a right to, for his name is Edmond Morton, as I can testify. In the next place he was seen—at least I have no doubt that such was the case—in Mallington Park, speaking with that very notorious person, Jack Williams, who is, I am happy to tell you, now in custody. I have no doubt, either, that their conversation was earnest, nay, perhaps, very vehement; but, as to your assumption that neither of them had any right there, that I have before denied, and do still deny."

"Upon what grounds, sir," demanded Mr. Middleton, beginning to find his ideas getting a little confused.

"Upon the best of all possible grounds," answered Mr. Quatterly, "as you shall hear. Jack Williams, perhaps, had no right there—I am not aware that he had. It is not in evidence, and yet it might be so, for if Mr. Morton invited him he had a right, and therefore your assumption in his case is as unwarranted as in the other. But in regard to Mr. Morton, I not only contend that he had a right, but that nobody on earth, let his condition, state, rank, or calling be what they may, had so good a right to be in Mallington Park, at any hour of the day or night which unto him might seem expedient; for, who can have so good a title to walk in a park—Mallington Park or any other—as the owner thereof!"

"What!" exclaimed Mr. Middleton, "has

Mr. Morton purchased the park! I did not know it could be sold."

"You have got a capital case of circumstantial evidence," continued Mr. Quatterly, enjoying the evident consternation and surprise of the profound magistrate, and now I will tell you what you were going to commit a man for. For breaking into his own house, robbing his own plate-room, and shooting his own park-keeper. All these circumstances are very probable! Reason and likelihood go with them. But stay a minute—don't be in a hurry, either on one side or the other. We will have the whole matter clear before we have done with it, if you please. You shall have full evidence that the gentleman now before you is the proprietor of Mallington Park, of Mallington Hall, and of everything that it contains, and that the poor man who lost his life there was his servant, and had been receiving wages from him for some time."

"I told you you were going too fast, Middleton," whispered Sir Simon Upplestone across Dr. Western.

"Pish!" cried Mr. Middleton, in a high state of excitement, and Mr. Quatterly went on, saying, "As to Mr. Morton's absence from this place from Saturday morning till Monday morning, that can be easily accounted for. But it may be sufficient for our present purpose to show where that gentleman was at the time the murder was committed. Now, up to the hour of half-past seven o'clock, he was, with myself and Dr. Western, at the distance of two and twenty miles from Mallington; he then set off in a hack post-chaise, and a dark night, intending, I believe, to sleep here; but the chaise unfortunately broke down some seven miles from this place, about ten o'clock. He reached a public house, called the Hand-in-Hand, about four miles off, towards eleven, and remained there till this morning, at about half-past eight, when he left it to walk hither, without ever quitting the house in the interval. It may seem to the sagacity of your worships somewhat extraordinary that I should come here so well prepared to meet this case; and as justice is a very suspicious person, and to peep out from under her bandage, just to see that nobody is playing her a trick, this fact must be explained also. The truth, then, is, that as Dr. Western and myself were driving over hither from the town of ——, we came upon Mr. Morton's post-chaise, with the axle broken and one of the wheels off, and with a man doing his best to pull it further to pieces for the purpose of mending it. The post-boy who drove it was in the act of giving him instructions to that effect, and by him we were informed that the late tenant of his vehicle had the night before gone on to the Hand-in-Hand, two or three miles further, and, stopping there to water the horses, we had a full, true, and particular account from the landlady of the arrival and departure of her guest, for whom we inquired. There sits Dr. Western, who can corroborate my evidence."

Dr. Western bowed his head and said "Entirely."

"And now," continued Mr. Quatterly; but Mr. Middleton interrupted him, beginning to find that he was in what is usually termed the wrong box. "Oh!" he exclaimed, "if all these circumstances can be so clearly explained, the great weight of suspicion is removed; but still it would be satisfactory to all parties if the whole were cleared up, and, perhaps, Mr. Morton will assign the cause of his meeting with Williams, who is certainly not fit society for a gentleman of property."

"That is very easily explained, sir," replied Morton. "It may be in your recollection, and certainly is in Dr. Western's, that I was knocked down upon the common here, and on that occasion I lost a pocket-book, containing the certificate of my grandfather's marriage, and various other papers of considerable importance. I sent for a Bow-street officer from London, and offered a reward for the recovery of the papers. We found that the parties who possessed them comprehended their value, and thought that I might be induced to give a much larger sum for them than I had offered. They opened a communication with me to that effect, and a place of meeting was appointed, first in Wenlock Wood, and subsequently in Mallington Park. I went to the rendezvous, as agreed upon, alone, and not having been able to come to satisfactory terms with the man Williams, the person who met me there, I was walking back again, when I saw somebody scampering off, who, it now seems, was the worthy gentleman with his fragrant Balm of Trinidad. Such is the plain state of the case, as there are several persons here who know; and if there be anything else that requires explanation, it must be given, as the whole of this matter had better be cleared up at once, especially the placing of these bloody clothes in the room which I lately occupied, for I should wish to be quite sure that malice had no part in such a proceeding."

"Oh! hush, hush," said a faint voice behind him.

But Mr. Middleton replied, without attending to those sounds. "That is just what I was going to observe, sir," he said, "it is very necessary that that fact should be explained. It seems clear to me that these clothes on which the blood is not yet dry, as you perceive, must have belonged to the person who committed the crime. Now, how came they in this house? How came they in that room? That is the question. Soames, you had better call all the servants up, and let my man and Sir Simon's aid you, with any persons you can collect near, to ensure that nobody quits the house without permission."

Mrs. Charlton displayed at this moment a considerable degree of agitation. Whether it was that her emotion proceeded from disappointed rage, or that some faint shadow of the truth crossed her mind, or that she felt apprehensive that any of her servants should have been implicated in so horrible a deed, I cannot tell; but, certain it is, that she moved about with a certain sort of nervous uneasiness in her chair, and seemed twice as if she was about to speak. She did not do so, however, and it was Mr. Quatterly who proceeded as soon as the magistrate had done. "There are one or two other questions, in the first place, I should like to establish," he said; "as the charge has been made against Mr. Morton, it is necessary to trace his whole course, and therefore I wish to question some of the servants, if you have no objection, gentlemen."

"None whatever," said Sir Simon Upplestone.

"Not in the least," replied Mr. Middleton, courteously.

"I would fain know, then," continued Mr. Quatterly, "who it was that let this gentleman in this morning?"

"I did, sir;" answered the man Wilkinson, stepping forward.

"At what hour was that?" demanded Mr. Quatterly.

"It might be half-past nine, or a quarter to ten;" was the servant's reply.

"What did Mr. Morton then do?" inquired Mr. Quatterly.

"He walked straight up stairs towards the drawing-room," answered Wilkinson, "and met my mistress at the drawing-room door."

"You are quite sure that he did not go up to his room?" said Mr. Quatterly.

"Quite sure," replied the servant, "for I heard him speak to my mistress immediately, and saw them go into the drawing-room together."

"I will only remark," proceeded the solicitor, "that, from the lady's evidence, these articles were found before she met Mr. Morton. I will now ask, however, whether any one saw that gentleman in the house, or about the house, before he was admitted by the footman?"

There was a complete silence; and he went on, "Then, now, Mr. What's-your name, which door did Mr. Morton come in by? There are more doors than one to the house, I suppose."

"He came in by the great gates, sir," answered the man. "The bell rang, and I opened the door of the house, and went out to let him in."

"Then he was actually without the garden-wall when you first saw him," said Mr. Quatterly.

Wilkinson assented, and the lawyer went on, "Was the house-door locked or open?"

"It was locked when I got up, sir," said the house-maid; "but I opened it to sweep out the hall."

"Well, then, my pretty girl," continued the solicitor, "since you are upon your legs, I'll ask you a question or two, with their worships' leave. You said just now that you had found dirty footmarks up the stairs. When did you make that discovery?"

"When first I got up, sir," said the girl; "as soon as I had taken down the shutters off the glass-door into the garden I saw them directly, first upon the mat, and then upon the stairs, and upon the oil-cloth, too, for that matter."

"Then they began at the glass-door going into the garden," said Mr. Quatterly, "and went up stairs. How far could you trace them?"

"Why, as far as Mr. Alfred's room," replied the girl.

"Oh!" exclaimed Mr. Quatterly, and Dr. Western suddenly raised his head with a look of horror and consternation.

"Were the marks plain there?" demanded the solicitor, still addressing the housemaid.

"There was a piece of mud and some gravel stones," replied the girl; "but they were not so plain as below."

"Could you track them any further?" was the solicitor's next question.

"I didn't remark them," she said.

"Did you go into that room?" demanded Mr. Quatterly.

"No, sir," replied the girl; "I had all the lower part of the house to do first; and when I went up after our breakfast I first went to Mr. Morton's room, to open the windows there. It lies at the other end of the passage, you know."

"No, I don't know," answered Mr. Quatterly. "What may be the distance?"

"Oh, not ten steps," answered the girl. "Mr. Alfred's is just over Miss Louisa's room, and the other is down two doors beyond."

"Was the glass door open or shut?" inquired Mr. Quatterly.

"It was locked, but not bolted," said the housemaid.

"I bolted it last night with my own hands," observed the butler, who had entered the room, with the cook and several other servants, a minute or two before; but Mr. Quatterly went on, still addressing the housemaid, "Were you up first in the house?" he demanded.

"No, sir," replied the girl, beginning to get a little bewildered. "I think Mrs. Windsor and the still-room maid were down before me."

"We were," said Mrs. Windsor, "and I found the door unlocked, and locked it till the men got up. I have got more to say when it is wanted; but I think my young lady can tell more than any of us."

Mr. Quatterly looked from the housekeeper to Louisa; but Miss Charlton's eyes were fixed upon her step-mother, who sat opposite, fixed and immovable as a statue, with her face pale and her head bent down. There was a pause for a moment, and then Louisa rose and with somewhat trembling steps advancing to the table, spoke across the table to Dr. Western in a low tone, "You had better take her away," she said; "you had better take her away."

The worthy rector instantly rose, and going round to Mrs. Charlton, he said, "I think it would be best for you to retire, my dear lady. You are not well. This is too much for you."

But Mrs. Charlton instantly raised her head, quickly and sharply exclaiming, "No! It's all false; but I'll hear it all, I'll hear it all."

"Be advised," said Dr. Western, in a tender tone.

"No, I will not," she cried; "I understand it all. Go on, go on," and Dr. Western, retiring from her side, resumed his seat. Louisa had by this time retired to the chair where she had been sitting, and stood trembling beside it with a face very pale, and her lips almost bloodless.

"You said you had evidence to give, my dear," said Mr. Quatterly; "will you give it now, or shall I examine this good lady first?"

Louisa hesitated, but Mrs. Charlton exclaimed vehemently, "I demand that one should be sent out of the room, while the other speaks. They will frame their stories one upon the other, I dare say, if they have not done it already."

Louisa said nothing, but moved towards the door. Mrs. Windsor, however, replied, "I havn't spoken to Miss Charlton to-day, ma'am—not a word—and have only to tell the truth, though I am afraid what I am going to say may offend her."

"Tell the truth, Mrs. Windsor," said Louisa, turning at the door, "whatever it may be—your so doing will give me no offence, be assured."

"A pretty scene!" cried Mrs. Charlton, with a look of contempt.

"Now, ma'am, what have you to depose?" said Sir Simon Upplestone, who was getting heartily tired of the affair, and wished it over.

"Why, merely this, sir," said Mrs. Windsor. "Last night, as I was lying awake in bed, I heard somebody walking in the garden. My room is at the far corner, just over Mr. Morton's. I can't tell what o'clock it was, for I had gone to sleep for a short time when I first laid down; but it could not be very late, for the moon was still far up. However, thinking that it might be somebody that wanted to rob the house, I got up and went to the window, and there I saw a man below on the gravel walk, who seemed to throw some stones up towards Miss Charlton's room. He then called out, but not very loud, "Louisa, Louisa," which is her name. He then seemed to make signs to her to open the window, and presently I could plainly hear it thrown up. After that, he asked her to come down and open the door, for he would come in. After that, I could hear Miss Charlton say she would call one of the servants to let him in; but he answered not to do so on any account; but to come down herself, and he spoke sharply and angrily to her; after which she told him to wait a minute and she would. He seemed very careful to tell her not to wake any one, saying that he did not wish it to be known that he was there. After waiting a minute or two, I could plainly hear the door below unchained, unbolted, and unlocked; and the minute after a foot coming quickly up the stairs, stopped at Mr. Latimer's door, and went in. It did not come as far as Mr. Morton's room, then, but after about two minutes I heard it come along the passage, and some one opened the door of Mr. Morton's room, which is just below mine—the bed-room, not the dressing-room, I mean."

"Ay, it was in the bed-room, under the drawers, I found the things," said the housemaid.

"Whoever it was did not stay there a minute," continued Mrs. Windsor, "and then went back and down stairs. He seemed to stop a minute at Miss Louisa's door, and then went down and out into the garden. As soon as I heard the garden door shut I went back to the window again, and I saw the same man go along the gravel walk, and take the first turning to the left towards the wall. I could see him quite plain, for the night was clear."

She paused, and Mr. Quatterly inquired, "Did you ever see him before?"

"Yes, often," replied Mrs. Windsor, in a firm but solemn tone.

"Do you see him now?" demanded Mr. Quatterly.

"No," replied Mrs. Windsor, fixing her eyes full upon Morton.

"Was he the man before you?" asked Mr. Quatterly again.

"Certainly not," answered the housekeeper.

"Then that is all I have to do with the affair," rejoined the solicitor, taking a step back.

"Then who do you really think it was?" demanded Mr. Middleton.

"I think and fully believe," replied Mrs. Windsor, "that it was Mr. Alfred Latimer. His person, perhaps, I could not swear to, for when first he came he seemed strangely disguised; and though, when he went away, he was differently dressed, his back was towards me; but his voice I could swear to anywhere, and he called Miss Charlton, sister, too, which he sometimes did when—"

"Liar and hussy!" cried Mrs. Charlton, starting up and stamping her foot; but Mr. Middleton, whose views were now altogether changed, exclaimed, "We must not have anything of this kind, madam. The case must be investigated fully. Shall we call in Miss Charlton?"

"I think you had better first inquire how the person was dressed," said Mr. Quatterly, "and also call in the gardener, for footsteps must have been remarked."

All the magistrates assented to this course; and in regard to the apparel of the person she had seen, Mrs. Windsor replied, "That when first she saw him, he was dressed in a carman's frock, such as that which lay on the table; but that, when he went away, he had on a dark coat such as Mr. Latimer usually wore."

A pause ensued, not pleasant even to the somewhat obtuse Mr. Middleton, for he was one of those men of action who are uncommonly puzzled when they have nothing to talk about; and the presence of Mrs. Charlton was a burden upon all the other gentlemen present, who showed no inclination to speak themselves, or to indulge him by listening to anything he could say. Feeling strongly convinced that nothing which could transpire would be aught but painful to Mrs. Charlton's ears, Dr. Western resolved, in charity, to make one more effort to induce her to retire; but when he again approached her chair she repulsed him rudely and scornfully, and the good man sat down, grieved, but not offended.

At length the gardener was brought in and questioned, and seeing the frowning countenance of his mistress, and the grave expression upon every face around, he instantly became possessed by that truly English demon, the fear of committing himself, and sturdily resolved to know nothing. Mr. Middleton, however, piqued himself on that art—the meanest of all forensic tricks—the art of cross-examination; and as Mr. Quatterly rested satisfied with having cleared his client, and did not show any disposition to assist or interfere, the worthy magistrate took the task upon himself.

"Pray, gardener," he said, "what did you remark particular in the garden this morning when you first came in."

"Nothing particular, sir," replied the gardener steadily.

"Oh, of course," said Mr. Middleton, with a laugh; "from what I have seen of the garden, I know that you never look to anything but the cabbage-beds; but you can at least say whether you saw anything particular in them."

"I look to every part of the garden," replied the man, nettled—"cabbage-beds too, though the under-gardener has more to do with them; but I see that they are all right, morning and evening."

"We had better send for the under-gardener," said Mr. Middleton, aloud. "We shall gain no information from this fellow; he is clearly incompetent. You take no notice of the bowling-green or the gravel-walks, I suppose, my good man; it's the under-gardener who mows and rolls them, I suppose."

"Much you know about it!" answered the gardener. "There's no bowling-green here; and as to the gravel walks, though he rolls them, I sees when they want rolling. Why, it is only within the last blessed half-hour that I ordered him to roll the gravel under the windows, and up the great straight walk, and the little serpentine, to take out the foot-marks."

"Your own foot-marks!" said Mr. Middleton, in an indifferent tone. "No one has been out in the garden but yourself and the man, I understand."

"Some one has, since last night," said the gardener, "that I can swear, for there were prints all the way along that were neither mine nor his'n;" and having been led thus far, the poor fellow was soon driven to give an accurate description of the traces of Alfred Latimer's feet from the wall to the house and back again. He was then dismissed, with a warning neither to go near the footsteps himself nor to suffer the under-gardener to roll them out if it were not done already; and then Louisa Charlton was summoned to give her evidence, Mr. Middleton merely observing upon the gardener's testimony, "Exactly the same as those of the smaller prints at Mallington Hall."

Louisa entered more calmly than she had departed. She was still very pale, and her steps still wavered. Her heart, too, sank, and she felt afraid that her voice would fail her when she came to speak; but she had had time for thought, she had had time to ask herself what was her duty, and the voice within at once answered, "To tell the plain truth." It was a terrible thing indeed to bear any part in destroying one whose young years had been spent under the same roof with herself, who had been accustomed to call her sister, whom she had often aided and befriended, for whose willfulness and vices she had often mourned—but still she felt that she must not let such feelings take from her her truth; and, though she resolved not to offer aught in evidence against him that was not drawn from her by questions, yet she was determined to answer each question truly, without a shadow of turning.

If, however, she expected to escape close questioning, she was mistaken; for as soon as she entered, Dr. Western having first requested her to take a seat, Mr. Middleton proceeded to interrogate her in a way that left no opportunity of passing aught over in silence, taking as a text book Mrs. Windsor's account; and having gained the admission that some one had come under the window a little after twelve, had thrown up some pebbles against it, and called her by name, he in plain terms directed her to state all that had occurred between that period and her retiring to rest. Louisa told all truly, but as succinctly as possible, often stopped and questioned as she went, and still giving true and straightforward answers, till at length just as she was replying that Alfred Latimer was dressed when he came in a carman's frock—the very one, she believed, upon the table—Mrs. Charlton, seeing that the proofs against her unhappy son were all too clear, and that, in her own malignity and covetousness, she had been the person to bring them all to light, exclaimed almost with a shriek, "Oh, treacherous girl!" and in a vain effort to reach the door fell fainting almost at Mr. Morton's feet.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

The fainting of Mrs. Charlton caused, as may be supposed, a good deal of confusion in the little court of inquiry held in her back drawing-room; and there were few who did not feel some degree of pity for her situation. Miss Mathilda Martin, indeed, muttered something about pride having a fall, and declared that she had always known how it would be; but sympathy was the prevailing feeling amongst the rest of those assembled, and Morton himself raised her, and bore her to the sofa in the next room. Louisa stood by her, and, aided by the servants, used all the ordinary means to recall her to consciousness; but when she began to revive, and good Mr. Nethersole, the surgeon, who had been sent for, appeared, Dr. Western, who had long before this acquired a deep insight into Mrs. Charlton's nature, took Louisa by the hand, saying, "Come away, my love. You will still be wanted to give further evidence, and your presence here will only irritate her."

Louisa was well aware that what he said was true, but yet she would fain have remained to proffer her services at least. Mr. Middleton, however, interfered, saying, "Leave her with Mr. Nethersole, Miss Charlton, and let us return to business. We may want you, Nethersole, after you have done here; so just step in when the lady has recovered."

When once set forms of any kind are disarranged, it is a very difficult thing to get them into order again; and bodies of men thrown by any little circumstance into confusion, are very like certain birds which were once very common in England, and are still occasionally seen in the less cultivated parts of the country. These are called ruffs and rees, and very beautiful and graceful birds they are; but they have the extraordinary habit that as soon as a flight has alighted each bird forms for itself a peculiar circle, and runs round therein upon its long legs with very great rapidity. As long as each keeps to its own district, all goes on as harmoniously as in the planetary system; but the moment that any one of them, either from accident, fright, carelessness, or that perversity which is nearly as common amongst birds as amongst human beings, ventures into the circle of his neighbor, everything becomes confusion, and a general battle commences, during which hundreds of them are taken at a time.

Now, the fainting of Mrs. Charlton, like one of the ruffs getting out of his place, threw magistrates, solicitors, constables, and witnesses all out of their orbits, and for at least a quarter of an hour after they had returned to the room, where the investigation had been going on, a confused, desultory, gabbling conversation took place, of which it is impossible to give any adequate description. Mr. Middleton talked in a loud voice with Mr. Skinner and Mr. Quatterly, the latter of whom treated him with various nursery rhymes, and sundry puns, till Mr. Middleton was left in a state of doubt as to whether he was mad, or laughing at him. Dr. Western spoke in a low voice with Morton and Louisa; Mr. Soames, in very choice English, of its own particular kind, harangued the butler and footman; and Miss Mathilda Martin expatiated to the female servants upon her own wisdom, wit, and discrimination, informing them that she had foreseen the whole affair, and told Mr. Middleton all about it, before it began—an assertion the truth of which the reader has had the means of discovering. She added sundry dry and pungent insinuations regarding Mrs. Charlton, which were not unpalatable to most of her hearers; for, strange to say, notwithstanding all her grace and sweetness, Mrs. Charlton was not very much loved and respected by any of her household. False money may deceive for a time; but keep it for a while in your pocket, and the gilding is sure to wear off.

The only person who kept silence in the room was Mrs. Windsor, and she, as usual, looked quietly about her, and made up her mind as to what was to be done, listening to everybody with decent attention, and catching words and sentences here and there, which were not intended for her ear.

The first thing that had a tendency to give order to this chaos was the entrance of Mr. Nethersole; but even he, important personage as he was, had to move through the crowd unattended to, till he called attention by saying, "Ahem! Mr. Middleton. Ahem! Sir Simon. Did you wish for my presence, gentlemen?"

"Oh, yes, yes, certainly," said Mr. Middleton; "but really I think we had better take our places again."

"How did you leave Mrs. Charlton?" demanded Dr. Western, as the magistrates moved towards their seats.

"Pretty well, pretty well," replied the surgeon, with a mysterious air. "She seems in great grief, though; a slight disposition to hysteria coming on, so I have administered a few drops of the fetid spirit of ammonia, and shall follow it up by-and-by with some sulphuric æther. Poor dear lady, I have had her removed to her own room, and recommended the recumbent position, as she seems in great grief."

"Is that a good remedy for grief, doctor?" asked Mr. Quatterly. "I know that by the vulgar, the fruges consumere nati, lying is considered a remedy for many evils, but I did not know it was for grief."

Mr. Nethersole stared, and Dr. Western, with a melancholy shake of the head, and his eyes bent down, as if speaking to himself more than to any one else, said, "Well may she be grieved! these are the effects of indulgence and neglect."

"Now let us to business," said Mr. Middleton. "There are one or two other questions, Miss Charlton, which I wish to ask you before we proceed with Mr. Nethersole's evidence. Be so kind as to take that seat again, and we shall soon have done. In the first place, are you quite sure and certain, beyond all doubt and dubitation whatever, that the person to whom you gave admittance last night was absolutely and distinctly Mr. Alfred Latimer."

"I am but too certain, sir," replied Louisa, in a low and sad, but clear tone.

"It was quite dark at the time," said Mr. Middleton, anxious to show his acumen; "the person you saw was disguised, that is to say, clothed in unusual apparel, if it was Mr. Latimer; the moon, at that time, must have been, I think, at the southern angle of the house, so as not to shine in at the door. Now, could you see his face so distinctly as to be able to swear that it was he?"

"I took one of the candles from my dressing-table," answered Louisa, "and he took it out of my hand at the door, so that I could not help seeing his face. Indeed, sir, I should be but too willing to doubt, were it possible."

"Don't be frightened, my dear young lady, don't be frightened," said Mr. Middleton; "we only wish to make the whole matter quite clear, that is all. He took the candle from you, you say. Did he bring it back again to you when he went away?"

"He might bring it to my door, perhaps," replied Louisa; "but I would not let him in, for I was frightened at his appearance and manner, and at the time thought he had gone mad."

"Did he speak to you at the door of your room, my dear?" asked Dr. Western.

"He spoke through the door," said Louisa, "and bade me tell no one that he had been here."

"Now let the housemaid and the constable go up to Mr. Alfred Latimer's room, and examine two things—first, whether there is there a candlestick belonging to Miss Charlton's dressing-table. I suppose you will know it, young woman?"

"Oh dear, yes, sir," said the housemaid, "it is quite different from the others in the house."

"And next let them see if they can trace the steps there," continued Mr. Middleton. "Have you swept it out yet, young woman?"

"No, your worship," replied the housemaid, "I have not been in it yet at all, because—"

"Never mind because," said Mr. Middleton; "we don't want any becauses. Go away with the constable. Bring down an accurate report, Soames, of all that you see and find.—Now, Mr. Nethersole, we will take your evidence, if you please."

Mr. Nethersole advanced, and Mr. Middleton proceeded to inquire whether he had visited the Hall and examined the body of poor Edmonds, the park-keeper. Having replied that he had, he was directed to state what remarks he had made, and what he supposed to be the cause of his death, though Mr. Quatterly justly observed that this was evidence rather for the coroner's inquest than the magistrates.

"I found a wound," he said, "in both sides of the head, which, from the appearance it presented was caused by a pistol ball fired from the right side, where it cut the temporal artery and passed through the anterior lobe of the brain, finding exit on the right side, about two inches above the eyebrow."

Sir Simon Upplestone had said nothing for some time, and he owned to himself that Mr. Middleton was the dominant spirit; but still he thought he ought to have his share of importance, and might as well ask a solemn question too, to throw light or darkness on the matter, as the case might be. "Pray, Mr. Nethersole," he said, "did you use any means of resuscitation?"

There are some questions so utterly confounding that the wit of the most ingenious man on earth cannot find a ready answer to them, and Mr. Nethersole, with the most profound respect for the worthy baronet, and every desire to answer as fast as possible, could only stare in silence for a full minute, at being asked whether he had attempted to restore a man to life who had been shot through and through the head nearly twelve hours before.

"We have an authentic record," said Mr. Quatterly, in a low voice, "of a man having burnt his mouth by eating cold plum porridge, and of another man having bitten his own nose off, so that it is clear nothing is impossible; and therefore, whatever others may think, I hold the question to be a very sensible one."

"My dear sir, I can't jest upon the subject," said Morton, to whom the words were addressed. But, as Sir Simon Upplestone evidently waited for an answer, Mr. Nethersole at last made shift to say, "Why, no, Sir Simon, I did not think it would be of any avail, for I never knew a man to recover with his brains blown out; and, besides, the poor fellow had been dead many hours, the limbs were quite rigid, so it could have answered no purpose."

"I think I would have tried something," said Sir Simon, sagely.

Mr. Middleton contrived to occupy about five minutes more with questions of somewhat greater sagacity, but not much more pertinence; and at the end of that time the constable and the housemaid recappeared.

"Well, Soames, well," cried Mr. Middleton, "what have you discovered?"

"Why, I found this here candlestick, your worship," answered the constable, putting one down on the table. "It's burnt out in the socket, you see, sir, and scattered all the wax about. It was a-top of the drawers in Mr. Latimer's room. It might have set the house a-fire. Then, as to the footsteps, we traced two or three of them in straight from the door up to the drawers, and one of the drawers had been pulled open, for we saw the mark of a hand upon it, somewhat dirty, and not quite dry, and the same is on the candlestick, if you'll look; and then on the floor, tumbled down, with the top off, was a hat-box, which the girl says had a new hat in it yesterday; but the hat is gone now, howsoever; and there were two finger-marks on the top."

"Did you find any steps towards Mr. Morton's room?" asked Mr. Middleton.

"Why, no, sir," said the constable; "but the girl says she swept the passage and the room. We found nothing particklar there, though I went over it, just to see underneath the drawers, where the bundle had been stowed away; the carpet was somewhat bloody—not much, just a scratch of blood, like; but that shows that the job couldn't have been long done, or the things would have been dry."

"Very true, very true," said Mr. Middleton; and, turning to Morton, he said, "I think, sir, the evidence given clears you of all suspicion."

"Then you'll have the goodness to dismiss the warrant," said Mr. Quatterly.

"I think we ought to have evidence," said Sir Simon Upplestone, "that the gentleman is really the proprietor of Mallington Hall, for on that rests a great deal of the matter."

"Not a whit," replied Mr. Quatterly. "If he had no other property than a mortgage on the moon there is not one suspicious circumstance against him. But the evidence you shall have—the evidence you shall have. There is your own clerk, a very respectable solicitor, whom you all know. He can testify to the fact."

"I beg leave to depose," said Mr. Skinner, rising and speaking with due deliberation, "that this gentleman, commonly called and known by, in these parts, the name of Mr. Morton, is the undoubted proprietor of Mallington Hall, and the Mallington Park estate, together with all the goods, chattels, household furniture, books, pictures, plate, and appurtenances therein contained, or belonging thereto;" and down he sat, having said exactly what he thought sufficient, and not one word more.

Sir Simon Upplestone was frustrated; for, if truth must be told, a certain very ticklish propensity, easily excited in human beings, and called curiosity, was the true motive of the question he had put. He wanted to know, in short, who Mr. Morton was, and what, and all about him; and Mr. Quatterly saw through and through him as if he had been a piece of rock crystal. Not seeing, however, any new channel open for further inquiries, at least publicly, he determined, as the only probable chance of getting information, to cross-examine Mr. Skinner in private upon the very first opportunity, and consented that the warrant against Mr. Morton should be discharged forthwith.

"And now, Dr. Western," said Mr. Quatterly, "I think, my very reverend friend, that it will be expedient for you to inform your worshipful brethren of the facts which came to our knowledge this morning regarding two worthy gentlemen named Thomas Brown and John Williams, and also in regard to another personage called Mr. Alfred Latimer, against whom a slight case of suspicion has been made out this morning. Your worships will remark that I say slight; because it is very slight indeed, and though from the temper of the court it is evident that the young gentleman does not appear in a very favorable light, yet it must be recollected that nothing has been proved against him whatsoever as yet; but that he entered his own mother's house clandestinely and in disguise on the same night that this unhappy event occurred. The disguise, however, might have been assumed from a thousand different causes; the clandestine mode of his coming might be accounted for in various ways; and the blood which was found upon the clothes supposed to be cast off by him may be that of a hare, of a rabbit, or a barn-door fowl, for aught we know to the contrary.

"There, my dear," he continued, turning to Louisa, "go and tell that to your step-mother, it may be some comfort to her; and as for yourself, your white face and trembling hand shows that you have had quite enough of this business already."

Louisa felt that it was indeed as he said, and rose to depart, and Morton very naturally accompanied her for a short time from the room —not, indeed, that he had the slightest intention of visiting Mrs. Charlton, as he was well aware that in the existing state of that lady's mind his presence was not likely to be peculiarly agreeable to her. It might be, though I will not pretend to say that it was, that Morton wished to have a few minutes' conversation with a person who was very dear to him; but at all events I shall beg leave to take advantage of their absence to detail the events to which Mr. Quatterly referred—not exactly in Dr. Western's own words, which were somewhat prolix, from the necessity of explaining to his brother magistrates many particulars with which the reader is already acquainted.

CHAPTER LXXV.

When last we left Dr. Western and worthy Mr. Quatterly, previous to bringing them suddenly and unexpectedly to Mallington, where they have been acting and speaking throughout the last three chapters, they were standing before the small gate of the church of St. Stephen the Martyr, in the town of—quod versu dicitur non est. They were left there, too, to their own speculations; for, as may be remembered, the excellent constable, Mr. Higginthorp, had set off with almost superhuman velocity, to take hold of the collar of Jack Williams. Now, Mr. Higginthorp was a strong man—a very strong man indeed, considering his peculiar conformation, but that conformation gave him a tendency to topple over when any strong force was applied to the superior extremity of his person, which he was conscious of; and though it was as difficult to make Mr. Higginthorp let go his hold when once he had taken it, as a bull-dog or a shark, yet a sudden wrench, such as might be caused by a knock-down blow, sometimes had slipped a fustian jacket out of his fingers; and, therefore, when he saw his lean confederate coming slowly down the next street as he crossed it like a steam engine, he made him a sharp sign to follow, resolved "to make assurance doubly sure, and take a bond of fate," though he would take no bail but leg bail of Jack Williams.

Neddy—for we know the sub-constable by no other name—was quick at taking a hint, and he followed not so rapidly, indeed, as Mr. Higginthorp ran, but with considerable speed, so that he had entered the main street of the town, and could see clear into the market-place when his superior had reached the latter. He there saw his superior slacken his pace, advance quietly behind two personages who were just turning into the door of the chief inn, and suddenly seize the shorter of the two by the collar of his coat. The person whom he thus grasped, without more ado, turned round and instantly struck the constable a blow between the eyes, which overset his bulk, and down Mr. Higginthorp went; but so firm was his grasp of the stout cloth, that down went Jack Williams upon him; and fixed like a vice tightly screwed, the constable held on with his right hand, while with his left, rolling over and tumbling in the kennel, he contrived with quiet and pertinacious resolution to extract from the wide open pocket of his coat a pair of iron handcuffs, which, with marvelous dexterity, he essayed to slip over the wrists of his destined prey even in the midst of the fierce struggle that was going on between them. At the same time he shouted loud and strong, "Help, in the king's name. I calls upon all good men to aid and abet me in getting seizure of this here felon!"

The landlord of the inn had retired into his domicile some five minutes before, after taking a draught of the morning air at the door, to get his breakfast; and one of the waiters and a helper in the stable, who had been standing under the arch, and saw the commencement of the affray, having no vocation for aiding constables, retreated immediately. But a stout shopkeeper of the town, and a hump-backed man who was walking with him, ran up and stopped Brown just as he was beating a retreat from what he conceived to be a lost battle; and Neddy coming up, well disciplined by Mr. Higginthorp, cast himself on the back of Jack Williams, and, directing his efforts to the one sole object of getting the handcuffs on his wrists, soon saw him powerless in his upper limbs.

"What the devil do you mean by attacking me in this way?" cried Jack Williams, whose policy now was to assume a different tone from that of resistance; "if you are a constable why did you not tell me so?"

"Oh, we always secures our man first, and then we tells him," answered Mr. Higginthorp. "There's more lost nor gained at any time by talking, Mr. Williams. I say, Jack, that was a wiper you gave me between the eyes. Winegar-like, it makes 'em tingle. But, that's all over; so now be quiet and easy, and come along, like two respectable gentlemen. Their wushipe want a bit of a talk with you about that there job last night at Mallington Hall."

But Jack Williams was not so easily led as young Blackmore, and he turned round his head to Brown, closing his teeth fast, and slightly raising his under lip, which the other received as a warning to be silent; and not being of an extremely loquacious disposition, signified his approval of the course recommended by a nod.

"Well, sir," said Williams, with an air of as much dignity as could have been assumed by a captive prince, "I do not know what you are talking of, but if you have any charge against me, and are really a constable, you must take me in tow, and bring me to what port you like."

"'Any port's good in a storm,' they says, Jack," answered Mr. Higginthorp; "and so, as this here is blusterous weather for you, why I'll just steer you to the nearest harbor, which is Mr. Muzzlewell's justice-room. You'll find friends there, I'm thinking, and that's always mighty pleasant for the misfortunate."

"Certainly," replied Jack Williams, dryly, "only I'm not so misfortunate as you think, Master Constable, and you may be more so than you know of for the assault you have committed on me—so look to yourself."

"I always does," answered Mr. Higginthorp, "and a little to other folks too. But what signifies talking? Come along. I'll trouble you, Mr. Gillaghan, jeest to look arter that ere fellow along with Neddy—many thanks for lending a hand to grab him. I'll take care o' this 'un; and we won't trouble you far.'

Thus saying, he walked on by the side of Williams, who went on calmly and quietly enough, revolving in his own mind the course to be pursued in the present emergency, and considering every means of escape that could suggest itself to a fertile imagination, long practised in extracting hope, and even success, from the most adverse circumstances. Had he been alone, he would have entertained no apprehension—fear, indeed, he entertained none, for, both by habit of danger and by corporeal temperament, he was incapable of terror. But in the present instance, he well knew that the folly or the indiscretion of any of those who were more or less his accomplices might produce a result fatal to himself and them; and his chief trust was that Alfred Latimer might be beyond pursuit, that Maltby might not be suspected, and that the habitual taciturnity of Brown might be only increased by the peril in which he stood. How suspicion had fallen upon himself, and how the crime he had committed had been so soon discovered, and the pursuit instituted so rapidly, puzzled him a little, and made him doubt that his person had been sufficiently disguised; but he resolved to wait and watch, to assume the air of perfect innocence and unconsciousness against any proofs, and studiously to seek for some means of escape from thraldom, even to the last. In some respects he had provided against all contingencies; he had, as we have seen, come into the town from the side opposite to Mallington; he had taken care that the ill-gotten wealth which he and Brown possessed should be concealed where little probability existed of its being discovered by other eyes than their own; and he had laid out with Brown and Alfred Latimer a story which they were all to tell in case of difficulty. Fortunately for his purpose, that story had at least some fact in it, and all he doubted was that Brown might be able to stand a cross-examination in regard to all the details.

Such were the thoughts that occupied him as he walked on in the handcuffs towards the house of the worthy and worshipful Mr. Muzzlewell; and as the streets of the town were not very crowded at that hour, even by urchins, he passed without the unpleasant accessory of a mob at his heels. Several persons were collected round the door, amongst whom was the clerk, waiting for admission, and some little bustle, as not unfrequently happens, took place when the two prisoners were led on through the midst. Williams had hitherto been kept at a distance from Brown, but here they were for an instant brought close together, and the former immediately took advantage of it to whisper, "The story we agreed upon in every particular!"

The next moment Williams was taken forward, and found himself suddenly in the presence of two of the magistrates of the town, while on the right of Mr. Muzzlewell appeared Dr. Western, and on the left of the other magistrate, Mr. Quatterly. With Dr. Western Jack Williams was unfortunately too well acquainted, having been compelled to visit him in his magisterial capacity more than once; but of the features of Mr. Quatterly he knew nothing, and consequently set him down as one of the other magistrates of the town. Mr. Muzzlewell began the examination in the true justice of peace style of that day by exclaiming, "Well, prisoner, what have you got to say for yourself?"

"Nothing, sir," answered Jack Williams sharply; "but that I think it devilish hard a man can't walk along the streets peaceably and honestly without being collared by a constable, just, I suppose, because at one time of my life, when I was a mere boy, I was fond of a little poaching; but if there is law in the land I'll know whether you've all a right to do this."

Frustrated in this quarter, Mr. Muzzlewell had recourse to the constable. "Well, Higginthorp," he said, "what have you got to say to this? Why did you take this man in charge?"

"Why, your worship," said the constable, "I took him in charge and the fellow as was with him, on account of a deposition made this morning by a 'cessory before the fack in regard to a notorious robbery as was to have been committed last night at a place called Mallington Hall, in this county."

"As was to have been committed!" said Dr. Western and Mr. Quatterly in the same breath.

"Pray, Mr. Muzzlewell," continued the reverend gentleman, "does your constable mean to say that the robbery was not committed, then?"

"'Pon my life, I don't know what he means to say," replied Mr. Muzzlewell, with a look of bewilderment; "there he is, ask him."

"I mean to say, your worship," said Mr. Higginthorp, taking the explanatory part of the matter upon himself, "that it was to have been committed, and mought have been committed too, for that matter, for aught that I can say; but of that I knows nothing. But the charge I brings against the prisoners is, that whether they were guilty of robbery or not, that it is clear by the deposition of a 'cessory before the fack, that they were compounding a felony."

Mr. Quatterly gave a merry glance along the bench, and chuckled heartily, and seeing that Dr. Western was really and truly, in the simplicity of his heart, at a complete loss to know what the constable meant, and only more darkened by his explanation than he had been by his statement, he observed aloud, "I suppose by compounding of felony, he means laying a scheme to rob a house."

"That's it! You've hit it, my buck!" cried Mr. Higginthorp. "But what does it signify talking, there's the deposition taken down by myself, and witnessed by Neddy. There you can read it for yourselves. 'The deposition of John Blackmore, gardener'—I've got the boy in the lock-up, and we can examine him presently; and mind, I used no inducements; I told him all the time he was as likely to be hanged as not."

The paper was handed to the magistrates, and by the magistrates to their clerk, who proceeded to read it in a dosy, nasal, and rather solemn tone, which brought out all the rich absurdities of Mr. Higginthorp's peculiar style and orthography in the most prominent manner. Mr. Quatterly was enchanted. He had heard many curious specimens of composition before; but he had never met with anything equal to the present. But the whole business seemed so absurd, that it produced on his mind an opinion rather favorable to the prisoners than otherwise, especially as he knew from what he had seen of Mr. Higginthorp's practice, on the preceding night, that he was a person very likely to use somewhat extraordinary measures to extract from young John Blackmore the confession before them.

As soon as Williams had heard it read, and perceived the whole and sole grounds upon which his apprehension had taken place, he saw the necessity of making a bold and vigorous effort to slip out from amongst the claws of justice before fresh and corroborative facts were brought against him. Assuming, therefore, a frank and innocent tone, he exclaimed, "It's all a lie—that is to say, not altogether a lie either, for there is some truth in it. There was some talk of there being a great lot of money in Mallington Hall, and what people might get by breaking in. But I remember quite well that I said that most likely they'd get their necks twisted if they did. Why the devil didn't the boy put that down? Well, then, it's true enough that I did send the young blackguard over on horseback to tell Mr. Latimer that all the business was found out about his having carried off Mr. Morton from Mallington, and that the story of his being a madman wouldn't do, so that his whole scheme was blown to pieces like a burst bomb-shell. And I did come over myself, with Tom Brown here, to help him out of the scrape, for I knew that that cowardly scoundrel called Tankerville would only get him in farther and farther. But we didn't come all the way in a gig, though, for the horse got rusty, and backed by a chalk pit on the road, and Tom and I had just time to get out before the devil went over, gig and all, and there they lie now, if the knackers havn't got hold of them."

"And pray what did you do after you came to Mr. Latimer?" asked Dr. Western. "This was on Saturday night, I think."

"Yes, sir," answered Williams; "Saturday night, hard upon twelve. Why, when I got to Mr. Latimer's, I found him in a great fright from the message I had sent him over, and expecting to have the magistrates upon him every minute, and yet as he had promised to marry poor Lucy Edmonds on this morning—which he did, by the way, and I was present at the wedding, which wasn't like as if I had committed a robbery last night."

"Certainly not," said Dr. Western

"Well, your reverence," continued Williams, "I told him the best plan was for him to come away with me and Brown at once, and to have Mr. Morton let out the next morning, and, then, perhaps, there would be no more said about it; and I told him I would show him where he could stay over Sunday, and he could come back early on Monday morning and marry Lucy, and be off again. But I didn't take him down Mallington way, you may be sure, when I wanted to get him out of your way, sir. We went t'other side, quite away towards London, and stayed all night at the Wheatsheaf, not far this side of St. Albans. Then this morning we came back again. We set off about four o'clock, and walked along till just about day break, or thereabouts; we stopped at the Chequers, a mile or so upon the road, and had a glass of ale each. You can send and ask the landlord — I don't know what his name is. Well, then, there's another thing I remember, which will show that I am telling truth. Just coming into the town from the London side, there's a hosier's shop, and the man of the shop was opening it with his boy as we came by, and we stopped for a minute to ask him what was the best inn for us to go to, because Mr. Latimer didn't choose to go home, for fear of being caught about Mr. Morton's business, and I am sure the hosier will remember seeing us, for he looked at us devilish hard."

"We will send for these two men—the landlord of the Chequers, and Mr. Gimp, the hosier," answered Mr. Muzzlewell; and then he added, with a warning shake of the head, "Higginthorp, Higginthorp! you have been too sharp again, I fancy."

But at the same time Mr. Quatterly took out his watch, and observing to Dr. Western that it was quite time they should be gone, turned round to hold a short conversation with the magistrates in regard to what was to be done.

"If I may be permitted to suggest, gentlemen, as I term it," said Mr. Quatterly, "the best plan for you to follow is to take all the evidence you can get here, and then to remand the prisoners till to-morrow for further information. The man tells his story well; but there's something—something—something that I don't like;" and he shook his head sagaciously at each something very suspiciously. "However, as Dr. Western and I are going direct to Mallington, we can, within six hours at the farthest, send you information whether Mallington Hall has really been robbed or not; and it will be no great harm to remand the two worthy gentlemen till to-morrow morning."

Thus speaking, Mr. Quatterly, accompanied by Dr. Western, withdrew, the magistrates promising to follow all his suggestions.

Oh, promises, promises! piecrust is adamant to you, and puff-paste is not more fragile. Soon after Mr. Quatterly and Dr. Western had rolled out of the town, the landlord of the Chequers, Mr. Gimp, the hosier, and young John Blackmore himself were brought down to the magistrates' room. The first two fully corroborated Williams's statement, and the third, on being confronted with the prisoners, was seized with a violent fit of trembling, and on Williams demanding in a stern tone, "What the devil he meant by telling such lies of him," John Blackmore burst into tears like a great baby, declared that he had thought it was the intention of Mr. Higginthorp to starve him to death, and that he had made the deposition for the sake of a roll and a basin of cocoa.

In vain Mr. Higginthorp vowed and protested that he had used no inducements. He was too well known as a sharp practitioner for his word to be fully believed, and the magistrates, forgetting their promise to Mr. Quatterly, and thinking the case quite clear, ordered Williams and Brown immediately to be set at liberty, and young John Blackmore to be set in the stocks, an implement which was still in use at that time

CHAPTER LXXVI.

"KNOWLEDGE is power," said Lord Bacon; and many have said so since; but never was there propounded by human tongue an axiom more calculated to mislead. Adam and Eve found it so when first the tempter tried the same argument with them, and they believed him; every one of their children have found it so since; and Bacon himself, before he had done, discovered the fallacy when he saw weaker and less instructed minds triumph over one of the greatest that ever was possessed by man. Even could the mortal creature rob the Almighty Creator of one of his attributes, would that imply that he could rob him of all, and that power to use it would be commensurate with the knowledge obtained? Even in its ordinary application to the matters of this earth the dictum breaks down under us, whichever way we turn it. History, reason, experience, all show us its inapplicability; and that, let man's knowledge be what it may, there is ever an overruling principle, in action, which limits its operation within a prescribed range, and, as if to reprove the pride of science, snatches from it the rod of power at the moment least expected. History—sad history, the saddest of all things—shows us, alas! that none have possessed less real power over the minds of their contemporaries than those who were most in advance, in point of knowledge, of the age in which they lived; and the rack, and the scourge, and the dungeon walls, bear evidence how little power there is in knowledge against the force of circumstances.

The knowledge that we possess, too, is always so small in amount, so deficient in one part or another, that but too often it leads us to act in the worst possible direction. If our minds possess the faculty of separating the important from the unimportant in any question that is before us, of sifting the corn from the chaff, the gold from the sand, and taking out the true from amidst the false, how seldom is it that we obtain the whole that is true! In other words, how seldom is it that everything which affects the question is before us. It is still a broken chain, dear reader, and imagination supplies the missing links with packthread.

Dr. Western told his story truly and fully; but he could tell no more than he knew, and the magistrates naturally concluded that, as he himself believed, Jack Williams and Thomas Brown were safely lodged in custody in the little town of ——. Where were they by the time that Dr. Western had finished his statement? That you shall hear by and by. The personage, however, against whom the strongest motives for suspicion existed was evidently at liberty, and probably afar, and it was proposed that he should be immediately pursued. Neither Mr. Quatterly, however, nor the worthy rector had heard the directions given to the post-boy who drove Alfred Latimer and his poor bride; it was necessary, therefore, to despatch information to the magistrates of —— of all that had been discovered at Mallington; and it was proposed to mount Harry Soames on horseback and send him off at once. But the constable was growing hungry, and, stepping forward, he observed that Bill Maltby was already in custody; that he certainly knew something of the affair, and as he did not think that he was a principal, it was very probable he would give valuable information if rightly questioned. A nice piece of toasted cheese in a mousetrap never proved more tempting to one of the sleek long-tailed denizens of the skirting-board than did this suggestion to Mr. Middleton. He declared that they ought not to send over incomplete information when they had the means of rendering it perfect, and though Mr. Quatterly urged that delays were dangerous, and hinted that there was never any knowing what country magistrates might do, having a shrewd suspicion that worthy Mr. Muzzlewell would mismanage the affair, yet Mr. Middleton persisted in his desire to examine Bill Maltby, and Sir Simon Upplestone, ever bearing in mind that the foxhounds would meet the next morning, determined to seize the precious moment to insure that the following day was not wasted on magisterial business when so much more important avocations were before him in the field. Mr. Quatterly rubbed his hands, chuckled, and looked at his friend Morton with a sly glance, whispering

"Bye, baby bunting, Daddy's gone a hunting."

But, notwithstanding jest or remonstrance, Harry Soames was sent to bring Bill Maltby before the magistrates, who amused themselves during the twenty minutes he was gone by discussing the whole particulars of the affair to very little purpose; while Dr. Western, sometimes meditative over the fearful events that had occurred, tracing in the wild demeanor which he had remarked in Alfred Latimer the consciousness of his crime, and sometimes conversing with Morton in a low voice, occasionally smiling faintly and sadly as any of the absurdities which had mingled with the horrors awakened in him that sense of the ridiculous which had originally been strong within him.

At the end of the time I have mentioned, Maltby was brought into the room, handcuffed, pale in the face, and bearing craven in every line and feature. Harry Soames had taken care to frighten him well as he came, eager, for his own credit's sake, to drive him to confession. In the tenderest and most friendly manner he had insinuated everything that was likely to create fear. He had talked of hanging, had expatiated upon gallowses; he had spoken a whole essay upon ropes. Judges, juries, counsel, the black cap, the condemned sermon, the pinioning for execution, were all passed in review; and, as they walked along, he ended by giving a full, true, and particular account of the last trial and execution he had seen, adding, that one of the three fellows whom he had seen kicking in a noose for nearly an hour, might have saved himself that unpleasant sort of dance if he had been wise enough to turn king's evidence at once. He wanted to do afterwards, the constable said, but it was too late, and they did without him. The dence was not very complete, indeed, but luc they had got a hanging judge and a hang jury, who went lightly over any little flaws, condemned the fellows notwithstanding.

Thus prepared, Maltby appeared before magistrates with his heart in the soles of feet, and Mr. Middleton immediately commenced the examination in the usual style, "Pray, Mr. Maltby," he said, "give an account of yourself from half-past eleven o'clock last night till one o'clock this morning!"

Bill Maltby was silent, not from anything like obstinacy, but from the very opposite condition of mind—doubt and hesitation.

"Do you choose to answer, or do you not, sir?" demanded Mr. Middleton; and Dr. Western added, "The law does not require you, prisoner, to say anything that may criminate yourself. With this information, it is for you to judge whether you will speak or not."

"I'd speak willingly enough," answered Maltby, "if I were promised to be king's evidence."

"That cannot be promised by us," said Dr. Western, speaking before Mr. Middleton could put in his word. "It must depend upon the crown, and I can hold out no hope to you of such being the case, especially if, as your words seem to imply, you have been a principal in the horrible crime which last night disgraced the country. Doubtless, there will be sufficient evidence of all the facts without yours."

"No, no!" cried the young man eagerly; "I'm no principal—I had nothing to do with the robbery—I was never in the house, nor near the house; and sooner than be thought a principal, I'll tell the whole just as it happened."

"Remember," continued Mr. Middleton, something in the style of Mr. Higginthorp, "we hold out no inducement, we make no promises."

"Well, it don't signify," answered Maltby; "I'll tell the whole truth, and perhaps it may be taken into consideration."

He did not keep his word, however, in respect to telling the whole truth, for cowardice is ever apt to take its basest course—that of lying—when opportunity offers; and Maltby, though he related every circumstance that could criminate Williams, Brown, and Alfred Latimer, suppressed or distorted all that could aggravate his own offence. To have heard him one would have believed that he was nearly as innocent and as simple as a sucking lamb, and that he had been made a complete tool of by Williams and the rest. But, unfortunately for him, nobody believed that part of his story. Mr. Quatterly took no part in the examination, but smiled once or twice at the coloring which the young man gave to his own share in the transaction, and observed to Morton, "If he don't mend his story it won't stand cross-examination. He'll trip, for a hundred guineas, at the first five questions. Cross-examination has this advantage; that, though I have seen many a very honest man tell a dozen lies in a minute without knowing it, simply from puzzle and confusion, yet I never saw a liar who was such a complete master of his trade as to stand against it for ten minutes"

As soon as the investigation was over, Mr. Middleton proposed to commit the prisoner, on his own showing as an accessory before the fact; but, at the suggestion of Mr. Skinner, he was remanded till after the coroner's jury could be assembled.

The magistrates then adjourned, and Mr. Middleton, well contented with himself and with the important part he had played, was quite placable and courteous to every one else, but more especially to Mr. Morton, who was rising vigorously in his good graces, upon the strength of being the proprietor of the Mallington Park estate.

Although Morton's mind was not of a character to bear rancor, and although he held Mr. Middleton too lightly to retain any lengthened indignation for his conduct, yet the contempt that he felt for that worthy person was an effectual bar to anything like cordiality on his part. A stiff bow, a word or two of commonplace, was all that Mr. Middleton's civilities could extract from him; and it is a truth which even narrow and vulgar-minded men feel more or less, that when a gentleman and a man of sense answers you with commonplaces, he has a very low opinion of your mind or your character. Indeed, you may almost always judge of the estimation in which you are held by another from the conversation which he addresses to you.

Thus rebuffed, Mr. Middleton took his departure, mentally calling Morton a proud puppy, whereas before he had called him a low scamp. The witnesses were suffered to depart. Mr. Skinner bundled up his papers and withdrew, and Sir Simon Upplestone, advancing to Mr. Morton, frankly apologised for having entertained the suspicions that had been instilled into him, saying, with a laugh and a glance at Mr. Quatterly, "We poor country squires, sir, know no better, and are strongly inclined to suppose every Londoner a rogue."

Morton shook him by the hand, for he liked his folly better than the other's. "Don't think of it any more, Sir Simon," he said; "we shall be neighbors, and I trust good neighbors, too; so, according to the old saying, we will let bygones be bygones, and look upon each other differently for the future."

"Sue out a venire de novo, and try the cause again," said Mr. Quatterly; and Sir Simon, not quite understanding what he meant, took his leave and his departure.

Left in possession of the back drawing-room, Mr. Morton, Mr. Quatterly, and Dr. Western gave a few minutes' consideration to all that had occurred, and then proceeded into the next room in search of Louisa, whom they found weeping alone, and near the window. The worthy rector, well understanding a part at least of her feelings, comforted her to the best of his ability, and Louisa, though she could not forget the occasion of her sorrow, or recover altogether from the shock and horror which the events of that morning had produced, wiped away the tears from her eyes, and besought her venerable friend to go and endeavor to give consolation and support to Mrs. Charlton, saying, "She needs it much more than I do, my dear sir, and me she, of course, will not see. I went to her dressing-room just now, because I thought it right, but, as I expected, she refused to admit me."

"She's very wrong in many respects," replied Dr. Western; "but, perhaps, is only the more in need of comfort and advice from the fact of being torn by angry passions, as well as assailed by misfortune. I will go to her for a short time, my dear; but I must not forget there is another who requires consolation as much, and deserves it more—I mean the poor widow."

Thus saying he retired, but returned in a few minutes, saying, "She will not see me, and, indeed, I think her mind seems almost deranged by these terrible events, for she sent out word by her maid, that we were all in a conspiracy against her, and that the sooner we were out of the house the better. You, my dear young friend," he continued, turning to Morton, "cannot, of course, remain here, and you had better come down to my homely dwelling and remain there till your affairs are settled."

But Morton shook his head. "I think, my dear sir," he replied, "that had better not be. I have watched Mrs. Charlton narrowly for some time, and do not think I do her injustice when I express a belief that she will speedily render a residence in the same house with herself impossible to this dear girl. Though this house is Louisa's own, yet I know her too well to say that she will say one word to cause her step-mother to quit it. Under these circumstances it will be as well that she should have a place of refuge always at hand, and I see none to which she could possibly fly with propriety but to your roof, till such time as our marriage can take place, and therefore it will be better for me to take up my 'lodging as before at the inn."

"Always just and thoughtful," answered the clergyman; "and if Louisa thinks it right to come with me at once, I will go home with her before I proceed to the park."

"No," answered Louisa Charlton, with her bright eyes filling. "I will endure as much as I can first. It shall not be my fault if I do not remain to comfort and to soothe her."

"Good, dear girl," said Dr. Western, pressing her hand in his, "do your duty always, my love. It will have its reward. I shall come up, however, in the evening to see; and I suppose, my dear sir, you and I will meet in the course of the afternoon."

"Undoubtedly," answered Morton.

Mr. Quatterly taking his departure with the worthy rector, the lovers were left alone for a few minutes. Had anything been needed to draw the hearts of Louisa Charlton and of Morton closer together, it would have been found in the conversation which followed, sorrowful and painful as it was; for though passion may rise up in the midst of gay and happy scenes, love that is watered by tears is generally the strongest and the finest plant. But they were not permitted to enjoy for any length of time even the happiness of being alone together.

Scarcely had the clergyman and the solicitor been gone ten minutes when Mrs. Charlton's maid entered, and, with a short courtesy to Morton, said, "I have a message from my mistress, sir, which I must deliver, though it isn't a very pleasant one. She says, that considering all things, and the state of the house, she thinks it very improper you should be here, and begs you would not trouble yourself to stay any longer."

A slight cloud came over Morton's brow; but he repressed every angry feeling, and replied, "Give my compliments to Mrs. Charlton, and tell her that, imagining that my society would not be pleasant to her at the present moment, I was prepared to depart when her message came, which I wish she had spared herself the pain of sending, and me of receiving."

"Very well, sir," replied the woman, in almost a saucy tone; but she still lingered in the room, till Louisa, turning round, with a look of surprise, said, "You may go."

"My mistress said, ma'am," replied the woman—but Miss Charlton stopped her, saying, "Understand, Margaret, that in some things, at least, I am mistress of this house, and I tell you to go."

Her tone was perfectly calm, but firm; and the maid did not venture to disobey, but carried back to Mrs. Charlton the information that Miss Louisa had turned her out of the room, saying she was mistress of the house, and would not have her stay.

Mrs. Charlton started up from off the couch on which she was lying, with rage in every feature, exclaiming, "Mistress of the house, is she? Well, that may be, but she shall find that I am mistress of her and her fate;" and she took two or three steps towards the door. Thought came in the midst of passion, however, and she paused. She recollected what might be the consequences if, as she at first intended, she instantly came to a rupture with Louisa, and quitted Mallington House. Visions of importunate creditors came before her—of privation, discomfort, and annoyance, and, turning back to the sofa again, she put her handkerchief to her eyes, saying, "It is not worth while to grieve myself more than I am grieved already."

"I dare say he will not be long before he goes, ma'am," observed the maid.

"See, and let me know when he does," replied Mrs. Charlton; and in two or three minutes more the woman returned with the welcome tidings that Mr. Morton was gone. The worthy lady immediately rose again, and proceeded to the drawing-room, with the full determination of tormenting her step-daughter to the utmost of her ability, and it was great. She resolved, indeed, to put a certain degree of restraint upon herself, in order not to raise the spirit of resistance; but to say everything that was cutting and unkind, to point every insinuation and inuendo in the calmest and meekest manner, to assume the airs of the injured and the patient, but to lose no opportunity of stinging where she dared not bite, and to utter words and imply suspicions which she fancied would poison Louisa's rest for many a day to come. She was met, however, in a different way from that which she expected. Judging from herself, she had supposed she would be able to irritate the poor girl into saying something that would put her in the wrong. But with Louisa pity triumphed over every other feeling, and she met everything with gentleness and calmness, which for long placed Mrs. Charlton at fault; it was done without effect, too, for it sprang from the real feelings of her heart. She could not be angry with one whom she supposed to be suffering so deeply, and at every unkind word that her step-mother addressed to her, she did not think, as some might have done, "Well, I will bear it; it cannot last long," but rather said, "No wonder she is irritable, with burst of passion, in which she poured usations, and even insults, in a tone med her fair hearer for her intellect.

e first time since Morton's departure ept, and in the midst of her tears, and
s. Charlton was still giving vent to the f her rage, the door was thrown open, Western announced. He was close ie servant, and had the excellent lady ght before she was aware of it. He e fierce and bitter words she uttered, he angry hatred and defiance of her d gestures, and he soon made up his to what was to be done.
r part, Mrs. Charlton speedily saw that been caught in the fact, and that it t do suddenly to change her voice and he moment that Dr. Western entered. ierefore, went on in the same strain, but re violently than before, saying, "Base y girl! Is it not enough that by a foul y you have attempted to take away life, and now you treat me with con-nd contempt, almost giving me orders our house, which, if your father's di-had been followed by those who drew ill, would have been mine, not your's."
d nothing of the kind," replied Louisa, ring to wipe away her tears, "and can ou that no such thought ever entered mind. I only insisted upon a servant the room who thought fit to intrude after I told her to go, and that was o."
I dare say you will make your story exclaimed Mrs. Charlton, seeing her eyes to Dr. Western. "The heiress ty of partisans, no doubt; but I must
I wonder that I am subjected to intru-said, "I can be depriving you of nothing that you can wish to retain, when I take one whom you have pronounced the only bane of your peace, and the serpent in your path;" but the next instant his heart smote him for what he had said, and, though he was resolved to execute his purpose, and firmly repeated his request to Louisa to get ready to accompany him, he added to Mrs. Charlton, as soon as she was gone, "I think, my dear madam, that Miss Charlton's absence for a few days, till you have recovered your usual command of yourself, is absolutely necessary to the preservation of those feelings between you which I hope may soon be restored, and never again interrupted."

"Oh, very well, sir—very well!" exclaimed Mrs. Charlton, rising. "I see it all—I understand it all! The scheme is plain enough, but it shall not succeed; for, thank God! I have power to stop it—and power which I will use, too. So don't let her triumph too soon, pray;" and thus saying, she turned and left the room without waiting for a reply.

When Louisa, on her return, found Dr. Western alone, she looked anxiously round the room, inquiring, "Will she not see me before I go?"

"My dear, it is better not," replied the rector; "an ill-regulated mind, in a high state of irritation, is apt to say things that are not easily forgotten. She will think better of all this by and by!" and, taking her hand, he led her to the carriage.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

We must give a very brief space—a very articles, which somewhat alarmed the respectable traveler; for therein grave and serious remonstrances were addressed to him in regard to the small results which for the last two months had accrued from his exertions, and the little return derived from the expenses of his tour. A hint was also conveyed to him that his services would be dispensed with unless a different position of affairs was presented by the accounts of the next month; and as his heart was wrapped up in the Fragrant Balm, and he felt that his honor and reputation were concerned in its success, Mr. Gibbs had just determined to walk over to Sturton, where he had some time before commenced a negotiation with a perfumer, and endeavor to do, what is, I believe, technically called, "make a deal," when he was called as a witness before the magistrates. The length of time that he was kept at Mallington House threw him into despair; and as soon as he was free to act as he pleased, he set off down the hill like a shot, entered the inn, provided himself with a certain number of bottles and his note-book, and informed worthy Mrs. Pluckrose that he was going over to the neighboring town, and might stay all night.

"Dear me!" cried Mrs. Pluckrose, "that is unlucky, I do declare, Mr. Gibbs; for since you went out old Stapleton, the rich old wig-maker at Barbourne, has been here, and I talked to him of your stuff ('Stuff!' said Mr. Gibbs), and showed him what it had done for my hair; and he said he had a great mind to take a score, if he could get a good per-centage, and he's to be back about it to-night."

Mr. Gibbs instantly promised in the most solemn manner to be back to meet old Stapleton, and off he set for Sturton at a swinging pace.

It was a good long distance, as the reader well knows; and although Mr. Gibbs walked as fast as he could go, and he was a light and active man, who usually went at the rate of a postman, it took him a few minutes more than two hours to reach the market-place at Sturton. When he did reach it, however, which was about five o'clock in the afternoon, he found every reason to be satisfied with his expedition. The bottle of the Fragrant Balm which he had left was approved of; it had adorned the head of the mayor's wife; it had beautified the locks of the aldermen's children! After a little haggling about price, fifty bottles were disposed of to the chief perfumer in the place, and Mr. Gibbs, saying to himself "This will bring me up with a wipe," retired to a snug little public-house to get himself some bread and cheese and ale, before he set out on his return to Mallington. The traffic, the bread and cheese, and ale, took him altogether about one hour and five-and-twenty minutes, so that it was about half-past six o'clock when the worthy traveler set out upon his return towards Mallington.

I trust that I have combined precision with brevity in this account of Mr. Gibbs's proceedings, for it is necessary that the reader should know the particulars, but not necessary that he should pause upon them. Now, to any one who considers how far the year was advanced it will be apparent that Mr. Gibbs could not get half way back to Mallington before night began to fall, and the same fact was apparent to Mr. Gibbs also before he set out; but what c... Mr. Gibbs! He had made a successful sp... lation; he had wiped away a reproach upon h... commercial abilities; his heart was light, t... evening was fair, and he had bread and ch... and ale on board! If he thought at all of h... ing been knocked down in Wenlock Wood, ... remembered at the same time that, by ... Western's showing, the knocker-down was ... away from the knockee, in custody one-a... twenty miles off, and, therefore, away he w... with a gay step—

"Harmless himself, expecting harm from none."

During the first two miles he met with ... good number of people, all cheerful, bustli... busy, like himself. It seemed as if the radia... of Mr. Gibbs's countenance spread sunshi... around him. But during the next two miles th... population became thinner, a laborer or two w... met trudging slowly homeward, one farm... passed on horseback, and that was all; t... next mile of the road proved almost a solitud... The country became wilder, the sky grew som... what gray, and Wenlock Wood was near at ... hand. Whether it was that the ale began to lose its effect, or that the spirits of Mr. Gibbs had exhausted themselves by their own activity, or whether it was that Mr. Gibbs was tired, or that the solemn aspect of the sky and the wo... scene before his eyes oppressed his breast, cer... tain it is that Mr. Gibbs's heart began to fail h... little, a very little, at the sight of Wenlock Wood.

We have before said that Mr. Gibbs was a brave man; he by no means wanted courage, though subject, like many other men's courage, to a few little irregularities; but as soon as he found a sort of sinking about the præcordial region, he called all his resolution to his aid, and began to mount the hill before him with a wide step and a somewhat more rapid pace than was necessary. By the time that he reached the top, where the hill formed a sort of angle, commanding a view on two sides over the country below, Mr. Gibbs found himself what in jockey language is called "blown," anglicé, out of breath, and pausing on the top to recover, he looked out over the low ground on either hand and the two slopes at the hill. He could see the road by which he himself had ascended, another small path on the left, at about a third of a mile's distance, and another road to the right, somewhat farther, all mounting with a winding course, like three great serpents, into Wenlock Wood; and the gray cool light of the evening, without any of the dazzling mistiness of the day, showed him, perhaps, their several courses more distinctly than if the sun had been above the horizon. He knew, from his former perquisitions in the wood, in company with Mr. Harry Soames, constable of Mallington, that the path to the left wound up to the very spot where he had been knocked down; and in the state of his feelings at that moment, it was by no means satisfactory to him to perceive two persons issue forth from amongst the bushes about half way down, and beginning to climb the hill. Mr. Gibbs, at one glance, saw that the foremost of these men was a short stout personage, whom either fancy or the clearness of his visual organs made him think very like the celebrated Jack Williams; whil...

the one that followed was a taller and heavier personage, who might very well be Mr. Thomas Brown.

All this was seen in a moment, as I have said, for as soon as he had seen it, Mr. Gibbs ducked down to prevent his own person from attracting observation, and hurried along with the utmost rapidity, calculating that he should get past the place where the two paths met before the others could reach it.

There is an old proverb to the effect that the more haste is the worst speed, and so Mr. Gibbs found it on the present occasion. He made some way, indeed, without any sinister accident; but when he had gone about half a mile, and was in the midst of the thickest part of the wood, grim night had begun to be unpleasantly troublesome. Certain importunate brambles which we have spoken of before, began to tug at his shins as he passed, and solicit him urgently rather to remain where he was; the stump of a tree objected strongly to his passing; and at the same time Mr. Gibbs was very well aware that the path on which he had seen the other two men, came along at an acute angle with the one he was himself pursuing, so that if they had gone on at anything like a moderate rate of progression, they would not be further from him than a hundred yards or so. He fancied he heard voices too, and that put him in a portentous fright. The epithet may seem not well chosen, but still it is selected with care. The evil which his fright portended, was a tremendous fall over the gnarled root of an old oak, just about five yards from the spot where he had before fallen from an application of a crab stick to the other extreme of his person.

Mr. Gibbs broke his shin. The consequence was that immediately upon rising, he hopped for a minute and a half on one foot in the temporary insanity of acute pain. He was brought to his senses the moment after, however, by distinctly hearing a voice, and an excessively unpleasant voice it was to his ears, for he had heard it more than once before.

What could he do? What was to become of him? He was lame, lonely, benighted, and within thirty yards upon the best possible computation of a couple of murderers flying from justice.

Mr. Gibbs had been famous for bird's nesting in his youth. He had practised some of the inferior means and appliances of the same art in Mallington Park, amongst the beech trees. A beech tree is more difficult to climb than an oak, the one which had overthrown him was close at hand, and Mr. Gibbs resolved to make a friend of an enemy, and get into the tree. There was neither sin nor shame in it; King Charles had done the same before him; he was less likely to be followed, and more able to defend himself there than on the open path; and consequently up he went, finding the various knobs and protuberances of the old oak's rugged rind almost as good as a flight of stairs, and a great deal better than a ladder. And now having placed him in a very interesting situation, we shall leave the reader to contemplate him as he sits about twelve feet from the ground, where the principal stem of the oak divided into great branches. A man may have a more uncomfortable seat than on an oak tree, if there be not a pack of wolves at the foot.

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

We left Mr. Gibbs in an oak tree, and in no very pleasant state of mind. We have much compassion for him; we have a yearning to return to him, one of our early love—to get him out of his oak tree if possible—to lend him a friendly hand, and aid him to descend lightly to the ground. The reader, too, would fain watch him as he sits, and learn what became of him—would contemplate him in the crisis of his fate, and prepare to shed tears over his tragic end, in the hand of those wolves in sheeps'-clothing (an exquisite figure of speech, which may well be applied to any bad man who wears a woolen jacket), or to smile with a rejoicing heart if he contrives to escape them. The critic, too—the lenient, mild, benignant critic—lies in wait beside us, ready, in the true style of our witty friend Poole's "slashing article," to condemn any course that we may pursue, and declare that there is a great deal too much, or a great deal too little of Mr. Gibbs in the book—just as we speak of him or let him alone. But after due deliberation, and a considerable waste of thought, we have determined, not without some hesitation, and a good deal of alarm, from manifold motives, and for various reasons thereunto us moving, which we will not detain the reader any longer to explain—to leave Mr. Gibbs in the oak tree!

There he is, reader! Let him make the best of it. It is his own fault: he had no business to get into the oak tree if he was in such a hurry to get out of it. What business have men to complain of a union workhouse? If it is so terrible a place, why do they go in? It is true they may starve if they stay out, and many prefer it; but, nevertheless, merciful legislators give them a choice—starvation or imprisonment! What unreasonable men to grumble! Thus, Mr. Gibbs fancied that he would have his throat cut if he stayed down below, and therefore got up into the tree. Yet it was his own fault if he felt uncomfortable there, for he might have remained where he was at first, and all the miseries of life would soon have been over. So he had nobody to thank for it but himself. The two cases are exactly parallel.

Neither will we follow Louisa Charlton to the rectory at present, nor pursue Alfred Latimer on his ill-omened bridal journey; nor sit with the Misses Martin to their dish of scandal; nor follow Mr. Henry Soames upon his pursuit of the criminals; but, by the reader's leave, that everything may be in order, we will walk along with Mr. Quatterly and Mr. Morton to the respectable inn called the Bagpipes, where they were received with every sort of joy and satisfaction by the blooming Mrs. Pluckrose.

It may be well supposed that the little town of Mallington had been in a state of excitement and consternation during the whole morning, and where they have neither a billiard-room, a reading-room, a club, or a coffee-house in a place, where can people go to compare notes, receive information, and manufacture rumors, so well as to the principal inn or public-house in the neighborhood? The bar, the commercial room, and the passage were filled with the inhabitants of Mallington and its vicinity, and round the door were collected a considerable number of persons who had an objection to spending their money upon ale, wine, or brandy-and-water.

Through the midst of all these Mr. Morton passed with his friend, Mr. Quatterly, and they all turned round at him to stare at him as they went, for they were all aware by this time that he had been accused of robbery and murder, and whatever it was that they expected to see, they were certainly considerably surprised by his calm, placid, and self-possessed demeanor, as he walked on, unconscious of the attention he was attracting.

"Well, madam," said Mr. Quatterly, tapping the landlady familiarly on the shoulder; "Well, Mrs. Pluckrose"—and immediately alleviating, as was sometimes customary with him, into an abominable pun, he added, "though, indeed, my dear lady, I think your name ought to be put into the plural, for you must have plucked two roses to blush so brightly on either cheek. But to return. Has anybody been here this morning inquiring for me. If so, I hope you have kept him."

"Oh, yes, sir," replied Mrs. Pluckrose, dropping a courtesy, "there are two gentlemen waiting for you. I took the liberty of putting them into Mr. Morton's sitting-room, because the house is so full."

"Not so full as to prevent my having a bed in it, Mrs. Pluckrose?" said the worthy solicitor; but the landlady reassured him on that point, and Mr. Morton and his friend walked up stairs, where they found waiting a middle-aged gentleman, who looked very much like a solicitor, and a younger man, bearing a strong resemblance to a clerk. There was a great blue bag upon the table before them, and the solicitor looked out of the window, while the clerk sat with his hands on his knees.

"Ah, Mr. Writham," said Mr. Quatterly, rolling into the room as fast as his small legs would carry him. "I hope I have not kept you waiting, for we had a little magisterial business to go through here. Indeed, I did not expect to see you yourself. A clerk would have done."

"Oh, nothing like one's own presence, my dear sir," answered Mr. Writham, who had a peculiarly clear, sharp, ferret-like expression of countenance, with a long sharp nose, the very look of which would have made a flaw in a piece of parchment. "I came down to say that the whole matter may be considered as definitely settled and agreed upon the basis laid down between us at our last conference—always provided, nevertheless—"

"Anything hereinbefore contained to the contrary notwithstanding," said Mr. Quatterly, laughing. "I thought there was an exceptionable clause, friend Writham. Well, what is it—what is it? Out with it, man. We'll soon deal with it."

"It is simply this, my dear sir," answered Mr. Writham, "and you will own that it's quite reasonable, namely, that your client—I presume that I have the honor of being in his presence—do produce lawful and sufficient proof of the marriage of Henry Morton Wilmot and Maria dei Pazzi, and also of the death without issue of Charles Francis Wilmot."

"Oh, the latter is easily proved," replied Mr. Quatterly, "and, besides with that you have nothing to do, for if he did leave legitimate issue, it would bar your client as well as mine, and besides, I never heard of a boy seven years old having a son and heir. The law does not contemplate such a case, Mr. Writham, and we can prove his birth and his death, with an interval of seven years between them. As to the other matter, it is quite right that you should have the proof you require, and you shall have it. There may be a little delay, from an awkward event which has removed the certificate to some distance."

Mr. Writham pricked up his ears, for there seemed to him a chance of pleading still, and he observed in a solemn tone, "Of course, Mr. Quatterly, proof is necessary. Full, legal indubitable proof."

"And proof you shall have, my dear Writham," answered Mr. Quatterly — "full, legal, indubitable proof, as you say, for where we got the one certificate we can easily get another, even if the first should be lost. But by your good leave, my friend, we will draw up a little memorandum of the grounds on which we stand, stating the proofs and particulars that you require, and guarding against any future demands." Mr. Writham seemed to pause and hesitate; but Mr. Quatterly went on in a decided tone, saying, "It is absolutely necessary, Writham. It must be done, my friend. Either sign and get your costs, or don't sign and go without them. I'm a solicitor, too, you know, Writham, and one time I had a window broken in my house—a glazier was sent for, who put in the pane. Just when he had done I unfortunately walked into the room, and saw him neatly starring the next pane with his diamond, then placing his finger dexterously against it till it gave a crack. I thought to myself, 'What an image of a solicitor!' We are all fond of making little holes, that we may mend them afterwards. It's the very nature and essence of our profession, Writham," and he took his fellow practitioner by the arm and gave him a friendly shake.

Mr. Writham did not attempt to resist his eloquence. The paper was drawn up by Mr. Quatterly's own hands; Mr. Writham suggested some alterations; they were canvassed, discussed, investigated in their tendencies, and some were rejected, whilst others were admitted; after which the paper was signed. Mr. Morton took no part in the affair; but amused himself quietly by writing a letter, which occupied the greater portion of the time. When the whole business was concluded, Mr. Quatterly began to feel the inconvenience of his brother solicitor having been shown into that room. He was naturally of a hospitable and jovial disposition, and he would have liked very well to have asked Mr. Writham to dine with him at Mallington; but then he wanted a little private conversation with Morton, and was well aware that Morton might desire a little private conversation with somebody else. Mr. Writham, however, relieved him from his difficulty by declaring that he must be off to London as fast as possible, as he had at least a hundred and fifty pieces of business to transact on the following day. As no coach passed towards town after that hour, his only resource lay in post-chaises; and accordingly, as soon as one could be procured, away he went, taking his clerk and his blue bag along with him.

As soon as he was gone, Mr. Quatterly entered upon business with his friend. "This certificate must be procured somehow, my dear sir," he said. "It may be difficult and unpleasant to wait for journeys to and from Italy; and yet how are we to get it without sending, I do not perceive. You look mighty cool and indifferent; but I can tell you it is a serious matter; for the want of this document, if the exhibition thereof be long delayed, may encourage these people to plead; and then Lord have mercy on your purse!—for it will be a fight with them for life or death—or for costs or no costs, which comes to the same thing."

"I am not at all indifferent, my good friend, I assure you," answered Morton; "but nevertheless, I feel very sure that we shall obtain the paper speedily. I know it to be in the hands of the fellow Williams, with all the other papers that were in my pocket-book. Most likely he has not had time to destroy them before he was apprehended, as you have stated, for the only thing he could gain, would be by keeping them; and, therefore, doubtless, they will be found amongst the rest of the things which he may have thought fit to leave behind. I suppose we shall soon have over some intelligence from Mr. Soames, the constable, and you can send over directions to stop all that belongs to me."

"That shall be done—that shall be done!" answered Mr. Quatterly: "but still I can't help regretting that the paper is not forthcoming at once. I see risk and inconvenience, and a great deal of law; and no one who knows as much of the fresh eggs of Mrs. Themis can doubt that the sooner they are hatched the better; for if they are left alone for a single night, a thousand to one they are found addled the next morning."

"That is not a very consolatory view of the case," answered Morton; "but still I do not see, my excellent friend, how I can help myself. There is an old saying, which you of all men must be well acquainted with, that 'what is done cannot be undone.'"

"Oh yes, I love old sayings," answered the worthy solicitor, "some for being wonderfully good and true, and some for being wonderfully bad and false; though, probably, they were all true when they were first said, otherwise Solomon must have been a fool, and many a wiser man than he was much in the same case. Now, for instance, men say that honesty is the best policy; and it would be true of all times, if they had added the words 'here or hereafter;' but as the proverb stands, upon my life, I believe there is nothing more false. An honest man always makes much less noise in the world than a rogue; and as the only way to get on in life is to make a noise in the world, the rogue has the better chance. Look at poets, philosophers, statesmen, soldiers—you will always find that those who have done the most good have been the least rewarded. Write lascivious verses and immoral odes, and your contemporaries crown you with immortality—the public purchase, and the minister honors. Inculcate virtue, try to amend and correct, and starve in a garret, or die in a madhouse. Set up for infidel, and you're raised above Locke and Newton. Be a true Christian philosopher, and you are passed by as a twaddling canter. So with statesmen, so with soldiers, so even with lawyers. A rogue has a thousand paths he may follow to distinction, an honest man but one. Rogues for ever, friend Morton! But I'm getting misanthropical and you fidgety; so tell me what you are going to do, noble sir, and I'll be no clog upon you."

"First, my dear sir," replied Morton, with a smile, given in passing to his friend's somewhat bitter, but not very unjust view of human life. "First, I am going over to Mallington Hall, in order to see something of the scene of such sad events, and to visit the poor widow of the murdered man; then I am going to return here, by your leave, to dine with you upon such fare as Mrs. Pluckrose can furnish; and then I shall go and drink tea with good Dr. Western and his sister."

"Where you expect to meet somebody else," said Mr. Quatterly. "Well, then, my young friend, my afternoon is laid out also. First, I will walk over with you to Mallington Hall, if you have no objection; then I will return here with you and dine; then I will amuse myself by writing a few letters, and making a few notes, till it is time to go to what the young people call Bedfordshire. Thus will you and I both consult our convenience: I shall not be in your way, and you will not be in mine. But pray order the dinner before you go, or else we shall have to wait for a full hour after we come back. Now, there is nothing so unpleasant on earth as waiting for an inn dinner."

Morton praised the punctuality of Mrs. Pluckrose, the greatest virtue of an innkeeper, but took his friend's advice, and after the dinner was ordered, they both set out upon their expedition, although the day had become cloudy as the sun crossed the sky. Mr. Quatterly admired the whole scene very much. With the park he was peculiarly pleased, and noticed all those little beauties which well directed art had added to nature, in a manner that would have delighted poor Edmonds, could he have heard his words.

"All that you so much praise, my dear sir," said Morton, "is owing to the exertions of one man, poor Edmonds, who lies murdered up at the house there. He was a fine specimen of that very fine creature the English peasant of the best class. Not without his peculiarities; he was, perhaps, rather elevated by them than otherwise, for they were all of a fine and generous kind. He was blunt and straightforward, but never rude or insolent, and resolute to do his duty to his master, whether his master liked it or not; he was sometimes a little pertinacious, especially where the object required labor and exertion on his own part. There was a certain degree of sternness about him, but yet he was not without kindly and gentle feelings; and, indeed, from all I have heard, I fear that his taking part with, and making excuses for, that wretched young man, Mrs. Charlton's son, when every one else avoided and condemned him, has been the means of bringing wretchedness to his home, and even death upon himself."

"A fine character, but a rare one in his class," said Mr. Quatterly.

"Nay, I do not think so," answered Morton;

"I believe that there are more of such characters in England than we imagine, and that there would be more still if various circumstances in our state of society did not tend in different ways to brutalise them. It is with the classes above themselves that a great part of the fault lies wherever we find a rude and animal class of peasantry. I speak not of one class alone, but of all the classes above them in their degree, for the great proprietor has his share in producing the evil, by the neglect of the means which God has put in his power for the purpose of removing it. But take two classes as examples—the farmer and the manufacturer. There are many individual exceptions, but in general they only seem to look upon those who labor for them as machines, by means of which they are to produce as much as possible at the least possible expense. They have no object in making them aught but machines, and a human machine is nothing but a teachable beast. In the manufactory he may become a well-drilled monkey; in the fields he may be a bear; but no effort of any value is made to raise him, but, on the contrary, many to depress him in the scale of being. In some places we teach the people reading and writing, and so far we do well; but we rarely, if ever, address ourselves to teach them to think rightly, to reason justly, or to weigh moral against physical advantages; and all the time we show them by our own conduct that we use their exertions but for our own purposes, and, by paying not one penny more than we are obliged, keep them in that state of poverty and dependence which is the most brutalising of all things; or, what is worse, perhaps, and more dangerous to themselves and society, prove to them that in their communication with the classes above them, they receive nought but injury and wrong. Here, in this very case before us, a man in the rank and station of a gentleman is treated both respectfully and kindly by a person greatly inferior to himself in station, though greatly superior to him in mind; and what does he inflict in return, first upon the daughter, and then upon the father?"

"What!" exclaimed Mr. Quatterly, with surprise, "you do not mean to say that the poor girl I saw married this day to that young vagabond, Alfred Latimer, is the daughter of the murdered man."

"Yes, indeed," answered Morton; "and I know not to be sorry or to rejoice that the marriage has really taken place."

"Oh, rejoice, rejoice at all events," answered Mr. Quatterly; "but, to say truth, this offers me the first reasonable cause for doubting the young man's guilt. Notwithstanding all my knowledge of human crime—and it is tolerably extensive, as I need not tell you—I can hardly believe it possible that a man, however depraved, should go and wed at the altar a woman with whose father's blood his hand was still wet. Truth, that most extraordinary thing, is the most difficult of all ores to extract from the immense mass of dross with which it is mingled, and in this case we may have got upon a wrong scent. Certainly the circumstances are very suspicious; but yet nothing is clearly proved. The young man may have been out upon some other wild expedition, the blood may have come upon his clothes in some other way; God grant it, and grant that it may be proved, for although we get at as much truth as perhaps can possibly be obtained by the means and appliances of our criminal law, yet, depend upon it, many a man is hanged for crimes he has never committed."

Morton was silent, for he knew more of Alfred Latimer's character than good Mr. Quatterly did, and he did not entertain the same hopes as his friend. In a few minutes after they approached the great door of the house by the gravel walk in front, and the old gentleman, not feeling the same interest in all the actors of the sad scenes which had lately passed that Morton did, paused to comment upon the heavy and antique masses of the building, which had their picturesque beauty, notwithstanding some want of taste in the details. Morton walked silently on and rang the bell. The door was speedily opened, and Mrs. Chalke, the housekeeper, appeared behind the good woman who drew it back. "Ah, sir," said the housekeeper, as soon as she saw Mr. Morton; "this has been a terrible affair, and I'm very glad you are come, if you have anything to do with the place, for, indeed, I cannot stay in it to-night after what has happened. I should die of fright, I am sure, before morning broke; and, indeed, if we had not got in Betsy Smith and Mrs. Blackmore, I don't think I could stay in it by day."

Morton promised that he would send two or three men to remain upon the premises all night, and then proceeded with Mr. Quatterly to visit the immediate scenes of the plunderers' operations. He first turned his steps to the plate room, the door of which was still open, for the keys had always been kept in London, and then, after having given orders that it should be immediately fastened by a padlock, he proceeded to the chamber where the body of poor Edmonds still lay, awaiting the coroner's inquest. The presence of death is always sad and solemn. There are vague and dark prophecies in the look of the dead that appeal with a warning voice to the living, even when the last final act of man's life has come in the regular course of the great tragedy. But when an active and intelligent being has been brought to a close, in the midst of health and vigor, by some unnatural cause, and more especially by crime, that voice becomes more deep and strong, reasoning to the ear that will hear it, of all the duties and relations of life, and all the punishments which attend their neglect or violation. The punishments inevitable, innumerable, not alone those which the hand of man visibly inflicts, but those which the judgment of the Almighty prescribes even in this world—the withdrawal of his countenance and his grace, the extinction of good feelings and of higher hopes, the blotting out of all the traces of a better and a purer nature, which were left to his descendants by the first sinner at the fall. Mr. Morton and his friend gazed upon the body of the poor park-keeper, as he remained stretched upon the bed in the same position in which he had been placed on the preceding night. Neither of them said a word for some time, but both felt deeply, and Morton, when he turned away, repeated once or twice, "Poor fellow, poor fellow!"

"Now, my dear sir," he said, when they were once more in the hall; "I will go over to the widow's, and if she will receive me, I will see her, however painful a duty it may be. The man has been killed in my service, and I doubt not, from what I know of him, in doing it well. She and her children, therefore, must be provided for, and though, perhaps, she may not have turned her thoughts to the aggravation which poverty and wordly difficulties must always, sooner or later, bring to other sorrows, yet they would sooner or later present themselves to her mind, and it is as well that she should be spared that uneasiness altogether."

"You are right, my dear sir, you are right," replied Mr. Quatterly, following him; "one of the best charities is the sparing of our fellow-creatures any source of unhappiness from which we can shield them."

The door of the park-keeper's house was opened by the little boy, with his face pale and his eyes red. The room in which the family had usually sat was vacant, and the boy said that his mother was lying down on her bed, and that Dr. Western had just left her.

"Tell her, my good boy," said Morton, "that I am here, and that I should like to speak to her for a few minutes, if she can admit me; but that if she is not well enough I will come and see her to-morrow."

The boy returned from the little room, beyond, however, asking Mr. Morton to go in; and, leaving Mr. Quatterly in the other chamber, he passed through the door, and found poor Mrs. Edmonds seated upon the side of the bed, with the windows half closed. Her grief was very silent; there was no display, no effort, no noisy sorrow. She made more than one ineffectual attempt to restrain her tears, but she felt that she could not speak, lest the bitterness of her heart should burst forth in lamentations. Morton took her hand kindly; and, seating himself on a chair beside her, he said, in a quiet low tone, "I am sorry to intrude upon you now, Mrs. Edmonds, especially as I know that such grief as yours is not to be comforted; but I thought I might as well spare you any unnecessary cares or anxieties by assuring you that your own fate, and that of your children, shall be well cared for. I will take the boy's education upon myself, and will provide for him hereafter. You, also, I will take care shall never know want of any kind, and in whatever occupation may suit you best—for I know that you will not like to be without occupation—you shall have every assistance that I can give you."

"Thank you, sir, thank you," answered Mrs. Edmonds; "you are very kind—but, oh, my poor girl!" and she burst into tears again.

"Well, perhaps, what I have to tell you of her may comfort you, on her score, at least," answered Morton. "I have ascertained, Mrs. Edmonds, that she is really lawfully married to him." He did not venture to mention the name; and he did hope and trust that, for some time, at least, the share which Alfred Latimer was suspected of having taken in the death of her husband would be kept from Mrs. Edmonds's ear.

"Oh! thank you, sir," replied the widow; "that is comfort, indeed. I did not dare to mention her name to Dr. Western, for I knew he thought her very wicked, though he never said so. Oh, that her poor father could have heard such news!" and the tears burst forth afresh.

After a few more words of kindness, which is always consolation in its degree, Morton left the widow, and returned with Mr. Quatterly to the inn.

We will not pause to discuss the dinner which Mrs. Pluckrose set before her revered guests, nor descant upon the excellence of the roast chickens, nor the insufferable hardness of the bacon by which they were accompanied. After the moderate meal was over, Morton left his companion for the evening, and once more took his way along the bank of the river from the inn to the rectory.

There are days in the life of every one when events seem to crowd so thickly together that they jostle one another for attention, and a thousand subjects of deep interest were pressing upon our young friend's mind at that moment; but yet a faint hope of seeing fair Louisa Charlton at the rector's passed through the crowd, and made him hurry his steps. Nor was he deceived, for the first person he saw on entering was herself.

"I thought, dear Louisa," he said, "that you would be driven to this kind place of refuge. I hope you had not much to endure before you sought it."

"A great deal more than ought to have been inflicted upon her," replied Dr. Western, speaking for his fair ward. "But now, my dear sir, my sister and I will do our best to make her happy whilst she remains with us; but I fear there are still a good many difficulties and discomforts to be encountered before her fate is more happily fixed."

"Discomforts, perhaps many," replied Morton; "but difficulties, I trust, none, my dear doctor. Mrs. Charlton's opposition, I know, we must expect; but if Louisa feels as I hope she does, that opposition need cause no delay whatever in our arrangements. The law must afterwards take its course, and pronounce how far we may be affected by the lady's decision. But after a scene which I have to relate to you, and which took place this morning before you arrived, I think you will see that it is unnecessary for us to pay any attention to Mrs. Charlton's proceedings, as her opinion of me or any other person depends entirely upon our pliability in regard to certain views, which seem to me not of the most honest character. However, of that hereafter."

The conversation now turned to other subjects; but still the events of the day formed, of course, the principal topic, and as all those events were sad—as they all showed, in different points of view, the depravity or folly of human nature, the general tenor of that evening's conference was sad and somewhat gloomy. Yet Morton did not love Louisa less, and Louisa loved Morton, if possible, more, as that conversation came towards a close. The lighter things of life have their effect perhaps in first attracting, but it is when the deeper and the sterner draw forth the more profound and precious qualities that the heart becomes knit to heart by ties that can never be broken. It is then that the casket is thrown open, and the real jewels displayed, for the small traits and indications which are visible in ordinary society much more frequently afford a view into the faults and failings than into the virtues and excellencies of our companions.

As the hour of ten was approaching, Morton related to Dr. Western his visit to the widow, and the short conversation which had taken place between them. "I must ask you, my dear sir," he said, "who know so much more of her habits and feelings than I do, to turn in your mind what sort of position will be best suited for her. I will secure to her a little independence; but I know that it will please her best, and I am sure that, under existing circumstances, it will be best for her, to have some employment for her leisure time. There are some occasions, as we all know, when labor is a blessing; and such, I believe, it will be in her case. The boy we will easily provide for; and as to poor Lucy, I fear we must wait to see the course of events before we can devise anything for her benefit."

"I dread to think," said Dr. Western, feelingly, "what must be the effect on Lucy's mind when she knows the whole of this sad history."

"Oh, keep it from her—keep it from her!" cried Louisa. "If it be possible, never let her know the worst of all that has occurred."

Dr. Western shook his head. "It is the saddest part of sin and crime, my love," he said, "that they bring misery to others who have no participation in them. One man's folly or wickedness often spreads round wretchedness to thousands, and almost each house in the land has, sooner or later, its heartaches from the errors of some one whom its roof has at some time sheltered. You, yourself, my dear child, will have to bear your share of suffering from Alfred Latimer's errors, and this poor girl who is now his wife must endure her part of the same hard consequences. I see no possibility of preventing it. She must know of his apprehension, which will doubtless be speedily effected, and all the circumstances will, sooner or later, be heard, whatever be the result.

"I think it might be prevented," said Morton, after a moment's thought. "His apprehension, indeed, she must learn; but it seems to me possible that by some one stepping forward to protect her in her unprotected state, the darkest fact of all—if it be a fact—that her husband was an actual participator in her father's murder, may be concealed from her. At all events, in the case of the poor widow, we had better keep our suspicions from reaching her ears as long as possible, for it would bitterly aggravate her grief at present were she to know all the circumstances as they now appear."

"You say if it be a fact, my dear sir," replied Dr. Western, "and you speak in a tone of doubt. Has anything occurred to make you hope that the opinions we formed this morning are groundless?"

"But little," answered Morton. "Mr. Quatterly, indeed, has doubts; but it seems to me—"

While he was speaking there was a good deal of bustle in the rector's hall; much more, indeed, than that usually quiet and well-regulated place was at all accustomed to. Voices sounded speaking low and eagerly, and the tones of Dr. Western's old butler, usually so grave and calm, were at length heard rising powerfully.

"But I must and will see him this instant," cried one voice, which Morton thought he recognised.

"But I tell you you cannot see him till I let him know, and ask whether he chooses it or not."

"But I know he will choose, and see him I will this moment," rejoined the first speaker. "I tell you it's matter of life and death; and there's not a moment to be lost!"

There seemed to come then a little scuffle in the hall, in which the rector's butler, being the weakest, as usual, went to the wall, and the moment after, the door of the dining-room, which was adjacent, was thrown open, and then suddenly closed again. Another moment brought a step to the drawing-room door, and it too was opened with eager haste. All eyes were turned towards it, on the part of Louisa and Mrs. Evelyn with some degree of fear, and instantly in rushed Mr. Gibbs in his own proper person, his usually neat and somewhat extravagant attire being a good deal deranged, his black and silken ringlets all confused and tumbled over each other like a mob of corkscrews; but importance and vigor in his countenance.

"Oh, sir," he said, addressing Morton, as soon as he perceived him; "I have such news for you, though it has well nigh cost me my life—come along—there is not a moment to be lost—we've got them safe if you like to have them."

Mr. Gibbs' mind was evidently over-excited, and Morton, fearing that he might come harshly on some subject that would be painful to Louisa, beckoned him to come out of the room, saying, "I will speak to you in the library, Mr. Gibbs, by Dr. Western's permission."

"Let him come, too—let him come, too," cried Mr. Gibbs. "We shall want all the assistance we can get, I can tell you, sir; but there's not a moment to be lost if you intend to do anything effectual"—thus saying he followed Mr. Morton out of the room. Dr. Western accompanied him, and after they had been about ten minutes away together, the bell of the library was heard ringing, and several of the men servants were called into the room.

CHAPTER LXXIX.

The reader cannot tell—nay, it is impossible to describe to him so as to give him even a faint idea of it—no, "si j'avais une langue de fer toujours parlante," as Voltaire has it, I could not explain the terrible temptation which an author has to struggle with when he has got his reader and some of his characters into what is vulgarly termed a predicament, and feels an inclination to leave them all there and go to some other part of the story. No man should be trusted with power. It is more than human nature can bear; and the despot's spirit is sure to seize upon every one who has his fellow creatures at his mercy. I feel at this present moment, dear reader, the tyrant strong within me, urging me to torture you even at the risk of losing my throne—to fly away from Mr. Gibbs and Mr. Morton and Dr. Western, and follow out the course of Alfred Latimer. But I will resist it manfully; and if ever I should come into Parliament—which heaven forfend!—I will introduce a bill to render it penal for an author to tell his story in any other than a straightforward manner.

I will go on with Mr. Gibbs, coute qui coute; for do not suppose that to do so is without its inconveniences. On the contrary, I foresee many to the after telling of my tale; but still "for a great good I must do a little wrong;" though, be it remarked that principle—a very vicious one, by the way—should never be acted upon but once in his life by an author, and never in his whole life by a prime minister. It is contrary to morals, to logic, and to common sense to do wrong at all; and no motive can justify it, as shall be proved at large in some chapter especially devoted to that purpose; but enough of the question for the present, and now for Mr. Gibbs.

We left Dr. Western, Mr. Morton, and the traveling perfumer all in the library together, ringing the bell; but before we proceed to examine into the results of that phenomenon we must inquire into the causes—"Mon ami bellier toujours commencez par le commencement." Upon my life, that is the third piece of French I have put into this chapter. I beg a thousand pardons, and trust to be forgiven; for I do not think there is as much of any foreign language, ancient or modern, in all my works put together.

However, we left, as I have said, Dr. Western, Mr. Morton, and Mr. Gibbs in the library together—I'll go on, now, upon my word—and the first sentence spoken was by Morton. "Well, Mr. Gibbs," he said, "What is all this? What have you discovered?"

"Why, I've got them, sir—I've got them!" cried Gibbs; "but there's no time to be lost if you want to have them."

"Who do you mean, my good friend?" exclaimed Dr. Western. "Do you mean Mr. Latimer?"

"No, no, no!" cried the traveler eagerly. "I mean the villains, the scoundrels, the chiefs of the whole gang, and I'm afraid every moment that they should get away."

"But give us some connected account of who they are, and what you mean?" said Mr. Morton, judging from the visitor's excited manner, soiled and deranged dress, and whirling words, that he had either drank too much, or that he was slightly insane. "We have already seen to-day, Mr. Gibbs, how unjustly suspicions may be entertained, and, of course, can do nothing without proper information."

"Well, then, if I must waste time," exclaimed the other, "all I have to say is that it is entirely owing to the fragrant Balm of Trinidad. If it hadn't been for that I should never have known anything at all. I went over to Sturton, sir, where I made a very convenient deal, and as I was coming back through the wood, just at the top of the hill on this side of Sturton, where I could look down over all the country, I saw two men creeping up by one of the narrow paths, and, not liking their looks at all—for I thought I knew the villains—I went on as fast as I could. They came nearly as fast, and, as the mischief would have it, it grew quite dark in the wood, and down I fell, breaking my shin most desperately. Running was out of the question; if I lay there I was sure to be murdered; so I took to my old trick, and got up the tree. I had not been there two minutes when the blood-thirsty villains passed underneath, and I held my breath, and listened with all my ears. Well, I heard one say to the other 'I could have sworn I heard something running and the bushes shake;' and then the other answered 'It's very likely a deer got out of the park; the paling is very bad in some places.' You may fancy how I trembled; but then t'other one said 'It was more like a man's foot than a deer's,' so that made me tremble more, till I thought they would hear me shaking. But then one said to the other 'It's all quiet enough now, however;' and the other answered 'Ay; if it was any one, he's off by this time, and he couldn't be looking for us, at all events.' That was Jack Williams that spoke."

"Jack Williams," exclaimed Dr. Western; "why, I left him in the hands of the magistrates at——."

"Ay! he's out, however it happened," answered Mr. Gibbs, "and Brown with him, too, doctor. "I'll take my oath of it, by the fragrant Balm of Trinidad, and all I hold sacred. I knew who they were pretty well when first I saw them, and then when I heard their tongues I was quite sure; besides, they called each other by their names, that is to say Brown called him 'Williams,' and he called Brown 'Tom.'

"But where are they, then?" demanded Morton. "It would take a whole regiment to search that wood properly, even if they are there still."

"They are there still," answered Gibbs; "but they won't be there very long. But as to searching the wood, that's needless; for I can tell you exactly where they are, and where they intend to remain till two o'clock, for I heard all their arrangements just as plain as a sermon. They stopped a minute close under the tree after they had said what I have told you, as if they were listening, and then Brown said to Williams 'I don't hear anything, Williams, do you?' upon which Williams answered 'No, Tom, I don't; and, at all events, we had better get into the cave, for we must have some rest before we go on, and we are in less danger there than anywhere else.' 'So I think,' answered Brown; 'but if I once fall asleep, I'm not likely to wake in a hurry, for it's a tolerable long walk, I can tell you, Williams, with all the round we have made, and this bundle is devilish heavy. One of us had better keep awake whilst the other sleeps, and so take it in turns.' But Williams replied 'Never you fear, I shall wake at two o'clock; I always do, for that's the time I used to go up and watch. I must have some sleep, too, recollect, for I've had none these three nights, and we mustn't be much after two in starting again, that we may get on ten or twelve miles on the other side before daylight.' 'Well, come along, then,' answered Brown, 'and let us have something to eat and drink first. It's devilish little use having got the money if we are forced to starve ourselves notwithstanding.' After that they walked on a little, and I began to think how I should like to follow them and see where the cave is they talked about; but I very soon found that it was nearer than I thought, for I could hear that they did not go along the path, but pushed through the trees and bushes near towards the high bank, and then they seemed to come to a dead stop, for I could hear their voices talking again without seeming to move. They were far enough off to prevent me from knowing what they said, except when they spoke very loud; but near enough to make me quite sure of whereabouts they were. Presently, too, there came a sort of crackling sound, and I could see a red light shining through the branches, which showed me that they had lighted a fire. The dogs did not know there was anybody so near, or I dare say they would not have made themselves so comfortable."

"This opportunity must not be lost," said Dr. Western, rising, and ringing the bell. "We must secure these men if possible."

"It would do me a great deal of good, your reverence," said Mr. Gibbs, "if you would just let me have a glass of wine, for, to tell the truth, I am somewhat tired, and a good deal exhausted, not having touched a bit of anything for a good many hours; but still I am ready to go the minute the others are."

"You deserve high praise for your courage and activity, Mr. Gibbs," replied the worthy clergyman, "and you shall have anything that you desire which the house can afford. 'Bring in some wine and some cold meat," he continued, as the servant appeared; "but first tell the coachman to come here directly. Now pray, Mr. Gibbs, let us hear how you escaped from your very unpleasant situation in the tree."

"It was all owing to the fragrant Balm of Trinidad," replied his visitor; "for having a specimen bottle in my pocket, as soon as I found that the murderers were safely lodged at such a distance as not to hear a little rustle, I took it out, and, pushing down my stocking, rubbed my shin till the pain quite went off, otherwise I couldn't have walked a step, I'm sure. I kept a sharp ear upon my friends in the cave, however, and rubbed and listened, and listened and rubbed, for full half an hour. But still they kept talking and eating I fancy, and I could hear a cork drawn, and then they laughed."

"Laughed!" exclaimed Dr. Western. "I am sometimes inclined to wonder how human beings ever laugh."

"It was Tom Brown, I think," returned Mr. Gibbs; "for I never saw Williams laugh in my life, and I don't think he ever does. But some time after that they began to be more silent, speaking for a minute or two, and then breaking off again; and then there came a word or two and an answer; and then they were still so long I thought they were both asleep; but then they began again; and so it went on till it must have been half-past nine, I dare say. After that all was quiet; but I dare not move for a full half hour, during which time I considered what I had best do, and gradually I began to take courage, and I determined to come down, and get across as fast as possible, for it was the nearest magistrate's house; and as I grew bolder and bolder, I thought I might just as well take a look at their cave before I went; and when I was quite sure they must be asleep, I got slowly down the tree from knot to knot, making no noise at all, and then crept quietly through the grass towards the chesnut-trees and bushes under the bank, making as near as I could for the spot where I had seen the light glimmering when I was up-stairs in the tree, for I could not see it now for the brushwood, but I smelt it strong enough, notwithstanding. I picked my steps like a cat over the wet ground, and presently as I moved about, I spied a gap amongst the leaves and branches, not bigger than my hand, through which I saw something red shining, and getting as near as I could I peeped through."

"And what did you see?" asked Morton, as the coachman entered, followed by the footman with a tray of cold meat and wine in his hands, and Mr. Gibbs paused in his narrative.

"Why, I saw the fire of sticks beginning to die out," replied Mr. Gibbs, "and that great big hulking fellow, Brown, lying upon his back with a bundle under his head, and Williams sitting with his back against the bank, and his head leaning forward, sound asleep. As I stood there Brown began to snore. You thought it very horrible, sir, that such men should laugh, but I can tell you it's very horrible indeed to hear a murderer snore; so creeping away again without making the least noise, I marked one or two of the large trees near with my knife, and then came down back again as fast as I could to old Blackmore, the gardener's cottage. I had to knock the old man up out of his bed, for his boat was chained and padlocked; but when he saw me, and heard what I wanted it for—though I didn't tell him all—he let me have it willingly enough, and I punted myself across here without more ado. The boat is just down by the bank there, and I'm ready to go as soon as I have had something to refresh me a little."

While Mr. Gibbs proceeded with great self-possession and satisfaction to comfort himself with the good things set before him, a consultation took place between Dr. Western, Mr. Morton, and the coachman, as to what would be the best plan to pursue for the purpose of capturing the two malefactors, whose place of concealment had been discovered by the worthy traveler. Considerable difficulties, however, presented themselves. The lateness of the hour—the want of all preparation—the absence of the only constable that Mallington boasted—the distance of Dr. Western's house from the village—and the early period at which Williams and his companion were to start upon their onward journey—were all impediments which were difficult to be overcome. Dr. Western was a man of peace; but, nevertheless, his sense of duty as a magistrate led him at first to resolve upon going in person, and it was with the greatest difficulty that Morton dissuaded him.

"I shall go, certainly, my dear sir," said the young gentleman himself, "for you know that I have a personal stake in this matter; when, besides forwarding the ends of justice, I would fain secure the papers which one or the other of these men undoubtedly possess. But both your age and your profession, my dear sir, should prevent you from going; and, doubtless, we shall be able to get enough men by the way to render our proceedings secure."

"I don't know, sir," said the coachman, scratching his head; "but, if you cross over in the boat, you'll find nobody but old Blackmore, and he's too lame to be of any good. You and I, and the gentleman there might be enough, it's true; but, depend upon it, the fellows will fight like mad, for I suppose they've got a rope round their necks any how."

"Doesn't Miles, one of the keepers, live up at the corner of the park by Mrs. Hazlewood's cottage?" asked Morton; "and we can easily take that in our way."

"Yes sir, so we can," answered the coachman; "and a strapping chap he is too. I didn't think of him."

"Then we shall be enough, my dear sir," rejoined Mr. Morton, turning to the rector with a cheerful smile. "Four stout men will certainly be sufficient against two. Though any odds are justifiable in such a case, I should be almost ashamed of taking more. We had better have some arms, however, if you have any in the house. If not, I must send for my pistols to the inn."

"Oh, the footman has a couple of brace in his pantry, and I have a long-unused gun upstairs," replied Dr. Western.

"I've got a pistol, too," said the coachman, and Mr. Gibbs chimed in, announcing that he had his two little barkers in his pocket, never having gone unprovided since his head had suffered in the very wood to which he was now destined. He started up at the same time, declaring himself quite ready; and, indeed, he showed a degree of alacrity and resolution which raised him high in the opinion of Mr. Morton. The gun and pistols were procured, and then a sufficient quantity of cord was sought for and cut at convenient lengths, with a portion of which each of the expeditionary party furnished themselves.

"Now, go out with the coachman and down to the boat, Mr. Gibbs," said Mr. Morton, as soon as all was ready; "I will join you in a minute;" and then turning to Dr. Western, he added, "I will just go and bid Louisa and Mrs. Evelyn good evening. It will be much better, however, that they should know nothing of this affair till it is over, as it would render them uneasy during the night, and poor Louisa has enough to grieve her without any further anxiety."

Dr. Western agreed cordially in this view, but at the same time he added, "You must return and let me know, my dear sir, for I shall certainly sit up till it is all over."

Morton promised to do as he requested, and then returning to the drawing-room, laughed with Louisa and Mrs. Evelyn for a moment over Mr. Gibbs's strange interruption, and merely adding that he thought it would end in the capture of two notorious malefactors, took his leave with as light an air as if he was going to a party of pleasure.

CHAPTER LXXX.

The moon had somewhat declined, the high slopes of the ground behind Mallington Park, the deep rounds of the wood in the foreground, even the lower part of the park itself, though turned to the south, were all in shadow; but yet the river in some of its bends caught the rays of the declining planet, and glistened like silver as it flowed along. The boat had been drawn up as near to the rectory as possible, where the stream, expanding, flowed on more gently, leaving a fringe of reeds, mingled with the large round leaves of the water lily, on that side of the river; and in the punt itself appeared, when Morton approached, the coachman and Mr. Gibbs. He concluded, of course, that they were waiting there for him; but, nevertheless, he could not, as he hurried on, divine with what amusement they were filling up their time; for the coachman, with his body slightly bent, and the pole in his hand, seemed very much in the attitude of one who was lifting out a large fish with a landing net, while Mr. Gibbs, on his knees, in the bottom of the punt, was stooping over still further, and reaching out with his hands, apparently to secure something that his companion was endeavoring to guide to the side of their little bark.

Just when Morton came up the worthy traveler made a sharp grasp at something, exclaiming the moment after, "I have got it—it's a hat."

He then emptied the water out, and turning to the young gentleman as he stepped into the punt, he showed him his prize, saying "Here's a hat in the water. Isn't that funny, sir?—a very good hat, too, and can't have been long in, or it would have fallen to pieces."

"Keep it safely, Mr. Gibbs," answered Morton, who saw more in the fact than the other seemed to do. "There, push off, coachman, as fast as you can. You had better, perhaps, mark the hat, Mr. Gibbs, for we must leave it in the boat, and it may be important to identify it."

"Here's something written in the inside already," answered the traveler, "if I could but make out what it is," and he turned it to the moonlight, but in vain. "I'll mark it at all events," he continued, taking out his pencil and marking a broad cross on the leather. "There, that will prevent mistakes. I shouldn't wonder if it were that young Mr. Latimer's hat. He came back without one, they say, and took a new one with him."

Mr. Morton did not reply, and the punt soon glided into the darker part of the stream, and approached the opposite bank, where the whole party stepped out, and the boat was made fast. Morton then led the way at once towards the cottage of the man Miles; but by this time it was past twelve o'clock, and the good countryman and all his family were sound asleep in their beds, whence it was very difficult to rouse them. At length, after long knocking at the door, and tapping at the window, Miles himself was called out of his bed; and, as apprehension was the order of the day, and as he did not choose to give such nocturnal visitors an opportunity of forcing their way in, he brought his face as near as possible to the casement, and opened it, inquiring "Who the devil are you?"

"Get on some clothes and come out, Miles," replied Mr. Morton. "Bring your gun with you, too, with a ball or two, fit for it, if you've got any. We've some business to do."

"Lord bless me sir! I didn't know you," answered the man in a respectful tone; but, rubbing his eyes heartily at the same time, "What is it all about? The season is too far gone for shooting a buck."

"I'll tell you presently," answered Morton; "but make haste, my good friend, for we have no time to lose."

The man retired, promptly threw on some clothes, and calling one of his little girls to shut the door after him, speedily appeared with gun and powder flask in one hand and some bullets in the other.

"You had better charge," said Morton, and the man obeyed without hesitation, but still not without some surprise. Mr. Gibbs he stared at heartily, but recognized Dr. Western's coachman, and asked him how he did in a semi-somnambulous manner, while he went on cramming his gun as hard as he could drive.

"The French havn't landed, have they?" he asked at length, as he followed Morton up the sandy lane under the park wall.

"Oh, no," answered Morton. "We have not such serious enemies to deal with as that, my good fellow. We have discovered where two of the men are lying hid who are suspected of having broken into Mallington Hall, and murdered poor Edmonds."

"Oh, d—n them!" cried the gamekeeper; "if I catch them I'll knock their brains out."

"No, no," answered Morton. "You must be so good as to follow your orders exactly. I'll tell you what to do when we get near the spot, and you must do neither more nor less."

"Where be they?" asked Miles, in an eager tone, which showed that sleep was now quite thrown off. "In the chesnut wood, I'll bet any money."

"No," answered Morton; "in a cave or hollow piece of ground in Wenlock Wood, I understand."

"What! Gammer Hurry's Hole!" exclaimed Miles, stopping suddenly. "Well, that's the very place for them to hide, to be sure. I havn't been there this many a year, and I didn't think of it. But stop a bit, stop a bit. If they are in there you'll want some light, for at the back part it's as black as the coal-hole, even in the day time, and we may all get our throats cut before we know it."

This was a point that had neither struck Morton, Mr. Gibbs, nor the coachman, and for a moment or two it puzzled them all very much.

Miles soon came to their relief. "I've got a dark lantern at home," he said. "You three go up to the common, at the back of the park, and I'll run and fetch it, and be up with you in a minute."

They reached the top of the hill, however, some minutes before they were overtaken by the gamekeeper; and Morton took advantage of the opportunity to cross-examine Mr. Gibbs in regard to the locality and circumstances of the cave, and also to arrange his plan of operations.

"Two of us had better go in first," he said, "and two stay at the entrance, in case the others should miss them, and they should run out. As soon, however, as we have got hold of them, the others can rush in to help."

"They were both close at the mouth," said Mr. Gibbs. "But who's to go in first?"

Morton mistook him, and thought that one of the qualms of apprehension which he acknowledged having felt in the tree had now got possession of him again, and he accordingly replied, "You and the coachman had better stay at the entrance, Mr. Gibbs; you can hold the lantern, so as to give us as much light as possible, and knock any of them down who attempt to pass."

But the safety that is in numbers had inspired Mr. Gibbs with the spirit of a hero. He was not at all unwilling to take his part in a fight, though he objected strongly to having the fight all to himself. "No, no, sir!" he exclaimed, "on my life, that's not fair. I found the fellows out, and I ought to be allowed my part in taking them."

"So you shall, my good friend," replied Morton; "but only, as I think that Miles is a stronger man—"

"Oh! I'm stronger than I look," answered Mr. Gibbs, interrupting him, "and devilish active. Let me once get my fingers on one of their throats, and the fellow shan't throw me off more easily than a pinned bull does a bulldog."

"Well, so be it," answered Morton, who recollecting that Miles was a married man, with a large family dependent upon him, thought it as well that the more dangerous part of the undertaking should fall upon the dapper traveler.

When the gamekeeper joined them, however, though he did not venture to express his dissent so boldly as Mr. Gibbs had done, yet he grumbled a little at the prospect of not being allowed, as he termed it, "to have a lick at the fellows who murdered poor Edmonds."

Morton replied, "You must remember that they are only suspected, my good friend, and, therefore, there must be no more violence than is necessary to secure them. Probably, however, we shall all have as much of it as we well deserve. So now that we understand the whole, let us go on in perfect silence; and remember, Miles, not to unshade the lantern till we are close to the entrance of the cave. Step as quietly as possible also; and you, Miles, lead the way, as I suppose you know the place best."

"Know Gammer Hurry's Hole! Ay, that I do," answered the gamekeeper; "but what am I to do if I am not to go in when I get there!"

"You keep close to the right of the mouth. The coachman, who must come last, will keep close to the left, and Mr. Gibbs and I will go in between you as soon as you unshade the lantern."

"Very well, sir," answered Miles, "just as you like, though I think you had better leave it to us, in case harm should come of it."

"No, no, that will not do," answered Morton. "I never put other men upon tasks that I am afraid to undertake myself. Now go on, Miles."

The man led the way across the common till he reached the edge of Wenlock Wood; but then, instead of taking the path which Mr. Gibbs had followed once before, he struck away to the left, skirting the wood, till he came nearly to the spot where the high bank in which the cave was dug fell away into the broken ground of the common. This proceeding agitated Mr. Gibbs a good deal, for he thought that the man must have mistaken the place; and, plucking Mr. Morton by the coat, he whispered his apprehensions.

"Hush!" answered Morton, "he is right, depend upon it;" and at the same moment the gamekeeper turned into the wood, where a somewhat broader and less entangled path was found under the shelter of the sandy banks.

Slowly and cautiously they walked along, keeping close to each other, and preserving a profound silence; and it is vain to say that the sensation was not somewhat awful, as, in the depth of the night, and with no other light but that afforded by the sky above, bright though it might be with the moon's rays, they walked on through the deep wood, and remembered that a struggle was about to take place with men whose hands were already imbrued in human blood, and who would, in all probability, struggle with the courage of despair. Every now and then, where the banks were a little lower, the moonlight poured from the south-west upon their path, streaming between the boles of the trees that crested the high ground above; but those occasional glimpses of brightness tended rather to render the gloom more deep when the darkness succeeded again.

When they had gone about a quarter of a mile a bird of the raven species—whether their steps had caught his watchful ear or whether he was already on the wing, I cannot tell—flew over their heads, with a hoarse croak, and they could hear the strong feathers of his wings flap amongst the branches. These were the only sounds they heard, all the rest was still, and solemn, and silent; not a breath of air was felt; the thin branches of the birch waved not, and the light leaves of the aspen remained at rest. Their own step was all that moved, and each took especial care to tread as lightly as possible, and to hold the cautious breath. At length a faint odor of burnt wood was perceptible, hanging about amongst the trees; and Miles, turning partly round, touched Mr. Morton on the shoulder, as an intimation that they were approaching the place.

Morton instantly drew one of the pistols from his pocket and held it in his left hand, giving the same sign to those behind him; and, after taking about twenty steps further, the gamekeeper stood still. Though completely dark, and though the fire which Mr. Gibbs had seen had now gone out, Morton could perceive distinctly enough the dark outline of the mouth of the cave, and when Miles paused and faced round on the right-hand side, the young gentleman did the same within about a yard of him. Mr. Gibbs also approached, and then Morton touched the gamekeeper as a signal to unshade the lantern. Just at the same moment there was a slight noise in the cave, as if some one moved; but the covering over the lantern was instantly drawn back, and the figures of the two sleeping men were straight before them. The feeble rays penetrated faintly into the cave, showing near the entrance the rough smoke-begrimed sides, but suffering the further parts to rest in obscurity. They flashed full upon the faces of Williams and his companion, however, and while Brown rolled over uneasily on his side, but without waking, the former started at once upon his feet, exclaiming, "Ay, ay, sir," as if suddenly called by some one in command over him.

Without giving him a moment's pause Morton rushed in upon him and grasped him by the collar; but even in the short interval, roused completely by the sound of feet, the miscreant was upon his guard, and grappling tight with his antagonist, a fearful struggle commenced between them. At the same moment Mr. Gibbs sprang upon Brown and held him down, meeting at first but little resistance, for the man's senses were completely buried in sleep; but as the grasp of his assailant began to oppress his throat, he too roused himself and struck the traveler a tremendous blow on the head as he started up, but without inducing Gibbs to let go his hold. Then seizing him by the waist he endeavored with his great strength to dash his head against the side of the cavern; but with active dexterity Gibbs contrived to avoid the blow, keeping fast to his throat, to use his own simile, like a bull-dog, while Brown raged and swore with every blasphemy that the vocabulary of crime could supply.

The contest, in the meantime, between Morton and Williams was more silent and apparently less violent, but more deadly. They were better matched in all respects; the gentleman was taller, as active, as much inured to exercise and danger; but not so muscular as his opponent. He had his pistol cocked in his hand, too, but that only embarrassed him, for he was determined not to use it but in case of the last necessity, and as he was presenting it at his head with a low threat to fire, a well-aimed blow knocked it out of his hand, and it went off as it struck the ground. They grappled with each other instantly, and wrestling with all their power, each strove to throw the other, till Williams, finding that he had to contend with one as powerful and as skillful as himself, relaxed his hold for a moment, and thrust his hand into the pocket of his jacket. It was for life or death; for he knew that the withdrawal of his hand from Morton's shoulder would give his antagonist one fearful advantage; but he saw the two men at the mouth of the cave; he heard Miles exclaim "Hang it, this will never do!" and beheld him set down the lantern to start forward. His only chance was in dispatching his adversary at once; and the next instant a pistol was in his hand. Morton saw it, turned towards him, and put forth all his strength. Williams staggered, wavered, lost his balance; but still, with the pertinacity of the wolf, that bites even in dying, he strove to aim the weapon aright as he fell, still clinging to his enemy with his left hand. Miles beheld the whole, as he rushed on, and grasped at the felon's wrist, turning it somewhat from its course; but at the same moment that Williams fell headlong, the pistol went off; and Morton cast himself upon him, holding his chest down with his knee.

"Are you hurt, sir! are you hurt!" cried the gamekeeper.

"Never mind! never mind!" answered Morton, "Tie him! tie him!" and at the same time he pressed heavily upon his antagonist's chest.

With rapidity and skill Miles slipped a noose over Williams's arms, while Morton held him down, drew it tight, and tied it fast. "Now, help them there! help them!" said the young gentleman, rising; and as Miles sprang away to aid Gibbs and the coachman, who were both struggling with Brown, Morton drew a second pistol from his pocket, turned to the mouth of the cave, and sat down, keeping a wary eye upon Williams. The man stood for an instant with his eyes bent upon the ground, without turning even a glance to the strife which went on for a moment near, ere his comrade was finally overcome and tied; but at length, with a slow step, he advanced towards Morton.

"Stand back!" said the young gentleman, as he saw him approach, raising his pistol at the same time; "I have not strength to struggle with you now, so I must fire, however unwillingly, if you attempt to escape."

"I was only coming to say I am afraid you are hurt, sir," answered Williams, in a mild tone; "I am sorry for it; but my blood was up, and I could not help it."

At the same moment Miles seized him by the collar, and dragged him back; but Morton exclaimed, "Do not ill-use him—do not ill-use him, on any account!" and the other three gathering round the young gentleman, whose face had turned somewhat pale, saw the blood streaming rapidly over the breast of his shirt from the right side as he leaned upon the left arm.

CHAPTER LXXXI.

In the prison of the town of ——, and in the best room of the prison, for in those days every man was considered innocent till he was proved guilty, and no man was treated to the utmost rigors of imprisonment till he was condemned by a jury of his country—we have changed all these things now, and it is quite as bad to be suspected of any serious crime as to commit a minor one—sat Captain Tankerville at his ease. He had a bottle of wine before him, and a veal pie—both excellent things, when they are good of their kind—and he reasoned with himself, as he sat, upon fate and human circumstances, and was quite as good a philosopher in his way, as far as ethics were concerned at least, as many a man who has written a large folio, and begotten for himself a great name. True, it is probable that his lucubrations would not greatly have tended to improve the moral or religious tone of society; but the same may be said, unfortunately, of almost every philosopher that ever lived. I say almost, because there are one or two great exceptions. But search through a large library, dear reader, and point out those exceptions one by one, and your feet will sooner have been tired of moving from shelf to shelf, than your tongue of pronouncing the names of the few clever men who have been good men too.

Captain Tankerville began by thinking of the strange turn circumstances had taken in bringing him to the jail of a small country town, when he felt himself well qualified to figure in a more extended sphere in the capital itself. "It's not an uncomfortable jail either," he said to himself, looking round—for Captain Tankerville was a connoisseur in jails, and had had some experience—"It's not an uncomfortable jail either, and devilish civil fellows in it; but it is strange to find one's self here. What an atrocious thing law is! Here am I shut up, for three or four days perhaps, for nothing in life but for playing at cards in an inn on a Sunday. It is true old Quatterly says he can prove a forgery against me—he's a clever fellow if he does. That cock's been tried before, I can tell him, and won't fight; but if he did he might run a chance of twisting my neck, after all. What an infamous shame to hang a man as one would a dog, merely for writing ten or twelve black strokes at the bottom of a piece of paper. It's contrary to every principle of justice and equity—it's pure murder. If I had to make laws I'd hang all those who have made them. Man was intended to be free. I don't suppose, when he was first turned out, that even a spadeful of earth was given to him as his own. Then whence does he derive his right to anything he has? It's all stuff. The whole world is properly in common, and each man has a right to take what he can get, and keep what he can. Why should not I write down upon a piece of paper the simple words, George Jacobson, just as well as any other man. I entered into no pledge with my godfathers and godmothers that I would stick to the name of Tom Tankerville all my life. Why doesn't a name wear out as well as anything else by too much use? and it's devilish hard that one may not get a new one, just as a man gets a new coat—that's cursed bad wine: brandy, sugar, and sloe juice. I wonder if one can't get anything better in this stupid town;" and he rang the bell which hung beside the mantel-piece.

One of the turnkeys came in immediately, for Captain Tankerville bled freely, as they said in the prison, and, thinking he had done his dinner, was about to remove the things; but the captain stopped him, exclaiming "Stay, stay; I havn't half done. I want some more wine, Mr. What's-your-name; and something better than that, too. I never tasted such stuff as that. You may take it away and drink it yourself if you like; but get me a bottle of good real old port, that will make the evening pass comfortably—and, I say, if you have anything new and entertaining come in, bring it in here just for an hour or so, for the sake of society. I'm beginning to get devilish dull."

"You don't seem so, I'm sure, sir," replied the turnkey; "but I'll tell Mr. Wilson what you say," and, withdrawing with the bottle in his hand, he went and spoke with his principal.

"Go and get him a bottle of old port from the Hart," said Mr. Wilson; "there's four shillings to pay for it—charge him eight, you know—but let it be good, for conscience sake. What's come in?"

"Nothing, sir," replied the turnkey, "but a petty larceny and an assault locked up in default."

"They might as well have sent that to the cage, I think," said Mr. Wilson; "I don't like to have such dirty jobs here—but I'll go and talk to him myself and amuse him. He seems a rollicking sort of blade, and takes it mighty easy."

"Ay, that he do," answered the turnkey. "I dare say he thinks the old gentleman won't persecute."

"Oh, but they'll make him," answered the principal jailer. "They have bound him over, I think."

"No, sir, the captain is only remanded," answered his subordinate. "But, hark! they are bringing some one in now. Why, it's that smart-dressed boy as was set in the stocks!"

As he spoke he held the door of the room, which was near the entrance of the prison, ajar in his hand, and Mr. Wilson sauntered out with his coat tails turned back as he had been standing by the fire. When he saw young Blackmore, however, and heard that he too was remanded on the charge of being an accessory in the robbery of Mallington Hall, he thought he would be just the person to suit Captain Tankerville, and accordingly ordered him to be put into that worthy's room till a cell could be got ready for him. There were plenty quite ready in the jail, but there are conventionalities in prisons as well as other places.

When young John Blackmore found into whose society he was introduced he was greatly relieved and delighted, and the appetite with which Captain Tankerville was eating his veal pie, though a great vacuity in one side showed that it was not the first attack he had made upon it, gave him quite a new view of prison life, and taught him the great advantage of "a light heart," whatever may be the benefit of the other article which is sometimes supposed, in conjunction with it, to facilitate a man in going "through the world." He had a great respect for Captain Tankerville. He was a man of the first class in the profession which he had shown himself anxious to follow, and the gay and cordial manner with which the worthy captain treated him inspired confidence and won regard.

"Ah, Blackee, my boy!" cried the captain, "what, have they grabbed you? Delighted to see you. You are welcome to the stone pitcher. Sit down and have a bit of pie and a glass of wine when it comes. I'll treat you."

Young Blackmore took a seat, and, with his usual effeminate manner, received the captain's civilities; but when the wine came, and he had taken a glass or two, he felt his spirits greatly revived, and the stocks were forgotten.

"Now, tell us what you're in for, Blackee," said the captain, after they had conversed and drank for some little time, "Something capital, I hope."

"Capital! la, captain, don't talk of capital!" replied young Blackmore. "You make me quite nervous again."

"I'm talking of capital fun, not capital punishment," replied his fellow prisoner, laughing; "but whatever it is, you had better have a little good advice. A young fellow like you, when he first begins, is sure to get himself into some scrape, if he hasn't some friend at his elbow to tell him to keep out of it."

"I've got into a terrible scrape already," said John Blackmore.

"The more reason you should take advice from my long experience," answered his sage companion. "This is the fourteenth time I have been in jail, Blackee—eight times for debt, and six for peccadilloes—and I never yet failed to get my head out almost as fast as it was in; so tell me what's the matter, and you shall have a good legal opinion without a fee."

"Why, they've put me in here," replied the lad, "for overhearing something that Jack Williams said to Bill Maltby, about robbing Mallington House, and not telling."

"Oh, Jack Williams!" said Captain Tankerville. "Then Latimer's in for it too, and I may be excused for not giving him his revenge, as I promised."

Young Blackmore nodded his head in token of assent, and Captain Tankerville went on in a grave, deliberate, thoughtful manner. "So, you overheard them, did you? and you didn't tell. Well, that certainly makes you particeps criminis. An awkward position, Mr. Blackmore, especially if you had any finger in the pie—I don't mean your whole hand. I mean only if you fingered it—carrying messages, running for horses, giving a nod or a wink, and such things. Now, if murder had been committed, the question would have been settled. You'd have had to taste hemp, Blackee. It's rather bitter, but not so much so as people imagine, I have a notion, and one thing is, it's soon over."

"They say murder was committed," replied the young man, in a low tone, fixing his eyes upon Captain Tankerville's countenance, as if his life depended upon the next word.

"Ah! that's awkward," answered his fellow prisoner. "Take a glass of wine, Blackee. We'll have another bottle when that's done. Now, as far as I can see, you've got but one chance. You must stag—I dare say you don't care a straw about Williams—nor I either, for that matter—nor about Alfred Latimer—nor I either. They are both sure to be hanged, any way; so, if you can get your neck out of the noose between them, you are a fool if you don't do it."

"But I did confess," replied the youth, setting down his half emptied glass of wine; and he proceeded to tell his companion all that had happened to him during the preceding night and that eventful morning, and added by saying that the constable, as he had brought him along, had told him that the whole story was out, and the people hunting for Williams, Latimer, and Brown, all over the country; "and so they took me out of the stocks and put me in here," he added.

"See what it is not to have an experienced hand to consult with," rejoined Captain Tankerville. "If I had been near you, I'd have put you right in a minute. You should have stuck to your story to Williams's face, whether it was true or false. Then you would have got clear off, and, perhaps, been rewarded; now you've only one chance, my lad. You must come back to your old story, and say that the sight of the fellow frightened you out of your wits; then if you can just tell where Williams is gone, so as to get him nabbed, you'll save your bacon."

"I don't know," answered the youth, mournfully.

"Do you know where young Latimer is gone?" cried Captain Tankerville.

"Yes, yes," exclaimed young Blackmore, joyfully; "I know where he intended to go, and how they arranged all their plans, though at that time I wasn't aware that he was to have any hand in this job. He was first to go to Portsmouth, and then over to France, to a place called Havre, where Williams was to join him, and then they were to go pirating in the Levant together."

"A very pretty scheme!" cried Captain Tankerville, laughing heartily. "Quite romantic, upon my life. Two gentlemen starting in the characters of Blue Beard and Black Beard." As he spoke he approached the bell and gave it a smart pull.

"What are you going to do? what are you going to do?" cried young Blackmore.

"To save your life, my lad," replied Captain Tankerville. "It's very seldom indeed that one can tell the truth with any advantage to one's self. I never knew above two or three instances of it. But this is one, and it shows a man's skill if he finds out when it is just as good for him to tell the truth as to tell a lie. So now you have nothing to do but to go and swear where Alfred Latimer may be found, and, if he's caught, you may be safe enough. I say, my good friend," he continued, as the turnkey opened the door, "just tell the governor to step here. This young man has got something to tell which may further the ends of justice immensely; and, as I am always fond of seeing justice done, I think it quite as well that the magistrates should know it. But you had better be quick, or the fellows may have got beyond reach."

Mr. Wilson appeared in a minute, and heard all that young Blackmore had to say with a dry attentive countenance. At first his former tergiversation, which had reached the worthy officer's ears, seemed to have produced an unfavorable impression in regard to the young man's veracity; but as soon as he heard what he had to say of Alfred Latimer's escape, he replied "You must come before the magistrates. Send up Bill here to keep him safe," he continued, addressing the turnkey who stood behind, "and let some one keep a look-out for Mr. Soames; he was down at the bench just now."

"He was over at the Hart asking when the shay went," rejoined the turnkey.

"Well, see for him—see for him! and let him know that we've got information," said Mr. Wilson; and these precautions had their desired effect, for John Blackmore's new deposition was made before Soames had quitted the town, and furnished with the best information he could get, and all legal powers, as well as an assistant, he jumped into a post-chaise, and drove off towards Portsmouth.

CHAPTER LXXXII.

The post-chaise which contained Alfred Latimer and his poor bride rolled along as fast as two horses could draw it; but yet not fast enough for his impatience, for remorse and fear were upon him. He fancied that he had taken all his measures so well, indeed, that suspicion was not likely to fall upon him speedily, if at all. He fancied that it would be some time before the bloody clothes which he had left at Mallington House would be discovered; and as no one knew that they belonged to him, that it would be still longer before any circumstance would show that they had ever been in his possession. Even his marriage with Lucy he thought would tend more than all the rest to the concealment of his part in the crime that had been committed, and he argued and reargued with himself to prove, to his own satisfaction, that he was quite safe. Yet fear was in his heart, for, with a very few exceptions, terror is always the follower of crime. He could not banish it; he could not drive it away. More than once he pulled up the covering over the little window at the back of the chaise and looked out behind; more than once he called to the postboy to "get on," though he was going as fast as he could.

Remorse also was doing its part bitterly and terribly, and the struggling feelings within his bosom strangely affected his demeanor. Sometimes he would fall into deep and gloomy fits of thought—sometimes he would answer Lucy sharply and angrily—sometimes be prodigal of tenderness and caresses. He loved her certainly better than he had ever loved any human being. He had always done so, and now he clung to her as the only solace left, and the only fragment that he had saved out of the wreck of better things left for him; and yet the impatience and irritation of his mind would not suffer him to be wholly kind. But she bore all with gentleness and affection, as she had been lately taught to bear; and she now saw that something, she knew not what, weighed heavily upon his mind. For a moment at one time she thought, with deep grief, that it might be his marriage with her that irritated him—that he might regret it—that he might feel that it had degraded him; but then came one of those fits of tenderness which showed her that such could not be the case.

She little thought, poor girl, that she was sitting side by side with the murderer of her father; and that the hand, the burning hand which clasped hers was stained with her father's blood.

Onward, however, they went, and had gone near fifty miles on their way before Harry Soames, the constable, set out from Mallington in pursuit of them. But though poor Lucy was tired, and Alfred Latimer himself became drowsy with the exertions and the watchfulness of the preceding night, still he went on, till towards eleven they reached the town of Southampton. As soon as the chaise drove up at the door of the inn, Alfred Latimer inquired when the packet would sail for Havre, and, to his great relief, heard that it got under weigh at four o'clock on the following morning. He immediately sent to secure berths for himself and his wife, and after a light meal, bade Lucy retire to rest for an hour or two. But he himself did not lie down, fearful lest the people of the inn, notwithstanding all his injunctions, should not call him in time; and he remained dozing by the fire of the sitting-room in a half-delirious sleep. The horrors that he underwent during those three hours that he thus remained are indescribable. Scarcely had he closed his eyes for five minutes when the figure of poor Edmonds, as he lay bleeding on the floor the moment after he had shot him, presented itself to his sight, and he woke with a start of agony. Then, when he slept again, he seemed to hear loud voices shouting, and people screaming out his name, and calling "Stop the murderer!" and again sleep was banished. Thus it went on all the time, till at the hour appointed the punctual porter of the inn came with a candle in his hand to call the gentleman and lady that were going by the packet.

Lucy was soon roused, and ready to depart. The trunks and boxes they had brought were put upon a wheelbarrow; the bills paid, the servants fee'd, and with the daughter of his victim hanging on his arm, Alfred Latimer took his way down through the dark streets to the port.

It was a fine clear night, the wind was light and favorable, and no obstacle or impediment presented itself. The careless examination to which goods going abroad at that time were subjected at the Custom House was soon got over; one trunk was opened, and then all were marked with chalk, and carried to the vessel. Alfred Latimer and Lucy went on board at the same time, and both went down below to wait for the ship sailing.

In about twenty minutes after, there was a good deal of noise and swearing upon deck, and Alfred Latimer looked anxiously towards the cabin door. But presently a sort of swaying motion was felt, the ship began to bend considerably to one side, and the noise of rushing water showed him that they had got under weigh. It was a blessed relief, but still he could not rest; and as he and Lucy were the only cabin passengers, he laid down for a short time on the sofa by the side of her berth, and then started up again, saying he would go upon deck to see how they got on.

He found everything now calm and quiet; the ship going easily through the water, and the different lights that marked the shoals and headlands in that part of the channel distinctly visible. He wished that they were all passed; but still it was some satisfaction to be at sea, and he gazed over for a few minutes into the water as the ship sent it in foam from her sides. Presently, however, the captain gave some orders, the speed of the packet was slackened, and then apparently she stopped, without however letting down the anchor, and in reality driving on slowly with the tide.

"What is the matter?" asked Alfred Latimer of one of the sailors who came up the gangway with a coil of rope on his arm.

"Nothing but a boat from Portsmouth, sir," answered the man, unfastening the bolt where what is called the accommodation ladder is placed.

Alfred Latimer asked no more questions, but instantly went below, and there remained listening, with the cabin-door ajar in his hand. Presently the sound of oars, a grating noise against the ship's side, and voices speaking were heard; a good deal of hallooing followed, and then some conversation upon deck; but the unhappy young man could not distinguish anything that was said. In another instant, however, steps were heard coming down, and he closed the door hastily, and laid down upon the sofa again.

The persons who had descended went into what was called the gentlemen's cabin first; but then almost immediately returned, and the door of that in which Alfred Latimer and his poor wife were was thrown unceremoniously open. The first who came in was the captain of the ship; but two other faces appeared behind him, and in one of them the wretched young man instantly recognized a countenance which he knew too well—that of Harry Soames, the constable of Mallington.

His fate was no longer doubtful; a chill like that of death spread on his whole frame, and though he shook not, nor uttered a word, it seemed as if all his limbs were changed into stone,

"Ah, Master Alfred!" cried the constable, in a familiar tone, "I've caught you at last, have I? 'Twas devilish clever of you that doubling upon me at Andover, and taking to Southampton instead of Portsmouth. But you must come along now, and I am sorry to say I must put the darbies upon you, for you see the offence is a big 'un."

Alfred Latimer stood before him without word or motion, with his eyes gazing upon him, his lips quivering, and his face as pale as death.

"What is the matter?" cried Lucy, rising in terror. "What is all this, in heaven's name?"

"Why, it's a bad job, Miss Lucy," replied Harry Soames. "I must take your lover here—that's to say your husband, for I hear you are married outright—away with me. I've got nothing to do with you. The warrant's against him, and you can go where you like—to France, if it suits you."

"I will go wherever he goes," answered Lucy, clinging to the arm of her husband.

"Can't allow that," said Mr. Soames, in a decided tone; "and besides, you see it is impossible. I and the other constable have got to take him back, and the shay will but hold three anyhow. Howsoever, you can come after us if you like, though I'd advise you not."

"Where are you going to take him?" cried Lucy. "What are you putting those things on him for?" and she gazed with terror upon the handcuffs that they were fastening upon his unresisting arms.

"Why, we are going back to Mallington," answered Harry Soames, "and that as fast as we can go; and as for why we are putting these on him, you see it's for murder"—he had very nearly added "of your own father," but he had once had a child, and he paused, thinking, "I will not say that."

"For murder!" exclaimed Lucy, "for murder! Well, he is my husband, and I will go with him, whatever he has done."

"But I tell you you can't, ma'rm," answered Harry Soames. "It's no use argufying, it can't be done."

"Then I'll follow," said Lucy mournfully—"I'll follow, wherever he goes."

"Come," said the captain of the vessel, "you had better get him out of the ship as fast as you can. I can't lay to here all night. I thought there was something wrong about him when first I saw him. Come, take him away to the boat."

"Oh, take me with him—take me with him in the boat!" cried Lucy; "at least take me on shore with him!"

But Mr. Soames thought fit to assume a harshness which, notwithstanding his various faults, was not natural to him. "It's a great deal better she should be out of the way," he thought; she'll only break her heart if she comes in the midst of it, and finds how it all is. Better the young dog should be safe lodged in the stone pitcher, and her father's burial over, before she gets home, anyhow;" and, therefore, upon these considerations he replied, "No, that can't be permitted, ma'rm. You may jest speak a word to him, if you like, before he goes. There can be no harm in that. Stay a minute, captain, there's a good soul. They are new-married people, and this is a hard parting," and he walked towards the door.

"And what am I to do with the girl?" asked the captain in a low voice, following the constable.

"Oh, you must take her over to Havre, and bring her back again if she wants to come," answered Harry Soames. "I'm not going to take her ashore, I can tell you, for many reasons; but be kind to her, there's a good man, for she comes of very good people, and he's a gentleman of high family, although he has played this here trick."

"Are they really married?" asked the captain.

"Ay, that they were, yesterday morning," answered Harry Soames; "I see the gentleman that married them."

In the mean time Lucy had cast her arms round her husband's neck, and given way to the tears she had long repressed. But Alfred Latimer recovered himself sufficiently to whisper, in a quick tone, "Put your hand in my waistcoat pocket, and take out the key of the large trunk—all the money is in it. Go on to Havre, and then come back again if you like, Lucy. But on no account bring that trunk back with you, or anything that it contains, but what money you want. Quick—quick!—don't let them see you."

Lucy did as he bade her; and the moment after Harry Soames said, "Come, I can't give any more time, Mr. Latimer; you must come along."

"Well, I am ready," answered the young man. "Farewell, Lucy!—farewell!" and he kissed her tenderly.

They were obliged to take poor Lucy's arms from his neck before they could lead him to the deck. Alfred Latimer went calmly, though slowly; but as he approached the ship's side the overwhelming impression of the dreadful situation in which he was placed rushed upon his mind more forcibly than it had done before. The horror of being branded and tried as a murderer—the sight of all those whom he had known from his youth gazing upon him with horror, and the agony of a public execution—all seemed to flash upon his mind at once, and he thought anything would be preferable. He was near the ship's side—one of the men had him by the arm to help him down into the boat, and his hands were manacled; but he contrived to dart away, and at one spring cleared the bulwark. A dull splash was heard in the water, and a loud shriek from Lucy, who had followed close behind; but the instant after one of the boatmen exclaimed "I have got him, I have got him. Here he is!" and as they held the lantern over the ship's side they saw two of the men below pulling the wretched culprit into the boat.

"Oh, let me go with him—in pity, in mercy, let me go with him!" cried poor Lucy; but Harry Soames and his companion scrambled down the ship's side without heeding her, and the next moment the boat pushed off, leaving her upon the deck.

"There, go down, go down, my poor young lady," said the captain, in a kindly tone, "go down and sleep. Perhaps they won't be able to prove anything against him after all."

Those were the first words of comfort that Lucy had heard, and, after gazing for a minute in the direction that the boat took, she did go down into the cabin, but not to sleep. Still the captain's words returned to her mind.

"They may not be able to prove anything against him," she repeated to herself, "Oh, no, no, no, I am sure they cannot. Murder! Alfred would never commit murder! Perhaps he has killed somebody in a duel; they call that murder sometimes, but then they are always pardoned, and I am sure he will be."

She gave up her mind, however, to bitterer thoughts when she remembered many of the circumstances that had taken place—the companionship of Williams, the long absence of her husband for a day and two nights, the terrible agitation he had displayed, his haste and eagerness to reach a foreign country, and the sort of dull despair that had fallen upon him when Soames and his companion came on board. "I will return directly," she thought. "I will get back as fast as I can. But where shall I go when I reach Mallington? My father would be angry and not see me, and my mother will not venture to have me there. I will go to Dr. Western; he will be kind, though he may be angry, and he will pity me and help me, I am sure. But I must get back directly. I wonder if they could not land me somewhere as they go."

As soon as this thought struck her she looked forth from the cabin and called the steward, inquiring whether the captain could not put her ashore on the Isle of Wight? The reply, however, was in the negative; and a few minutes after the captain himself came down, saying "I shan't touch anywhere till I get to Havre, ma'am, but I can bring you back the day after to-morrow, if that will do. But I think you had a great deal better lie down, for we shall soon get into rough water."

"The day after to-morrow!" said Lucy. "That is a long time;" but the poor girl had no other resource. Steam-packets in those days did not span the seas as with a flying bridge, and Lucy, after brief deliberation, agreed to the captain's proposal to carry her back again. Then lying down in her berth once more, she turned her face so that no one entering could see her, and gave way to her grief without restraint. Innumerable horrors could be added, if any one so pleased, to the tale, of the sorrows which poor Lucy suffered, and the romance writers of an olden time would have produced a long history of disasters arising—as, indeed, was not improbable—from her having with her a number of things belonging to Alfred Latimer, and, more especially, a large quantity of the gold which had been plundered from Mallington House. She knew nothing of the fact, indeed, but still it was more than likely to have led her into difficulties and even dangers. But there is nothing so sickening to good taste as the exaggeration of that which is horrible enough in the plain reality. Far from meeting with all the misfortunes that she could meet with, various circumstances combined to prevent many of them from falling upon her. In the first place, Harry Soames, who had never before had the honor of capturing so respectable a prisoner for so capital an offence, what between the hurry and the eagerness of the pursuit, and the confusion and the novelty of boarding the packet at night, forgot those precautions which a more experienced officer of the street called Bow would have taken with the most deliberate coolness, notwithstanding the haste and impatience of the captain, and, as his warrant was directed only against the person of Alfred Latimer, satisfied himself with having obtained possession of that, and neglected to secure his goods, chattels, and effects, which, indeed, might have been of great consequence in proving the case against him. The captain, too, though a quick, sharp man, never troubled his head, according to the happy vulgarism, about the lady's trunks and boxes, and poor Lucy's utter unconsciousness of their importance, and the little heed she took of them, prevented anything like suspicion being aroused. Had they been seized she would have been left nearly penniless in a foreign land, either to die of want, or to find her way back how she could. But they were not seized, and everything was landed quietly on the quay at Havre. One box after another was taken to the Custom House; a few articles of English manufacture were detained as contraband, and all the rest were sent up to the inn, whither she had gone by the captain's recommendation. At that inn we shall now leave her, unconscious of the danger she had run, but with her heart already loaded with fully as much grief as she could bear.

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

Great was the bustle and confusion in Mallington, even at a late hour of the night on which the notorious Jack Williams and the little less notorious Tom Brown were secured. The inhabitants, the genii loci, were sleeping their first sweet sleep; the Crumps and the Martins, the Dixons and the Skinners, were all in the arms of Morpheus; and dear Mrs. Pluckrose pressed the downy pillow, full of unconsciousness, when a loud knocking at the inn door startled her from her fond oblivion. Chambermaids and ostlers were roused in haste, but the knocking continued till they made their appearance at the door; and then messengers were sent off with the utmost rapidity to the house of Mr. Nethersole and to that of Dr. Western, where the knocking recommenced with as much fury as before. All these proceedings not only roused but agitated the inhabitants, and forth from many a window came many a head. The Misses Martin, in curl-papers, and Mrs. Dixon, in her night-cap, were amongst the first to thrust the ornament of their shoulders into the night air; but Mrs. Dixon had the advantage, as the reader is well aware, of lying between the house of Mr. Nethersole and the inn, so that that excellent lady had the opportunity of calling to the ostler, as he hurried back from the former habitation, and inquiring, in dulcet accents, what was the matter with the Bagpipes.

"Why, ma'am," replied the ostler, "it's a sad business. Mr. Morton has just been brought in badly wounded; but they've got Jack Williams and Tom Brown as committed the murder, and that's summut."

After giving this account he pursued his way home again, although the Misses Martin screamed after him from the other side of the street, but screamed in vain. They had recourse to all the fictions of imagination to account for the bustle; and, to say sooth, they did some injury to the reputation both of Betsey the chambermaid, and even good Mrs. Pluckrose herself, by their surmises in regard to the cause of this rapid and noisy appeal to the surgeon.

"What could Mr. Nethersole be sent for at such an hour of the night, if it was not to attend one of the women at the inn?" And having established this position as their starting point, they went on with great vigor to calumniate every one in Mallington except themselves, and then fell sound asleep again, with the comfortable reflection that nobody could think worse of their neighbors than they did.

In the meantime Mr. Morton was assisted upstairs, for by this time he was greatly weakened by loss of blood; and having undressed himself with difficulty, stretched himself on the bed, waiting for Mr. Nethersole. But a very few minutes elapsed before that gentleman appeared, half dressed indeed, but having a large case of instruments under his arm, and his assistant at his back. Without asking any questions, and with a very quiet, deferential manner, he proceeded to examine the young gentleman's wound, and probed it to the bottom.

"There's the ball," he said, "there's the ball. That's lucky, we shall easily get at it. I fear, sir, I must put you to a good deal of pain; but it must be extracted immediately, and then we shall easily take up the vessels that have been cut."

"I do not mind the pain," said Mr. Morton; "but you had better get me a glass of wine, for I feel faint."

Mr. Nethersole, as we have said, was a skilful man, very dexterous in manipulation of his tools; and while Mr. Morton had been speaking he had continued apparently probing the wound with a curious-looking instrument somewhat like a pair of curling-irons.

"Get a glass of wine, William," he said; and at the same moment Morton felt a sort of tug, by no means of a pleasant description, but it was followed by instant relief from a sort of burning sensation, which he had felt just between the right shoulder and the chest, somewhat below the clavicle.

"Here it is," said Mr. Nethersole, with a slight degree of triumph in his tone, although it was low and mild; and he held up before Morton's eyes a pistol bullet, which he had drawn from the wound. "All safe, my dear sir," he continued, "no bones injured; and now we will attend to the hemorrhage. Before ten minutes were over, the bleeding had ceased, and Morton felt himself comparatively comfortable when

Dr. Western arrived, with terrible consternation in his face. Good Mrs. Pluckrose, who had been holding the light with Spartan fortitude, now hastened to relieve the mind of the worthy rector, exclaiming, "It's all right now, sir; the bleeding is stopped, and the bullet's out. There it lies upon the table."

But Dr. Western, without examining the implement of evil, advanced quietly to his young friend's bedside, and took his hand quietly in his. "Oh, it's nothing, my dear sir," said Morton; "the loss of blood made me somewhat faint, but that is all the mischief that has been done. I took the liberty of sending for you, because I knew that you were sitting up, and wished you to communicate the fact to Louisa in such a way as would not alarm her. But I was quite sure there was no great injury done, and therefore would not let them call Mr. Quatterly. I dare say I shall be able to get out to-morrow."

Mr. Nethersole shook his head. "Perfect quiet, my dear sir, perfect quiet is absolutely necessary. For three days, at least, I shall not let you quit your bed. The wound certainly is not dangerous, but we never can tell the result of inflammation, and, as you are well aware, some inflammation must come on, even in order to effect the healing process. At present, I would forbid all conversation. It is my invariable rule, where such injuries exist as this, to prevent every sort of excitement, and I have found the most beneficial results. Upon quiet depends your perfect recovery in ten days or a fortnight, or you remain ill for six weeks or two months. You may, therefore, take your choice. We surgeons don't object to a long case, you know; but still conscience, conscience makes us give the patient his option."

"Oh, the shorter time by all means," answered Morton; "and, therefore, I will merely speak a few words to Dr. Western, and bid him good night."

Mr. Nethersole, taking the hint, retired to the other side of the room, wiped his instruments, washed his hands, and conversed a few moments with Mrs. Pluckrose, while Morton requested the clergyman to take every measure for securing the comfort of poor Mrs. Edmonds, and arranging the funeral of her husband, after the coroner's inquest had taken place. Many were the messages, also, which he sent Louisa, beseeching her not to make herself uneasy, but though Dr. Western, from all he saw, was inclined to believe that his young friend was not seriously injured, he well knew that it would be in vain to attempt to relieve Louisa's anxiety till she herself could see him.

Leaving Mr. Nethersole there, resolved to stay all night by his patient, the rector took his way homeward, and retired to rest, thinking he would spare Miss Charlton all knowledge of the events which had taken place as long as possible. But with the very best intentions, and with the very best judgment, we very often produce greater pain to those we love by the means we take to secure them from it. For, unless we could see the intricacies of the heart, we can never tell how to apply the balm to the exact spot where it is required. Louisa had not been deceived by the air of calmness and indifference with which her lover had set out that night. She saw that he was going upon some expedition of importance, and the very silence which had been maintained in regard to its end and object, had naturally made her suspect that it was of a dangerous character. Sleepless and anxious, therefore, she had lain listening for every sound till the ringing of the bell, and the knocking at the door, and the hurried going out of Dr. Western showed her that some events had taken place, though of what nature she could not tell. Still she lay and listened, but did not hear his return, for he gained admission to the rectory by his own key, and made no noise in retiring to his room. With the earliest light of day Louisa was up, and in less than half an hour afterwards was down in Dr. Western's study. As always happens in such cases, the very tidings which he wished to communicate as gently as possible were told by the housemaid in the most abrupt and exaggerated form. Louisa might, indeed, guess that something had been added to the tale over and above the truth, but still the fact was clear—Morton was wounded; and fear can be as great a magician as hope, although in a sadder way. For a full hour Louisa continued giving way to all the darkest fancies that apprehension could call up; and then, unable to bear the suspense any longer, she hastened to the room of Mrs. Evelyn, and, knocking at the door, craved admission. The tale was soon told, and though the old lady endeavored to soothe her as much as possible, it was evident that she was herself frightened, and, as the best means of satisfying both, she went away, half dressed as she was, to her brother's room.

Dr. Western did not make them wait, for he was already up, and dressed; and, hurrying out, he informed Louisa, kindly and tenderly, but with perfect truth, of the state of the case.

"Morton is certainly hurt, my dear," he said, "but not dangerously. I cannot counsel you not to be grieved for his sufferings, Louisa; but I assure you there is not the slightest cause for apprehension, and you know that I would not say so unless I had good grounds."

"I am perfectly certain of that," replied Louisa; "and your assurance is a great comfort to me; but yet I should be more happy if—do you think there would be any harm or impropriety in my going with you to see him?"

"No, my dear," answered Dr. Western, "circumstanced as you are, and with your guardian at your side, I think there would be none; but there is an objection of another kind. Mr. Nethersole recommends perfect quiet for the next three days. Now, I need not tell you, Louisa, that Morton could not see you without very different emotions from those with which he would receive the surgeon, or the surgeon's assistant. Therefore, I think you had better forbear."

Louisa was very reasonable. "Whatever I may feel," she said, "I will do nothing to protract his illness; but at all events, as I suppose you will go to see him yourself, I may accompany you to the door. That will be some satisfaction."

To this there was no objection, and it was arranged that about the middle of the day, Louisa, Mrs. Evelyn, and the good doctor should go together to the inn, and thence cross over to Mallington Park, on a visit of consolation to poor Mrs. Edmonds. But before they set out, a message from Mr. Nethersole brought the welcome intelligence that Morton was proceeding perfectly well, and that he wished to see Dr. Western, to which the surgeon assented; and when, after having waited in the carriage for about a quarter of an hour, while the clergyman visited the wounded man, Louisa was again joined by her guardian, she received the still better tidings that her lover was apparently better than the night before; and Dr. Western added, with a smile, "The only danger is, that he seems so well it will be difficult to keep him quiet."

They then drove over the bridge, and up the chief road towards the hall; but just as they were turning off, in the direction of poor Edmonds's cottage, they passed a number of men on foot, conversing together, whom Louisa at once understood to be the coroner's jury. She turned her head away with a slight shudder as the sight brought back to her remembrance all the dreadful details of the crime which had been perpetrated, and her heart sunk as she recollected all the consequences which were to flow from the acts which were then taking place. When she thought of Alfred Latimer—of one brought up in the same house, and nearly connected with herself—of his being brought to trial for so dark and dreadful a deed—of having to appear as a witness against him, to aid in his condemnation, and to know that she had a share, however unwillingly, in working his destruction—when all these circumstances came across her mind, she almost feared that she should never have strength for the task. Then came the thought of his execution, of his mother's agony and rage; and although she felt too sadly convinced that nothing but justice would be done if the severest infliction of the law fell upon his head, yet she could not contemplate such a result without deep and terrible grief, and tried to turn away her eyes from the prospect before her. Such is the power of association upon the human mind, that when habituated to the society, even of those we neither love nor esteem, we cannot help feeling with them in misfortune and grief, even when the consequences of their own errors fall upon them. All seemed dark and gloomy around Louisa Charlton, except the one bright spot where love shone, like the sunshine that sometimes bursts through a stormy sky, and her heart was bitterly depressed enough when they reached the poor park-keeper's cottage, and a new scene of sorrow was presented to her.

Mrs. Evelyn and Louisa were left for nearly two hours with poor Mrs. Edmonds, while Dr. Western went up to the hall to make the various arrangements that were necessary, and to learn the result of the coroner's inquest. On his return he stayed with the poor widow for some time, and thus it was nearly four o'clock when the carriage again drove from the door. The beautiful scenery of the park, as they drove through it, the soft lawns and green turf, the brown wood sweeping round, the glistening river, caught here and there, through the gaps in the trees, were all lighted up by the calm evening sunshine, and, by the aspect of the great Creator's works in a state of such tranquillity, seemed to offer a sad but monitory contrast in the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, to the troublous passions and bitter strifes of man, which had filled the hearts of all around with pain, anxiety, and fear. But one sight more was wanting to make that contrast more complete, and it was to be added before Louisa reached her temporary home. The carriage drove slowly over the bridge; and, at the spot where the roads crossed, was turning to the left towards the rectory, when, suddenly dashing down the hill as fast as four horses could bring it, appeared a post-chaise approaching the inn. Louisa's eyes were turned in that direction, when she naturally gazed at so unusual a sight in the little town of Mallington, but the first object she beheld in the vehicle was Alfred Latimer seated between the constable, Harry Soames, and another man, to whom she was a stranger. The face of her step-mother's son, once florid and healthy, was now as pale as death; and there was something in the position in which he sat, in the straitened and forward posture of the arms, which showed her that his wrists were manacled. His eyes were bent down, so that, though seen, he did not see anything that was passing around; and Louisa drew back in the carriage, and pressed her hand upon her brow. Dr. Western's chariot rolled on without pause, and the fearful sight of one who had called her sister brought past his own door as a captured felon was soon removed from her eyes.

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

Several days passed, and, at the usual hour in the evening, the London coach stopped at the inn in Mallington with a heavier load than it ordinarily brought. The burden, indeed, was not destined to swell even for a time the population of the little town, for, though several passengers jumped down from the outside, and, while some entered the inn and took the refreshment of a glass of ale, others walked up and down as a relief after their cramped position on the roof, only one passenger got out of the inside and gave any indication of an inclination to remain. That one was a lady simply, though nicely dressed; and one box, or rather trunk, which contained her worldly goods, was taken from the boot by the coachman, and set down at the door of the Bagpipes. Mrs. Pluckrose was waiting, as she not uncommonly did, to see what fortune fate would send her by the coach, and, after eyeing the lady for a moment, for her features were not clearly discernible through a thick veil which she wore, she approached with a courtesy, asking if she intended to stay in Mallington.

"I will leave the trunk here, Mrs. Pluckrose," said a voice the good landlady knew right well; "but I must go down to Dr. Western's immediately."

"Dear me, Miss Lucy!" exclaimed Mrs. Pluckrose, who though the veil was not yet removed, instantly recognized her, as I have said, by the voice, "Dear me! is that you? You have come, at a most sad time, Miss Lucy—Mrs. Latimer, I mean to say—I wish you had come at any other time."

"I know it is a sad time," answered Lucy, "I know it too well, Mrs. Pluckrose; but, nevertheless, I must go down to Dr. Western's directly."

"Oh, don't go there just now, ma'am!" rejoined the worthy landlady. "Don't go there just now, my dear child—or, at all events, stop a little here. Come into my parlor, there you can be quite quiet and private."

"No, no!", answered Lucy Edmonds; "I must not stop for anything. Only just take care of my trunk till I know where I can lie, Mrs. Pluckrose; I am determined to do just what Dr. Western tells me; and wherever he tells me I ought to go, there I will go."

"Well, that's right—that's very right!" answered Mrs. Pluckrose; "but yet, my dear! I wish you would wait here for a little."

Before Lucy could answer, the coachman came up, with his bill in his hand, saying, "Four-and-twenty shillings, if you please, ma'am;" and the landlady was called away to reckon with one of the travelers, who was about to proceed.

Lucy paid the money, received the admonition to "remember the coachman" with due attention, and then crossing over the way, followed the road by the river bank towards the rectory. Her steps were wavering and uncertain—her eyes bent upon the ground, and, to tell the truth, they were filled with tears, for every painful memory of the past, and every dark anticipation of the future, rose up before her, as she proceeded through the scenes of her early days, with none to welcome her, with none to offer one kindly word, or greet the wanderer's return with an embrace. From time to time she looked around, as if fearful that some one should see her whom she had formerly known. She dreaded to meet her father's eyes, little dreaming that those eyes were covered with the shroud. Even the mother who had so loved her—who had always been so tender and so kind—she would fain have shunned, little knowing that that mother was standing by a husband's grave on the road directly before.

When she had advanced about a quarter of a mile, she saw a lady and a gentleman coming slowly towards her, the latter very pale, and apparently languid and ill; the former with her eyes anxiously turned towards his countenance, and her hand resting very lightly on his arm. Lucy instantly recognized Miss Charlton and Mr. Morton, but she could not make up her mind to speak to them; and, anxious to avoid their notice, though she might have passed safely under the thick veil which she wore, she crossed the little bit of green sward which lay between the road and the river, and gazed upon the passing waters, as if some secret treasure lay hidden at the bottom of their course.

When they had passed by, she resumed her walk, and was approaching the rectory, when she caught a sight of Dr. Western's figure coming by a private gate from the church-yard into his own grounds. But upon the open road, before the rectory, there was another sight—two undertakers, in black, were leading the way from the churchyard before a long string of other persons, with all the signs of deep mourning in their apparel and demeanor, who seemed to have been attending a funeral. Lucy hurried forward, in the hope of avoiding them, by the gates which led into the garden of the rectory; but just as she did so, her eye fell upon the form of a young boy, walking beside a woman, whose face was buried in her handkerchief. They were the two first of the sad procession, the principal mourners, and in the one Lucy recognized her brother. Who was the other! The poor girl eyed her with a sinking dread at her heart, which made her whole frame tremble. The woman withdrew her handkerchief for a moment from her streaming eyes to speak a word or two with the boy, and Lucy beheld her mother!

A part of the truth—happily, only a part—flashed instantly upon her mind. Her father was dead! She accused herself of killing him; and, giving way to the sudden impulse of grief and love, she darted forward towards her mother; but ere she reached her, all the exhaustion that a week of agonizing suspense had produced, the weariness of traveling, the lassitude of long endured grief, overpowered her corporeal energies; she felt an indescribable sick faintness spread over her whole frame, the objects swam before her eyes, her brain seemed to turn round, and she sank senseless at her mother's feet.

It needed not the sight of her face to show her mother who she was; and Mrs. Edmonds stooped tenderly over her while one of the men who had followed the body of the poor park-keeper to the tomb lifted the unhappy girl in his arms. There was no look of reproach upon the widow's countenance—there was no reproachful feeling in her heart. She knew well that the grief and agony of her child when she came to learn the whole, would be far more than sufficient punishment for any fault she had committed, although Mrs. Edmonds was not aware of how much there was to palliate Lucy's conduct, or that she was rather the victim than the offender. While she was thus hanging over her, with all a mother's feelings strong in her heart, and while Lucy's brother was rubbing her hand, and gazing at the same time at the wedding-ring upon her finger, the voice of Dr. Western (who had been drawn to the spot by the sudden halt of the funeral party, and the little bustle that succeeded) was heard from within the garden fence, desiring that Lucy might be brought into his house.

This was soon done; and under Mrs. Evelyn's kind management the poor girl was speedily restored to consciousness; but as soon as Dr. Western saw the returning color appear in her cheek he took her mother into the adjoining room, and urged upon her the necessity of concealing from her daughter as long as possible the awful facts of which she herself had become by this time aware. Mrs. Edmonds would willingly enough have yielded to the good rector's advice, but she started a difficulty which he had not foreseen, for she knew her daughter better than he did.

"I will do anything you tell me, sir," answered the widow, in her humble manner, "but I can't help thinking my poor girl is suffering worse than she would do if she knew the whole truth. She fancies, sir, that it has been her going away that killed her father. I could see it in a minute, sir, and if you will ask her, you will find it so."

"Such may be the case, indeed," answered Dr. Western; "but we will ascertain the fact, and act accordingly. Let me speak with her first, Mrs. Edmonds;" and returning to the library, where Lucy still lay upon the sofa, though now much recovered, he sat down by her, while her mother held her hand, and kissed it.

"You are all very kind to me," said poor Lucy, "much kinder than I have deserved; and yet, indeed, indeed, if you knew all, you would see I am not so much to blame as you think. Oh! my poor father, if he could but have known" —and she burst into tears.

"Lucy, my dear child," said Dr. Western, "we have no cause to think that he believed you so much to blame as you suppose he did—at least after his first anger was over. Doubtless, he would have been easily brought to forgive you, especially when he heard of your marriage, had not this fatal accident deprived us of him."

"A fatal accident!" exclaimed Lucy; "then it was not my doing—a fatal accident!"

"Yes, my dear child," replied the rector; "he met his death by violence, it would seem; but as yet we know not the full particulars."

"By violence!" cried Lucy, raising herself, deadly pale, and gazing in the clergyman's face. "By violence!—and my husband—Oh heaven! —my husband!—violence!—murder!" — and she fell back again, as if life had utterly departed.

CHAPTER LXXXV.

It is extraordinary how near we are in point of time to barbarism—how very lately we have emerged from a state which in many particulars was worse than that of the savage tribes which roamed the forests. Not three quarters of a century have passed since scenes daily took place within this island which, if recorded by a modern writer, would not be believed by the great majority of his contemporaries; and of all the curious histories that could be written, perhaps the most curious would be the history of prison discipline in this realm of England. It is no longer ago than the days of our fathers that in all great prisons a system of inconceivable licence reigned within the walls of the jail, and every excess and every vice that the corrupt heart of man can devise was not only tolerated, but actually encouraged, by those who conceived their only charge and only duty to be the safe custody of those accused of, or condemned for crimes. Though the judges on the bench might be pure and upright, the magistracy were corrupt and profligate, the whole system of police vicious, and the men and women awaiting the sentence of the law, or its execution, were not only suffered to mingle together without restraint or supervision, but were supplied, as long as they had money to pay for it, with everything that could drown thought, or stimulate the passions. We have long since gone into the opposite extreme. Brutal harshness and severe infliction are now the consequences of mere suspicion; solitude and close confinement, deprivation and rigor are awarded to the accused, with even a less sparing hand than to the guilty and condemned, and the English jail is, in many respects, modeled upon the prisons of the Inquisition. The cause of both these extremes is the same—the want of fixed principles in legislation and civil polity, which want will always, according to the tone of the day, produce either laxity and corruption in practice, or severity and injustice, springing from cold and unsubstantial theories. It is a great fundamental principle of all law that every man should be supposed innocent till he is proved to be guilty; and if such be the case, those who treat him as if he were not so, before proof, are deeply guilty themselves. It may be a necessary evil, that a man accused, should be for a certain time deprived of his liberty, and it may even be granted that it is scarcely possible that the country should make him compensation for the injury inflicted, if the charge be not established; but there is no excuse whatever for depriving him of aught but liberty till he be condemned. To deprive him of his freedom at all, is a wrong, if he be innocent, to inflict anything else upon him is a crime; and who can doubt that to subject an untried prisoner to silence, solitude, the loss of all companionships, of the consolations of friendship and of love, to the deprivation of all accustomed amusements and healthful exercise, of the comforts of his station, of even the luxuries that have become necessaries, and to confine him in silence and in secrecy, numbered and clothed like a galley-slave, for months, for weeks, or even for a day, is one of the grossest iniquities, one of the darkest political crimes that an age of theoretical cruelty has yet produced. Not less evil, and not less unjust, was the system which sent every suspected person, innocent or guilty, young or old, confirmed in crime or trembling on the brink of the great moral precipice, to herd with felons, to share their orgies, and to be driven by the lash of continual scorn and ill-treatment to take part in vices and excesses which many of them, on entering those doors, shrunk from with horror. Yet such was the custom some seventy or eighty years ago, and it is well known to every one that the horrors of the bagnio, the gambling-house, and the gin-shop, seemed all concentrated within the criminal prisons of England. But between these two extremes there is a mean, but that mean is, unfortunately, what men never seek, and which is seldom arrived at in the natural course of events. Thus, at the period to which our tale refers, which is nearly midway between the present epoch of iniquitous severity and that former time of careless and demoralizing laxity which I have mentioned although some of the evils which had preceded had been done away, many still remained to be removed; and although we had not yet adopted all the harshness of the present times, a good many unnecessary inflictions were sometimes endured by the prisoner. All was, in fact, irregular; and in that state of transition, had any wise and good man stood forward to propose a reasonable system of prison discipline, it probably might have been adopted. We might then have seen some classification of prisoners before trial—a classification easily devised, and which would have been most beneficial in its results. We might have seen those persons accused before a magistrate for the first time, kept apart from those who had been accused more than once; those who had been accused more than once of offences within the summary jurisdiction of the justice, separated from those who had been actually convicted. We might have seen those persons who had been convicted of minor offences by a magistrate, divided from those who had been convicted of graver crimes by a jury; and many another distinction might form the limits of different classes, remembering always that accumulated causes for suspicion, vouched by the authentic records of different courts, must always naturally justify, to a certain extent, the presupposition of guilt, and greater strictness of confinement.

This is all very dull, dear reader; and, though not unimportant, is, perhaps, not profitable. I will, therefore, go on with my tale, from which I have been somewhat led astray, when I set out, at the beginning of this chapter, simply with the purpose of giving some notion of the state of the prison at Sturton, in which Alfred Latimer, with his two companions in crime, Williams and Brown, were now confined. A good deal of laxity existed. The prisoners were allowed to purchase anything they thought fit, if the governor of the prison did not judge it dangerous. They were suffered to walk out in the yard, to converse together, to arrange any plans they might think fit, and to see any one who might come to visit them, favored by a magistrate's order, on the governor's caprice. The three persons I have named, all charged with the same crime, and committed very nearly upon the same evidence, were, nevertheless, very differently dealt with. Alfred Latimer, undoubtedly the most criminal of the three, knew little of the rigors of imprisonment but the name. He was a young gentleman, and was treated in a very gentlemanly manner indeed. He had a comfortable room in the governor's own lodging, a well-furnished table, wine at will, books to read, paper to write, and occasionally a game at piquet with another favored culprit committed to the same jail. When he walked out in the yard, no clanking irons announced the felon; and had it not been for the downcast look and gloomy brow, the quivering lip and the abstracted air, one might have supposed him a visitor, brought by curiosity to examine the interior of the jail.

Neither was Williams manacled, though the desperate resistance he had made when he was taken, and the wound he had inflicted upon Mr. Morton, might have well justified such a precaution. But since his confinement he had shown himself perfectly calm, tranquil, and obedient. His resistance, in the first instance, he shrewdly explained away, saying that, suddenly startled out of his sleep, after a long and fatiguing walk, he did not know what his captors wanted, and expressing great and apparently sincere regret that he had hurt the young gentleman, who, he added, had always been very civil to him. He frequently asked after his health, and seemed well pleased to hear that he was recovering rapidly, displaying a great wish to see him, and ask his pardon for having wounded him.

Tom Brown, on the contrary, never appeared without being accoutred with what he himself called the "darbies;" but, to say truth, he had given cause for this severity, having knocked down and nearly murdered one of the turnkeys two days after his committal. He thought himself very ill-used, indeed, when walking out in the yard, he found Williams left to the free use of his limbs; and a feeling of rancor was generated in his bosom by the distinction which did not fail to bear fruit in time. The most brutal of human beings, however, have generally a sort of animal cunning about them which serves instead of reason, and he took care not to show his companion what he felt, but would walk up and down with him, conversing in a low and grumbling tone, and trying to concoct a scheme of defence which would harmonise with the evidence which they knew had been brought forward against them.

For several days after their committal Alfred Latimer did not appear in the yard at the same time with themselves, and at first Williams concluded that he had effected his escape, expressing to Brown some satisfaction that such was the case. Brown gave no answer but by a savage laugh; and as secrets will find their way out even in a prison, they soon found that their comrade in crime was within the same walls.

Williams accounted for his non-appearance by the supposition that he was purposely kept apart from them by the authorities of the prison, which, as the management of unconvicted prisoners at that time greatly depended on caprice, was not at all improbable. But the facts of the case were very different. Alfred Latimer, on his committal, had affected to desire no communication with the persons under the same charge with himself, and had requested, as a favor, to be allowed to walk in the yard at a different hour from that assigned to them. He said, and said truly, though not for the purpose of truth, that his acquaintance with Williams, and having suffered himself to be led into several wild adventures by that man, had been the cause of all the evil that had befallen him; and he added that he wished for no more of his society. But very speedily a change came over his views after speaking in private with a shrewd solicitor who had been brought from London to prepare his defence. He then saw that the evidence of Maltby, which clearly established the fact of his having been in company with Williams and Brown, would require a combination of measures with them, and he thenceforward became as anxious to speak with them as he had before been desirous of disclaiming any connection with them at the period when the offence took place. He so contrived it the next day that at the hour assigned for his own walk he was apparently busy in drawing up notes and memoranda for his lawyer; and afterwards, at the hour when he knew that they would be in the yard, he pretended to be suffering from headache, and requested to be permitted to take some exercise. The governor informed him in reply, that the two men Williams and Brown were then out; but Alfred Latimer affected a tone of indifference, answering, "Oh, I don't care for meeting them—I am not afraid to meet anybody;" and having obtained leave, he went forth.

There were several people in the yard besides the turnkey who was watching them at the door; and the young gentleman, on first entering, had to abide all the insults and annoyances which usually await a new prisoner on first mingling with his fellow-captives. A few pieces of money, however, for beer and gin, which were unceremoniously demanded to make him free of the worshipful company into which he now entered, soon delivered him from the most importunate, though not without encountering many of those stinging sarcasms which are so rife amongst the vicious when all the restraints of fear and risk are taken away. As soon as he could free himself he crossed over direct towards Williams, who was pacing up and down the yard with Brown, as if keeping watch on the deck of a ship; and, after a slight hesitation, he shook hands with him, and entered into conversation with him as they walked. They could pursue no topic long and uninterruptedly, for many of their fellow-prisoners either crossed them, or came up for the express purpose of teasing the new-comer, but from time to time they spoke of the subject that was naturally uppermost in the thoughts of each, though in low tones, and with anxious looks around.

"I don't think it will do, Mr Latimer," said Williams, in reply to some observation of the other; "I think they have got us tight, whichever way we turn, unless they break down at the indictment. You see that cowardly blackguard Malthy has sworn that he saw us all together on the very night that we came over the river, just after the time when the thing was done. Then, there's that unfortunate job of your bloody clothes being found, and a dozen other things will come out besides, if they havn't come out already; no, there's nothing for it," he added, "but to get out of this place, if we can. I've a scheme on hand, which would be easy enough done, if it wern't for these irons on Brown; but we'll talk about it to-morrow, for it will soon be shutting-up time."

Alfred Latimer returned to the room in which he was confined more gloomy than he had been since he had entered those walls. Hitherto his mind had found occupation in devising schemes for his defence, and he had buoyed himself up with hopes that all the criminating circumstances which had been proved against him might be explained away. But the more firm and reasonable view which Williams took of the case had undermined all such expectations, and he sat down to contemplate his probable fate in horror and despair.

I will not recapitulate all the dark images that fancy called up before him, but only say that there he sat for more than one hour, with the thought of a dreadful death before him. The chance of escape from the walls of the prison seemed so faint that it gave him no relief. He looked upon it merely as a thing to be justified by despair, and he gazed trembling on into the future, tasting all the bitter fruits of crime.

While he thus pondered and thought, the shades of night began to fall, and the faint light and the gray and gloomy sky, which he saw through the barred windows of the jail, harmonized sadly with the sensations in his own bosom. Was there yet penitence? was there yet the repentance which is not to be repented of? Alas, no! there was fear, despair, and bitterness of heart; but his character was not changed; it was such as we have always represented it. Vanity, in some shape, is at the bottom of one-half the crime and three-quarters of the madness of the earth, and it is a bar to all repentance. Still, still, Alfred Latimer cast the blame on every one else but himself. He fancied he had been driven to crime, step by step, by others. Every one he knew—every one who had any share in his education, or any control over his conduct, came in for their part of the charge which he brought against the whole world but himself. One had not given him aid when it was needful—one had irritated him in youth till he had been driven to low companionship; another had been over indulgent; another had been too severe; and he hated them all with that intense and violent passion which had led him on from act to act in the dark and fearful course he had pursued. No, oh, no! there was nothing like repentance in his spirit; but let it be remarked, I have not said that there was no remorse, but that is a very different sensation. When he thought of the dreadful act he had committed—when imagination brought up before his eyes the form of poor Edmonds, weltering in his gore, it seemed as if a scorching and a seething flame passed through his heart and brain—not withering, not consuming, but inflicting agony indescribable. As far as he could command his own mind, he shut out all such images. He said to himself, "The deed is done—it cannot be undone; I will think of it no more." He called it weakness, folly, indecision. He resolved to think upon the future, to struggle with the past. But the fatal past—the dark, the certain, the irretrievable—the only thing fixed, permanent, unchanging, unchangeable—still held him in its adamantine grasp, and, like a chained bird, when his mind had fluttered away for a short distance, and fancied itself free, it was still brought back to the stake, and found itself bound down to horrors that could never be cast off. At night, too, in darkness and solitude, when every sound was still, and every sight removed, and the spirit left alone to deal with the things within itself, the oppressive burden of the heart was felt in all its weight, and the grievous load of sin pressed down every hope, and extinguished every light. It seemed as if a gloomy curtain was drawn round between him and all external things, leaving nought within that sad and solemn arcove but himself and his fearful crime. The spirit of the dead, whom his hand had slain, rose up as if to reproach him for the past, and to tell him, with the prophetic tongue of the future—the future not of this world alone, but of another—the interminable future, with all its store of agony, to which the temporary suffering of the gibbet and the cord was but an idle nothing. He thought of standing face to face, before the throne of God, with him whom he had murdered. He thought of the comparison that must then be drawn between the life of the victim and that of the slayer. He thought of taking his place amongst those who had spilt man's blood, from Cain down to the last crime, and of being driven before the face of the assembled universe into the place of endless punishment! He felt that the agony of hell had already begun; he felt, too, that it could never end, for something told him that remorse must be eternal—that the crime, and its memory, and its woe, could never, never be swept away—that the worm that dieth not was within him, the flame that cannot be quenched in his heart. But yet, if it be asked, did these awful impressions give an inclination to do better, did they teach him to submit, to resign himself to Heaven's will, to make atonement? I must answer, no. Far, very far from it, his whole feeling seemed embittered towards every one that was better than himself. By a strange and indescribable and almost unaccountable perversion of feeling, the very agony of remorse that he suffered seemed to him an injury; and to cast it off, to drown it I may say, he was ready, in the impatient irritation of his pride, to commit any other crime, as if in the hope of doing away the bitter impression of the first by familiarizing himself with the guilt of many more. In some sense he said to himself, like the fallen seraph, "Evil, be thou my good."

Such thoughts and feelings were crowding upon him fast on the evening of which we have been speaking, while the shades of night drew a dim veil over the sky, and the light within his room faded gradually away. He would have fain fled from them, he would have read or written, or done anything to escape, and he grew angry and furious that they had not brought him lights, as they usually did about that hour. At length, however, he heard the bolts withdrawn, and the door unlocked, and the next instant the governor himself entered with the turnkey, who bore the candles.

"Your mother, sir," said the officer, "is in my room, wishing to see you. I don't know any reason why she should not. The magistrates have given me no directions. So, if you like to see her you can."

To the governor's surprise, and it must be added to his horror, Alfred Latimer's first exclamation was, "Curse her! she has done me more mischief than any one else. If it had not been for her I should not have been here. I don't want to see her. I should like to see my wife, indeed, but I don't care about this woman."

The governor was turning away in some disgust, and without reply, but then the hardened villain seemed to think better of it, and exclaimed, "Well, never mind, let her come in, she may as well see what a terrible state she has brought me to;" and in a minute or two after Mrs. Charlton entered, supported by the governor.

I will not pause upon the first part of the scene that ensued, for it is too horrible to be dwelt upon. Bitter, horrible, and impious invectives was all that the mother heard from the lips of her son; and strong as was the spirit of Mrs. Charlton herself, it was completely cowed under his wild and outrageous violence. She strove to pacify him, to soothe him, and, with her usual skill, she soon divined that the only means of doing so was by holding out hopes. That quieted him a little; and when she went on to speak of the means to be taken for his defence, he listened sullenly, and answered from time to time, in few words, and in a bitter tone. His mind was led on, however, by several things she said, to think over some cunning scheme for evading the grasp of the law. Neither mother nor son for one instant took into consideration the truth or falsehood, the justice or the iniquity, the right or the wrong of anything they proposed to say or do. To save him from an ignominious death, by any means, was all that they considered. Mrs. Charlton never inquired whether he was innocent or guilty—the truth was, in her own heart, that question was by this time settled; but after suggesting several schemes, all of which presented some insurmountable objection, she said, in a low tone, "Don't you think I could bribe some of the jury? Three or four thousand pounds would tempt any common man to do more than that."

"How the devil will you know who the jury are till the very day!" exclaimed Alfred Latimer; but then, a moment after, he said, "Stay, stay! I have thought of something, perhaps you could bribe the fellow who draws up the indictment—the Clerk of the Arraigns I believe he is called—to put in a flaw, and that would be sure work. But it will take a great sum, depend upon it. You must not offer him less than five or ten thousand pounds!"

"But where am I to get it!" exclaimed Mrs. Charlton. "If I were to sell all my jewels and plate they would not produce more than four thousand."

"You must get it from Morton!" said her son; "he will give treble that, I am sure, to marry Louisa."

"He won't—he won't!" cried Mrs. Charlton; "I tried that before all this happened. He is as proud and haughty as Lucifer, and will not enter into any bargain whatever. If he would not do it then, I am sure he will not do it now."

"You must try!" replied Alfred Latimer, doggedly; "or see me hanged—that's all. I don't suppose you care much about that, on my account; still, you won't like to have it said that your son died on a gibbet, for that would not suit your own purposes. So you must try; and if you can't get him to do it any other way, set Louisa to ask him. He will do it for her, if not for you, for I suppose you have quarrelled with him by this time."

"Quarrelled with him!" exclaimed Mrs. Charlton. "I hate him, I abhor him. He treated me with cool and shameless insolence, and, for my own part, I would rather die than ask him anything. Oh! if I have to give my consent that that saucy girl shall marry this conceited, mercenary upstart, it will break my heart—it is well nigh broken already."

"No fear of it," answered her worthy son, "it's tough enough, or else you wouldn't hesitate when your son's life is at stake. I dare say you think that under your new name of Charlton it will never be known that the accused person is your son; but I'll take care of that, for I'll call you as a witness at the trial, and have the whole story in my last dying speech and confession, that you may have it hawked about under your windows for a penny—ha, ha, ha!" and he laughed bitterly.

"Do not, do not—for heaven's sake, do not, Alfred!" exclaimed Mrs. Charlton, wringing her hands; "you know I would do anything for you—I will do even this, let it cost what it may. The girl will surely never refuse me; but I will try him first. If I could but drive them," she continued, in a lower tone, after pausing, and thinking for a moment—"if I could but drive them to a sudden marriage, without my consent, then the whole property would be mine, and I could give any sum I liked to the Clerk of the Arraigns, or whoever the man is."

"That's all nonsense," answered Alfred Latimer, "there's no time for such manœuvres. The assizes are to be held in ten days, and it will take you a year to bring about what you want. You always talk as if you and I were to live forever. Better take what you can get at once, and drive a bargain with Morton. He's a very good fellow, in spite of all you may say, and gave me help once before, when you wouldn't."

"I could not, Alfred, I could not," answered his mother. "You know very well I had not the means."

"I know nothing of the kind," said her son, harshly; "and all I now know is, that your son will be hanged if you don't do as I tell you. So you can finish the work you have begun; if you like. And after having contrived to bring me here, can go on, and take me to the gallows; but I shall say there, and tell everybody that it is all your doing."

"My doing!" exclaimed Mrs. Charlton; "what had I to do with it?"

"Oh! a great many things," answered her son; "education and example, too. I know a good deal that there is no use talking about now; but it shall all come out, by-and-by, if my mind is not made easy."

He spoke in a threatening tone, and his mother was profoundly silent.

Now the reader is well aware that Mrs. Charlton was not usually embarrassed with any very fine feeling; yet she might be, and, doubtless was, shocked at the cold heartlessness of her son. But there were other causes for the emotion that she felt, which was great. Let every one arm himself in the triple brass of selfishness, as strongly as he will—let him dip himself in the Styx of the most profound egotism—there will still, as in the fabled hero of the "Iliad," be some vulnerable point by which the arrows even of a weak and inexperienced hand may reach some vital part, and render every precaution vain. The consciousness, too, that there is such a weak spot about us must make the persons thus carefully, but insufficiently guarded, always the more fearful lest others should discover the assailable point. My belief is, that a man would go into battle more boldly naked; without shield or buckler, than one who knew that in his armor there was a flaw.

Now, Mrs. Charlton knew that all in her schemes there was a vulnerable point, and though, perhaps, selfishness might have so far predominated as to induce her to leave her dearly-beloved son to his fate rather than sacrifice any of her comforts or her future prospects; yet there was something in his words and in his tone that alarmed her, and made her resolve to submit to the greatest sacrifice to save him. I do not mean to say that she had any inclination to see him hanged, though there are mothers on record who have indulged in such a desire. Far from it; she would have done a great deal to deliver him from his perilous situation, and herself from the shame of having a son in such a position. But, nevertheless, it may be doubted whether maternal love and tenderness would at once have settled the question, if fear had not had something to do with it. After an instant she replied, however, "I do not know what you mean, Alfred, and I certainly do think you very ungrateful. But that does not matter; I will do all that you wish, all that I can, to deliver you. I will sacrifice even my just resentment, and condescend to see this man. I will even sue to an ungrateful girl, who, forgetful of all the benefits I have conferred upon her youth, now turns upon one who has been more than a mother to her, I am sure; and if I fail there I will contrive, notwithstanding, to raise the money in some way to save my son. I will sell everything—I will even pledge my income, and live in penury, if he too will not show himself ungrateful."

"Ay, come now, that is something like!" answered Alfred Latimer; and, after some further conversation in regard to the means and the agent to be employed in this scheme for frustrating the ends of justice, the mother and her son parted apparently better friends than they had met. Alfred Latimer remained revolving a new plan which had occurred to his mind for making all doubly sure, and preparing such a defence as would meet all the evidence against him; but Mrs. Charlton, entering her carriage, rolled away towards Mallington with thoughts which would not have been very pleasing to him if he could have seen into her heart. "I will do the best I can for him," she thought, "but if I do not succeed, I must, at all events, make him think that everything is arranged; for there is no knowing what he might say in one of his wild passions if he were driven to despair." Self, self, was ever uppermost in her thoughts, whatever were the circumstances in which she was placed, and not even maternal affection could act pure and unmingled. All was affected still by the great ruling principle of her nature.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

As Mrs. Charlton's carriage rolled somewhat slowly on its way homeward, a post-chaise passed her going in the same direction. Had she known who was the tenant of Mrs. Pluckrose's rumbling vehicle, she might have felt inclined to stop it; but as she did not, and the chaise rattled on, with the postilion bobbing up and down like one of the dampers of a piano, we will not exactly follow it, but rather precede it to the place of its destination.

The human mind has a marvelous and very pleasant power, as the reader knows, of adapting itself to circumstances. Were sorrows and misfortunes to retain the same intense effect, even while they themselves endure, the corporeal frame, if not the mental powers themselves, would give way under the continued pressure; and did the memory of each grief remain unimpaired, the accumulation in any one man's short career would abridge life or destroy reason. Memory, however, is but a painter of the past, and though the canvass will in some cases retain the lines and hues much longer than in others, yet she always uses fading colors, which lose part of their brightness even while she is laying them on. The grief—I might, indeed, call it the gloom, for with grief there was something besides grief—which had spread over the little party at the rectory, in consequence of the dark and terrible events which we have lately recorded, had passed in a degree away. Cheerfulness had to a certain extent returned, and the feelings of all were at that point where amusement of any quiet and tranquil kind is sought by the mind to relieve it from the painful consciousness not only of the sad things gone, but of others that are to come. Gaiety, indeed, was yet far away, and with Louisa Charlton, perhaps, could never wholly return. The lightness of heart that finds beauty and rejoicing in everything, the bloom of life's fresh fruit, can never be long preserved; for though the knowledge of good may and must be the source of the purest happiness, the knowledge of evil combined inseparably in the fatal apple, is death to the warm and happy confidence of innocence. Nevertheless, Louisa had shaken off the deeper depression, and following the example of good Dr. Western, would suffer her mind to dwell neither upon the gloomy and terrible events which had lately taken place, nor upon those which were soon to follow. They would come rushing upon imagination indeed, from time to time, whether she would or not, and cast a dark but temporary shadow on all around. But still there was light beyond the cloud, and hope having good ground to rest upon, waved her on into the sunshine of coming years when the storm should have passed by.

The worthy rector had dined somewhat later than ordinary, and he, his sister, and their fair guest were still sitting round the table, evidently waiting for some one who was expected, but who did not come. Louisa seemed somewhat uneasy, and her kind old friend jested with her on apprehensions without a cause.

"Well, perhaps it is foolish, and perhaps it is wrong," answered Louisa, "but I am afraid it is natural too, when we have seen such terrible and unexpected things take place, to lose, as it were, our confidence in the future, and never see a friend depart from us without asking ourselves shall we ever behold him again! Will he be safe, well, uninjured where he is going!"

"Is not that something very like losing our confidence in God!" asked Dr. Western, in a graver tone. "If, my dear child, it is our duty to bear any griefs or adversities that he may send us with tranquil submission to his will, depend upon it that it is no less a duty which we should inculcate and practice to look forward to all his dealings towards us with trust and hope in the full knowledge of his goodness and mercy. One of the best and most beautiful exemplifications of faith in ordinary life is the serenity with which a good man waits for the future developments of God's will. We have no right to anticipate one evil, except as a consequence of our own bad acts; and he who has a conscience clear of offence may well feel sure that if adversity do befall him, it will prove ultimately a benefit rather than an infliction. I know, my dear child," he continued, seeing a shade come over Louisa's countenance, "that the flesh is weak, however willing the spirit may be, and I but wished to furnish you with some motives to guard you against the very natural apprehensions which first misfortunes generally produce in young and enthusiastic minds. In the present instance, however, you have no probable cause for fear, and I will not have you cultivate unreasonable terrors. Some people are constitutionally more brave than others, but depend upon it the highest point and the highest quality of courage is afforded by true faith. Who can be, who ought to be afraid of anything, when he knows that an Almighty arm shields and supports him!"

"Well," said Mrs. Evelyn, who did not take quite so high a view as her brother, and was anxious to cheer Louisa by more human means, "there can be no danger to Mr. Morton in this case, and here I think he comes, to show that no evil has happened."

The sound of wheels grating through the gravel was heard as she spoke, and in another minute Morton himself appeared. He was still pale and somewhat languid from his wound, but his face was bright and cheerful. Louisa would fain, if she had given way to the feelings of her own heart, have run out to meet him, when the chaise first drew up to the door. The customs of society, however, which bind in their strong bond many of the better impulses of the heart, as well as restrain that which is evil, prevented her from so doing, but could not keep her from springing up with extended hand to greet him as soon as he entered the room.

"Here is a fair lady who has been frightening herself about you, my young friend," said the clergyman; "indeed, you must take care to get no more wounds and bruises, or her courage will all go, and she had once a good deal."

"There was no danger in this instance, at least," replied Morton, "for I had a phalanx of jailers and turnkeys about me sufficient to have protected a monarch. My journey has been successful, too, my dear sir," he continued, putting a small pocket-book into Dr. Western's hand, and seating himself by Louisa.

While the worthy rector opened the pocket-book, took out one paper after another, put on his spectacles, and examined them carefully, Louisa Charlton inquired somewhat timidly of Morton, whether he had seen Alfred Latimer?

"No," he replied, "on asking for him, I found that his mother was with him, and of course I could not break in upon their conference; but I will go and see him some other day, dearest girl, and offer him every means of defence. For, whatever may be my own conviction, it is but right that he should have the full opportunity of proving his innocence if possible."

"God grant it!" answered Louisa, sorrowfully—"God grant it! Even if he could show that it was not his hand that did it, what a matter of rejoicing it would be."

"They are all here, then," said Dr. Western, abruptly, raising his head from the small scraps of paper he had been studying, "there's no link wanting?"

"The only one that was missing is there supplied," replied Morton, "so that every difficulty is removed."

"Well, then, you can have no objection now," said the worthy rector, rising from his chair. "Sister, allow me to introduce to you a new acquaintance. Mrs. Evelyn, the Earl of Mallington—my lord, my sister, Mrs. Evelyn."

Morton took the old lady's hand, laughing at her brother's formal introduction, and saying, "You must forgive me for my concealments, my dear madam, but as long as there was any doubt whatever of my being able to prove my title, I did not choose to assume a name that might be taken from me. And having, when I first came down here in search of different documents, judged it best to drop my final name of Wilmot, retaining only the two first as Edmond Morton, I could not well resume the other without betraying the whole secret."

"And do you think you deceived me?" asked Mrs. Evelyn, with a quiet smile; "I can assure you, my dear lord, I have been well aware of the fact for the last fortnight. From the time when you were declared the owner of Mallington Park, I settled the matter quite quietly in my own head that you were the heir of the peerage."

"Nay," answered Morton, "I might have been the owner of the park, my dear lady, without being the heir of the peerage, for the title to the estate was more easy to be proved than the title to the rank. But you have certainly concealed your knowledge very well, for I never imagined that you ever suspected how the case stood."

"Oh! a woman can keep a secret, notwithstanding all man's libels upon her," replied Mrs. Evelyn. "There is Louisa, who sits smiling there, as if it were a great relief to her to be freed from the burden. She has borne it most heroically, I can assure you, and never hinted it even to me, her oldest friend."

"From her I felt bound to have no concealment," answered Morton, "and never will," he continued, taking Louisa's hand; "though I won her as a simple gentleman, yet, when once won, she had a right to share all my thoughts."

Louisa gazed at him with dewy eyes, brilliant yet moist, like a landscape in the early morning; but, before she could reply, Mr. Western's old servant opened the door, saying, "Mrs. Windsor, sir, wishes to speak with you."

The words were addressed to Morton, and Dr. Western added, "She has been here twice this afternoon, and seems burthened with her secret also, for she did not think fit to communicate it to me, yet seemed very anxious indeed to bestow it upon you, asking particularly when you would return. You will find a fire in the library; and we shall be in the drawing-room when you have done with the good lady."

"She mentioned once before that she had something to tell me," answered Morton, going out. "Oh, come into this room, Mrs. Windsor," he continued, finding Mrs. Charlton's housekeeper in the passage.

Mrs. Windsor followed him into the library, and closed the door behind her, looking, as usual, perfectly prim and quiet, as if she had come about the most ordinary business in the world. "I remember you told me, when last I was at Mallington House," said Morton, leaning on the table, "that you had something to communicate to me. Is it on the same subject you wish to speak with me to-day, or another, Mrs. Windsor?"

"The same, sir," replied Mrs. Windsor, in her usual, quick, brief manner. "I heard you had been wounded, sir, and did not like to intrude; but now you are well again, and things must soon come to a conclusion, I thought it best to come down, because there is no reason why Miss Charlton, who has always been good and kind to everybody, should be made a bit more unhappy than necessary, or why she, or you either, should be plundered of what you have a right to."

"Certainly not, Mrs. Windsor," answered Morton; "but may I inquire what you allude to, or why you think your young lady is likely to be made unhappy at all?"

"Why, sir," replied the housekeeper, "I know my mistress very well. I have known her for a great many years. Now, one can't do that without seeing and understanding what she means just as well as she does herself. Now, with regard to you, sir, and Miss Louisa, I have understood everything from the beginning, though I don't think you did."

"Certainly not from the beginning," replied Morton; "but I very soon found that there was something to be discovered, Mrs. Windsor."

"Oh dear, yes, sir," answered the abigail, with one of her axioms, which were rarely without a certain portion of good sense—"'It's a very easy thing to conceal a great deal, but a very difficult thing to conceal that we are concealing something;' however, as Mrs. Charlton never thought that I saw anything but what she wished me to see; I saw a great deal, as you may suppose, and I very quickly made up my mind as to what was her game with you."

"And, pray, what might it be, Mrs. Windsor?" asked Morton, desirous that the good lady should develop her own views.

"Why, sir, she took it into her head, when first you came down, that you were a painter," replied the housekeeper, "and she held to that opinion, because she was fond of it, long after she should have known better, if she ever gave it up at all. She thought, because you did not bring down servants, and horses, and a carriage of your own, that you must be a poor gentleman, at all events, who would be glad to marry a young lady with a good fortune at any price. She had been laying it out in her head for a long time, I know, and you were just the sort of person that suited her, for you were introduced by Dr. Western, and had the sort of air with you that would give her a good excuse for letting you always be with Miss Charlton without pledging her to anything in case you did not come up to her price. So you were quite a godsend in her way, and she had you a great deal more to the house than she ever had any one before."

Morton smiled to find how accurately Mrs. Windsor had calculated all her mistress's steps, and he inquired, "What might be the original cause of all this, Mrs. Windsor? for, taking it for granted that your view is quite correct, it seems to me that she has somewhat hurried all her proceedings."

"Ay, sir, that's because she's hard pressed just now," replied Mrs. Windsor; "she owes a great deal in different quarters, and people are getting impatient. She intended, some months ago, to have gone to London, and played the same game there, but there was a difficulty about money then, and you came down just at the time, and saved her the trouble. So she did everything in her power to let you love Miss Charlton on the one side, and, on the other, to make Miss Charlton love you; and when she found out that it all went on as she wished, she was quite delighted. She got in a little fright, indeed, when she found out that you had more money than she had fancied, but as she had sat down to the game, there was nothing for it but to play it out, which she did, I suppose, the last time you saw her."

Morton was not satisfied with such vague explanations, and, determined to bring Mrs. Windsor to the point, he said, "Why, what do you suppose she did, my good lady!"

"I suppose, sir," said Mrs. Windsor, with a smile at the question, as if it were quite superfluous to put it, "that she told you she would be very happy to see you Miss Charlton's husband, provided you gave up one half of her fortune; that if you didn't, she would not give her consent, and, if you married without it, it would all come to herself. I am sure that was her plan, whether she put it in execution or not."

Morton paused and meditated, but the subject of his reverie was not exactly what the reader may suppose. He was considering with himself the exact topography of Mallington House, and calling to mind the relative positions of the drawing-room, the library, the dining-room, and the hall, with a view to ascertain whether Mrs. Windsor could have overheard what passed between him and Mrs. Charlton, for, under any other supposition, the precise knowledge which the worthy lady displayed was marvelous in his eyes. He settled it at length, however, that such a thing was impossible, and, therefore, that the housekeeper must have derived her information from some other source. "You are not very far wrong, Mrs. Windsor," he said, "but before we speak further on these rather delicate subjects, it will be as well for you to tell me what the intelligence you have to give me is, and how it bears upon these matters."

"Certainly, sir," replied Mrs. Windsor. "I am sure I ought to beg pardon for speaking upon them at all; but you see I came into the house when Miss Charlton was very young, and I have seen her grow up as nice a young lady as any in the world, and I cannot bear that she should be wronged. All I have, therefore, to say is, that Mrs. Charlton has no more to do with Miss Louisa's marriage than I have, whatever she may say."

"But," said Morton, "there is a codicil to Mr. Charlton's will, by which it is provided that if Louisa marries without her step-mother's consent, the whole property falls absolutely to Mrs. Charlton."

"Pooh, sir!" exclaimed Mrs. Windsor, "that codicil is not worth a piece of packing-paper, and I can prove that it isn't."

Morton smiled at the boldness with which she spoke, though far from being convinced that she was right in her assertion. "Women, I am afraid, my good lady," he replied, "are not the best judges of the law. The codicil is all written in Mr. Charlton's own hand, signed with his name, and, though not witnessed, is as good as any other part of the will. However, set your mind at ease about your young lady; it luckily happens that I am not so poor as Mrs. Charlton supposed. As my wife, she will feel no difference in point of comfort and ease from that which she has been accustomed to; and to one thing I have perfectly made up my mind, not to drive any bargain whatsoever with regard to her fortune. She shall have all or none. Her hand is too precious a thing to be bought or sold."

"I was quite sure you would think so, sir," replied the housekeeper, "otherwise I should not have said a word. But with regard to the will, I am quite sure you are mistaken, and, as I fancy, things standing as they do, Mrs. Charlton will not be long before she begins the matter with you again, I think you might as well ask her one or two questions, and see what she answers."

"There can be no harm in doing that," replied Morton; "but what may the questions be, Mrs. Windsor?"

"First, sir, I would ask," rejoined the housekeeper, "whether she was in the library for an hour and a half, when everybody else was in bed, on the night that Mr. Charlton died, and whether she didn't write a great number of papers there, and burn several of them that were not quite done to her mind? Then I would have you ask her where Mr. Charlton was on the 25th of July, 18—?"

"Why that was the day that the codicil was signed," rejoined Morton, with the light beginning to glimmer in upon him.

"That is the day it is dated," answered Mrs. Windsor; "but what I want to know is, where he was on that day, for it is dated Mallington, too, I think, and there must be a mistake somewhere."

Morton gazed at her steadily for a moment; but the woman's face was all calm and quiet, adding nothing whatever to her words. "I think, Mrs. Windsor," he said, at length, "I had better call in Dr. Western to hear our consultation, as he is one of Louisa's guardians, and an executor under the will."

"I don't know, sir," replied Mrs. Windsor, in the same quiet, but quick tone, "you are the best judge; but, perhaps till you have considered the matter, it would be as well to keep it between you and me and Miss Charlton. Dr. Western is a magistrate, you know, and may think himself bound to take strong measures, which, when once they are begun, must be gone on with. I don't wish to do my mistress any harm, and I think if you were to talk quietly with her, and just ask her the questions I have told you, all would go right, and things wouldn't happen that I'm sure would break poor Miss Charlton's heart. It would be a sad thing, sir, to have mother and son in jail both at once, especially for Miss Louisa, when it is her own father's wife she has to do with."

"You are right, Mrs. Windsor, and I thank you for the hint," answered Morton; "it will, indeed, be as well to say no more upon this subject than is absolutely necessary. Is there anybody else besides yourself who knows any of the facts?"

"A fellow-servant, sir," answered Mrs. Windsor, "knows that my mistress was in the library a long time that night, and that she burnt several papers, but no one ever thought of the date of the codicil, as it is called, but myself. Whenever it was read, I thought 'why, master and mistress were both away at that time, or I am much mistaken; and when I went and looked at my books, I found it was just so. They went away four days before, and did not come back till the week after."

Morton mused, but again the subject of his meditation was very different from that which might be supposed. The first question he put to himself was "Might it not be better to do anything this unhappy woman demands, rather than expose so disgraceful an affair?" But the moment after, he replied to himself "No, I see not why she should be suffered to triumph in her knavery. If she escapes prosecution, she is, perhaps, too leniently treated." "Well, Mrs. Windsor," he continued aloud, "I am very much obliged to you for the information you have given me; I will soon bring the question to issue with Mrs. Charlton, even if she does not do so herself; and, should need be, I will send for you to speak with me further. At all events your services shall not be forgotten, you may depend upon it."

"I am much obliged to you, sir," replied Mrs. Windsor, with a low courtesy, "but I wish for nothing but to see right done, and I am quite sure that neither you nor Miss Charlton will see me suffer for speaking the truth. I must get home now as fast as I can, for my mistress may soon come home now," and thus saying, she courtesied again and quitted the room.

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

When Morton entered the drawing-room after his conference with Mrs. Windsor, he found Dr. Western with a note in his hand, which the rector handed to him without comment. Morton took it and instantly recognized Mrs. Charlton's hand-writing, which he had often seen on sundry neatly-written, neatly-folded, and neatly-sealed billets of invitation to Mallington House. The contents of the present epistle, however, were of a very different character, and as he read a smile came over his countenance, the internal causes of which I will leave the reader to divine when he sees the substance of the lady's note, which was as follows:—

"My dear sir,

"I must really remonstrate upon the conduct which Miss Charlton pursues, and is suffered to pursue. You must be well aware that I have no false or affected prudery about me; and I trust that, though my own conduct has always been governed by propriety, I have ever shown full consideration for the feelings, and sometimes more than consideration for the foolishness of young people. I learn, however, that Louisa, since you thought fit as her guardian to remove her from my house, has been permitted to walk about the whole neighborhood with Mr. Morton alone, when that gentleman has not even yet obtained my consent to his engagement, as I suppose it must be called, with Miss Charlton, whom you must know I have always looked upon and treated as if she were my own daughter. I should have thought that gentleman's own good sense and good feeling, of which he is by no means destitute, would have shown him the impropriety of such conduct; but I cannot sit by and neglect my duty by suffering it to proceed any longer without some explanation between himself and me. If, therefore, he is now at your house, where I understand he is usually to be found, I beg you will communicate to him what I say, and hint that it will be expedient that we should have some conversation without delay.

"Believe me to be, my dear sir, yours, &c.,

"Emily Charlton."

Such was the present well-concocted epistle which met Morton's eyes, and, returning it to Dr. Western, still smiling, he said, "Well, my dear sir, what do you think of it?"

"Very bad—very bad!" said Dr. Western, shaking his head, "you must act as you think fit, my young friend; this is a matter in which I cannot advise you."

"Perhaps the best way will be to see the lady at once," observed Morton, after some consideration; "for though I must speak with Louisa fully upon the subject before I can finally determine upon anything, it may be as well to hear what Mrs. Charlton can say, in the first place."

"I will abide by anything you determine," replied Louisa; "for I am sure, Morton, you will remember that she was my father's wife, and will not do anything that is harsh or unkind."

"Undoubtedly I will not, Louisa," answered Morton; "but yet, my love, you do not know the whole. To-morrow morning, if it be fine, I will ask for one of those walks which Mrs. Charlton's notions of propriety so strongly condemn just now, and then I will tell you the whole. I wish much that my good friend Quatterly was down here still, for I want a little of his legal help in judging of these matters. I am afraid there is a certain perversity in my nature which induces me to resist desperately one part of the fate of all human beings."

"What part is that, Morton?" asked Louisa.

"Being cheated, dear girl," answered Morton, laughing; "but now I will run away, lest I be tempted to give you any more of such blunt answers."

Taking his hat, Morton walked slowly up the hill to Mallington House, considering as he went how he should act under the circumstances in which he was placed; and coming to Sterne's conclusion, that it would be better to determine upon no course at all, but let events take their own way. He had twice to ring at the bell before he was admitted; and there was something in the whole appearance and state of the house, negligence in the air of the servants, a want of that activity and propriety which had been formerly observable, with a number of little circumstances, very nearly indescribable, which showed Morton that a great change had taken place since Louisa left her own dwelling; and that the respect as well as affection of the inferior persons it contained, was gone from those about them. The butler, who opened the door, replied, in answer to his questions, that Mrs. Charlton was at home, and disengaged; and Morton, as he followed the man, said deliberately, "Have the goodness to tell her that the Earl of Mallington wishes to see her." The butler instantly put on a deferential air; and while Morton remained for a moment or two without, he could hear his name announced, and Mrs. Charlton exclaim, in a sharp tone, "The Earl of Mallington—what Earl of Mallington?"

"Mr. Morton as was, ma'am, if you please," answered the butler.

"Oh!" cried Mrs. Charlton, with a dry and somewhat sneering prolongation of the sound, "show his lordship in—show him in, by all means."

Morton was accordingly introduced; and the fair lady, rising, made him a profound, and too ceremonious courtesy, saying, "I am informed that I have the honor of seeing the Earl of Mallington—pray be seated, my lord."

"The same, my dear madam," replied Morton, calmly, for he easily understood that it was not particularly agreeable for Mrs. Charlton to find his rank and station such as would afford no reasonable ground of objection to his marriage with Louisa. Finding she remained silent, "however," he continued, "my friend, Dr. Western, informs me that you wished for some conversation with me; and although I should not under all circumstances have ventured to intrude upon you just yet, without such a communication, I thought it better to come up at once, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour."

"And perhaps thinking," added Mrs. Charlton, who had rapidly arranged her plan, "that the Earl of Mallington might find my views different from those expressed to Mr. Morton. In that, my lord, at least you are mistaken, for, taking it for granted that your present rank is not, like your former name, assumed, that fact will only strengthen the opinions I before expressed."

"Let me correct one error," said Morton, as she paused for an instant, "neither my present rank, nor my former name, was assumed, my dear madam; my name is simply Edmond Morton Wilmot, or Wilmot Morton, and as I never assume anything that is not clearly my own, I did not take the title of Earl of Mallington so long as any one could entertain a doubt of my right to it. As all doubts and difficulties, however, are now removed, I should be deceiving you were I to give myself any other name."

"I am glad to find, sir, you did not deceive me before," replied Mrs. Charlton somewhat sharply, "and I only wish you had carried your candor a little further and informed me of your pretensions, as I should certainly, under those circumstances, have neglected the honor of your acquaintance. I have an objection—I may almost say an insuperable objection—to young women of an inferior rank marrying persons of family and title. I have myself experienced all the evils which result from such unequal connections, and am most indisposed to sanction them in any case."

Morton could not refrain from a smile. "I am very sorry to hear it," he replied, "but I fear, my dear madam, there is no help for it in this instance, as I have no power to give up my rank, and no inclination to give up Louisa."

"You speak with prodigious coolness, my lord," answered Mrs. Charlton, with her cheek flushing and her eye gleaming, "and I doubt not in the least that your fortune is so enormous as to make six or seven thousand a year with your wife a matter of no consequence to you at all—oh dear, no, such a thing is quite a trifle to the new Earl of Mallington! But one thing I must say, that Miss Charlton's guardians will not do their duty unless they see, when such a sacrifice is made, that a settlement quite equal to the loss is secured to their ward."

"That will all be easily settled," answered Morton, in a tone of the most provoking indifference. "I have the consent of both her guardians, which is, I believe, all that is necessary."

"To her marriage with you, sir, perhaps it is," answered Mrs. Charlton, "but to your obtaining a penny of her fortune something more is required—my consent. Unless that is obtained, every shilling she has, this house, and all it contains, is mine. You take her a beggar if you take her at all without my approbation—pray remember that."

Morton was provoked more than he had fancied his contempt would suffer him to be. "If what you say, my dear madam, is true," he replied, "I think—taking the whole matter in a mercantile point of view, and dealing with it as a matter of business—you would be very foolish to give your consent at all. You seem to forget that it would be a dead loss to you, and I cannot conceive how a lady of such correct calculations can even consider the matter at all, unless, indeed, you entertain the opinion which some people have, that the grounds of your pretensions are not quite so sure as they seem at first sight."

"Not sure!" exclaimed Mrs. Charlton vehemently. "What says her father's will? You have seen it, doubtless, sir?—studied it deeply, I am pretty certain. It is proved, registered, acted upon, and admits of no doubt. How will you get over that, I should like to know."

"There are two or three ways in which I might answer that question," replied Morton; "in the first place, my dear madam, a Court of Chancery, though an inconvenient resource, yet gives the means of putting a right and lawful construction upon wills; and it would be for that court to consider whether the refusal of consent, which would entitle you to the whole of Mr. Charlton's property, must not absolutely be made upon reasonable grounds."

"There is nothing to that effect in the codicil!" exclaimed Mrs. Charlton; "the word is simply consent."

"True," replied Morton; "but the codicil premises that it is made on the consideration that heiresses are too often the dupes of sharpers; and that the power given to you is to prevent that result in the case of Mr. Charlton's daughter. Such being the case, and I not being a sharper, the construction of the will may, perhaps, afford a curious and intricate question to the bar."

Mrs. Charlton remained silent and very pale for a minute or two; but at length she answered, "I see, my lord, that you wish to frighten me with the idea of a long lawsuit, but it won't do. I am not easily frightened, I can tell you."

"I should think not," replied Morton; "and, therefore, what I am going to say will, probably, produce no alarm. The law proceedings, Mrs. Charlton, may, probably, be reduced within a very narrow compass, for there are other questions connected with this will, which may be much more easily decided than its construction. The first will be, is the codicil genuine?"

"Genuine!" exclaimed Mrs. Charlton, grasping the arm of the sofa—"genuine!"

"Yes, my dear madam, genuine," replied Morton; "there are two minor questions affecting that greater one, which it will be well for you to consider before you proceed farther in the course you have thought fit to adopt. The first question is, whether on the night after Mr. Charlton's death, and in possession of all his keys, you did or did not pass a considerable time, when the whole household were in bed, in the examination of different papers, and writing others in the library? The next question will be, whether the codicil to Mr. Charlton's will is not dated Mallington, on a day when Mr. Charlton himself was many miles distant from the spot? I would recommend these subjects to your consideration, and until you have considered them, I think we had better delay any farther consideration on the subject, for there are acts which place people in very great danger, and which none of those connected with them can wish to be investigated too closely."

Thus saying, Morton rose, and, bowing to Mrs. Charlton, walked towards the door. She sat however, on the sofa, still and silent as a statue, with her horrified eyes fixed upon the table, and the agony of detected guilt at her heart.

Notwithstanding the contempt he felt for her, Morton was moved with compassion when he beheld the intense suffering which his words produced; and, after pausing for an instant at the door, he turned back, and, approaching close to Louisa's step-mother, he said, "Mrs. Charlton, listen to me for a moment."

She remained perfectly silent and motionless, however, as if she were deprived of all thought and sensation. Her face was deadly pale, her lips were white, and it seemed as if she hardly breathed. "Listen to me, I beg of you," he continued. "Louisa and myself are disposed to do anything that is kind towards you. We cannot recognize a claim that we do not believe rightly exists, and, therefore, anything you desire must not be put in such a shape. We have no inclination to stir this question of the will, unless it be forced upon us; and farther for myself, allow me to say, that, out of affection for her, I am ready now, or at any time, to do all I can to assist or befriend her father's widow. Pray, think of this, and let me hear from you, when you will not find me unwilling to serve you."

A ray of consciousness came into Mrs. Charlton's eyes, and she held out her hand to him. Morton took it for a moment, then released it, and left the room.

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

There are times and seasons when intense corporeal suffering is a relief, for mental agony is far more terrible to bear; and it fortunately happens, in the strange mysterious union between soul and body, that in general the powers of the human frame give way when the pangs of the spirit reach a certain point, affording either a diversion or a cessation of thought. At her mother's earnest request, Lucy Edmonds was conveyed from the rectory to the park-keeper's house at Mallington Park, under a strict promise on the widow's part not to say a word that could give her any certainty upon the terrible subject of her suspicions. Caution, however, was not very long necessary, for though Lucy was placed in bed and kept perfectly tranquil, yet before nightfall she began to show symptoms of fever: her thoughts wandered; her cheek grew flushed, her eye dull, her breathing quick; and about midnight delirium came on, in which she seemed to lose all consciousness of her actual situation. Sometimes, indeed, she would rave of Alfred Latimer, but then it was as connected with the past, not with the present. She would tell him to leave her, not to ask her to disobey her father; she would assure him that she loved him, but that she could never be his; and then, at other times, she would go back to still earlier days, and mutter about the scenes of her childhood, and her brother who was dead. For nine days this state continued, and then, carefully and tenderly nursed, and with constant and skillful attention on the part of Mr. Nethersole, youth and a good constitution began to triumph over disease and grief. The delirium ceased; she became quiet and more at ease; but it would seem that for a time memory of more recent events was altogether obliterated. She spoke little, and only uttered a word or two at a time, but those words showed that she had forgotten her marriage and all the terrible events connected with it, her husband's situation, her father's fate, her hapless journey with Alfred Latimer, and her own sad return to the scenes of her youth. There was a blank in memory, a cloud over a part of the past—dark and fearful, it is true, but yet for some time impenetrable, though she often tried to scan it, and with feeble efforts strove to call forth the figures that were behind that gloomy curtain. She felt that there was something dreadful, but she knew not what; and the mind's powers were not yet sufficiently restored to let her dwell long upon any one train of thought. Doctor Western visited her, after watching with the most kindly care every change that took place, anxious to seize the right moment for administering the only sort of consolation she could receive. One day it seemed to him that the time was fast approaching, for Lucy was much better. She could sit up; she could hold a longer conversation; she listened with attention, and apparently with deep thought to all he said, and he ventured to dilate in general terms upon the duty and necessity of submitting patiently to the will of God under all afflictions, of moderating grief, and receiving every painful dispensation with firm faith in the inscrutable mercy of the Almighty. He made no personal application of his words, and left her, as he thought, calmer and better prepared. But when he was gone, Lucy fell into a fit of deep meditation, and then gave way to bitter tears. Her mother, who slept beside her, perceived that she wept through a great part of the night, and though her health did not suffer, as might have been expected—though she rose the next day, and dressed herself with apparently greater strength than she had yet displayed since her illness—though she took food, and everything that was recommended to her—yet a deep gloom hung upon her, and in the evening she spoke with her mother, for the first time, of her husband and of her father.

Mrs. Edmonds endeavored to turn the conversation, though the irrepressible tears rose in her own eyes, as she sought to speak of more indifferent subjects; but Lucy, though, from the agitation she perceived in her mother, she would not press the subject of her father's death, could not be brought to refrain from asking further questions in regard to Alfred Latimer.

"Where is he, my dear mother?" she said; "do not be afraid to tell me, for I now recollect all. They took him away from me, and put him in prison, I know. You must tell me where he is confined, for I must write to him—when I am able."

The widow, seeing that she would not be satisfied without information, thought it best to tell her the truth, that her husband was in Sturton Jail. But about ten the following morning she set out to inform Dr. Western of what had occurred, leaving her son to sit with Lucy during her absence. When she went the poor girl was up and dressed, and apparently trying to amuse herself by reading; but as soon as Mrs. Edmonds had quitted the cottage she called her brother to her, saying. "John, I want you to tell me one thing, and then I won't ask you any more. Who killed our father?"

Her voice was perfectly calm, though low, and her manner displayed little or no agitation. But the boy, who had been warned beforehand, replied with glistening eyes, "Indeed, I don't know, Lucy. People say that tall man, Brown, or the other, Jack Williams; but nobody can tell rightly yet."

Lucy was silent, and looked at the book again, but her eye did not move along the line; and had the boy been very watchful, he must have seen that her thoughts were busy with objects beyond her sight. About five minutes afterwards his sister looked up, and said "I wish you would run up to the hall, John, and ask Mrs. Chalke to lend me the great book full of pictures, that she once showed me. Tell her I will take great care of it, and you bring it down carefully, there's a good boy."

Perhaps her brother might have hesitated to obey before his mother returned, if it had not been for the thought of the pictures in the book, which he was well inclined to look at himself. He paused an instant, indeed, but Lucy repeated her request, and, taking his hat, he set off as fast as he could for the hall.

As soon as he was gone his sister rose suddenly, went into the other room, searched for her bonnet and shawl, and having found them, hastened to the door and looked out, then darting away with a quick step she made a circuit round the house, gained the shelter of the wood, and hurried along one of the paths which led towards the stile near Dame Hazlewood's cottage. As she approached, however, she heard voices in the road, and turned away to the left, to another stile further up the hill, and then issued forth from the park, and bent her steps direct towards Sturton. She walked on for some way with much greater strength than might have been expected, not taking the path through the wood, but following the road to the left through several small villages. When she had gone about half the distance, however, her strength failed her, and she sat down to rest for some time by the way side. In about twenty minutes she rose again, and with tottering steps hurried on till she came opposite to a little public-house on the other side of the road, where she paused, and looked up with a hesitating and uncertain air. But she felt that she could not proceed further on foot without refreshment, and knowing the people to be good and honest country folks, well acquainted with her family, she crossed over and went in. At first the landlord and his wife did not recollect her, for she was much changed both in dress and appearance—pale, thin, wan, and with her lips parched and dry with recent illness—but when they did call her person to mind, they showed her such kindness as their somewhat unpolished air permitted, and seeming to divine whither she was going, set before her some refreshments without asking any questions. The good man and his wife talked together, indeed, for some time in a low voice; and Lucy, terrified lest any one should stop her, remarked that their eyes were directed towards her as they spoke, and rose sooner than she would otherwise have done to depart, asking what she had to pay.

"You are not fit to go, my dear," said the landlord, coming forward to her; "I suppose you are walking to Sturton; but it's a long way for a poor sick girl like you, on foot. I wonder your mother let you come, and alone, too."

"I must see my husband, you know," answered Lucy, judging from the man's words that her whole history was known.

"Well, I don't say but you must," replied the landlord; "I suppose that's right, whatever may have happened. But I'll tell you what, my dear, you had better have our chaise-cart. Bill will soon drive you over."

It may easily be conceived that this offer was a great relief to the poor girl's mind. The little tax-cart was soon brought out, a pillow was placed in it to render the seat more easy, and in about three-quarters of an hour poor Lucy Edmonds was at the gates of Sturton Jail. Her heart sunk when she approached them, and gazed up at the awful and gloomy masses of stone, which seemed to harmonize but too sadly and darkly with all the crime and sorrow which, from time to time, they contained. She rang the bell, however, and on the wicket being opened asked to see her husband, Mr. Latimer. The man gazed at her with a cold look, indifferent both by hardness of nature and long habit to every species of grief, but a piece of money slipped into his hand soon softened him, and bidding her wait a minute in the lodge, while he asked the governor, he hurried away, leaving Lucy with one of the turnkeys, who was smoking a pipe at the table. Both remained silent, and the porter returned in a minute or two with the joyful tidings that the governor had no objection.

With eyes bent down, and wavering steps, and a heart beating wildly at every door they passed, poor Lucy followed the jailer along the passages of the prison to the room where her husband was confined. By the time the two large bolts were drawn back, and the door unlocked, she could hardly stand; but the moment after, the sight of her husband sitting at the table revived her, and, running forward, while the man said, "Here's your lady, sir, come to see you," she cast her arms round his neck, and wept.

Alfred Latimer's eye was haggard, and his whole look anxious and despairing; but, nevertheless, he was truly rejoiced to see poor Lucy again. She was the only being on earth for whom he had ever felt anything like real tenderness and affection; and, in the moment of his affliction and his danger, her coming was a true consolation and comfort to him, reviving for the time the faint light of better feelings in his dark and obdurate heart. He pressed her warmly to her breast; he soothed, he caressed her, and even so far forgot himself as to remark her altered appearance, and to say, "You look very ill, love. You must have suffered a great deal, I am sure, my poor Lucy."

"I have been very ill," answered Lucy; "they thought me dying, I believe, for I quite lost my senses, after I came back; and they would not have let me come now, I am sure, if they had known it."

"They have no right to stop you!" exclaimed Alfred Latimer, sharply. "Are not you my wife? They can't stop a wife coming to see her husband."

"No; it was because I have been so ill, and am so weak," replied the poor girl. "I feel as if I should faint now."

"Here, take some wine," said Alfred Latimer, placing her in the chair where he had been sitting, and reaching a bottle from the mantelpiece. "You must keep up, Lucy—you must keep up, for I may want you to help me—I am sure you will, Lucy, won't you?"

"Oh, yes, that I will!" answered Lucy. "I will help you, whatever be the case, Alfred, for that is my duty now; yet I would fain ask you one question, Alfred," she continued, in a sad and hesitating tone—"only one question."

A dark and fiend-like scowl came upon his face, and he replied, "Ask me no questions at all, for I shall answer none—that's to say, at present—for small words often do great mischief. Your only business is—if I am your husband, and you really love me—to do the best you can to get me out of this scrape."

Lucy was silent for a moment, with her eyes bent down in bitter thought; but looking up the instant after, she said, gravely, "I will do all I can."

"That's a dear girl!" answered her husband; "and I'll tell you what you must do. In the first place, you must know nothing about this business at all; and if any one asks you, say so."

"I do know nothing," answered Lucy; "they have told me nothing yet."

"Well, that's all right," answered her husband, sitting down beside her, and putting his arm round her waist. "Take some more wine, my love, that has done you good already. I'll tell you how it all is, Lucy: the best scheme I could devise has failed. My mother, some how or another, got together ten thousand pound, and tried to bribe one of the clerks to put a flaw in the indictment against me. It was the lawyer Hazzard, who managed it all; but the fool of a clerk would not take the money, and threatened to peach besides. My mother told the lawyer not to tell me that it had failed—some of her own cunning schemes made her want to keep it from me; but he was here this morning, and let it all out; so the only chance is by what I am going to tell you—but you do not listen, Lucy—would you, too, help to ruin me?"

Lucy had remained with her eyes bent down, and with a look of deep and bitter thought upon her face; but she instantly raised her head, saying, "I do listen, Alfred; I hear every word; and you know I would give my life to save you. Only tell me what I have to do, and I will do it, if I have strength; but I have very little, Alfred, and I fear what little I have will fail me very soon."

"Pooh, nonsense!" answered Alfred Latimer, all whose selfishness had returned upon him in full force again; "you must get a chaise, dear Lucy, and that will save you; then bid the post-boy drive you over by the bridge here, round the common behind Mallington House; make him stop near the gravel pits, and seek out Mother Brown, who has a cottage there. You know Mother Brown?"

Lucy shook her head. "Why here is the cottage close by the pits," replied Alfred Latimer, "where I was taken when I got such a fall. But you must find her out, at all events, and tell her if she would save her son's life, she must get some pheasants or hares, or game of any kind, and hide them away in the very back part of the cave in Wenlock Wood. She'll know the place quite well. You must give her some money to pay for the game, for I don't think the old wretch would spend a penny if her own life depended on it; and tell her that you will give her more when you know that it's done, for she's not to be trusted. I don't care what the game is like, and the longer it has been killed, the better, especially if there be a good deal of blood about it."

A sharp shudder passed all over poor Lucy's frame, but her husband did not remark it, and went on to say, "Simpkin, the poacher, will get her as much as she wants; and the more she gets the better. Do you hear?"

"Yes," answered Lucy, "I hear, and I will go and do it directly. Can I do anything else, Alfred?"

"No, my love," he replied, "but bring me some money with you the next time you come. What have you got with you now?"

"Seven or eight guineas," answered Lucy; "I brought two hundred over with me from France, thinking you might want some, and I have spent four or five."

"Well, bring me a hundred next time you come, and take care that no one sees you with it, for most likely they would stop it."

He paused, and thought for a moment, and then added, thoughtfully, "I wish to Heaven I could see Tankerville! he would soon help me to get out of this place. Couldn't you write to him, Lucy, and tell him my mother will give him a thousand pound if he can get me over safely to France!"

"But where is he to be found?" asked Lucy Edmonds, leaning her head upon her hand.

"Ay, that's the question," answered her husband. "Well, there's no help for it; if you can find out where he is, tell him what I say; but, at all events, do the other, and come back and see me as soon as you can, there's a dear girl."

"Would it not be better for him to come and see you himself?" asked Lucy; "he could manage it all better than I could, I am sure."

"They won't let him in," answered Alfred Latimer, impatiently. "You, or my mother, or the lawyer, well and good, but they'll let me see no one else; but, stay a bit, love, I'll tell them to get you a chaise into the court of the jail, and you can tell the boy to drive towards Mallington House, then they'll think you are going to my mother."

Lucy made no answer, and her husband rang the bell, which was one of the conveniences granted in those days to a prisoner who could afford to pay for good accommodation. A turnkey speedily appeared; a chaise was ordered, and quickly brought to the gates, for it was not allowed to enter the court, and Alfred Latimer took leave of Lucy, embracing her, and kissing her tenderly. She suffered him to do so, for it cannot be said that she returned his caresses; a great change, indeed, having come over her demeanor towards him since she first entered the prison. It is needless to enter into any long explanation of the cause, for a few words that she murmured to herself, after having entered the chaise, and told the postilion where to drive, may probably be sufficient. As the vehicle drove rapidly away towards the bridge over the river, the unhappy girl sunk back in the seat, clasping her hands together, and saying, "Oh, my father, I am helping your murderer; but he is my husband—he is my husband!"

CHAPTER LXXXIX.

About five o'clock on the evening of the same day the woman called Mother Brown might be seen returning to her own cottage, laden with a large bundle of broken sticks and dry gorse. As soon as she had entered the hovel she deposited her load upon the floor, bolted the door, and then taking a quantity of the thorns and wood laid them upon the nearly extinct embers which glowed faintly upon the hearth. The dry faggots speedily caught fire, and blazed up; and then, hanging her pot upon the hook, she filled it with water; and, returning to the bundle, spread the furze and sticks abroad, drawing out from the very heart of the whole a fine barn-door hen, stripped of the feathers. The neck hung down limp and pliant, as if it had not been long killed, and the old woman, with a low, chuckling laugh, muttered, as she raised it, "Ah! thou'lt lay no more eggs for Dame Johnson; she'll find thy feathers, if she wants them, under the hedge."

After certain preliminaries, such as cutting off the head, which was given to her one-eyed cat, that sat by the fire, the fowl was consigned to the pot; and the old woman continued to hover about, moving now this thing, and now that, to very little purpose, and talking to herself the while, in a rambling incoherent sort of way, "Ah! they may hang him, if they like, for me," she said, picking up the sticks, and putting them in a corner by the fire—"the varmint! to go away, and rob a rich house, and never think of giving his old mother a penny of it all; he'll make a prettier corpus than Jack Williams, any how, for he's a devil of a sight a bigger man, though t'other is so strong. That Latimer is a smart youth, any how; I should like to see him cut a tumble, but I suppose the boys would hoot me if I went to have a peep. Well, I can stay away; I've seen many a one hanged in my day, so it's no great loss; I wish half the world were hanged!—that pot's a-boiling over," and she ran and lifted the lid, and took some of the water out. "Well, it's a funny world," she continued, in the same moralizing vein; "people seem born to be hanged, or get into trouble; but I'd rather be hanged, arter all, than go to Botany, and then have to work for them as sent me. The lad was not a bad lad, if he would have kept within compass, and not put his head in Jemmy's cravat; but if a man will pull a rope, he must—there's no stopping him. I should like to get him out of the pitcher, notwithstanding"

She was by this time stooping down to put a bit of tile under one leg of the table, which was either naturally shorter than its brethren, or had met with an inequality in the floor, which offered a very good exemplification of the ups and downs of life; but just as she was in the act some one from without lifted the latch, and pushed the door sharply. Up started Mother Brown, giving an apprehensive look towards the door, and then another at the cat, who was still busy with the fowl's head. With a somewhat blasphemous objurgation of her feline companion, for not finishing her meal quicker, the old woman tried to take away the head, and meeting with the gratitude she might expect, in the form of a sharp scratch, she drove the beast and its prey into the neighboring room, while the personage without shook the door again and again, exclaiming, "Come, open it, or I'll burst it in; I see you quite plain, you old jade!"

Finding her castle likely to be stormed, Mother Brown thought it best to surrender at discretion, and, opening the door, exclaimed, in a tone of surprise, as Captain Tankerville walked in, "Lord, sir, is that you! I couldn't think who it was, and I was afraid, for I am quite a lone woman now, since they nabbed my boy Tommy."

"Well, you may shut the door, if you like now," answered Captain Tankerville, for I have come for a night's lodging, and I want to hear about your boy Tommy, as you call him, and my friend Alfred Latimer."

"Lawk, sir, I can't take you in," answered Mrs. Brown.

"No, that you can't, granny," answered Tankerville, playing on the words; "though you have taken many a one in in your day, I dare say; but I'm not so easily done, and I intend to stay here all night, I can tell you. You shall have half-a-crown for your pains, so don't say another word about it. Now, tell me about your son Tommy, and where they've put him and Jack Williams and young Latimer; I shouldn't wonder if there's a penny to be made out of that blade yet."

"You've just got out yourself, I dare say, captain," said Mrs. Brown; "my son told me, when he brought you here, that you're a famous one for diddling the beakies; and so you want to lodge here, not to be seen."

"No, you're out, old woman," answered Captain Tankerville, who, whether her surmise was true or false, was not willing to make her his confidant. "The old gentleman who had me in couldn't make out his case; but you don't answer my questions—what have you got in that pot?"

"Hush!" cried Mother Brown, "there's some one a coming."

"Is there, by Jove!" cried the worthy captain; "then I'll make myself scarce," and away he went into the other room, closing the door carefully behind him.

Scarcely had he disappeared, when a gentle knock was heard at the door, and Mother Brown exclaimed, in her gruff and indifferent tone, "Come in, whoever ye be!"

The person who appeared, as the reader may suppose, was no other than poor Lucy, who inquired, as she entered, "Is your name Brown, ma'am?"

"Yes, my pretty lady," answered the old hag; "and I'm not a ghost either, though you look as pale as if you seed one."

"I am very tired," answered Lucy, "and have been ill; but I want you to do me a service, Mrs. Brown, and you shall be well paid for it."

The idea of money always had an immense effect upon the person to whom these words were addressed; and she speedily became extremely civil, asking Lucy to sit down, eying her shawl with a certain sort of glance, which was in itself an evident breach of the tenth commandment. Lucy's business, however, was soon entered upon, and she was going on to tell all that Alfred Latimer wanted the old woman to do, when Mother Brown raised her finger with a monitory gesture and elevated eyebrows, saying, in a whisper, "Hush! there is some one in there; we had better go out before the door, and talk." But before her suggestion could be followed, Captain Tankerville, who had heard the name of Alfred Latimer more than once mentioned, walked in, with his usual swaggering air, wishing Lucy good evening, as an old acquaintance.

"Oh! this is so fortunate, Captain Tankerville," said the poor girl, "for I was told to write to you on the part of my poor husband."

"Husband!" repeated Captain Tankerville. "Oh!—aye, very well—but we had better shut and bolt the door, and then we can talk without being interrupted."

Lucy's cheek had flushed at his first words; but she replied at once, "No, there is no need of that, I have very little to say;" and she drew nearer to the door, in order to go out, if he attempted to close it, for there was something she dreaded exceedingly in that man, and then, going on, she gave both to him and the old woman the messages with which she had been charged by her husband.

Captain Tankerville, for his part, mused in silence for a moment or two over what he heard; but the old woman at once exclaimed, "But the money! the money! one can't buy swishtails, or lions either, without money."

"Here is enough for that purpose," answered Lucy, drawing forth her purse, and giving the old woman all it contained, except what was just sufficient to pay the expenses of the chaise. "When you have done what I tell you, and I am sure the game is there, you will receive five guineas more."

"Five guineas!" said Mother Brown; "that's very little, considering I have to walk so far."

"Why, you old besom!" exclaimed Captain Tankerville, joining in, "you wouldn't hang your own son for the sake of a walk, would you?"

"I don't care whether he's hanged or not," answered the hag; "howsomever, I'll do it—but where am I to get the five guineas, my pretty lady?"

"Come down to me at Mallington Park," answered Lucy, "and you shall have it—come to Mrs. Edmonds's; but remember you do not speak a word of this to any one but myself. Ask for Mrs. Latimer."

The old woman answered only by a low unpleasant chuckle, and Lucy took a step towards the door; but though her heart was sadly wrung by contending feelings, she thought she had not yet done her duty fully to her husband; and turning again to Captain Tankerville, she added, in a trembling voice, "I hope, sir, you will be able to do what I asked. You had better see Mrs. Charlton as soon as possible, for no time is to be lost."

"I suppose not," answered Tankerville, dryly; "I will do my best; for, to be frank, a thousand pounds is something worth having; and besides, it's always as well to help a friend out of a scrape. We sometimes get a help in return; and I like Latimer, too. He's a devilish good fellow."

"He seems quite sure you can do what he wishes, if you please," replied Lucy. "I trust —I hope he is not guilty."

"Oh! as to guilty or not, I have nothing to do with that," said Captain Tankerville, with a laugh, that made the poor girl shudder; "but as to getting him out, that may be a different affair. Stone walls are stone walls. He's not very prudent, as he has shown already; and he has got two other fellows in with him, who must be of the party, I suppose. If I were in myself, I could manage it, I dare say; for then I could direct the whole; but now it can only be done by a good lot of money."

"That will not be wanting, I am sure," replied Lucy. "Mrs. Charlton will supply all that is needed; but now I must go, for I have been away long."

"Well, well—I dare say we shall manage it," said Tankerville, whose imagination warmed at the idea of the thousand pounds, and who saw the prospect of extracting considerable sums from Mrs. Charlton, at all events; "I'll do my best, Lucy, and come down and tell you how all goes on; for we may want your help to tell him news, and let him know what we are about."

There was a familiarity in his tone that pained Lucy—I might say, that punished her—for she felt that the situation in which she had been seen by the man before her had degraded her even in his eyes, all degraded as he was himself—and, with a brief word or two of reply, she hurried away again, got into the chaise, and drove sadly back to her mother's house. She had gone through the fatigues and the exertion of that day with resolution that conquered even bodily weakness, with powers that she herself had not known she could display; but the moment that she had crossed the threshold, and was clasped in her mother's arms, she fainted away, and lay for some time as if she were dead. When she recovered, Mrs. Edmonds asked no questions, fearful of agitating her, and Lucy herself was the first to speak of her going. "My dear mother," she said, "I have been to see my husband: you must forgive me—for, whatever he has done, I am his wife, and must do my duty to him. I must go again too, and you must not try to stop me, for if you do I shall die."

"It is only for your own sake, I would try to stop you, Lucy," replied her mother; "for, indeed, my child, you are not fit for such exertion. You have almost killed yourself now."

"It would do me much more harm to stay away," replied Lucy; "but I will not go to-morrow, I will take that day to rest and recover." Much, indeed, did she need it; until the following evening she remained in bed.

In the meanwhile Captain Tankerville sat for more than an hour in Mother Brown's cottage, spending part of the time in cogitations as to the course he should pursue, and part in devouring his full share of the old woman's stolen fowl. He made no inquiries where it came from, indeed; and as he was a man without any scruples, it is not improbable that had he known the facts of the case his viands might have been eaten with even a greater relish, though he derived some satisfaction from forcing his hostess to let him be a partaker of her supper, which, it must be added, was much against her will. As soon as it was quite dark, the worthy captain set out for Mallington House; and, ringing at the bell, desired to see Mrs. Charlton. His appearance, just having come out of prison, was—to use a very expressive, though somewhat vulgar term—rather seedy; and the servant, after eyeing him for a moment, told him that Mrs. Charlton was engaged and could not see him. Captain Tankerville, however, was not a man to take a refusal easily, and assuming an authoritative air, he replied, "Go in and tell her, my good fellow, that I must see her on business of importance. I have not a card with me, but my name is Captain Tankerville, of the royal navy, a friend of her son's, from whom I have a message."

The servant, after some slight hesitation, obeyed, but took care to inform his mistress that the applicant was "rather an odd-looking fellow." Nevertheless, there was something aristocratic in the name of Tankerville, and that, together with the dignity of a captain in the navy, proved a passport to Mrs. Charlton's presence. Captain Tankerville was accordingly admitted, and though very different people, perhaps no two persons were ever better qualified to deal with each other than that worthy gentleman and that fair lady. The captain opened his business with the utmost coolness and effrontery as soon as he had seated himself, informing Mrs. Charlton that he had received a message from her son, with the promise of a thousand pound from her, if he succeeded in effecting Alfred Latimer's liberation. "Now, my dear madam," he continued, "I think I can manage the matter, but the first thing to be ascertained is, whether you are disposed to ratify the engagement. A thousand pound, a thousand pound, you know—promises from a man in prison are worth nothing, and you may view the matter differently from my friend Latimer."

"I shall not grudge the thousand pound, sir," replied Mrs. Charlton, "if my son is actually liberated; but I certainly shall not pay it before."

"That's very prudent," replied Captain Tankerville, who seemed to have an instinctive appreciation of the lady's character; "it would not be pleasant to give a thousand pound, and have him hanged too."

"Good heaven! sir, you need not use such shocking expressions," exclaimed Mrs. Charlton; "I trust there is no chance whatever of such a dreadful event."

"I don't know, my dear madam," replied Tankerville, dryly; "he seems to think there is, and he's the best judge, I fancy; but business is business, and it is best to use plain terms. Although, of course, I do not expect you to be such a goose as to buy a pig in a poke, and pay before your son's out, you will not object, I dare say, to sign a little memorandum that I am to have the thousand pound if I get him out; then we shall both be pinned fast, you see. If you don't pay me, you might chance to be required to visit New South Wales for your share in the transaction; and then again, you have got a hold upon me, for I can't peach of you without subjecting myself to the same voyage, which, though a naval man, would not be agreeable to me."

Mrs. Charlton leaned her head upon her fair hand, and considered the matter with due deliberation, but at length she made up her mind to consent, and before showing his game any further, Captain Tankerville thought it best to have the paper drawn up and signed, which was accordingly done.

"And now, my dear madam," he continued, as soon as he had got the document in his pocket, "the next thing to be considered is the means."

"The means," repeated Mrs. Charlton, "I thought you had arranged all that already. You told me you thought it could be done."

"True, true," replied the worthy captain; "but when I say means, I would imply the sinews of war, my dear madam. I am a poor captain on half-pay, and I cannot be supposed to supply all the finances for such a transaction as this. The sum required won't be a trifle, I can tell you, and you can judge yourself what your son's life is worth, as well as if you kept an insurance-office. "There are jailers to be bribed, and turnkeys to be fee'd—ay, and the governor of the prison himself, in all probability, to have his little recompense, for I don't see how we can get on without making him wink with one eye, if not with both."

"Then I am very sorry it can't be done," said Mrs. Charlton, in a low but decided tone. "The thousand pound I can command, but I cannot go much further, for the truth is, I have not the money; and besides," she added, with a slight smile, "how could I tell in what way the money was applied! I could not be sure that it was used at all for the purpose intended."

Mrs. Charlton's mind rose highly in Captain Tankerville's estimation, and he mentally observed, "A very different lady from her daughter-in-law! We must try to give her some security." Nevertheless, before he proceeded in that course, he said, with a frank and good-humored air, "Oh, my dear madam, you must have some confidence in those you employ!"

"True; but, as you said just now, business is business, Captain Tankerville, and I always like to know how my money is spent."

"Well, as to some part of it," replied the worthy captain, "that can be done. You had better come over to the place yourself. I can prepare the way for you, and when the turnkeys are off duty, can have the honor of introducing them to you quietly, when you can pay them with your own hands, for they must be trusted, even if you don't trust me."

"Ay, but I have some hold upon them, Captain Tankerville," replied Mrs. Charlton; "if I can prove that they have taken money from me, and if they don't do what they promised, they can be punished, you know."

"Well, so be it," answered the captain; "you may be quite sure I shall do my best to get the thousand pounds; but some money must be had in hand even to begin with. They will never risk coming to see you, nor talking much with me either, without having something to make it worth their while."

"How much will be required, do you think?" asked Mrs. Charlton.

"Why, there will be the porter, and the principal turnkey, and one of his fellows," replied Tankerville, thoughtfully; "I should think three hundred pound would do"

"Three hundred pound!" exclaimed Mrs. Charlton, "what, to begin with?"

"You can't expect men to risk transportation for nothing," replied the captain.

"There is no risk of transportation for coming to speak with a lady at an inn," rejoined his fair companion. "In one word, Captain Tankerville, I must see my way clearly in this business. I am not a person easily deceived, and, besides, I have not got more than a hundred pound in the house."

"Well, we must make that go as far as it will," he answered, perfectly unconcernedly; "we will meet at this place, Sturton, as soon as you like, Mrs. Charlton; and I trust with the hundred pound, if you will have the goodness to fetch it, I shall be able to get two of them at least to come and see you."

Mrs. Charlton went away, and returned in a minute or two with the money, Captain Tankerville having amused himself in the meanwhile with taking a pinch of old very dry snuff out of a valuable gold snuff-box of the late Mr. Charlton's, which stood upon the mantel-piece, and then immediately putting the box in his pocket.

"Oh, very well, this is the money," he said, holding out his hand as soon as Mrs. Charlton appeared; but the lady, instead of giving him the notes, took up the pen, dipped it in the ink, and proceeded to write a regular receipt for one hundred pound, specifying in good set terms that it was to be applied to the purpose of bribing the jailers and turnkeys of Sturton Jail to facilitate the escape of Alfred Latimer, Esq. To this she requested Captain Tankerville's signature; but that gentleman hesitated, and Mrs. Charlton then added, holding the notes tight in her hand, "Our hold must be mutual upon each other, Captain Tankerville; I shall not pay a single penny without a similar receipt."

The captain laughed, and signed the paper, saying, in a complimentary tone, "Well, you are the cleverest woman I ever had to deal with." And, after some further conversation, in the course of which it was agreed that Mrs. Charlton should go over to Sturton on the following day, and sleep at the inn there, the worthy captain took his leave, assuring her that he would lose no time in commencing the preliminary negotiations. Instead, however, of returning to the cottage of Mother Brown, as he had proposed, he walked straight down to the inn at Mallington, where he indulged in a couple of bottles of sherry and a broiled fowl.

CHAPTER XC.

The yard of the prison was not so full as ordinary, and the greater part of the prisoners which tenanted it at the time were busily amusing themselves in one corner with different games which they had devised to pass the troublous hours of captivity, and which were in those days permitted to the unconvicted. It was curious to see how, in this state, old habits came back upon all—old habits, which in many instances must have dated very far back—some had even returned to their boyish days, two or three were playing at marbles, and one was spinning a peg-top. But we must not pause to particularize all their occupations; suffice it that while one part of the prison yard was thus engaged, the other displayed Jack Williams and Alfred Latimer—the former taking his short walk up and down, the latter keeping by his side and talking eagerly.

"It won't answer, Mr. Latimer, it won't answer," said Williams, in reply to something that his companion had just communicated. "They have proofs enough against us all, that's the truth; and we had better look at it straightforwardly. I had a hint yesterday afternoon that they have got hold of everything we took in the place where we hid them away."

"They havn't got what I had," answered Latimer eagerly; "that's all safe in France; and they found nothing upon me that they could swear to."

Williams looked at him steadfastly for a moment, and then said "You are thinking of getting yourself out of the scrape, and leaving us in; but it won't do, Mr. Latimer."

"I am thinking of no such thing," answered Alfred Latimer sharply, with the color mounting in his cheek; "such a thing never crossed my thoughts, but I was thinking it was a pity you hadn't been as careful as I was. Even now I don't see, if they cannot prove that you put the things there, how it can tell against you, or Brown either. Any one who took the things might have hidden them as well as you."

"There's some truth in that," answered Williams thoughtfully. "Well, let us hear what's your plan, with this business of the game?"

"Why the object is," answered Alfred Latimer, whose wit had been sharpened by his danger, "to account for two or three of the strong points against us. In the first place, if we are all in the same story, that we were just out bagging a few pheasants, which is very likely, seeing that we have all been in the same scrape before, it will show how we all came to go across the water together, and will knock down that cowardly rascal Maltby's evidence. Then, again," he said, "it will show a cause for the blood upon my clothes; and almost everything else will be affected by it, one way or another. So you see I was not thinking of getting out of the scrape and leaving you in it, though I cannot fancy what good it could do you to have me hanged as well as yourself."

"Perhaps not," answered Williams, with a grim smile, "but we are all in the same boat, Mr. Latimer, and must sink or swim together—not that I mean to say, if judge or jury were inclined to let you off, for any want of proof, that I would speak a single word to stop them. That's all fair, but if you were to contrive any plan for saving yourself without giving us a chance, I would spoil that for you, I can tell you. Now let's think of this scheme a little more. It's not a bad one, and we may as well let it go on, for it may make the folks doubt, and that's something; but the hope is so very faint a one that we must leave nothing else untried."

"But why is it so faint?" asked Alfred Latimer; "Maltby did not see us go into the house—nobody saw you and Brown hide the rings and things, and on me they have found nothing but ten guineas in my own purse."

"But they found well-nigh a thousand with me and Brown, in Wenlock Wood," answered Williams, "so we should have that to account for, any way, and your story won't match."

"That's awkward, indeed," answered Alfred Latimer; "but as the game is there by this time, I dare say, it may as well stay—what's to be done now, I wonder."

"Oh, yes; the game had better be left there, and we had better keep to the same story, if the worst comes to the worst. But the first thing is to try to get out of this place."

"Ay, but how is that to be done," asked Alfred Latimer, "I should be glad enough to get out, if I saw any chance of it."

Williams gave his under jaw a twist, as if there had been something in his mouth, and then answered "It is to be done, Mr. Latimer, and though the less that is said about it the better, yet, as you must have some share in the thing, and must give us some help, I may as well tell you part of the plan, especially as we can never tell how long we may have an opportunity of talking over it, for if these fellows in the jail knew what they were about, they would never let you and I be walking up and down here, laying our heads together in this way; and if the visiting justices hear of it, they'll have a finger in the pie, that's clear. Wait till that fellow's gone by, and I'll tell you."

One of their fellow-prisoners at this moment came up, and asked Williams a question of no great importance, to which he obtained a short reply, and then moved away. As soon as he was gone, the fellow continued, "That wall's a good height, you see, but yet a ladder could soon be made that would reach to the top, if we could only get some thin but strong cord."

"I could soon get that," answered Alfred Latimer; "my wife would bring that in—what sort of cord do you want, how thick?"

"It doesn't much matter," answered the man, "how thick, so that she can carry it, without being seen; and if it be strongly twisted, I shall have to work it up into the thickness I want, myself. That would be soon done, if I could sit to it long enough at a time; but the people are always coming into my cell, and as I have got no light to work at night, I should be obliged to do it by the feel."

"Oh, I'll get her to bring me in a phosphorus-box and some candles," said Alfred Latimer; "but when you have made the ladder, I don't see how you could use it. You are locked up at night, I suppose, as well as myself; and if you were to try it in the day, you'd be stopped in five minutes."

"There's such a thing as mortar between stones," answered Williams, dryly; "and such a thing as working the mortar out; Brown's at it, and I shall take my turn by and by; we are half way through the wall already, as near as I can calculate; and in two days more, we shall be within half an inch of the outside."

"Why, Brown and you arn't in the same cell, surely," said the young gentleman.

"Oh, no, not at night," answered Williams, "but during the airing time, as they call it, as our cells are close by the yard door, and as there is no means of getting out that way, they don't much watch, if we go in for a minute or two, and then nobody notices if he goes into his cell or mine."

"But how will he get into your cell when you want to get away," asked Alfred Latimer.

"Oh, we've a plan for that," replied Williams; "that won't be difficult to manage."

"And how am I to manage, Williams," demanded his companion; "it seems to me that you have been laying out for yourselves to get out of the scrape, and leave me in it."

"I shouldn't be telling you all about it, if I had," answered Williams; "but you must do something for yourself, Mr. Latimer. You shall know whenever all is quite ready, and the time fixed, then you must pay one of the turnkeys well to let you come at night and have a little private talk with me. You know a stout swivel-eyed fellow, with a hook-nose; ie's the man you must speak to. Just give him a hint that you want to consult me about our defence. Now, for ten pounds he won't mind letting you do that, for they think that's all fair; and to make everything sure, you can tell him he may lock you in, and come for you in a couple of hours again. He did so for Brown two or three nights ago, for the little sum I could give him, which was but two guineas."

"How did you get that?" asked Alfred Latimer. "They took all I had from me, and let me have all I want on my mother's account. The blackguards searched me to the skin."

"So they did me," answered Williams; "and if I had had two guineas about me, they would have soon found it; but I had what was worth more than two guineas—a certain bit of paper belonging to a friend of yours, one Mr. Morton, for which at one time he offered a reward of fifty pounds. I had slipped it in between my jacket and the lining, where they never thought of looking; and after I had been in for awhile I sent for Mr. Morton, on pretence of wanting to confess something to him, and then asked him if he was willing to give the same sum for the paper as ever. He was glad enough to do it, so I got the money and he got the paper—but that's nothing to do with what we were talking about. I wanted to try that turnkey, for I've a strange notion of picking out men by their faces, and I thought I was pretty sure of my mark. I have seldom seen a fellow with a swivel eye that hadn't got some sort of a twist inside as well as out. You may talk to him, therefore, quite safely, the first time you can get him into your room, and he'll do what you want any time for ten pound. Then when I tell you all's ready, you can get him to bring you to my cell about one or two in the morning, and while you are locked in there, as he thinks, we can be walking away towards Portsmouth."

"But won't he see the hole you have made in the wall," asked Alfred Latimer.

"Oh! dear, no," replied Williams. "In the first place there is never a stone out of its place when they come in, and besides the bed-head is against it."

The younger of the two villains ruminated for a minute or two over what he had heard. The scheme seemed to him certainly feasible, and he had heard of such things being attempted with success, but yet the risk seemed to him so great that he said at length, "Won't it be better, Jack, to keep this shift till the last—I mean, till the trial is over?"

"Why, you fool," answered Jack Williams, sharply, "we shall be in irons then. It's a wonder we ar'nt now, and only because there are one or two old women amongst the justices, who are trying what they call a new system here, in order to reclaim us, as they say—devilish little chance of reclaiming me, I think, irons or no irons." He and his companion both laughed, and he proceeded—"Brown got his darbies off yesterday by good behavior, and we must take good care to use our legs and arms while they are at liberty, so you get the cord and the phosphorus-box and the lights—one of those long rolls of taper will be better than candles—furnish yourself with all the money you can scrape together, and we shall do the matter easily enough. If I were you, Mr. Latimer, however, I would not neglect the other scheme. That can do no harm, and we might be stopped, you know. Another thing is, I don't see why you should be worse off, if it does come to a trial, than any of us, and as things stand now you are so, for that young lady, that Miss Charlton, knows nothing of me or Brown, but her evidence may be devilish unlucky for you. I should think, when you are so nearly related to her, that you could easily get her out of the way."

"Not so easy," answered Alfred Latimer, thoughtfully; "but I'll try—yes, that I will; I'll try. She's kind enough, but there's a great deal of determination about her, too, when she takes a thing into her head."

"I'd try every way," answered Williams; "but here comes Dick, the other turnkey, as if he were making for us. Don't say a word to him, mind, for, though he's devilish civil, yet you'll find him a dogged fellow, who won't take a sixpence."

The turnkey beckoned to Alfred Latimer as he approached, and told him that his lady was waiting to see him, in very reverential tones. There must be something most extraordinary in gold that the very name and reputation of wealth should obtain the respect which virtuous poverty cannot command.

> "Plate sin in gold,
> And the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks;
> Armed in rags, a pigmy straw doth pierce it," said the great poet. But there's something more than all this, it is not alone immunity that can be won by wealthy vice, but reverence; and virtue ungilded can command but scanty courtesy. When we doff our hats most humbly, 'tis to the purse in a man's pocket, not to the gem in his heart; and, let him be ever so loaded with crimes, the awful power of riches shall still affect all who approach him, and the very hangman tie the noose more reverently. Oh, Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuchadnezzar! thou wert a politic king, but scarcely didst thou know thyself the extent to which thy decrees would be obeyed, for we still, even at the end of more than two thousand years, bow down and worship the golden image thou didst set up.

Alfred Latimer, to return from our didactics, followed the worthy jailer into the prison, and in a few minutes was in his room again with Lucy, who seemed to have gained strength, notwithstanding all she had suffered. Lucy had a long tale to tell, for, since she had last seen him, many things had happened. Mrs. Charlton had opened a communication with her, had been to see her, and, upon the strength of the occasion, had been as gentle and kind, and sweetly maternal as possible. Not choosing to visit the prison again too soon, the lady had instructed her son's wife to communicate to him secretly the efforts that were making to liberate him, and to warn him to be prepared to take advantage of whatever might be done on his behalf at a moment's notice. Lucy had been instructed, too, to convey to him the means of disguising his person, and over her own ordinary dress, she now wore a second gown and shawl, which she had been told to leave with him. She had received all these directions, and promised to follow them, with her natural gentleness, but Mrs. Charlton remarked, in their interview, a sort of apathetic coldness, which she attributed, perhaps, to the right cause, and feared that it might interfere with Lucy's exertions on Alfred Latimer's behalf. Now, Mrs. Charlton never scrupled, when she had an object in view, to say what was not, and, therefore, in taking leave of her daughter-in-law, whom she might have treated at any other time as the dirt beneath her feet, or as a politician treats an elector who has served him, and can serve him no more, she kissed her tenderly, adding, "You must be very well aware, my dear Lucy, that nothing would induce me to take all these steps, even for a son, were I not fully convinced that he is perfectly innocent. The truth is," she continued, seeing some surprise in Lucy's face, "poor Alfred, whose wild ways you well know, had engaged to go out with these men, to shoot in the preserves here; it was very wrong and very foolish, certainly, but more a boyish frolic than anything else. However, he had nothing to do with the rest of the sad affair. That they did alone when he left them, but as he was seen with them just before and just after, there is no means of proving his innocence, unless they would confess the truth, and even then their words would not be believed; besides, these people are always so malicious. But I have heard quite enough to show me the true state of the case, and that poor Alfred was never nearer to the house than the willow-ground by the water."

Had Lucy been very clear-sighted, had she had a full knowledge of all the evidence that had been given, she would easily have perceived that Mrs. Charlton's story could not be true. But what we wish for, that we believe—at least in nine cases out of ten—and she gladly caught at the hope afforded her that her suspicions had done her husband injustice. If Mrs. Charlton, she thought, with full information in regard to the whole, could be perfectly convinced that her son was innocent, why should she doubt it? And though vague and shadowy suspicions would still haunt her, and facts occur to her remembrance which shook her trust, yet still she labored, and successfully, to explain them away, and to convince herself of that which she wished to be true. She thus returned to her husband with warmer feelings and a more eager desire to serve and save him than when she left him, and she detailed all the information she possessed as rapidly as possible, stripped off the gown and shawl in haste, and aided to hide them amongst his clothes.

It may easily be conceived that the tidings were joyful to Alfred Latimer, and he loaded poor Lucy with caresses, calling her the best and dearest girl in the world. He did not forget, however, the conversation which had taken place between him and Williams, and judging that it would be much wiser in every respect to carry on the scheme of escape which had been developed between them, in case that of his mother and Tankerville should fail, he directed Lucy to bring him the phosphorus-box and taper, and inquired eagerly for the money which had been spoken of at their last interview. It was instantly produced by Lucy, neatly rolled up into the smallest possible compass. But Alfred Latimer had still directions to give, and after meditating for a moment, and saying to himself, "Even if this scheme of Tankerville's succeeds, I must not let Williams and Brown know what is going on, and, to hide it all, I must seem as busy about their plan as ever; but in case both fail, I had better try to get the evidence against me out of the way;" he proceeded aloud, "There's one thing, dear Lucy, I wish could be done. If you could give my mother a hint that, at all events, she had better persuade Louisa to marry and go abroad for awhile, I should be very glad. Louisa would do it, I am sure, if she's asked, and my mother can always coax her to do a thing, if she takes the right way. If young John Blackmore, too, were gone, it would be all the better. Maltby, I am afraid, they can't get hold of, for I have heard that they have shut him up."

"But do you think Miss Charlton will consent?" asked Lucy, doubtingly; "she is not with Mrs. Charlton now, you know."

"The devil she isn't!" cried her husband; "I suppose, then, my mother has quarrelled with her like a fool; but I'm sure, after all, Louisa could be persuaded, for she could never wish me to be condemned when I am innocent."

He said the words boldly enough, for he had accustomed himself to the assertion, and even to the lawyer who had visited him, to prepare his defence, he had never admitted the fact of his guilt. Nevertheless, there was some slight hesitation observable as he spoke; and Lucy asked, in a low and anxious tone, while her heart sank with doubt as to what his answer might be, "And are you really innocent, indeed, Alfred?"

Not more than a fortnight before, such a question would have cast her husband into a fearful state of agitation, for remorse at that time had mingled with apprehension; but selfishness had now resumed her full sway, and his only thought was to save himself, whatever might be the means required. He answered, then, vehemently, almost eagerly, "To be sure I am. How could you ever doubt it, girl? It is only that appearances may be against me. I can tell you, Lucy, there's many an innocent man in England hanged upon what they call circumstantial evidence; and here, because two or three things are proved, which might have had something to do with the robbery, but which could be easily accounted for, I am already treated like a guilty person, and should very likely be found guilty by the jury."

Lucy replied nothing, but murmured to herself, "Thank God!—thank God!"

"Thank God that I am likely to be hanged!" exclaimed Alfred Latimer.

"No, no!" she cried, placing her hands upon his arm—"thank God that you are innocent, Alfred."

"You should never have doubted it!" he answered, pushing her from him; "but that does not matter," he continued; "you tell my mother what I say, bid her go on with what she's about with Tankerville; but in case the worst comes to the worst, let her get Louisa out of the way as soon as possible; she can easily manage it if she tries, and then it will be pretty nearly all sure."

Lucy was pained, for every moment showed her more clearly that he thought of nothing but himself; but still the increasing assurance that he was innocent was the greatest of comforts to her. Whatever she might have to suffer herself—whatever he might make her undergo—whatever his harshness, or the selfishness that she too clearly perceived, might inflict upon her—she could bear with calmness, with fortitude, with resignation, provided the awful fear was removed from her mind that she was willingly aiding the escape of her father's murderer.

And after having made him repeat all his instructions, she again took leave of him to depart. A momentary fit of tenderness seized him at the last instant of her stay; and he even so far forgot himself as to ask her to remain a little longer. Did I say he forgot himself!—perhaps it was wrong to say so; for, after all, it was but a softer kind of selfishness, less hard, less brutal than the other. He felt a comfort, a relief, in her society. There was something in the clinging affection of the poor girl, in her devotion to him in that hour of peril, that seemed to cheer and mitigate the dark solitude of crime. It seemed as if, while she was there—with her love and her tenderness—she who had no share in the deeds he had done—that he was not so utterly separated by the darkness of his crime from the rest of human creatures—that the barrier was not so completely fixed against him—that there was something innocent, and good, and true, that loved him yet, and it was a mighty consolation. He seated himself by her—he threw his arms round her—he leaned his head upon her shoulder, while her hand lay clasped in his; and as they were thus placed, one of the jailers suddenly entered, perhaps with some doubt as to what might be the object of Lucy's visit. All seemed natural and easy, however—both started at the interruption, and Alfred Latimer withdrew his arm; and the turnkey, making some excuse for his entrance, returned to the rooms of the governor, from which he had come. Shortly after Lucy quitted the prison; but this time she went on foot, and took her way towards the best inn in the place.

CHAPTER XCI.

The Bell at Sturton was, as the reader is aware, a large and handsome inn. It had multitudes of bed-rooms, it had multitudes of sitting-rooms, multitudes of waiters and chamber-maids, and, amongst all its multitudes, the greatest was the multitude of bells. There they hung in three tremendous long rows; and had the bell-hanger but possessed a musical ear, and arranged them properly, and with due discretion, one might have heard, when the house was full, some of the finest pieces of music that Beethoven or Haydn ever produced, played from morning till night. There were eight full octaves, and they surely might have been put to a much more harmonious purpose than they were by the guests who continued ringing the changes upon them all day long. I throw this out as a hint to all future keepers of great inns, or possessors of large flocks of sheep. Depend upon it, if they but arrange their bells, in thirds and fifths, there would be much more harmony in their several establishments.

The great bell of the Bell, however, was the bell of the house-door, which was so sized and situated that every waiter and every chamber-maid, unless deep in wine, love, or sleep, could not avoid hearing it, wherever he or she might be, from the remote garret of Boots down to the profound storehouses of Bacchus.

One night, about the period of which we have just been writing, towards half-past nine, post-meridiem, that great bell rang vehemently. The roll of wheels had previously called forth the ostler, and now, out of sundry chambers, darted two or three waiters in black silk-stockings, like spiders darting along the toils at the first touch of a fly's foot. The glass doors were thrown open, the landlord himself was summoned, and the housekeeper lighted a bed-candle. The first object that presented itself to the eyes of landlord and waiters, when they rushed out upon the step, was a traveling chariot of somewhat antique construction, and apparently of a green color. The lamps were lighted, and the postboy stood beside his horses already undoing the harness. Ostler was in a hurry to call out "horses on," but the head-waiter opened the door of the vehicle, politely saying, "Won't you please to alight, sir?"

"What's o'clock?" said a voice from within. The waiter took a step back, looked at his watch by the light in the hall, saw the time, added half an hour, to give the inn a better chance, and replied, "Ten o'clock, sir."

"Then I'll stop here to-night," replied the gentleman from within; "though, dickory, dickory, dock, the mouse must have run up the clock, for it was only eight when we left, and that's but ten miles."

"This way, sir, this way," said the waiter, without any reply to the gentleman's last observation. But our good friend, Mr. Quatterly, who stepped out of the carriage as the man spoke, did not think fit to follow him immediately, but remained for the space of about three minutes, paying the postboy, and seeing sundry tin-cases and small green leather boxes, which he had with him in the interior of the carriage, safely brought out and carried on before him. He then duly followed where the waiter led, Mr. Gatton's housekeeper exclaiming "Number forty-two, Jackson," as the party passed; and, ushered up to the first floor, Mr. Quatterly was introduced into a sitting-room, the neatness of which, together with the sparkling fire in the grate, were very satisfactory to his corporeal feelings. He looked at his watch, nevertheless; it was a large, round, turnip-shaped commodity, which told the time with great exactness, and shaking his finger at the waiter, he exclaimed, "You vagabond! you said it was ten o'clock, and it wants twenty minutes."

"Bless my heart, sir," cried the waiter, twitching out his own chronometer, as if horribly shocked at the thought of such an error, and then looking confounded, he added, "Really, I beg pardon, sir, I made a mistake, that light there below is so wery bad. Will you take tea or supper, sir?"

"Ay, I understand, I understand," said Mr. Quatterly, good-humoredly, "but you shall have sixpence less for cheating me. I thought we couldn't have taken all that time, or I must have been dreaming, like David Dribble, who dreamed he drove a dragon, for it seemed as if the horses were going as fast as they could—tea or supper! I'll have dinner first, if you please, for I have not put a morsel between my grinders since seven o'clock this morning. Let me have what can be soonest ready—a little soup, no fish—I hate fish in the midland counties, and anything else that the house can afford, together with a bottle of sherry and an apple-tart, not baked above three days, if you please, Mr. Waiter."

"Baked this morning, sir," said the waiter.

"At ten o'clock?" inquired Mr. Quatterly, slily. "Now be so good as to put those boxes in order upon that table—regularly, regularly, if you please; the big ones behind, the little ones before; the light companies in front, and the grenadiers behind. And now show me my bed-room. I always like to see the thing I have got to lie upon."

"This way, sir, this way," said the waiter. "Chambermaid, forty-nine." And candle in hand, he lighted Mr. Quatterly about ten steps along the passage, towards the door of a bed-room on the opposite side. In ten steps, however, very wonderful things may happen, and in this instance something did happen which surprised Mr. Quatterly a good deal. A door opened on the same side as his own sitting-room, and a head and face, with a part of the body, appeared at the aperture. Mr. Quatterly saw the countenance distinctly, for the waiter held the light in a very illuminating direction, and there were the precise and identical features of his worthy and accomplished friend, Captain Tankerville, which, though withdrawn again as soon as seen, produced from Mr. Quatterly's chest the significant interjection, "Ah, ah!"

"Sir!" said the waiter.

"Number forty-five," said Mr. Quatterly, "who's staying in forty-five, waiter?"

"Mrs. Charlton, sir, the Honorable Mrs. Charlton," replied the officer in black silk stockings.

"Ah! when the pie was opened the birds began to sing," said Mr. Quatterly, and without any more pellucid comment upon the information he had received, the worthy solicitor followed the waiter and the chambermaid, by whom they were just then joined, into the bedroom, examined the bed, ordered the mattress to be put uppermost, called the chambermaid "my dear," and then returned to his sitting-room, pausing every second step to think for a moment. When he had reached the door, his cogitation seemed to have arrived at some result, for he turned to the waiter, saying, "Get the dinner, and serve it. I shall be back by the time it is on the table. And going into the room he took his hat, and issued forth from the inn on foot.

In the streets of Sturton Mr. Quatterly walked on, looking to the right and left at the different houses he passed, as if he were enjoying a strange town—one of the greatest pleasures to a thoughtful man that can be conceived. It is so full of mysteries, so replete with work for the imagination, that I could easily find an excuse for a man spending his whole life in visiting strange towns, even if he never saw any more of them than the outsides of the houses. However, Mr. Quatterly, it would appear, was differently occupied, and after having gone for a couple of hundred yards, or somewhat more, he crossed over to a chemist's shop, which was one of the few that was open in the place, and walked in, with a low bow to the proprietor thereof, who was standing taking leave of his goods and chattels for the night.

"Pray, sir," he said, "can you inform me where the mayor is to be found? and, if not, which is the house of the nearest magistrate?" The chemist did both, and the magistrate's dwelling being near at hand, and the mayor's far away, Mr. Quatterly proceeded to the door of the former, and was soon after admitted. His visit was not long, for in about five minutes he issued forth again, and, in all, was about a quarter of an hour absent from the inn. His dinner did not seem to have made much progress during his absence, for the cloth was still unlaid. But all was bustle as soon as he summoned the waiters by the bell, and in about ten minutes more the soup was before him. That part of the feast was discussed, and Mr. Quatterly was entering upon the wing of a fowl, when one of the host of waiters came in, and inquired, "Pray, sir, is your name Quatterly?"

"It used to be," replied the worthy solicitor, "and if it has been changed, it was done without my consent."

"Mrs. Charlton, sir," said the waiter, "would be glad to speak with you for a few minutes, with her compliments."

"Well, then," answered Mr. Quatterly, "pray tell Mrs. Charlton, my friend, that I am particularly occupied at this moment, but that I will wait upon her in a quarter of an hour, with my compliments;" and Mr. Quatterly applied himself to his meal again with all due devotion. He did not eat much, it is true, but what he did eat was with a right good will, and he added four glasses of sherry to the meal, and a glass and a half to the apple tart, then raising himself, and rubbing his hands, he thanked heaven for a good meal, and directed the waiter to inform Mrs. Charlton that he was ready to attend her. The lady sent back word that she was eager to see him as soon as he could come, and the minute after Mr. Quatterly entered the sitting-room number forty-five.

With one of her sweetest and most engaging smiles, and the utmost courtesy of demeanor, the lady received her guest, and declared that she was delighted to see him, besought him to take a seat by her on the sofa, and spared no blandishments to produce a favorable impression. But as we have shown before, Mr. Quatterly combined with very great simplicity of manners, and a peculiar fondness for many very juvenile things, a shrewd and keen intellect, great knowledge of the world, and a vast experience of rogues and vagabonds of every class and degree; and all Mrs. Charlton's arts were lost upon him, for he saw through and through her, as if she had been a piece of rock crystal cut and polished. "Delighted, my dear madam," he replied, "to renew my acquaintance with you under less disagreeable circumstances than those with which it commenced. I trust I see you in good health."

"As well as I can be expected to be," replied the lady. "Ah, that was a terrible day, indeed, Mr. Quatterly. I was quite beside myself, but even the timid pigeon, you know, will peck when its young ones are assailed."

"The hen pigeon, madam," replied Mr. Quatterly, somewhat dryly; "but I did not think you were beside yourself at all. You seemed to me to do it all very well."

Mrs. Charlton did not altogether like his answer. Some people are not well pleased to have their characters fully understood, and after pausing for a moment, and nibbling her pretty lip, she said "I was very glad to hear from a friend that you were here, Mr. Quatterly, for I thought that you might be the means"——

"I beg your pardon for interrupting you," replied the solicitor, "but the friend, I presume, is Captain Tankerville."

"Ye—s," said Mrs. Charlton, with some hesitation, "poor man, he is—he is," and there she stopped.

"Exactly, ma'am," rejoined Mr. Quatterly, ending the sentence for her, "he is a swindler, ma'am, and a felon."

"Good gracious, I hope not!" exclaimed Mrs. Charlton, in affected surprise and consternation; "he seemed to take a great deal of interest in my son, and so"—— "It is exactly as I say, my dear madam," replied Mr. Quatterly. "Your son, I beg leave to say, he pigeoned in the most egregious manner, and was one of those who greatly aided to lead him or drive him into acts which have produced his present unpleasant situation. As for himself, I am sorry for him, poor fellow, for he has been but a tool in the hands of others, I am quite sure."

"I can assure you he is perfectly innocent," said Mrs. Charlton, earnestly, "that is to say of the offences with which he is charged. That he was very culpable in going out at night to shoot the earl's game I admit, but that was his only offence."

"Then let it be his defence likewise, my dear madam," answered the solicitor; "prove that, and he's quite safe."

"But how can one prove it?" demanded the lady. "Meeting with these men on his way back, he crossed over in the boat without knowing anything of what they had done. But who could suppose, for a moment, my dear Mr. Quatterly, that any one would go and marry in the morning the daughter of a man he had murdered at night?"

"It is not a usual proceeding, indeed," answered the solicitor; "and I trust it may be, as you say, impossible. Nevertheless, his situation is, indeed, very awkward, and how he is to get out of it, I don't see. It will depend upon thirteen contingencies, namely, twelve jurors and the judge. A hanging judge and a hungry jury are hard things to deal with. But we may have something more favorable in this case, and I trust such may be the result, not alone for your sake, but for that of Miss Charlton, to whom the whole business must be most painful."

"Ay, that is just what I wanted to speak to you about, Mr. Quatterly," said the lady; "it will be very terrible to poor dear Louisa, and still more to Alfred, who has ever looked upon her as a sister, to see her appear as a witness against him, whose testimony will be very likely to turn the scale, and doom him to death. Do you not think, Mr. Quatterly, that it would be much better for her, and for all parties, if she were at once to give her hand to Lord Mallington, and take a little tour on the continent. It would do the health of both good, I am sure."

"May I ask, madam, if you consult me as a friend, a lawyer, or a physician?" inquired Mr. Quatterly."

The natural impulse of Mrs. Charlton's art, if I may use such a contradictory expression, would have led her to reply at once, "Oh! as a friend, of course," but a moment's thought stopped the words on her lips, and she said "as a solicitor."

"Six-and-eightpence, then, madam," said Mr. Quatterly, dryly; and Mrs. Charlton, with a smile, took out her purse, and laid seven shillings on the table. The worthy solicitor swept it up, put it in one huge pocket, and drew forth fourpence from the other, which he duly handed across to the lady. "Now, madam," he said, "I am your lawyer, and in that capacity I beg leave to reply, that the very best thing for your son, be he guilty or innocent, would be to get some of the witnesses out of the way, especially Miss Charlton. The lad Blackmore is another who may be disposed of with advantage, and those are the only two you can deal with. But you must excuse me if I decline to undertake the operative part of the affair, as it is out of my practice. I can't blame you if you do it, but I should blame myself very much if I did."

"But surely, my dear Mr. Quatterly, you will not refuse to take a message from me to Louisa and the earl," said Mrs. Charlton, "or to urge them most strongly to hasten their nuptials, for which they have my fullest consent—and—and—"

"And go to the continent," said Mr. Quatterly. "Well, my dear madam, I will take the message, and though I do not promise to urge them most strongly, yet I will say nothing against it."

"Oh, pray do urge them," said Mrs. Charlton, eagerly; "I am sure a word from you would do a great deal."

"My dear madam," rejoined the solicitor, "I never yet saw a man whom it was necessary to urge to take a glass of wine if he was thirsty, and liked wine, or to take a walk if it was a fine day, and he liked walking; no, nor any two young people either, who were in love with each other, to marry at once, if there was not the slightest impediment in nature. I, therefore, think your proposition has a very good chance, even if it come plain and unadorned from my lips."

Mrs. Charlton mused for an instant, and then replied, as Mr. Quatterly rose and stood before her, about to depart, "I am sure you will do what you can; but now tell me about Captain Tankerville."

"I have nothing to tell, my dear madam," replied Mr. Quatterly; "you have his character, according to my best powers of portraiture—he's a swindler and a felon. He fleeced your son, and he's now fleecing you, I suspect; or at least would be if he wern't in jail, which he is by this time, if the magistrates have done their duty."

"Good gracious!" cried Mrs. Charlton; "I can hardly believe he's such a character."

"The powers of credulity required are not very great," replied the solicitor; "but nevertheless, it is so. And now, my dear madam, good night, for I have a great many papers to look over."

"Well, thank God!" said Mrs. Charlton, as soon as Mr. Quatterly was gone, "I have seen both the porter and the turnkey myself, and know where to find them, and how to deal with them, so it's no great matter. If he's in jail, it will save money."

CHAPTER XCII

The morning was bright and beautiful, though an occasional shower, more like one of those which checker the sunshine of an April day, swept over the sky, and passed away again, leaving the whole world sparkling. Breakfast was just over at the rectory; Dr. Western had gone into his library to speak to some of his poor; Mrs. Evelyn had retired from the breakfast-room, whether on business or from discretion I cannot tell; and Morton and Louisa stood together at the window, gazing over the pleasant scene before their eyes, catching the glistening river through a break in the shrubs, and gaining a view beyond that again of Mallington Park, with its sweeps of woodland, and wide broken lawns, and a gray angle of the hall itself appearing from behind a mass of giant chesnuts perched upon a gentle rise. It was natural for Louisa's mind to be led on by the sight she beheld into the future with which it associated itself. There was to be the dwelling of her after years—there was the ancestral mansion of him she loved so deeply—there the spot in which all the bright imaginations of youth, all the fond visions of affection, congregated themselves before the eye of hope. Was it unnatural that, with so many dark and painful circumstances as then surrounded her, she should feel a yearning for the coming time—a longing to hurry forward to the period when the cloud should be passed away, and the sun shine all bright again? It is seldom, very seldom that the bright fancies of early love, that all the ornaments and gay colors with which we decorate the object of early affection, are found to retain their lustre after the first glow of enthusiasm has passed. Seldom indeed that the qualities which we attribute to the being whom we love are not found, more or less, to be the work of our own imagination. But it had not been so with Louisa and with Morton. His character, like his circumstances, had only seemed the brighter from every day that passed. He had come to her in lowly guise, without pretensions and without claim; he had won her regard as a simple gentleman, with no ostensible title to aspire to the hand of the rich heiress; and it was not till that hand was promised that she had learned that he was the possessor of wealth superior to her own, and of claims to a rank which she never dreamed of seeking. Thus, too, with his heart and mind, the treasures with which they were stored, the true nobility with which they were dignified, had revealed themselves by degrees. Plain and unaffected in manner, seeking neither to dazzle nor to strike, hiding rather than revealing the richer things within, every day he had grown upon her affection, and advanced in her esteem. At the same time he, on his part, summed up all his feelings towards her by saying that he had come to Mallington in search of an idle name, and had found a real treasure by the way. Loved her he certainly had from a very early period of their acquaintance. He had soon learned to think her the most beautiful, and what is of more importance, the most interesting being he had ever beheld; but now such sensations had warmed by intimacy into a passion as ardent as it was deep, and as he stood there and gazed with her from the window on the scene I have described, he felt even a more eager longing than she did to hasten forward to the time when the tie that was to unite them for ever should be theirs, and every cold restraint and worldly barrier done away. They spoke not, indeed, of such sensations, though their conversation might glance to the future even while dealing with the things of the present; yet if eyes are books in which men can read the secrets of the heart, there were looks that told the tale of what was passing in the bosoms of each, even while they were talking of more indifferent things.

What might have been said next I cannot tell, but certainly a more propitious moment could not have been found for any proposal that might tend to hasten their union, but as they were still gazing forth, and speaking of the changes and improvements that were by this time going on at Mallington Park, the green chariot of worthy Mr. Quatterly drove in through the gates, and stopped at the door before their eyes. His voice was then heard in the hall, giving various directions for the safe custody of the numerous little boxes which the chariot contained, and the next moment he was ushered into the room by Dr. Western's old servant, one of whose arms was heavily laden with the cases by which the worthy solicitor set such store. With an air of mock ceremony and reverence, Mr. Quatterly advanced towards the young nobleman, bowing profoundly, and then taking Morton's extended hand, he shook it heartily, seizing upon Louisa's next, and gallantly raising it to his lips.

"My lord," he said, "I have the honor of informing your lordship that all your lordship's affairs are finally wound up, settled, and arranged. You are now, my lord, recognized by all parties as the undisputed possessor, in fee simple, of the Mallington Hall estate, as both heir at law and next of kin to the late Earl of Mallington, to every stiver of whose real and personal estate, goods, chattels, messuages, tenements, and effects, of every kind, sort, or description whatsoever, your lordship has an indisputable, an undisputed claim, as well as to the style, title, and honors, with all the rights and privileges thereunto appertaining of Earl of Mallington, as I am ready to prove by the contents of those green boxes, and upon which I sincerely congratulate your lordship."

"There's an harangue," he continued, turning to Louisa, while Morton inquired, "But what's in the red box, my dear friend. I hope nothing of the Pandora kind."

"Faith, I don't know," answered Mr. Quatterly; "let's see—yes, that's the right one. But there are two more which he has not brought in. In this, my lord, there is a very dangerous document. I scarcely dare to pronounce the name of it in a lady's presence—it is a draft neither for money nor of wine, but of a thing which I will whisper in this fair lady's ear, lest she should be too terribly shocked—a marriage settlement," said Mr. Quatterly. "Having received a hint that such a thing might be needful, I thought there could be no harm in having a little conversation on the subject with my friend Quin, the solicitor of the guardians and executors. The whole matter was settled with the most illegal haste and irregular rapidity. The draft made as short as possible, much to my own loss, and that of my clerks, laid before Bell, flaws discovered and corrected, the deed engrossed, and the draft lies at the top, and the parchment at the bottom; if it is not wanted it can't be helped," and Mr. Quatterly rubbed his hands and chuckled.

"Shall we look at the papers, Louisa?" said Morton with a smile.

"Oh, no, no, Edmond," she replied; "I can have nothing to do with them."

"Oh, but you must have to do with them, sweet lady, as far as signing them goes," answered Mr. Quatterly; "as to all the rest, I believe that can be settled between myself and Dr. Western. This noble personage's instructions I received before, and they have been attended to to the letter."

"The annuity?" asked Morton.

"Yes," replied Mr. Quatterly, "a thousand a year extra, which is nine hundred and ninety-nine pounds, some shillings, more than she deserves. However, I have nothing more to do but to obey. Don't let me forget, though, that I have a proposal to make from her to you two young people. I saw her last night at Sturton, you must know, consorting with a certain Captain Tankerville, whom I have taken care shall be laid in limbo again. That's one good thing done, and this time I have so framed my charge that he will be transported for life, not hanged, as would have been the case if I had pursued the other business—I'm not fond of hanging people, my dear. I can't even bear to see a mouse caught in a mouse-trap, its large black eyes look so reproachfully at one."

Louisa's face grew grave in a moment, and Morton inquired "But what of Mrs. Charlton? Any new demand, I wonder?"

"Oh dear, no," answered Mr. Quatterly; "a simple suggestion, conceived in the most tender and considerate spirit, with a regard to the eagerness and impatience of two young people on the eve of marriage. She proposes, my dear lady, that you and this noble lord should, with her full consent and approbation, be linked together in Hymen's fetters without the least delay or hesitation, and take what is called the wedding tour—as if matrimony were nothing better than a roundabout at a fair—on the continent, or to any other sweet and delectable spot, at a distance, that you may fix upon."

Morton smiled, but Louisa looked gravely up, saying, "But that is impossible, you know, my dear sir, for I shall have to appear at this dreadful trial."

Mr. Quatterly took Louisa's hand in his, and gazed at her with a kind and an affectionate look, while he replied, "That is just what Mrs. Charlton wishes to prevent, my dear lady; and as she has a glorious and penetrating view into human nature, she judged that such a proposal would neither be very unpleasant to you, nor to my noble friend here."

Louisa moved to the table, and seated herself, leaning her brow upon her hand; and for several minutes she made no reply, while Morton gazed at her, feeling the struggle which was going on in her breast the more from that which was taking place in his own. After a long pause, he approached and took her hand, and Louisa, looking up in his face, suffered him to see that her beautiful eyes were full of tears. "What shall I say, Edmond?" she inquired, in a low tone. Before he could answer, however, Dr. Western entered the room, and Louisa turned towards him, as her best and secret adviser, but when the matter was explained, it proved that the worthy rector brought no decision into the council, for he was as much embarrassed as any one.

"You must not ask me, my love, you must not ask me," he said; "I feel deeply for you, Louisa, I feel deeply for the unhappy woman herself, but—no, you must not ask me. It is a difficult case."

Louisa turned again to Morton, and he replied, in answer to her look, for she spoke not, "I am as much embarrassed as yourself, dear one. Were I to give way to the feelings of my heart, I should say 'Come at once, let our marriage take place without delay, and leave the rest to fate.' I do not know that one is called upon to sacrifice every feeling of the heart in such a case as this; but I will not enter into any casuistry, for I feel I am too much prejudiced by my own wishes."

"Well spoken, Lucius Junius Brutus!" said Mr. Quatterly. "I suppose I must say a word, though I told the good lady I would not. Remember, however, I don't speak as a lawyer; and, moreover, remember, I don't speak as a magistrate, but merely as a friend, and as your friend, fair lady, more than even his. In the first place, then, let me tell you, that it isn't for the sake of Mrs. Charlton I speak—no, nor for that young scamp, her son—but for you, my dear. My own opinion is, that for you to go into the witness-box, in a public court of justice, to give evidence against one who has called you sister—to endure the badgering and insinuations of cross-examination by a clever counsel—and, after all, to think, throughout your life, that your testimony went far to doom this young man to death, would well nigh kill you; and if it did not at once, would injure your health for years."

"It would," replied Louisa; "of that I am well aware."

"Then the question is settled," said Morton; "I join my voice to his, and say, 'Let us go, Louisa.'"

"I will put it in another point of view," said Mr. Quatterly. "You are bound down in recognizances to appear and give evidence. The law itself has, therefore, fixed your responsibility at a certain sum of money; if you choose to sacrifice that, the law has nothing to say to you. So much for the law of the question; and, in good faith and truth, I can't help thinking that you have no occasion to deal more hardly with yourself than the law does."

"With me there is but one question," said Morton, "what may be the effect of this upon your own health and happiness, Louisa. If they are both likely to suffer in a serious degree, I must hold that you are not bound to risk such a result. I trust I am unprejudiced in what I say—at least, I try to be so."

"You know, Edmond," replied Louisa—laying her hand upon his, and looking up in his face—"that I am not one to yield weakly; and if it be right to stay and give evidence, I will do it at any risk; but I will acknowledge that the very thought of standing in a court of justice, and saying those things which, however true, may deprive Alfred Latimer of life, terrifies me, and takes my courage from me. I believe that I should hardly quit the court alive; and I am quite sure that if anything I said were to produce the effect of his condemnation and execution, a gloom would come over my whole life which I could never shake off. The idea that I was right and just would, I fear, have very little power in consoling me; for we women, I believe, can seldom look at the simple question of justice as men do; and if there were any doubt also—if he persisted in denying his guilt to the last—I am very much afraid my own weakness would sometimes make me look upon myself as his murderer—Oh, it would be very horrible!—and yet, and yet, I fear that he is guilty!"

"I don't know," said Mr. Quatterly; "as the case stands at present he will be hanged to a certainty; but that does not at all prove that he is guilty, for there is a great deal of hanging honest men in England; and the palladium of English liberty, the trial by jury, is very much like tossing up a penny—heads win, tails lose. His defence is, I find, that he was out poaching on your manors, my lord—that he got his hands and his clothes stained with the blood of some bird or beast that he shot, and never was near the house. He says, I find, that he left the game he had procured, in a place called Gammer Mudge's Hole, somewhere in a wood near this place."

"A quantity of game was found there yesterday," said Dr. Western, "quite in the back part of the cave. The constable, who discovered it, says that it is nearly in a state of putrefaction, so that the story may be true. I pray God, that he may be able to prove it."

"He'll be hanged, notwithstanding, I should think," said Mr. Quatterly; "if the evidence remains as it is, and the very fact of this story having been put forward will have the effect which this dear young lady fears, and make her ever fancy that she has aided in condemning an innocent man."

Louisa pressed her hand upon her eyes, and her cheek turned deadly pale; but Morton seated himself beside her, and asked, in a low voice, "May I decide for you, Louisa?"

"Oh, yes, yes!" cried Louisa Charlton; "do, Edmond, do. I shall be quite satisfied and confident that you are right, and whichever way I acted on my own judgment, I should always fear I had been wrong."

"Very well, then," said Morton, turning to Dr. Western, "it only remains for Louisa to fix the day, sometime between this and the first of next month, when I think the assizes commence. Under all circumstances, dear Louisa, I think it will be wise to let the marriage be as private as possible, and, therefore, I shall not regret that all your establishment is not prepared for you, and that we shall go without new carriages and liveries, and wedding favors, and all the et ceteras of a smart bridal."

Louisa looked up, and smiled, but did not reply; and Dr. Western and Mr. Quatterly left the lover and her he loved alone together, while the worthy solicitor carried off the red box, containing the marriage-settlement, into the rector's library, and spread the parchment before him. They were soon after joined by Morton himself, with the news that Louisa had fixed that day week for the wedding; and Dr. Western smiled gravely, not at all doubting that love had not a little to do with the decision at which they had arrived on the difficult question submitted to them.

The dearly beloved reader can have no doubt that they were both exceedingly wrong; that Louisa ought, with unhesitating decision, to have gone into court, and given her evidence against Alfred Latimer, as if he had been a perfect stranger; that the love of public justice should have outweighed every private consideration; and that Themis should have triumphed over not only old associations, womanly weakness, a gentle heart, and a feeble frame, but even over Cupid and Hymen both together. She was very wrong, indeed, there can't be the least doubt of it; but still, I can but tell the story as it happened, and only begging to be remembered that I never set her up as a perfect character, and that I beseech all my lady loves, heroines, and others, not to follow the very bad example that she set them in the present instance.

CHAPTER XCIII.

The inhabitants of Mallington were as happy as heart could wish; for I must now return to give a general glance over the state of the population in that little town, whose interests I have neglected too long. For years, for long years, perhaps never before in the history of the place, had such an inexhaustible fund of amusement and excitement been afforded to the Mallingtonians as the events of the last few months had supplied. Fortune had been prodigal to them and given them abundantly of all her most esteemed stores. In their humility and moderation, a simple highway robbery would have been considered by them, some six months before, as a great treat; but now they had had two people knocked down, a mansion broken into, a murder committed, and a young gentleman, bred up amongst them, lodged in prison, charged with a capital felony. These are what the French cook would call the pièces résistance of the feast; but there were numerous corner and side dishes, such as examinations before magistrates, coroners' inquests, constables galloping and searching, a wounded gentleman, a prospective marriage, and the discovery that Mr. Morton was neither more nor less than the new Earl of Mallington.

Besides all this, there were the various hors d'œuvres of the imagination. To judge from the satisfaction that was seen on every countenance, the bustle and activity displayed by the streets, and the eternal cackle that was going on at different doors, and at different counters, one might have supposed that the whole town, and every individual in it had won a prize in the lottery. There wanted nothing but a fire and a suicide to make their happiness complete.

The Misses Martin, the Crumps, the Dixons, and all the rest of the fraternity, were in a state of high glorification; but the unlearned reader may imagine that Miss Mathilda Martin would have a somewhat difficult card to play, considering how completely all her surmises and prognostications in regard to Mr. Morton had been falsified. A difficult card, indeed, it would have been to any unscientific person; but Mathilda—fair Mathilda!—was a complete mistress of the art and mystery of gossip; and she knew how and when to turn round, and take up the most opposite position to that which she had before assumed—to attribute the insinuations that had been proved false, and the assertions that had been contradicted, to the exact reverse of all the causes in which they had originated, and to vindicate her own claim to infallibility by skillfully proving that she knew the truth the whole time, though, for reasons of her own, she thought fit to conceal it. Oh, blessed and beautiful powers of imagination! what a resource are ye to numerous most industrious classes of society, especially to the rogue, the swindler, the scandal-monger, and the detected gossip! What shifts and turns will ye not supply!—what schemes and plots will ye not furnish!—what evasions and prevarications will ye not provide in a moment! Not even the poet, the romance writer, or the historian—all deeply indebted to you as they are—owe you half so much as Miss Mathilda Martin! When Mr. Crump one day bought half-a-yard of coarse calico at the shop of the two spinsters, for the express purpose of maliciously condoling with Mathilda upon the discovery that Mr. Morton was the exact reverse of all that she had stated him to be, any ordinary mind would have been overthrown, any mere mortal cheek would have blushed—but not so Mathilda Martin—she laughed, she nodded, she winked to her sister; and then, with a sweet giggle, inquired of Mr. Crump, "And do you really think, my good sir, I didn't know?"

"I really can't tell, Miss Martin," replied the gentleman; "all I can speak of is what you said."

"To be sure I said it," answered Miss Mathilda, with a look of compassion, and a toss of the head. "And I did more, Mr. Crump, I went up to Mr. Middleton, and let him know what every one said in the place, as well as myself. But I knew very well, all the time. And are you blind enough not to see why I did this?"

"I am, indeed?" answered Mr. Crump, in some amazement, for his powers were of a very inferior order to Miss Mathilda's.

"Poor man! Well, I'll tell you, then," said the lady, "I knew quite well who he was before he had been here three days—oh, yes, I had good information, I can tell you; and I saw quite well that he had come down here to see what we were like, and to spy us all out in disguise; and I determined that I'd force him to explain himself, and show who he really was. I've no notion of a gentleman—and a nobleman, too—coming down and pretending to be what he is not, just to take poor people in, so I determined he shouldn't carry on that game long—I put down upon a piece of paper who he was a long time ago, and said to those I could trust—see if I am not right?"

Mr. Crump took his half yard of coarse calico, and retreated home, saying to his wife, when he arrived, "She pretends that she knew all about it, and only told all those lies to make him explain himself. But I don't believe a word of it." Neither did Mrs. Crump, nor any one else in the place.

Miss Mathilda, however, as soon as the worthy gentleman had evacuated the shop, turned to her sister with a laugh, saying, "I don't choose those Crumps to get the better of me."

Miss Martin quite agreed in her sister's view of the case; but a new source of satisfaction was about to be opened before them, treading upon the heels of a slight disappointment. Before half an hour was over, some of the neighbors came in to inform them that Alfred Latimer would certainly get off, for that the story he had told was found to be quite true, and that the game he said he had been shooting, and which had blooded his clothes, had been discovered in Gammer Mudge's Hole by Harry Soames, the constable.

This was a terrible shock to the feelings of the Miss Martins, not only because they had hoped with all their hearts to see Alfred Latimer hanged, but because they had predicted years before that his life would terminate by that process, and, consequently, if he escaped, another of their prognostications would fall to the ground. It made them seriously uneasy; it even suggested itself to the mind of Miss Mathilda that it might be as well to supply some little bits of evidence against him from her own copious manufactory. But that she did not dare to do eventually, though she was, as the reader knows, of a bold and adventurous character. She could not altogether, however, refrain from insinuations, and, for once in her life, she did not hit far from the mark. When Mrs. Dixon told her, because she was sure it would mortify her, that Mr. Latimer's acquittal was quite certain now that the game had been found in the cave in Wenlock Wood, Miss Mathilda replied sharply "to the creature," as she always called her, "Pooh, nonsense! of course he got some one to put it there for him." These words of Miss Martin were taken up by Mrs. Dixon, and were repeated, far and wide, during that evening and the next day, throughout Mallington. They did not reach the ears, however, of Mr. Harry Soames till two days after, and as soon as he could, which was not till the next morning, he went into the shop of the Misses Martin in order to hear further particulars, for he looked upon it as some imputation upon his skill and penetration that any one should suppose such a thing possible without his having discovered it.

"So I hear, Miss Mathilda," he said, "that you declare Mr. Latimer has got some one to put the game that I found, in the cave since the murder. Now, I should like to know what evidence you have got upon the subject, for it doesn't do to say such things unless you can prove them, 'specially when a young man's life's at stake."

"Oh, I've got no evidence," said Miss Mathilda, sharply; "I only guessed it was so. It was so likely a thing, it might strike a baby."

"I don't think anything of the kind," answered Mr. Soames. "The game had been there a long time, I'll swear. There were five pheasants and two hares, all stinking; and one had got its head torn off, as if a fox had been at it."

"Just as easy to put stinking game there as fresh," said Miss Mathilda, dryly.

What the constable would have answered cannot be told, for just as he was about to reply, and that somewhat hotly, as it appeared, who should trip in but Mr. Gibbs, with his usually important air still more important than ever. He began by purchasing a number of yards of white muslin for neck-cloths, and while Miss Martin attended to his orders, and cut off, with the aid of her thumb, a quarter of a yard less than she charged him for, Mr. Gibbs turned round and greeted Harry Soames, whom he had not seen for ten days or a fortnight.

"Well, Mr. Gibbs, you have been to London, I suppose," said the worthy constable.

"Yes," answered the traveler; "I went up to account to my employers, and they made a great piece of work at my having remained in these parts so long, although they couldn't deny that I had sold more of the fragrant Balm of Trinidad than either of their three other travelers. They were very unjust, Mr. Soames, both to me and to that precious balsam, whose peculiar quality it is to nourish and revive the growth of the hair, to restore the natural curl, and impart—"

"Well, but how did it all end?" asked Mr. Soames, who had heard all about the Balm of Trinidad more than once before.

"Why, in my resigning, to be sure. What they said was tantamount to a vote of want of confidence, so I instantly tendered my resignation, which was accepted; and, having a slight inkling that something was to be done here, I set off from London immediately, and should have been here yesterday afternoon, had I not stopped at Sturton, to hear all about this new discovery there."

"What new discovery?" asked Mr. Soames. "Do you mean about the game?"

"Game! oh, dear, no," cried Gibbs. "I mean about the receiver of the stolen goods—the fence, as they call him. He's a Jew, and having been taken up on suspicion, has confessed it all. How Williams and Mr. Latimer came to him the night before, and made a bargain with him about the sale of the plate and things they were going to steal."

"There, I told you so!" cried Miss Mathilda Martin. "Why, the whole thing's as plain as the nose in a man's face."

"That depends upon the length of it, my dear madam," said Mr. Gibbs, whose own proboscis was of no very extraordinary extent. "However, what I tell you is quite true. The man was taken up at St. Albans, it having been proved that he was down here at Sturton just at the time, and a great many odd things were found in his chaise. Seeing, I suppose, that he couldn't deny the facts, he thought, as Shakspere says, Miss Martin, to make a merit of necessity, and told the whole."

"Lor! does Shakspere say that, Mr. Gibbs?" cried Miss Martin. "I didn't know that; and so it's all up with Alfred Latimer. I said it would be so, a long time ago, for if there was a bad one, it is he."

"It's all up, indeed," said Gibbs; "this business of the receiver, Levi, has settled that quite, and so the story of the game is proved to be all fudge."

"No fudge about finding the game," muttered Harry Soames, turning to the door of the shop, and out he went, without waiting for the further comments of Miss Mathilda.

"Ah! poor man," said the lady, "he thought he could persuade me that Mr. Latimer was innocent. He's an innocent himself, I believe, to fancy such a thing. He who has known him so long, too."

"Pray, Mr. Gibbs, what do you want the muslin for?" asked the elder Miss Martin. "I only want to know how you would like them hemmed; if it's for neck-handkerchiefs, we can get them done for you."

"You must get them done very quick, Miss Martin," said the traveler, "for I shall want them soon. The truth is, I have just engaged myself in the service of the Earl of Mallington. I am first to act as his groom of the chambers, you know," he added, with a significant look; "we've been in a good many little affairs together; the apprehending those two ruffians, and the like; so each knows his man. I can depend upon him, and he can depend upon me."

"Very true, Mr. Gibbs," said Miss Mathilda; "that's a great advantage, Mr. Gibbs. I hope you won't forget us when you are established at the hall. We shall always be very happy to see you; and though we don't make as much show as some people, who have less substance, perhaps, than we have, yet our goods are of the best quality, and that you may depend upon. And when is my lord to be married, for that's the next thing, I suppose?"

"I really don't know," answered Mr. Gibbs; "as soon as possible, I believe."

Mr. Gibbs spoke the exact truth, for he did not know, Morton and Louisa having settled themselves that it would be better to keep the period of their intended union perfectly secret from all who were not necessarily acquainted with it. But the Misses Martin could never believe that anybody was perfectly candid with them, and they both, therefore, determined to worm the truth out of the worthy traveler, whether he liked it or not.

"Ah, poor things, they will have a long time to wait!" said the elder of the two ladies, "for Miss Charlton will have to give evidence on the trial; and then there will be the execution, you know; and then it won't be decent for her to marry at least for six months after her step-brother has been hanged. I shouldn't wonder if it did not take place at all, for my part. It would not be pleasant, you know, Mr. Gibbs, to hear any one say to his wife, 'Your ladyship's brother, that was hanged!' would it now?"

"Not particularly, I should think," answered Gibbs; "but I don't suppose anybody would say so. It would be grossly indelicate, Miss Martin."

"Now I, for my part," rejoined Mathilda, "should not wonder if it took place immediately. I saw the beautiful new carriage that came down yesterday. It's mighty handsome, that's certain; but very plain, for an earl: no arms, no coronet, nor anything. But I dare say he wouldn't have been in such a hurry to have it down, if he weren't soon going to make use of it."

"And Miss Wilkinson's got a number of things to make, too," said Miss Martin; "and the hall is getting full of servants."

"Oh, he'll not be such a fool as to let the cord stand in the way of the heiress," replied Miss Mathilda, "and if he's a wise man, he'll get it over as soon as possible, and then cut the Latimers altogether. It will be very easy for her ladyship to say, 'the man was no relation of mine.'"

"And true, also," said Mr. Gibbs, "for he is no relation of her's. But as to the marriage, I think you are mistaken, for I found the earl and the young lady sitting quite quietly together, and looking anything but very merry.'

"Oh, that's no sign," rejoined Miss Mathilda, "he always has a grave look; and though she was as gay, lighthearted a thing as one could see before her father took up with this Mrs. Latimer, she has never been so cheerful since that, I will say. See what comes of old men marrying intriguing widows!"

With this moral reflection terminated the more important part of the conversation between Mr. Gibbs and the Misses Martin, and we must now for a time leave the party in the shop, as it may be necessary to show what was the effect produced in other quarters by similar tidings to those which the worthy traveler brought over from Morton to Mallington.

CHAPTER XCIV.

It was just the governor's dinner hour—an hour at which, occupied in a function that had its peculiar delights for him, as well as for many other men, the worthy officer was not likely to disturb himself—when the swivel-eyed turnkey whom Jack Williams had commended to Alfred Latimer's notice, entered the young gentleman's room, and fixing upon him one of his eyes, closed the door quietly behind him, saying "I've got some news for you, sir;" then approaching alone to the table, he continued in a whisper, "That game story is no go, for they've caught Levi, the fence, and he's stagged. It's all out, how you and Jack saw him at the Bell, and made a deal with him about the stuff."

Alfred Latimer struck his hand against his forehead in a fit of rage and despair, but the turnkey took upon himself, on this occasion, an office which turnkeys are not very frequently found to perform. "Pooh, nonsense!" he said, "don't take on so. The matter's not a bit the worse for that, I can tell you; if you had stood the trial, it would have gone hard with your neck, even if the fence had not peached. Why, the judge as is coming down is Sir John ——, and he always sums up agen the prisoner. He keeps the black cap close beside him, and is sure to get it on one way or another afore he's done."

"If I had stood the trial!" exclaimed Alfred Latimer; "I don't understand what you mean. How could I help standing the trial?" and he looked in the man's face, apprehensive lest he had discovered the means employed by Williams and Brown to effect their escape from the jail. The turnkey's countenance, however, was very difficult to read, for the peculiar construction of the eyes, and the impossibility of knowing which of the two was looking at you, rendered the meaning always doubtful. If the one seemed to say one thing, the other said another, so that they neutralized each other.

"Oh, you knows wery well what I means," rejoined the turnkey, winking his right eye; "it's all settled, and if you manages anything sharp, there'll be no more difficulty about it nor drinking a glass of small beer."

"Still I don't understand you," answered Alfred Latimer; "you must give me a hint of what is to be done, or I shall never know how to do it."

"What, hasn't your wife told ye?" asked the turnkey. "Didn't ye see her this arternoon?"

"No," answered Alfred Latimer, "she hasn't been here for these two days."

"Oh yes, she wer, this wery night," rejoined the other; "but I know how it is. There's been a bit of a row about all the liberty granted here. One of the justices has been a-jawing of the governor, and so he's sent her away. I shouldn't wonder, now all this has come out, if they put Williams and Brown in irons again. I don't suppose our gentleman will do that with you, and if he do, we must get 'em off, that's all."

"But what is to be done—how is it to be effected?" demanded the prisoner.

"Stay a bit," said the jailer, and opening the door, he looked up and down the passage to ensure that there was nobody there who might remark his long conference with the young culprit. Having satisfied himself in this respect, he returned to the room again, and proceeded "Why, if you've heard nothing, I must tell you, for we can't get on without your knowing. You see one night last week, when I was off duty, and out at the Green Man a-drinking on a pot of beer, up comes to me a feller they calls Captain Tankerville, and he taps me on the shoulder, and says he wants a word with me. And so he had a word; and then he introduces me to a lady at the Bell, as is your mother—and a mighty cunning lady she is too, as ever I see."

The jailer meant this as a compliment, for shrewdness was in his estimation the highest quality of the female mind. Alfred Latimer received it as it was intended, and merely asked, "Well, well, what was done?"

"Why, we come to terms," replied the swivel-eyed turnkey; "and she bound me down pretty tight, didn't she? But she was free enough of the cash, and that's the principal; so I promised you should see your way out some dark night, and you must keep yourself ready."

"Can't it be to-night?" demanded the prisoner, eager to ensure that no new circumstance might intervene to deprive him of this fresh-sprung hope.

"To-night! Lord 'a mercy, no!" replied the turnkey. "Why, there's nothing ready, and Dick's on night-duty. No, no—wait a bit; there's plenty of time. The day arter to-morrow the governor must go away to Huntingdon, and he'll be away all night. I know quite well that Mallet, who'll be left in charge, will take that minute to get drunk, for he harn't been drunk this half-year, and he can't stand it much longer nor that. Dick, mayhap, will help him; at all events, he'll take more than usual; and if he is frightened to do it outright, we can contrive to hocus the last glass of his grog. Then we shall have all this ward to ourselves; and as the porter is in the job, you'll have nothing to do but to walk out. However, I'll tell you all about it another time. I must be off now, for fear the folks should think something."

Thus saying, he hurried away, and left him to his own meditations. Those meditations, however, were lighter and more joyful than they had been for many a day. He had new hope, looking all the brighter from the darkness out of which it sprung. Previously, although he thought his scheme was well laid, and gave him some chance of a favorable verdict, yet the uncertainty was so great, the probability of condemnation so terrible, that he had not ventured to indulge expectation; and in the plan of Williams and Brown he had placed but little confidence. Now, however, with assistance within the prison, and from the very officers who were bound by their duty to oppose him, his escape seemed certain; and he fancied that, with twelve or fourteen hours before him, and with the means of flight which he knew his mother would have prepared, he anticipated no difficulty in reaching the shores of France, where, at that time, a secure asylum could be obtained.

It may have been remarked by the reader that he made no inquiry of the turnkey as to whether his companions in guilt and misfortune were to benefit with himself in the means to procure his liberation; and the truth is, Alfred Latimer had no intention that they should. Even in the story which he had told, both to the governor of the jail, and to one of the turnkeys, in regard to the game which he said he had left in Wenlock Wood, he had shown no consideration for them, leaving their own share of the transactions of the night of the murder to be explained by them as they best could; and instead of declaring, as he had assured Williams he would, that they had all been out upon the same expedition together, had stated that he met the other two accidentally, and merely asked a passage in their boat. It was not, therefore, to be expected that, on the present occasion, he would pay any great attention to their safety. He determined, then, to keep the whole project which had just been revealed to him a profound secret from his two companions; and when he saw them in the yard, to affect the greatest interest in their scheme for escape, as if he had no other hope but that. We all of us deceive ourselves continually, however, and the cunning and the wily more frequently than the others. We lay our plans, we scheme, we project, we advance in execution, and then comes fate, and throws some little insignificant obstacle in our way, by which all our devices are overthrown.

The next morning early, the governor of the prison came to visit him, with a grave, though civil expression of countenance. "I am sorry to tell you, Mr. Latimer," he said, "that I must make some change in your treatment. I am quite willing to show you any kindness or lenity in my power; but observations have been made, and sharp things said, so that I'm afraid that I must put you in irons, especially after what has come out before the magistrates."

"Good heaven, I hope not!" cried Alfred Latimer, turning very pale; notwithstanding the assurance of the turnkey, that he should soon be freed from those unpleasant appendages, the very idea was horrible to him. "There can be no necessity for such harshness, sir; I have done nothing since I have been here, surely, to make you alter your conduct."

"I can't say you have," replied the other; "and I should not think of doing it myself, but for these visiting justices. It is a great bore to have such a pack of meddling old women always at one's heels, finding fault with this thing one day, and with quite the reverse another. But I can't help myself, Mr. Latimer; and I must either do as I have said, or deny you the liberty of the yard, which would be worse."

"Oh, dear, no!" exclaimed the young man "I would a great deal rather never go out again than have those irons on."

"Well, if you choose to stay in your room," said the governor; "it does not so much matter; but if you were to be seen out in a different way from the other two men charged with you there would be a great piece of work made."

Alfred Latimer repeated earnestly that he greatly preferred confinement to shackles; and after a few more words, the governor left him, little knowing that there was treason in the camp. During the next day, and the day that followed, the prisoner had but small intercourse with his friend the turnkey; though once or twice, when he brought something into the room, the man whispered words of consolation, such as, "It's all right"—"Keep a good heart"—"To-morrow night will do. Mind you be ready."

On the night of the same day, however—when Mrs. Charlton's son had lain down to rest, and, as near as he could guess, about two o'clock in the morning—he was aroused from sleep by hearing the door unlocked, and looking towards it, he perceived his squinting friend entering with a lantern in his hand. Approaching his bed-side, the man set down the light, and seated himself, saying "I'm on night-duty this evening, so I just came to tell you how all was settled. To-morrow there will be a chaise waiting for you at the end of the bridge, so, as soon as you are out, make for it direct, and then off wherever you like. It's brought from a great distance, so no one will know anything of which way it goes."

"Ay, but how to get out of this place is the difficult matter," replied Alfred Latimer; "how is that to be done, if one of your comrades will be on duty?"

"Never you mind that," answered the man; "I'll manage Dick; only you be ready, and mind what I say. He'll go his round about twelve, and most likely take a look in. You had better be a bed, and asleep. Then, a little while after, you'll hear the door unlocked, and the bolts undrawn; but don't you take no notice, case of accidents. Wait five minutes, and then go down the passage into the yard—you know the way—and you'll find the door open. Then cross to t'other door, where you've often seen me a-standing, what I call watching my lambs at play. Go through that into t'other yard, and then straight through the lodge—it's just up the steps, you know, on the right hand; mind you don't make a mistake."

"No, no!" answered Alfred Latimer, "I know it quite well; that's the way I was brought in."

"Ay, you're the man that has got an eye for the country," answered the turnkey; "well, you'll find both the wicket and the gate open, and nobody there to say anything to you, so just walk out, and it's all done. Everything will be made snug as soon as you are gone, and they'll never find it out till breakfast time to-morrow."

"And what'll become of Williams and Brown?" asked Alfred Latimer, more to say something, than from any great interest in their fate.

"Why, they'll be hanged, you see," said the turnkey, with a laugh; "but they're mighty angry with you. I can tell you; for some of the fellers let them into what you said about meeting them accidentally in the park, after you had prigged the game; and I hear as how Jack Williams says, if you tell that story in court, he'll knock your brains out against the side of the dock; but you'll not need to say it in court, I've a notion," and the man laughed again. Alfred Latimer joined in his merriment; and, after repeating all his directions very distinctly, the turnkey left him.

Little sleep did the prisoner obtain that night, and the next day also passed in the uneasiness of expectation mingled with apprehension. Towards evening, however, various little signs of irregularity showed him that the governor was absent, as had been predicted he would be. The meals were brought half an hour behind the usual time; there was more noise and bustle than was common in the prison; and the turnkeys whistled as they walked along the passage. But time slipped away, one hour passed after another, and the clock of the neighboring church, which had so often told to the ear of the culprit that the few last moments of existence were waning fast, now marked for Alfred Latimer the approach of the period appointed for his liberation; and when at length it struck eleven, he threw down some clothes by the bedside to make it seem as if he had undressed, and then crept in between the sheets, just as he was, without even taking off his boots. Scarcely had he been half an hour in bed when the sound of an irregular footfall, and of a voice, half humming, half singing one of the common slang songs of the day, was heard coming along the passage. In a minute or two after, the door was opened, and Dick, the turnkey, looked in, with his lantern in his hand; and, raising his head, Alfred Latimer could easily perceive that the good man had already taken more of some potent liquor than was quite consistent with the proper execution of his functions.

"Ah, you're a-bed, are you?" he said, with a hiccup, "you're generally one of the late 'uns, as all them are who have candles and such stuff allowed them. If I were governor, they should all be treated alike, every man of them, rich and poor, smasher and flasher, diddler and devil.

"Ye prads, ye scamps, ye divers,
And all upon the lay,
In Tothill fields' blithe sheep-walks,
Like lambs that sport and play
O, rattling up your darbies,
Come hither at my call,
I'm jigger, dubber, here,
So you're welcome to Mill Doll.
Tol de rol de rol."

And, singing this very elegant composition, Dick, the turnkey, retired from the room, locked and bolted the door, and walked away.

Alfred Latimer lay and listened for every passing sound, but the hour of twelve struck, one and two followed, and no one approached his door. Apprehensions took possession of his mind, and all the phantasmagoria shapes of imagination passed before his eyes. Now he thought that his confederate had forgotten him—now, that some obstacle had occurred, and that the attempt must be postponed—now, that the whole had been discovered, and the plan frustrated—now that his mother and himself had been deceived, the money taken, and the act unperformed! Thus, till half-past two, he lay and tormented himself, glancing with a sinking heart towards the future, but seeing nothing before him but the just and terrible retribution of his crimes. At length there was a step, slow and deliberate, along the passage; he heard two other doors tried, and then the footfall came nearer. A key was placed in the lock with as little noise as possible, it was turned, the bolts withdrawn, and the step moved on again, the sound being soon lost as it retreated. For nearly five minutes he lay and listened, then rose, and, approaching the door, put his ear to the key-hole. All was silent, and, opening the door quietly, he looked out. There was a lantern, as usual, hung against the wall, half-way down the passage, but no other object met his eye, and after returning for a moment to take his hat, he stole silently out, proceeded to the door at the end of the corridor, which was unlocked, and then down six steps to another door, which led into the yard; it also was unlocked, but as he drew it back it creaked sharply upon the hinges, and Alfred Latimer paused for a moment or two, dreading that the sound might have called attention. As all remained silent, however, he ventured to go out, and walked on tiptoes across the yard. The night was very dark, the moon shone not, and no stars were to be seen, but he knew the way well, and hurrying on through the doorway, into the outer yard, advanced towards the lodge.

The door was ajar, and a light was burning within, and, mounting the steps, the prisoner peeped in, gaining a clear view of the interior by the light of a long-unsnuffed candle, which stood upon the table. No person was to be seen, and, opening the door farther, he advanced somewhat hurriedly, fancying he heard a step behind him. The wicket was open, but the outer door was closed, and locked; the key, however, was in the inside, and, with a shaking hand, the young malefactor turned it, and was about to open the door. A bolt, below, which he had not observed, had to be drawn first, and he was stooping down to pull it back when he heard a clank and a step, and a strong hand grasped him by the neck.

Starting up, and shaking himself free, he turned round, and beheld his companion in crime, Williams, with a look of dark and bitter determination upon his face.

"You villain and you blackguard!" cried the man, again seizing him by the throat. "So you thought to sneak off in this way, did you?"

"Hush, hush!" cried Alfred Latimer; "if you would save your own life and mine, be silent, and come with me."

"What, with these on!" cried Williams, aloud, glancing at his irons. "No?" and he added a blasphemous oath—"and if I don't serve you, as you served Edmonds," and he made a great effort to dash him against the wall. Alfred Latimer, however, was strongly made, and Williams was encumbered by his fetters; but the struggle was now evidently to be for life or death, and grappling with him, and putting forth all his vigor and activity, the young culprit endeavored to thrust him beyond the wicket, and close it against him, while he made his escape by the door. With a grasp of iron, however, Williams clung to him, now dragging him forward, now thrusting him back; and thus in terrible but silent strife they reeled about upon the floor, sometimes hurling each other against the wall, sometimes against the porter's bed, till at length, as they dashed against the table in the midst of the room, it was overthrown. The light fell with it, and for a single instant after the struggle continued. Then both came down with a heavy fall together, but Alfred Latimer was undermost; the back of his head struck with a violent blow against the edge of the bed, and a long death-like groan followed. The next instant the light began to spread through the room, and a quick flame ran up the bed-curtain, against which the candle had fallen.

CHAPTER XCV.

The hour appointed for Louisa Charlton's marriage was the earliest allowed by the canon. The licence had been obtained, the settlement signed, and all the arrangements made as quietly as possible. Dr. Western was to perform the ceremony, and Louisa's other guardian had come from town in order to give her away. Mrs. Charlton's written consent to the marriage had been obtained; and though she declined to be present at the ceremony, alleging her anxiety for her son as her excuse, she wrote a neat flowery note to the Earl of Mallington, expressing her sense, as she termed it, of the liberality and consideration for her interests which he had shown in the matter of the settlements.

All was arranged and finally prepared before Morton left the rectory, at eleven on the day preceding; and the whole party were about to retire to rest when one of the gamekeepers from Mallington Park came over to tell the worthy clergyman that poor Lucy, who had been very ill for the last three days, was not expected to get through the night, and asked eagerly to see him.

Dr. Western required no pressing, but set out on foot with the man, and was soon by Lucy's bedside. Fever was strong upon her, her cheek flushed, her eye bright and glistening, and her strength all gone, but she was perfectly sensible, and looked up with a faint smile when the good clergyman entered. He very soon found that the disease of the body still owed its cause to the mind, for it seemed that some one had foolishly told her of the revelations made by the Jew receiver, Levi, and that from that moment becoming convinced that all her worst suspicions had been well founded, and that her husband had been accessory to her father's death, she had given herself up to despair and self-reproach. The contention in her heart, between her love for her parent and her duty to her husband, had aided fatigue, grief, and apprehension, in overthrowing what little strength she had regained, and she had sunk rapidly from the hour the tidings reached her.

All the exertions of Mr. Nethersole had proved of no avail; and although Dr. Western entertained but little hope of any change for the better in her corporeal health, he sat down beside her, and tried, first by prayer, and then by argument, to tranquilize and bring comfort to her mind.

At first Lucy murmured more than once, "Oh! if my father's eye could have seen me aiding his murderer, and helping him to escape, what would he have thought of his poor child!"

"You are tormenting yourself, Lucy," replied Dr. Western, "with vain imaginations. The only eye that could and did see the whole was the eye of a holier and higher being; and he saw the motives, as well as the actions, and the heart likewise. You tell me, Lucy, that this young man assured you that he is innocent; God grant that it may still prove so. Do not let us judge him before even human law has pronounced upon his case; and until such is the result, you are perfectly justified in forgetting all, except that he is your husband. But first, my dear child, let us pray to him who sees all hearts, to strengthen and support you under every affliction, for your mind is weakened, and your faith diminished, or you would not suffer such terrors to prey upon your health, and even affect your life." And, kneeling down, the worthy clergyman did pray, with earnestness and devotion.

For three hours he remained with the sick girl, leaving no means untried to soothe her, and his efforts were not without success. She became more calm; she listened, and seemed convinced by his reasoning; she joined feebly in the prayers, and acknowledged that she felt happier and better. An inclination to sleep then came on; and about three o'clock in the morning Dr. Western left her, and commenced his solitary walk home.

Though a man of an equable mind, and so much accustomed to contemplate the course of human life, with all the joys and sorrows which he was daily called upon to witness, under one point of view, namely, in reference to a future state, yet his heart was naturally too kind not to feel saddened by the sight of suffering and sorrow, and he walked on—melancholy, though not gloomy—along the little path which he could scarcely descry through the thick darkness of the night. As he approached the gates, however, the air seemed to grow lighter, and he could see his way more distinctly. He did not look up till he reached the middle of the bridge, and then a red gleam, which shone reflected from the water through the balustrades of the bridge, caused him to raise his eyes first to the sky, where the heavy clouds were glowing as if with the approach of dawn, and then along the valley through which the river flowed, where the cause of the glare soon became apparent. Up from beyond the gentle slopes of the hills, and the belts of wood which crossed the country to the west, rose large volumes of smoke, glowing with the bright blaze of a fierce fire below, and every now and then dotted with sparks of more intense light, as fragments of paper and linen, caught by the fire, were hurried up by the current into the air; and twice he thought he saw a column of flame rush up for a moment into the sky, as if some roof had fallen in, and given free vent to the blaze. He paused for several minutes to watch the conflagration, but, as far as he could calculate, the fire was at the distance of some seven or eight miles, and it was hopeless to think of rendering any assistance. Even as he gazed, indeed, the light became less vivid, and, judging that the flames had nearly exhausted themselves, the good rector turned his steps homeward, and retired to rest.

Though kept up so late, he rose at his usual hour on the following morning, and shortly after joined the party in the drawing-room to read prayers. Louisa, though evidently anxious and agitated, and dressed as plainly as usual, looked well and beautiful, as brides, indeed, in general do; but scarcely were the morning prayers over, and the whole party about to set out for the church, when Dr. Western was called out of the room, and then in turn summoned Mrs. Evelyn to council. His face was so unusually grave that Louisa marked it with some alarm; but whatever it was he communicated it to his sister. She replied aloud, "Oh, no! on no account. There is no need for it, indeed, and I never like delays in such cases."

They then both returned to the drawing-room without mentioning at all the subject of their conference. But Louisa, who had formed her own judgment of what it was about, inquired somewhat anxiously, "Have you heard of poor Lucy this morning, my dear sir?"

"Yes," replied Dr. Western; "she is somewhat better, they say. I shall see her again by-and-by."

"Then, pray say all that is kind from me," rejoined Louisa. "I have left a little present for her in my room. Tell her I think she will value it, because I have always worn it."

"Now, Miss Charlton!—now, Miss Charlton," said her father's old partner, pointing to the clock on the mantel-piece, "I know the earl is waiting, for I saw him pass with Mr. Quatterly ten minutes ago."

The hint was sufficient; and passing by the garden, through the churchyard, on foot, they entered the church. Only once Louisa Charlton looked to the right or to the left, and that was as she passed by her father's tomb. Mrs. Evelyn saw that her lips moved, and a drop gathered in her eye, and, touching her arm gently, she said, in a low tone, "You've chosen, my dear, as he would have chosen for you."

"I trust, I am sure it is so," answered Louisa; and in a few minutes more she stood before the altar with him she loved.

She was a good deal agitated, but yet her heart beat joyfully as words were spoken which realised the dream of young affection, swept far away all the doubts and apprehensions which had clung about the last few months, and made her the wife of one to whom all the tender feelings of her heart had long been given. Once during the ceremony she raised her look to his face, and their eyes met, but the expression of Morton's countenance was still that which she could have wished, and that which, perhaps, she expected. There was nothing of light and exuberant joy—nothing of careless merriment; it was deep, tender, happy, as if he felt the great import of every word he spoke, and promised to love, cherish, and protect, from the depth of the heart.

When the ceremony was over, the register signed, and everything complete, Louisa turned and bid adieu to Dr. Western and his sister, giving a tear that she could not repress, to the parting with those from whom she had known parental tenderness and affection; and then entering the plain chariot which stood at the church door, was soon rolling away from Mallington with her husband. She owned to herself—she did not conceal from him, that she was happy; and the clouds that had preceded, and the storm that had fallen so heavily at last, only made the sunshine that followed, all seem more bright and sparkling.

More than a fortnight elapsed before the Earl and Countess of Mallington—then stopping for a day or two beside the Lake of Geneva—heard of the events which had taken place at Sturton. Even then there was little in the tidings they received to cast any deep shade upon their young happiness. The county jail, they were informed, in a letter from Dr. Western, had been burned nearly to the ground, on the night preceding the wedding-day. What had become of Mr. Latimer no one knew, the worthy doctor said. Many of the prisoners had made their escape—some had perished in the flames, as well as one of the turnkeys, who was supposed to have been drunk at the time. It was generally imagined, however—the letter went on to say—that Mr. Latimer had contrived to fly, for the wing of the building in which he had been confined was the only part left standing; and the room which he inhabited had been found tenantless, and with the door open, though no one could tell whether it had been unlocked by one of the jailers or not. The man Williams had also escaped, it appeared; but that, Dr. Western said, was easily accounted for, as the wall of his cell, when examined, proved to be pierced completely through, leaving an aperture communicating with the yard.

There were one or two circumstances connected with the burning of the jail which Dr. Western did not think fit to detail, in the absence of all positive certainty, with regard to several points of importance. In the lodge of the jail, where the fire was supposed to have originated, a body was found, so disfigured with the flames that it was impossible to identify it. The back part of the skull, however, was found to have been fractured; and a celebrated surgeon of the place, upon examination, pronounced that the injury must have been received before death. The worthy rector of Mallington himself visited the spot, and viewed the body; and, though he would not venture to speak positively, yet, from the appearance of one hand, which the fire had not touched, he entertained little doubt that Alfred Latimer had there ended his career of folly and crime.

The man Brown was brought to trial some ten days after the destruction of the jail, convicted of robbery and murder, and executed, as he well deserved; but before death, as was then more common with criminals than now, he made a full confession of his crime, telling all that had occurred when he and his companions made their way into Mallington Hall. He protested to the last that neither he nor Williams had any share in the murder of Edmonds, the park-keeper, but laid the guilt of that terrible act justly upon him who had really committed it.

Dr. Western did all that was possible to prevent these statements from reaching the ears of poor Lucy, but his precaution proved vain; and though she rallied a little, and even sat up for several days, yet six weeks had not passed ere the poor girl lay by the side of her father in the churchyard at Mallington.

What became of Alfred Latimer's companion, Williams, was never correctly ascertained; and the people of the place believe he is still living, and fancy that he appears in the neighborhood from time to time, seeking an opportunity of committing fresh depredations. However that may be, certain it is, that about a year after, in dragging for the body of a lad who had been drowned, the people of Sturton pulled up from the bottom of the stream, just below the bridge, the corpse of a man in a state of complete decomposition. The height was exactly that of the notorious Jack Williams; the depth of chest and breadth of shoulders so remarkable in that malefactor were the same; and the fetters by which the limbs were still encumbered, showed that at all events he was one of the prisoners escaped from the jail. Every person who took advantage of the confusion occasioned by the fire to fly was recaptured soon after, or convicted subsequently for fresh offences, with the exception of Williams and Alfred Latimer, so that in the end little, if any, doubt remained as to the body which had been found in the river.

The rest of the personages mentioned in this history went on in the course to which their several characters prompted them. The Misses Martin gossiped and slandered to the end; Mallington remained nearly the same as ever, till a few years ago, when a railroad was carried past it, and all was changed. Mrs. Windsor fondly flattered herself that she should be the housekeeper at Mallington Hall on the return of the earl and countess from the continent; but she was disappointed in this expectation, receiving, however, as a consolation, a very comfortable annuity for her services to Miss Charlton.

The only person who remains to be mentioned is the mother of Alfred Latimer, and her fate is soon told; she sat down with great resignation under her misfortunes, reposing upon her selfishness, which is a very comfortable pillow for those who have nothing else to rest upon. With an income of two thousand a year, however, her selfishness was very well provided for, and it was said she took other means of consoling herself also—the consumption of wine in her household being considerable. At all events, her sorrow was of the kind that grows fat, and before her death she had extended to an enormous size, and had also become a little coarse in skin and complection. Dr. Western and Mrs. Evelyn sleep in Mallington Churchyard. And of the earl and countess, what shall I say? I saw them lately, dear reader, and they seemed, as far as mortal eye could see, to be very happy—happy in the means, the opportunity, and the love of beneficence—happy in the respect of those whose respect they value—happy in honor and in virtue, and in calm and placid tempers—happy in themselves, in their offspring, and unchanging affection.

THE END.

BEAUCHAMP;

OR,

THE ERROR.

A Novel.

BY G. P. R. JAMES, ESQ.,

AUTHOR OF

"THE STEP-MOTHER," "HEIDELBERG," "RICHELIEU," "FOREST DAYS," ETC.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,

82 CLIFF STREET, NEW YORK

1847.

THE NEW YORK
PUBLIC LIBRARY
499873
ASTOR, LENOX AND TILDEN FOUNDATIONS.
R 1912 L

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS have the pleasure of announcing that they have just issued a complete Classified and Descriptive Catalogue of their Publications, comprising a very extensive range of Literature, in its several departments of History, Biography, Philosophy, Travel, Science and Art, the Classics, and Fiction; also, many splendidly Embellished Productions. A rigid critical taste has governed the selection of these works, so as to include not only a large proportion of the most esteemed Literary Productions of our times, but supplying also, in the majority of instances, the best existing authorities on given subjects. This new Catalogue, having been constructed with a view to the especial use of persons desirous of forming or enriching their Literary Collections, as well as principals of District Schools and Seminaries of Learning, who may not possess any reliable means of forming a true estimate of any production, commends itself to all such by its novel feature of including bibliographical, explanatory, and critical notices. For want of such aid, a large portion of the reading community remain ignorant of the vast wealth of our accumulated literary stores, an acquaintance with which must ever be regarded as an essential element, both in the progress of social advancement and in individual refinement and happiness. It may be as well to add, that the valuable collection described in this Catalogue, consisting of about eighteen hundred volumes, combines the two-fold advantages of great economy in price with neatness—often great elegance of typographical execution, in many instances the rates of publication being scarcely one-fifth of those of similar issues in Europe.

 Copies of this Catalogue may be obtained, free of expense, by application to the Publishers personally, or by letter, post-paid.

All orders accompanied with a remittance promptly executed.

82 Cliff-street, Sept., 1846.

BEAUCHAMP; OR, THE ERROR.

CHAPTER I.

THE ATTACK AND THE RESCUE.

It was in the reign of one of the Georges—it does not matter which, though perhaps the reader may discover in the course of this history. After all, what does it signify in what king's reign an event happened, for although there may be something in giving to any particular story "a local habitation and a name," yet there is nothing, strange to say, which gives one — I speak from my own experience — a greater perception of the delusiveness of everything on earth, than the study of, and deep acquaintance with the annals of a many-lined monarchy. To see how these spoilt children of fortune have fought and struggled, coveted and endeavored, obtained or have been disappointed, hoped, feared, joyed, and passed away—ay, passed, so that the monumental stone and a few historic lines from friend and foe, as dry as doubtful, are all that remain of them—it gives us a sensation that all on earth is a delusion, that history is but the pages of a dream-book, the truest chronicle but a record of the unreal pageants that are gone.

However that may be, it was in the reign of one of the Georges—I won't be particular as to the date, for heaven knows I am likely to be mistaken in the curl of a wig, or the fashion of a sleeve-button, and then what would the antiquaries say?

It was in the reign of one of the Georges—thank heaven, there were four of them, in long and even succession, so that I may do anything I like with the coats, waistcoats, and breeches, and have a vast range through a wilderness of petticoats (hooped and unhooped, tight, loose, long, short, flowing, tucked up), to say nothing of flounces and furbelows, beside head-dresses, in endless variety, patches, powder, and pomatum, fans, gloves, and high-heeled shoes. Heaven and earth, what a scope!—but I am determined to write this work just as it suits me. I have written enough as it suits the public, and I am very happy to find that I have suited them, but in this, I hope and trust both to please my public and myself too. Thus I wish to secure myself a clear field, and therefore to declare, in the first instance, that I will stand upon no unities of time or place, but will indulge in all the vagaries that I please, will wander hither and thither at my own discretion, will dwell upon those points that please myself as long as I can find pleasure therein, and will leap over every unsafe or disagreeable place with the bound of a kangaroo. That being settled, and perfectly agreed upon between the reader and myself, we will go on if you please.

It was in the reign of one of the Georges—I have a great mind to dart away again, but I won't, for it is well to be compassionate—when a gentleman of six or seven-and-twenty years of age, rode along a pleasant country road, somewhere in the west of England. It was eventide, when the sun, tired with his long race, slowly wends downward to the place of his repose, looking back with a beaming glance of satisfaction on the bright things he has seen, and like a benevolent heart, smiling at the blessings and the benefits he has left behind him.

The season of the year was one that has served poets and romance-writers a great deal, and which with very becoming, but somewhat dishonest gratitude, they have praised ten times more than it deserves. It was, in short, spring—that season when we are often enticed to wander forth by a bright sky, as if for the express purpose of being wet to the skin by a drenching shower, or cut to the heart by the piercing east wind—that coquetish season that is never for ten minutes in the same mind, which delights in disappointing expectations, and in frowning as soon as she has smiled. Let those who love coquets sing of spring, for my part I abhor the whole race of them. Nevertheless, there is something very engaging in that first youth of the year. We may be cross with its wild tricks and sportive mischief, we may be vexed at its whims and caprices as with those of an untamed boy or girl, but yet there is a grace in its waywardness, a softness in its blue violet eyes, a brightness in its uncontaminated smile, a luster even in the penitential tears, dried up as soon as shed, that has a charm we cannot, if we would, shake off. Oh yes, youth and spring speak to every heart of hope, and hope is the magic of life! Do you not see the glorious promise of great things to be done in that wild and wayward boy? Do you not see the bright assurance of warmer and mellower days to come in that checkered April sky? Youth, and spring, and hope, they are a glad triad, inseparable in essence, and all aspiring toward the everlasting goal of thought—the Future.

It was the month of May—now if poets and romance-writers, as we have before said, have done injustice, or more than justice to spring, as a whole, never were two poor months so scandalously over-praised as April and May. The good old Scotch poet declares that in April,

> Primroses paint the sweet plain,
> And summer returning rejoices the swain;

but rarely, oh, how rarely, do we ever see primroses busy at such artistical work; and as for summer, if he is returning at all, it is like a boy going back to school, and lingering sadly by the way. Such, at least, is the case now-a-days, and if the advice of another old poet, who tells us,

> Stir not a clout,
> Till May be out,

would seem to prove that in ancient times, as well as at present, May was by no means so genial a month, as it has pleased certain personages to represent it. Nevertheless, we know that every now and then in May, comes in a warm and summer-like day, bright, and soft, and beautiful, full of a tempered sunshine, appearing after the cold days of winter, like joy succeeding sorrow, and entendered by the memories of the past; such was the sort of day upon which the traveler we have spoken of rode on upon his way through a very fair and smiling country. The season had been somewhat early in its expansion; the weather had been unusually mild in March; frequent and heavy showers had succeeded in April, and, pouring through the veins of the earth the bountiful libation of the sky, had warmed the bosom of our common mother to a rich and lovely glow. The trees were all out in leaf, but yet not sufficiently unclosed to have lost the rich variety of hues, displayed by the early buds. The coloring would have been almost that of autumn, so bright and manifold were the tints upon the wood, had it not been for a certain tenderness of aspect which spoke of youth and not decay. There was the oak in its red and brown, here and there mingled with the verdant hue of summer, but beside it waved the beech, with its long arms robed in the gentlest and the softest green, the ash pointed its taper fingers in the direction where the wind was going, and the larch lifted up its graceful spire, fringed with its grass-like filaments, while its beautiful cones, full of their coral studs, afforded ornaments that queens might be proud to wear. The fields were spangled with a thousand flowers, and every bank and hedge was jeweled with vegetable stars; not only the pale violet, and the yellow primrose, but the purple columbine and the white hawthorn, even the odorous-breathed cowslip, the wild geranium, and a long list beside, were all spreading their beauty in the evening air, and glittering with the drops of a shower not long passed by. Overhead, too, the sky was full of radiance, warm, yet soft, deep in the azure, yet tinted with the evening light, as if the sunbeams were the threads of a crimson woof woven in with the blue warp of the sky.

But enough of this, it was a very fine evening, of a very fine day, of a very fine season, and that surely was enough to make any man happy who had good health, a guinea in his purse, and had not committed either murder or bigamy. The horseman seemed to feel the influence of the scene as much as could be expected of any man. When he was in a green bowery lane, with the wild plants trailing up and down the red banks, and he could neither look to the right nor to the left, he whistled snatches of a popular song; when he rose the side of the hill, and could gaze over the world around, he looked at the green fields, or the clear stream, or the woody coverts with searching and yet well-satisfied eyes, and murmured to himself, "Capital sport here, I dare say."

He seemed to be fond of variety, for sometimes he trotted his horse, sometimes made him canter, sometimes brought him into a walk, but it would appear that there was a certain portion of humanity mingling with the latent motives for these proceedings, inasmuch as the walk was either up or down a steep hill, the canter over a soft piece of turf wherever it could be found, and the trot, where the road was tolerably level. Ever and anon, too, he patted the beast's neck, and talked to him quite friendly, and the horse would have answered him in the same tone, beyond doubt, if horses' throats and tongues had been formed by nature with the design of holding long conversations. Such not being the case, however, all the beast could do to express his satisfaction at his master's commendations, was to arch his neck and bend down his under lip till it touched his chest, and put his quivering ears backward and forward in a very significant manner. It was a handsome animal, of a bright bay color, about fifteen hands and a half high, strongly built, yet showing a good deal of blood, and its coat was as soft and shining as satin. There was a good deal of red dust about its feet and legs however, which showed that it had made a somewhat long journey, but yet it displayed no signs of weariness, its head had no drowsy droop, like that of a country member on the back benches at three o'clock in the morning after a long debate. Oh no, there was muscle and courage for forty miles more, had it been necessary, and the noble beast would have done it right willingly. The horseman rode him well—that is to say, lightly, and though he was tall, muscular, and powerful in frame, many a man of less weight would have wearied his horse much more. His hand was light and easy, his seat was light and easy, and his very look was light and easy. There was no black care sat behind that horseman, so that the burden was not burdensome, and the pair went on together with alacrity and good fellowship. The gentleman's dress was in very good taste, neither too smart nor too plain, well fitted for a journey, yet not unfitted for a drawing-room in the morning. This is enough upon that subject, and I will not say another word about it, but as to his face, I must have a word or two more—it was gay and good-humored, and though it might be called somewhat thoughtless in expression, yet somehow—I know not very well from what cause—when one examined it one was convinced that the thoughtless look was more a matter of habit than of nature He was dark in complexion, but with a healthy glow in his cheeks, and though certainly his face was not as perfect as that of the Apollo of Belvidere, yet few would have scrupled to pronounce him a good-looking man. There was also an easy, almost careless swinging, rapid air about him, which generally engages kindly feelings, if it cannot secure much respect; and one could not watch him come cantering over the lea, with his open, smiling face, without judging he would make an entertaining, good-humored companion, with whom anybody might pass a few hours very pleasantly.

Thus he rode along, blithe as a lark, till the sun went down in glory, showing at the distance of about a couple of miles, the spire of a small church in a small town—or perhaps I had better call it a village, for I am not sure that it had grown up to townhood in those days.

The hint I have given that he could see the spire of the church must have shown the reader, that at the moment of the sun's setting he was on the brow of a hill, for there are no plains in that part of the country, and it was well wooded also. Down from the spot at which he had then arrived, in a line very nearly direct toward the spire, descended the road, crossing first a small patch of common, perhaps not twenty acres in extent, and then entering between deep, shady banks, as it went down the hill, not only arched over with shrubs, but canopied by the branches of tall trees. There was quite sufficient light in the sky to show him the entrance of this green avenue, and he said to himself, as he looked on, "What a pretty approach to the village; how peaceful and quiet everything looks."

He was not aware that he had work to do in that quiet road, nor that it was to be of anything but a peaceful character; but so it is with us in life, we never know what is before us at the next step. We may scheme, and we may calculate; we may devise, and we may expect, but, after all, we are but blind men, led we know not whither by a dog, and the dog's name is, Fate.

When he saw that he was so near the village, he slackened his pace, and proceeded at a walk, wishing, like a wise and experienced equestrian, to bring his horse in cool. At the first trees of the road a deeper shade came into the twilight. About half a mile further it became quite dark under the boughs, whatever it might be in the open fields; the darkness did not make him quicken his pace, but the minute after he heard some sounds before him which did. It is not very easy to explain what those sounds were, or by what process it was that, striking upon the tympanum of his ear, the two or three air-waves conveyed to his brain a notion that there were people in danger or distress at no great distance. There was a word spoken in a sudden and imperative tone, and that was the first sound he heard, and then there was a voice of remonstrance and entreaty, a woman's voice, and then something like a shriek, not loud and prolonged, but uttered, as if the person from whose lips it came caught it as it was issuing forth, and strove to stifle it in the birth; some loud swearing and oaths were next heard, mingled with the noise of quick footfalls, as if some one were running fast toward the spot from the side of the village, and the next moment the horseman perceived, at the first indistinctly, and then clearly, a number of objects on the road before him, the largest, if not the most important of which was a carriage. At the head of the horses which had drawn it stood a man with something in his hand which might be a pistol. At the side of the vehicle were two more, with a saddled horse standing by, and they were apparently dragging out of the carriage a lady who seemed very unwilling to come forth, but from the other side was hurrying up, as hard as he could run, another personage of very different appearance from the three other men. By this time he was within ten yards of them, and our horseman, from his elevation on his beast's back, could see the head and shoulders of him who was approaching, and judged at once that he was a gentleman.

I have said that under the trees it was quite dark, and yet that he could see all this, but neither of these is a mistake, whatever the reader may think, for just at that part of the highway where the carriage stood, it was crossed by another road which let in all that remained of the western light, and there the whole scene was before his eyes, as a picture, even while he himself was in comparative darkness. Impulse is an excellent thing, and a great deal more frequently leads us right than reason, which, in cases of emergency, is a very unserviceable commodity. It is only necessary to have a clever impulse, and things go wonderfully well. The horseman stuck his spurs into his horse's sides: previously he had been going at a trot, since the first sounds struck his ear, now it became a canter, and two or three springs brought him up to the carriage. He was making straight for the side, but the man who was at the horses' head seemed to regard his coming as unpleasant, and shouting to him in a thundering voice to keep back, he presented a pistol straight at him with a sharp, disagreeable, clicking sound, which, under various circumstances, is peculiarly ungrateful to the human ear, especially when the muzzle of the instrument is toward us, for there is no knowing what may come out of the mouth at the next minute. But the horseman was quick, active, and not accustomed to be daunted by a little thing like a pistol, and therefore, holding his heavy riding-whip by the wrong end, though in this instance it proved the right one, he struck the personage opposite to him a thundering blow over the arm. That limb instantly dropped powerless by his side, and the pistol went off under the horse's feet, causing the animal to rear a little, but hurting no one. In an instant the horse was turned, and among the party by the carriage; but that party was by this time increased in number, though not fortified by unanimity, for the person who had been seen running up, was by this time engaged in fierce struggle with one of the original possessors of the ground, while the other kept a tight grasp upon the lady who had just been dragged out of the carriage. With the two combatants our horseman thought it best not to meddle in the first instance, though he saw that the object of one of them was to get a pistol at the head of the other, who seemed neither unwilling nor unable to prevent him from accomplishing that object; but they were grappling so closely, that it was difficult to strike one without hitting the other, especially in the twilight; and therefore, before he interfered in their concerns, he bestowed another blow, with the full sweep of his arm, upon the head of the man who was holding the lady, and who seemed to take so deep an interest in what was going on between the other two, as not to perceive that any one was coming up behind him. He instantly staggered back, and would have fallen, had not the wheel of the carriage stopped him, but then turning fiercely round, he stretched out his arm, and a flash and report followed, while a ball whistled past the horseman's cheek, went through his hair, and grazed his hat.

"Missed, on my life," cried the horseman; "take that for your pains, you clumsy hound." And he again struck him, though on this occasion the person's head was defended by his arm.

"H—l and d——n," cried the other, seizing his horse's bridle and trying to force him back upon his haunches, but another blow, that made him stagger again, showed him that the combat was not likely to end in his favor, and darting past, he exclaimed, "Run, Wolf, run. Harry is off!" And before our friend on the bay horse could strike another blow at him, he had sprung upon the back of the beast that stood near, and without waiting to put his feet into the stirrups, galloped off as hard as he could go. In regard to the other two who were wrestling, as we have said, in deadly strife, the game they were playing had just reached a critical point, for the gentleman who had come up, had contrived to get hold of the barrel of the pistol, and at the very instant the other galloped away, the respectable person he called Wolf received a straightforward blow in the face, which made him stagger back, leaving his weapon in the hand of his opponent. Finding that his only advantage was gone, he instantly darted round the back of the carriage to make his escape up the other road.

"Jump down and stop him, postboy," cried the horseman, pursuing him at the same time without a moment's pause, but the postboy's legs, though cased in leather, seemed to be made of wood, if one might judge by the stiff slowness with which they moved, and before he had got his feet to the ground, and his whip deliberately laid over the horse's back, the fugitive, finding that the horseman had cut him off from the road, caught the stem of a young ash, swung himself up to the top of the bank, and disappeared among the trees.

"Hark, there is a carriage coming," said the horseman, addressing the stranger, who had followed him as fast as two legs could follow four. They both paused for an instant and listened, but to their surprise the sound of rolling wheels, which they both distinctly heard, diminished instead of increasing, and it became evident that some vehicle was driving away from a spot at no great distance.

"That's droll," said the horseman, dismounting; "but we had better see after the ladies, for I dare say they are frightened."

"No doubt they are," replied the other, in a mild and musical voice, leading the way round the carriage again. "Do you know who they are?"

"Not I," answered the horseman, "don't you?"

"No, I am a stranger here," answered the other, approaching the side of the carriage, to which the lady who had been dragged out had now returned.

She was seated with her hands over her eyes, as if either crying with agitation or in deep thought; but the moment the gentleman who had come up on foot addressed her, expressing a hope that she had not been much alarmed, she replied, "Oh, yes, I could not help it, but my mother has fainted. We must go back, I fear."

"It is not far, I think, to the village, madam," said our friend the horseman, "and we will easily bring the lady to herself again; but it is a pity she fainted, too. These things will happen, and if they have not got your money there is no great harm done."

"I am better, Mary," said a voice from the other side of the carriage, faint and low, yet sweet and harmonious. "Are they gone—are you quite sure they are gone?"

"Oh, dear, yes, madam," replied the horseman, while the lady next him laid her hand tenderly upon her mother's. "One of the worthies scampered off on horseback after he had fired at me, and the other was too quick for us all, thanks to your stiff-jointed driver. What became of the other fellow I don't know."

"You are not hurt, sir, I hope," said the younger of the two ladies, gazing timidly at him through the half light.

"Not in the least," he replied. "The man missed me, though it wasn't a bad shot after all, for I felt it go through my hair—but an inch one side or the other makes a wonderful difference—and now, ladies, what will you do?"

A murmured consultation took place between the two tenants of the carriage, while a whispered conference was held by the gentleman who came to their assistance. It is wonderful how often in this world several parties of the good folks of which it is composed, are all thinking, ay, and even talking, of the same thing, without any one group knowing what the other is about.

"I'm doubtful of that postboy," said the gentleman on foot to the gentleman who had been on horseback.

"Ay, and so am I," replied the other. "He's in league with them, depend upon it. All postboys are so. Their conscience is like the inn leather breeches, wide enough to fit anything. I wonder how far these two ladies are going?"

"I cannot tell," answered the other, "but it will be hardly safe for them to go alone."

"Can I speak to you, sir, for a moment," said the voice of the younger lady from the carriage, and the horseman advancing a step, leaned against the doorway, and put his head partly in, bending down his ear, as if he were perfectly certain that he was going to hear a secret.

"My mother thinks, and so do I," continued the younger lady, "that the man who drives us must have been bribed by those people who attacked us, for he drove very slowly as soon as ever he came near this spot. He stopped, too, the moment they called to him."

"Perhaps not bribed, my dear madam," replied the gentleman, "all these postboys, as they are called, favor your honest highwaymen, either in hopes of a part of the booty, or merely out of fellow-feeling. They are every one of them amateurs, and some of them connoisseurs of the arts of the road. You must have some protection, that's certain, and I think it would be better for you to turn back and get some people from the village to accompany the carriage."

"I'm afraid that can hardly be," said the elder lady. "We are already very late, and this has delayed us. My brother may be dead ere we arrive, for I'm going on a sad errand sir, he having been suddenly seized with gout in the stomach, and sent to call me to him in his last moments; however, it is not very far, and I trust that nothing more will happen."

"No, no, madam, you must not go without protection," replied the gentleman in a good-humored tone. "I will ride with you and see you safe—how far is it?"

"About five miles, I am afraid," answered the lady.

"Oh, that's nothing, that's nothing," cried their companion. "It will but make me an hour later at supper." And turning to the other gentleman, he continued, "I wish, sir, if you pass the inn called the White Hart—"

"I lodge there myself," returned the stranger.

"Then pray tell the people there to have me a chicken ready in an hour. It will be roasting while I am riding, so that will be one way of killing time, and not losing patience."

Thus saying, with a gay laugh, he sprang upon his horse's back, and addressing the postboy, exclaimed, while the other gentleman shut the door, and bade the ladies adieu, "Now, boy, into the saddle, and remember, if these ladies are interrupted again, the first head that is broken shall be yours."

The man made no reply, but got up with more alacrity than he had got down, and was soon trotting along the road at a rapid rate.

The horseman kept close to the carriage all the way, and after a ride of about five-and-thirty minutes, through pleasant lanes and fields, they came to what seemed the gates of a park, but the porter's lodge was dim and unlighted, and the postboy gave the horseman a significant hint that he had better get down and open the gates, as there was nobody there to do it for him. The gentleman, however, managed the feat dextrously without dismounting, and the carriage rolled through and entered a long avenue of magnificent chestnuts. Between the boughs of the trees, every here and there, were to be seen glimpses of soft green slopes, studded with wild hawthorns, and masses of dark wood beyond, and at the end of about three quarters of a mile more, appeared a fine old stone house, with a somewhat flat but imposing-looking face, like that of an old country gentleman, with a great idea of his own importance.

As the horseman looked up to the house, however, which was raised upon a little terrace, and approached by a gentle rise, he could not help thinking, "That does not look very much like the dwelling of a man dying of gout in the stomach; it looks more like that of one getting up a good fit;" for three windows on the ground floor, having very much of a dining-room aspect about them, were thrown up to admit the air, and in addition to a blaze of light, there came forth the sounds of merry laughter, and several persons talking.

The postboy drove up to the great door, however, and the horseman, springing to the ground, rang the bell, after which, returning to the side of the carriage, he leaned against it, saying,

"I trust your relation is better, madam, for the house does not seem to be one of mourning."

The lady did not reply directly to his words, but she said, "I hope if you remain in this part of the country, sir, you will give me an opportunity of thanking you, either here, or at my own house, for the great service you have rendered me. The people of the inn will direct you, for it is only ten miles on the other side of Tarningham."

"I shall certainly have the honor of waiting on you to inquire how you do," replied the horseman, and then adding, "these people do not seem inclined to come," he returned to the bell, and rang it vigorously.

The next moment the door was opened, and a capacious butler appeared, and the stranger, without more ado, assisted the ladies to alight, remarking as he did so, that the younger of the two was a very pretty girl, some nineteen or twenty years of age.

"How is my brother now?" demanded the elder lady, who wore a widow's dress.

"Quite well, ma'am, thank you," answered the butler, in the most commonplace tone possible, and before she had time to make any more inquiries, the stranger who had come to her rescue, wished her and her daughter good night, and mounting his horse, rode down the avenue again.

CHAPTER II.

THE SUPPER AT THE WHITE HART.

The White Hart of Tarningham was a neat little country inn, such as was commonly found in most of the small towns of England at the period of my tale. They are rapidly being brushed off the face of the earth by the great broom of the steam-engine, and very soon the "pleasures of an inn" will be no longer known but by the records of history, while men run through the world at the rate of a hundred miles an hour, finding nothing on their way but stations and "hotels." I hate the very name hotel. It is un-English, uncomfortable, unsatisfactory, a combination, I suppose, of host and hell, the one the recipient of perturbed spirits, and the other their tormentor. But the word inn, how comfortable it is in all its significations. We have only retained the double n in it that we may "wear our rue with a difference," and whether we think of being in place, or in power, or in the hearts of those we love, or in the house during a storm, how pleasant is the feeling it produces. It has a home-like and British sound, and I do with all my heart wish that my fellow-countrymen would neither change their words nor their manners for worse things of foreign parentage. An inn, in the days I speak of, was a place famous for white linen, broiled ham, and fresh eggs. I cannot say that the beefsteaks were always tender, or the veal cutlets always done to a turn, or the beds always the softest in the world, but then think of the white dimity curtains, and the casements that rattled just enough to let you know that it was blowing hard without, and the rosy apple-faced chambermaid, and the host himself, round as his own butts, ay, and as full of beer. An innkeeper of those days would have been ashamed to show himself under nineteen stone. He was a part of his own sign, the recommendation of his own ale. His very paunch seemed to say "Look what it has done for me." It entered into his fat, it flowed through his veins, it puffed out his cheeks, it ran out at his eyes, and malt and hops were heard in every accent of his tongue. You had no lean, wizen-faced, black-silk-stockinged innkeepers in those days, and the very aspiring waiters imitated their landlords, and hourly grew fat under the eye, that they might be in a fit condition to marry the widow and take the business when the poor dear gentleman was swallowed up in beer.

Such an inn was the White Hart at Tarningham, and such a host was the landlord, but he was a wise man, and loved not to look upon his successors, for which cause, as well as on account of the trade not being very brisk in that quarter, he maintained no regular waiter; he had a tapster, it is true, but the cloth in the neat little parlor on the left hand was laid by a white-capped, black-eyed, blooming maid-servant, and the landlord himself prepared to carry in the first dish, and then leave his expected guest to the tendance of the same fair damsel.

The room was already occupied by one gentleman, the same who in taking his evening walk had joined with our friend the horseman in the rescue of the two ladies, and to say truth, it was owing to his courtesy that the cloth was laid there at all, for he had prior possession, and on communicating to the landlord the fact that a guest would soon arrive who proposed to sup upon roast chicken, the worthy host had exclaimed in a voice of consternation, "Good gracious me, what shall I do? I must turn those fellows out of the tap-room and serve it there, for there is old Mrs. Grover, the lawyer's widow, in the other parlor, and ne'er a sitting-room else in the house!"

"You can make use of this, landlord," replied the stranger; "this gentleman seems a very good-humored person, and I do not think will be inclined to find fault, although he may not have a whole sitting-room to himself."

"I'd bet a quart," cried the landlord, as if a sudden thought struck him, "I'd bet a quart that it's the gentleman whose portmanteau and a whole bundle of fishing-rods came down this morning. I'll run and see what's the name."

Whatever he felt, the gentleman already in possession expressed no curiosity, but in two minutes the host rolled back again—for to run, as he threatened, was impossible, and informed his guest that the things were addressed to "Edward Hayward, Esq., to be left at the White Hart, Tarningham."

"Very well," said the guest, and without more ado, he took up a book which had been lying on the mantelpiece since the morning, and putting his feet upon another chair, began to read. The landlord bustled about the room, and put the things in order. One of his fat sides knocked his guest's chair, and he begged pardon, but the gentleman read on. He took up the hat, which had been knocked off in the struggle with the chaise, wiped off the red sand which it had gathered, and exclaimed, "Lord bless me, sir, your hat's all beaten about;" but his companion merely gave a nod, and read on.

At length, when the table was laid, and mustard, pepper, salt, vinegar, and bread had been brought in severally, when the maid had rearranged what the landlord had arranged before, smoothed what he had smoothed, and brushed what he had brushed, a horse's feet trotting past the window were heard, and the minute after a voice exclaimed at the door of the inn, "Here, ostler, take my horse, loose the girths, but don't take off the saddle yet, sponge his mouth, and walk him up and down for five minutes. Has his clothing come?"

"Oh, dear, yes, sir, come this morning," answered the landlord. "This way, sir, if you please. Sorry you did not let me know before, for positively there is not a whole sitting-room in the house."

"Well, then, I will do with half of one," answered the stranger. "Why, my friend, if you grow any more you must have the doors widened. You are the man for defending a pass; for, upon my life, in default of harder materials, you would block up Thermopylæ. Ale, ale, ale, it's all ale, landlord, and if you don't mind, it will set you ailing. Have my fishing-rods come down? all safe I hope;" and by the time he had run through these questions and observations, he was in the doorway of the little parlor on the left-hand. He stared for a minute at the previous tenant of the room, who rose to receive him with a smile, and whose face he did not seem to have observed very accurately in the semi-darkness of the road. But the height and general appearance of the stranger soon showed him that they had met before, and with an easy, good-humored, dashing air, he went up and shook him by the hand.

"A strange means of making acquaintance, my dear sir," he said, "but I'm very happy to see you again, and safe and well, too, for I thought at one time you were likely to get knocked on the head, and I scarcely dared to interfere, lest I should do it for you myself in trying to hit the other fellow. I hope you did not get any wounds or bruises in the affray!"

"Oh, no," replied the stranger; "I was nearly strangled, that is certain, and shall not easily forget the grasp of that man's fingers on my throat; but in regard to this way of making an acquaintance, no two men, I should think, could desire a better than to be both engaged, even accidentally, in rescuing two ladies from wrong."

"Quite chivalrous!" exclaimed the horseman, laughing; "but two Don Quixotes would never do in the world, so I'll acknowledge, at once, that I've not the least spark of chivalry in my nature. If I see a strong thing hurting a weak thing, I knock the strong thing down of course. I can't bear to see a big dog worry a little one, and don't much like to see a terrier catch a rat. But it's all impulse, my dear sir, all impulse. Thank heaven I am totally destitute of any sort of enthusiasm. I like everything in the world well enough, but do not wish to like anything too much, except, indeed, a particularly good bottle of claret—there, there, I am afraid I am weak. As to helping two ladies, it is always a very pleasant thing, especially if one of them be a particularly pretty girl, as is the case in this instance, I can tell you—but we really should do something to have these fellows caught, for they might have the decency to wait till it is quite dark, and not begin their lawless avocations before the sun has been down an hour."

"I went immediately to a magistrate," answered the stranger; "but as in very many country places, I did not find the ornament of the bench very highly enlightened. Because I was not the party actually attacked, he demurred to taking any steps whatever, and though I shook his resolution on that point, and he seemed inclined to accede to my demand, yet as soon as he found that I could not even give him the names of the two ladies, he went all the way back again, and would not even take my deposition. Perhaps after supper we had better go to him again together, for I dare say you can supply my deficiency by this time, and tell him the name of your pretty lady and her mother."

"No; 'pon my life I can't," rejoined his companion, "I quite forgot to ask—a very beautiful girl, though, and I wonder I didn't inquire, for I always like to ticket pretty faces. What is the name of your Midas, we'll soon bring him to reason, I doubt not. A country magistrate not take a deposition against a highwayman! By heaven, he will make the people think he goes shares in the booty."

"A highwayman!" exclaimed the landlord, who had been going in and out, and listening to all that was said, whether he had roast chicken, or boiled potatoes, or a jug of fresh drawn beer in his hand. "Why, lord, Mr. Beauchamp, you never told me!"

"No, my good friend," answered the other, "I did not, because to spread such a tale through an inn, is the very best way I know of insuring the highwayman's escape."

"Well, I dare say, my good round friend," exclaimed the horseman, whom we shall hereafter call Hayward, or as almost all who knew him, had it, Ned Hayward, "I dare say you can help us to the names of these two ladies. Who was it one of your postboys drove to-night, out there to the westward, to a house in a park?"

"What, to Sir John Slingsby's?" exclaimed the host; but before he could proceed to answer the more immediate question, Ned Hayward gave himself a knock on the forehead, exclaiming,

"Sir John Slingsby's! why that's the very house I'm going to, and I never thought to ask the name—what a fool I am! Well might they call me, when I was in the 40th, thoughtless Ned Hayward. But come, 'mine host of the Garter'—"

"Of the White Hart, your honor," replied the landlord, with as low a bow as his stomach would permit.

"Ay, of the White Hart be it then," said Ned Hayward, "let us hear who are these beautiful ladies whom your postboy drove so slowly, and stopped with so soon, at the bidding of three gentlemen of the road, with pistols in their hands?"

"Lord a mercy!" cried the host, "and was it Mrs. Clifford and her daughter that they stopped? Well, I shouldn't wonder—but mum's the word—it's no affair of mine, and the least said is soonest mended."

The host's countenance had assumed a mysterious look. His whole aspect had an air of mystery. He laid his finger upon the side of his nose, as men do for a practical exemplification of the process which is taking place in their mind when they are putting "that and that" together. He half closed one eye also, as if to give an indication to the beholders that whatever might be the mental light in his own brain, it should not escape for the illumination of those without. There is a perversity in human nature which makes all men—saving the exceptions that prove the general rule—anxious to discover anything that is hidden, and consequently both Mr. Hayward and Mr. Beauchamp attacked the worthy landlord, totis viribus, and attempted to wrench from him his secret. He held it fast, however, with both hands, exclaiming,

"No, no, gentlemen, I'll not say a word—it's no business of mine—I've nothing to do with it—it's all guess work, and a man who beers and horses all the neighborhood, must keep a good tongue in his head. But one thing I will say, just to give you two gentlemen a hint, that perhaps you had better not meddle in this matter, or you may make a mess of it. Sally, is not that chicken ready?" And he called from the door of the room to the bar.

"I certainly shall meddle with it, my good friend," said Ned Hayward, in a determined tone, "and that very soon. I'm not the least afraid of making a mess, as you call it, certain that none of it will fall upon myself. So, as soon as we have got supper, which seems a devilish long time coming, we will set off, Mr. Beauchamp, if you please, for this good magistrate's, and try—"

He was interrupted in the midst of his speech, though it had by this time nearly come to a conclusion, by a voice in the passage, exclaiming, "Groomber, Mr. Groomber," and the host instantly vociferated, "Coming, sir—coming," and rushed out of the room.

The voice was heard to demand, as soon as the landlord appeared blocking up the way, "Have you a person by the name of Beauchamp here?"

"Yes, your worship," replied the host; and after a few more words in a lower tone, the door of the room was thrown open, and Mr. Wittingham was announced, just as Mr. Beauchamp was observing to his new-found friend, Ned Hayward, that the voice was very like that of the worthy magistrate to whom he had applied.

Mr. Wittingham was a tall and very respectable-looking gentleman, somewhat past the middle age, and verging toward that decline of life which is marked by protuberance of the stomach and thinness of the legs. But, nevertheless, Mr. Wittingham carried it off very well, for his height diminished the appearance of that which is usually called a corporation, and his legs were skillfully concealed in his top-boots. He was exceedingly neat in his apparel, tolerably rosy in the gills, and having a certain dogmatical peremptory expression, especially about the thick eyebrows and hook nose, which he found wonderfully efficacious in the decision of cases at petty sessions.

The moment he entered the room, he fixed his eyes somewhat sternly upon Mr. Beauchamp (whom we have forgotten to describe as a very gentlemanlike—even distinguished-looking person of about thirty years of age), and addressing him in a rough, and rather uncivil tone, said, "Your name, I think you told me, is Beauchamp, sir, and you came to lay an information before me against certain persons for stopping a chaise upon the king's highway."

"I am, as you say, sir, called Beauchamp," replied the other gentleman, "and I waited upon you, as the nearest magistrate, to give information of a crime which had been committed in your neighborhood, which you refused to receive. Do me the honor of taking a seat."

"And pray, sir, if I may be so bold as to ask, who and what are you?" inquired the magistrate, suffering himself to drop heavily into a chair.

"I should conceive that had very little to do with the matter," interposed Ned Hayward, before Mr. Beauchamp could answer. "The simple question is, whether an attempt at highway robbery, or, perhaps, a worse offense, has or has not been made this night upon Mrs. and Miss Clifford, as they were going over to my friend Sir John Slingsby's; and allow me to say that any magistrate who refuses to take a deposition on such a subject, and to employ the best means at his command to apprehend the offenders, grossly neglects his duty."

The host brought in the roast fowl, and stared at the dashing tone of Ned Hayward's speech toward one of the magnates of the neighborhood. Some words in the commencement of that speech had caused Mr. Wittingham's countenance to fall; but the attack upon himself in the conclusion roused him to indignant resistance, so that his reply was an angry demand of "Who the devil are you, sir?"

"I am the devil of nobody, Mr. Wittington," answered Ned Hayward. "I am my own devil, if anybody's, and my name is Edward Hayward, commonly called Captain Hayward, late of the 40th regiment, and now unattached. But as my supper is ready, I will beg leave to eat my chicken hot. Beauchamp, won't you join? Mr. Wittington, shall I give you a wing? Odd name, Wittington. Descendant of the renowned Lord Mayor of London, I presume?"

"No, sir, no," answered the magistrate, while Beauchamp could scarcely refrain from laughing. "What I want to know is, what you have to do with this affair?"

"Everything in the world," answered Ned Hayward, carving the chicken, "as I and my friend Beauchamp here had equal shares in saving the ladies from the clutches of these vagabonds. He came back here to give information, while I rode on with the ladies, to protect them. Bring me a bottle of your best sherry, landlord. Now, I'll tell you what, Mr. Wittington—haven't you got any ham that you could broil? I hate chicken without ham; it's as insipid as a country magistrate. I'll tell you what, Mr. Wittington, this matter shall be investigated to the bottom, whether you like it or not, and I have taken care to leave such marks upon two of the vagabonds that they'll be easily known for the next month to come. One of them is devilish like you, by the way, but younger. I hit him just over the eye, and down about the nose, so that I'll answer for it I have lettered him in black and blue as well as any sheep in your fields, and we'll catch him before we've done, though we must insist upon having the assistance of the justices."

"I think, sir, you intend to insult me," said the magistrate, rising with a very angry air, and a blank and embarrassed countenance.

"Not a whit, my dear sir," answered Ned Hayward. "Pray sit down and take a glass of wine."

"I won't, sir," exclaimed Mr. Wittingham, "and I shall leave the room. If you have anything to say to me, it must come before me in a formal manner, and at a proper hour. To-morrow I shall be at the justice-room till eleven, and I hope you will be then prepared to treat the bench with respect."

"The most profound, sir," said Ned Hayward, rising, and bowing till his face almost touched the table before him; and then, as Mr. Wittingham walked away with an indignant toss of the head, and closed the door behind him, our gay friend turned to his companion, saying, "There's something under this, Beauchamp. We must find out what it is."

CHAPTER III.

THE FATHER AND THE SON.

I WILL have nothing to do with antecedents. The reader must find them out if he can, as the book must explain what precedes the book.

The past is a tomb. There let events, as well as men, sleep in peace. Fate befall him who disturbs them; and, indeed, were there not even a sort of profanation in raking up things done as well as in troubling the ashes of the dead, what does man obtain by breaking into the grave of the past? Nothing but dry bones, denuded of all that made the living act interesting. History is but a great museum of osteology, where the skeletons of great deeds are preserved without the muscles—here a tall fact and there a short one—some sadly dismembered, and all crumbling with age, and covered with dust and cobwebs. Take up a skull, chapfallen as Yorick's. See how it grins at you with its lank jaws and gumless teeth—see how the vacant sockets of the eyes glare meaningless, and the brow, where high intelligence sat throned, commanding veneration, looks little wiser than a dried pumpkin. And thus—even thus, as insignificant of the living deeds that have been, are the dry bones of history, needing the inductive imagination of a Cuvier to clothe them again with the forms that once they wore.

No, no, I will have nothing to do with antecedents. They were past before the tale began, and let them rest.

Nevertheless, it is always well worth while, in order to avoid any long journeys back, to keep every part of the story going at once, and manfully to resist both our own inclination and the reader's, to follow any particular character, or class of characters, or series of events. Rather let us, going from scene to scene, and person to person, as often as it may be necessary, bring them up from the rear. It is likewise well worth while to pursue the career of such new character that may be introduced, till those who are newly made acquainted with him have discovered a sufficient portion of his peculiarities.

I shall, therefore, beg leave to follow Mr. Wittingham on his way homeward; but first I will ask the reader to remark him as he pauses for a moment at the inn door, with worthy Mr. Groomber a step behind. See how the excellent magistrate rubs the little vacant spot between the ear and the wig with the forefinger of the right-hand, as if he were a man amazingly puzzled, and then turns his head over his shoulder to inquire of the landlord if he knows who the two guests are, without obtaining any further information than that one of them had been for some weeks in the house—which Mr. Wittingham well knew before, he having the organ of Observation strongly developed—and that the other had just arrived, a fact which was also within the worthy magistrate's previous cognizance.

Mr. Wittingham rubs the organ above the ear again, gets the finger up to Ideality, and rubs that, then round to Cautiousness, and having slightly excited it with the extreme point of the index of the right-hand, pauses there, as if afraid of stimulating it too strongly, and unmanning his greater purposes; but it is a ticklish organ, soon called into action in some men, and see how easily Mr. Wittingham has brought its functions into operation. He buttons his coat up to the chin as if it were winter, and yet it is as mild an evening as one could wish to take a walk in by the side of a clear stream, with the fair moon for a companion, or something fairer still. It is evident that Cautiousness is at work at a terrible rate, otherwise he would never think of buttoning up his coat on such a night as that; and now, without another word to the landlord, he crosses the street and bends his steps homeward with a slow, thoughtful, vacillating step, murmuring to himself two or three words which our friend Ned Hayward had pronounced, as if they contained some spell which forced his tongue to their repetition.

"Very like me," he said, "very like me! Hang the fellow! Very like me! Why, what the devil—he can't mean to accuse me of robbing the carriage. Very like me! Then, as the mischief must have it, that it should be Mrs. Clifford, too! I shall have roystering Sir John upon my back—'pon my life, I do not know what to do. Perhaps it would be better to be civil to these two young fellows, and ask them to dinner, though I do not half like that Beauchamp—I always thought there was something suspicious about him, with his grave look and his long solitary walks—nobody knowing him, and he knowing nobody. Yet this Captain Hayward seems a great friend of his, and he is a friend of Sir John's, so he must be somebody—I wonder who the devil he is? Beauchamp—Beauchamp! I shouldn't wonder if he were some man rusticated from Oxford. I'll write and ask Henry. He can, most likely, tell."

The distance which Mr. Wittingham had to go was by no means great, for the little town contained only three streets—one long one, and two others leading out of it. In one of the latter, or, rather, at the end of one of the latter, for it verged upon the open country beyond the town, was a large house, his own particular dwelling, built upon the rise of the hill, with large gardens and pleasure-grounds surrounding it, a new, well-constructed, neatly-pointed brick wall, two green gates, and sundry conservatories. It had altogether an air of freshness and comfort about it which was certainly pleasant to look upon; but it had nothing venerable. It spoke of fortunes lately made, and riches fully enjoyed, because they had not always been possessed. It was too neat to be picturesque, too smart to be in good taste. It was a bit of Clapham or Tooting transported a hundred or two miles into the country—very suburban indeed!

And yet it is possible that Mr. Wittingham had never seen Clapham in his life, or Tooting either; for he had been born in the town where he now lived, had accumulated wealth, as a merchant on a small scale, in a seaport town about fifty miles distant; had improved considerably, by perseverance, a very limited stock of abilities; and, having done all this in a short time, had returned at the age of fifty to enact the country gentleman in his native place. With the ordinary ambition of low minds, however, he wished much that his origin and the means of his rise should be forgotten by those who knew them, concealed from those who did not; and, therefore, he dressed like a country gentleman, spoke like a country gentleman, hunted with the fox-hounds, and added "J. P." to his "Esquire."

Nevertheless, do what he would, there was something of his former calling that still remained about him. It is a dirty world this we live in, and everything has its stain. A door is never painted five minutes but some indelible finger-mark is printed on it; a table is never polished half an hour, but some drop of water falls and spots it. Give either precisely the same color again if you can! Each trade, each profession, from the shopkeeper to the prime minister, marks its man more or less for life, and I am not quite sure that the stamp of one is much fouler than that of another. There is great vulgarity in all pride, and most of all in official pride; and the difference between that vulgarity and the vulgarity of inferior education is not in favor of the former, for it affects the mind, while the other principally affects the manner.

Heaven and earth, what a rambler I have taken! But I will go back again gently by a path across the fields. Something of the merchant, the small merchant, still hung about Mr. Wittingham. It was not alone that he kept all his books by double entry, and even in his magisterial capacity, when dealing with rogues and vagabonds, had a sort of debtor and creditor account with them, very curious in its items; neither was it altogether that he had a vast idea of the importance of wealth, and looked upon a good banker's book, with heavy balance in favor, as the chief of the cardinal virtues; but there were various peculiarities of manner and small traits of character, which displayed the habit of mind to inquiring eyes very remarkably. His figures of speech, whenever he forgot himself for a moment, were all of the counting-house: when on the bench he did not know what to do with his legs for want of a high stool; but the trait with which we have most to do was a certain propensity to inquire into the solidity and monetary respectability of all men, whether they came into relationship with himself or not. He looked upon them all as "firms," with whom at some time he might have to transact business; and I much doubt whether he did not mentally put "and Co." to the name of every one of his acquaintances. Now Beauchamp and Co. puzzled him; he doubted that the house was firm; he could make nothing out of their affairs; he had not, since Mr. Beauchamp first appeared in the place, been able even to get a glimpse of their transactions; and though it was but a short distance, as I have said, from the inn to his own dwelling, before he had reached the latter he had asked himself, at least twenty times, "Who and what Mr. Beauchamp could be?"

"I should like to look at his ledger," said Mr. Wittingham to himself at length, as he opened his gate and went in; but there was a book open for Mr. Wittingham in his own house, which was not likely to show a very favorable account.

Although the door of Mr. Wittingham's house, which was a glass door, stood confidingly unlocked as long as the sun was above the horizon, yet Mr. Wittingham had always a pass-key in his pocket, and when the first marble step leading from the gravel-walk up to the entrance was found, the worthy magistrate's hand was always applied to an aperture in his upper garment, just upon the haunch, from which the key was sure to issue forth, whether the door was open or not.

The door, however, was now shut, and the pass-key proved serviceable; but no sooner did Mr. Wittingham stand in the passage of his own mansion than he stopped short in breathless and powerless astonishment; for there before him stood two figures in close confabulation, which he certainly did not expect to see in that place, at that time, in such near proximity.

The one was that of a woman, perhaps fifty-five years of age, but who looked still older from the fact of being dressed in the mode of thirty years before. Her garments might be those of an upper servant, and indeed they were so; for the personage was neither more nor less than the housekeeper; but to all appearance she was a resuscitated housekeeper of a former age; for the gown padded in a long roll just under the blade-bones, the straight cut bodice, the tall but flat-crowned and wide-spreading cap, were not of the day in which she lived, and her face too was as dry as the outer shell of a cocoa-nut. The other figure had the back turned to the door, and was evidently speaking earnestly to Mrs. Billiter; but it was that of a man, tall, and though stiffly made, yet sinewy and strong.

Mr. Wittingham's breath came thick and short, but the noise of his suddenly opening the door, and his step in the hall, made the housekeeper utter a low cry of surprise, and her male companion turn quickly round. Then Mr. Wittingham's worst apprehensions were realized, for the face he saw before him was that of his own son, though somewhat disfigured by an eye swollen and discolored, and a deep long cut just over it on the brow.

The young man seemed surprised and confounded by the unexpected apparition of his father, but it was too late to shirk the encounter, though he well knew it would not be a pleasant one. He was accustomed, too, to scenes of altercation with his parent, for Mr. Wittingham had not proceeded wisely with his son, who was a mere boy when he himself retired from business. He had not only alternately indulged him and thwarted him; encouraged him to spend money largely, and to dazzle the eyes of the neighbors by expense, at the same time limiting his means and exacting a rigid account of his payments; but as the young man had grown up he had continued sometimes to treat him as a boy, sometimes as a man; and while he more than connived at his emulating the great in those pleasures which approach vices, he denied him the sums by which such a course could alone be carried out.

Thus a disposition, naturally vehement and passionate, had been rendered irritable and reckless, and a character self-willed and perverse had become obstinate and disobedient. Dispute after dispute arose between father and son after the spoilt boy became the daring and violent youth, till at length Mr. Wittingham, for the threefold purpose of putting him under some sort of discipline, of removing him from bad associates, and giving him the tone of a gentleman, had sent him to Oxford. One year had passed over well enough, but at the commencement of the second year, Mr. Wittingham found that his notions of proper economy were very different from his son's, and that Oxford was not likely to reconcile the difference. He heard of him horse-racing, driving stage-coaches, betting on pugilists, gambling, drinking, getting deeper and deeper in debt; and his letters of remonstrance were either not answered at all, or answered with contempt.

A time had come, however, when the absolute necessity of recruiting his finances from his father's purse had reduced the youth to promises of amendment and a feigned repentance; and just at the time our tale opens, the worthy magistrate was rocking himself in the cradle of delusive expectations, and laying out many a plan for the future life of his reformed son, when suddenly, as we have seen, he found him standing talking to the housekeeper in his own hall, with the marks of a recent scuffle very visible on his face.

The consternation of Mr. Wittingham was terrible; for though by no means a man of ready combinations in any other matter than pounds, shillings, and pence, his fancy was not so slow a beast as to fail in joining together the description which Ned Hayward had given of the marks he had set upon one of the worthy gentlemen who had been found attacking Mrs. Clifford's carriage, and the cuts and bruises upon the fair face of his gentle offspring. He had also various private reasons of his own for supposing that such an enterprise as that which had been interrupted in Tarningham-lane, as the place was called, might very well come within the sphere of his son's energies, and for a moment he gave himself up to a sort of apathetic despair, seeing all his fond hopes of rustic rule and provincial importance dashed to the ground by the conduct of his own child.

It was reserved for that child to rouse him from his stupor, however; for, though undoubtedly the apparition of his father was anything but pleasant to Henry Wittingham, at that particular moment, when he was arranging with the housekeeper (who had aided to spoil him with all her energies) that he was to have secret board and lodging in the house for a couple of days without his parent's knowledge, yet his was a bold spirit, not easily cowed, and much accustomed to outface circumstances however disagreeable they might be. Marching straight up to his father, then, without a blush, as soon as he had recovered from the first surprise, he said, "So, you see I have come back, sir, for a day or two, to worship my household gods, as we say at Oxford, and to get a little more money; for you did not send me enough. However, it may be as well, for various reasons, not to let people know that I am here. Our old dons do not like us to be absent without leave, and may think that I ought to have notified to them my intention of giving you such an agreeable surprise."

Such overpowering impudence was too much for Mr. Wittingham's patience, the stock of which was somewhat restricted; and he first swore a loud and very unmagisterial oath; then, however, recollecting himself, without abating one particle of his wrath, he said in a stern tone, and with a frowning brow, "Be so good as to walk into that room for five minutes, sir."

"Lord, sir, don't be angry," exclaimed the housekeeper, who did not at all like the look of her master's face, "it is only a frolic, sir."

"Hold your tongue, Billiter! you are a fool," thundered Mr. Wittingham. "Walk in there, sir, and you shall soon hear my mind as to your frolics."

"Oh, certainly, I will walk in," replied his son, not appearing in the least alarmed, though there was something in the expression of his father's countenance that did frighten him a little, because he had never seen that something before—something difficult to describe—a struggle as it were with himself, which showed the anger he felt to be more profound than he thought it right to show all at once. "I certainly will walk in and take a cup of tea, if you will give me one," and as he spoke he passed the door into the library.

"You will neither eat nor drink in this house more, till your conduct is wholly changed, sir," said Mr. Wittingham, shutting the door behind him, "the books are closed, sir,—there is a large balance against you, and that must be liquidated before they can be opened again. What brought you here?"

"What I have said," answered the young man, beginning to feel that his situation was not a very good one, but still keeping up his affected composure, "the yearnings of filial affection and a lack of pocket-money."

"So you can lie too, to your father," said Mr. Wittingham, bitterly. "You will find that I can tell the truth however, and to begin, I will inform you of what brought you hither—but no, it would take too much time to do that; for the sooner you are gone the better for yourself and all concerned—you must go, sir, I tell you—you must go directly."

A hesitation had come upon Mr. Wittingham while he spoke; his voice shook, his lip quivered, his tall frame was terribly agitated; and his son attributed all these external signs of emotion to a very different cause from the real one. He thought he saw in them the symptoms of a relenting parent, or at least of an irresolute one, and he prepared to act accordingly; while his father thought of nothing but the danger of having him found in his house, after the commission of such an outrage as that which he had perpetrated that night; but the very thought made him tremble in every limb—not so much for his son indeed, as for himself.

"I beg pardon, my dear sir," replied the young man, recovering all his own impudence at the sight of his father's agitation; "but it would not be quite convenient for me to go to-night. It is late, I am tired; my purse is very empty."

"Pray how did you get that cut upon your head?" demanded the magistrate, abruptly.

"Oh, a little accident," replied his son; "it is a mere scratch—nothing at all."

"It looks very much like a blow from the butt-end of a heavy horsewhip," said his father, sternly, "just such as a man who had stopped two ladies in a carriage might receive from a strong arm come to their rescue. You do not propose to go then? Well, if that be the case, I must send for the constable and give you into his hands, for there is an information laid against you for felony, and witnesses ready to swear to your person. Shall I ring the bell, or do you go?"

The young man's face had turned deadly pale, and he crushed the two sides of his hat together between his hands. He uttered but one word, however, and that was—"Money."

"Not a penny," answered Mr. Wittingham, turning his shoulder, "not one penny, you have had too much already—you would make me bankrupt and yourself too." The next moment, however, he continued, "Stay; on one condition, I will give you twenty pounds."

"What is it?" asked the son, eagerly, but somewhat fiercely too, for he suspected that the condition would be hard.

"It is that you instantly go back to Oxford, and swear by all you hold sacred—if you hold anything sacred at all—not to quit it for twelve months, or till Mary Clifford is married."

"You ask what I cannot do," said the son, in a tone of deep and bitter despondency, contrasting strangely with that which he had previously used; "I cannot go back to Oxford. You must know all in time, and may as well know it now—I am expelled from Oxford; and you had your share in it, for had you sent me what I asked, I should not have been driven to do what I have done. I cannot go back; and as to abandoning my pursuit of Mary Clifford, I will not do that either. I love her, and she shall be mine, sooner or later, let who will say no."

"Expelled from Oxford!" cried Mr. Wittingham, with his eyes almost starting from their sockets. "Get out of my sight, and out of my house; go where you will—do what you will—you are no son of mine any more. Away with you, or I will myself give you into custody, and sign the warrant for your committal. Not a word more, sir, begone; you may take your clothes, if you will, but let me see no more of you. I cast you off; begone, I say."

"I go," answered his son, "but one day you will repent of this, and wish me back, when perhaps you will not be able to find me."

"No fear of that," answered Mr. Wittingham; "if you do not return till I seek you, the house will be long free from your presence. Away with you at once, and no more words."

Without reply, Henry Wittingham quitted the room, and hurried up to the bedchamber which he inhabited when he was at home, opened several drawers, and took out various articles of dress, and some valuable trinkets—a gold chain, a diamond brooch, two or three jeweled pins and rings. He lingered a little, perhaps fancying that his father might relent, perhaps calculating what his own conduct should be when he was summoned back to the library. But when he had been about five minutes in his chamber, there was a tap at the door; and the housekeeper came in.

"It is no use, Billiter," said the young man, "I am going. My father has treated me shamefully."

"It is no use indeed, Master Harry," replied the good woman, "he is as hard as a stone. I have said everything he would let me say, but he drove me out of the room like a wild beast. But don't give it up, Master Harry. Go away for a day or two to Burton's inn, by Chandleigh—he'll come round in time, and you can very well spend a week or so there, and be very comfortable."

"But money, Billiter, money!" exclaimed the young man, whose heart had sunk again to find that all his expectations of his father's resolution giving way were vain. "What shall I do for money?"

"Stay a bit, stay a bit," said the good woman; "what I have got you may have, Master Harry, as welcome as the flowers in May. I've ten pounds here in this little purse;" and she dived into one of the large pockets that hung outside of her capacious petticoat, producing a very dirty, old knitted purse with a steel clasp, and adding, as she put it in her young master's hand, "It is a pity now that Mr. Wittingham wheedled me into putting all the rest of my earnings into the Tarningham bank, where he has a share—but that will do for the present, if you are careful, Master Harry—but don't go to drink claret and such expensive nasty stuff, there's a good boy."

"That I won't, Billiter," answered Henry Wittingham, pocketing the money without remorse of conscience, "and I will repay you when I can—some day or another. I shall certainly be able, for the houses at Exmouth are settled upon me;" and packing up all that he thought fit to take in a large silk-handkerchief, he opened the door again, and began to descend the stairs. A chilly sensation crept over him ere he reached the bottom, as memory brought back happy days, and he thought that he was going forth from the home of his youth, perhaps forever, that he was an exile from his father's dwelling, from his love, an outcast, a wanderer, with nothing but his own wayward spirit for his guide—nought but his own pride for his support. He was not yet sufficiently hardened to bear the shadow of his exile lightly, to look upon it as a relief from restraint, a mere joyous adventure which would have its interest during its progress, and would soon be over. But, nevertheless, his pride was strong, and as yet unchecked; and when the thought of going back to his father, asking his forgiveness, and promising all that he required, crossed his mind, he cast it from him with disdain, saying, "Never, never! he shall ask me humbly first." And, with this very lowly determination, he walked out of the house.

"I shall be able to hear of you at Burton's, by Chandleigh," said the housekeeper, as he stood on the top step.

"Yes, yes, you will hear of me there," he replied, and descending the steps, he was soon wandering in darkness among parterres, every step of the way being as familiar to him as his father's library.

CHAPTER IV.

THE POSTBOY AND THE POTBOY.

After a few words of common observation upon Mr. Wittingham and his proceedings when that excellent gentleman had left the room at the little inn of Tarningham, Ned Hayward fell into a very unusual fit of thought.

I do not mean in the least to say that it was unusual for Ned Hayward to think, for probably he thought as much as other men, but there are various ways of thinking. There are pondering, meditating, brown studying, day dreaming, revolving, considering, contemplating, and though many of these terms may at first sight seem synonymous, yet upon close examination it will be found that there are shades of difference between the meanings. Beside these ways or modes of thinking, there are various other mental processes, such as investigating, examining, disentangling, inquiring, but with these I will not meddle, as my business is merely with the various operations of the mind which require various degrees of rapidity. Now though Ned Hayward, as I have said, probably thought as much as other men, his sort of thought was generally of a very quick and active habit. He was not fond of meditating, his mind's slowest pace was a canter, and when he found an obstacle of any kind, hedge, gate, fence, or stone wall, he took up his stirrups and went over it. Now, however, for once in his life, he paused and pondered for full five minutes, and then thinking perhaps it might seem a little rude if he treated his new-found friend to nothing but meditation, he began to talk of other things, still meditating over the former subject of his contemplations all the while.

It must not be supposed, however, that he did not think of what he was saying. Such a supposition might indeed be founded upon the old axiom that men cannot do two things at once. But the axiom is false: there never was a falser. We are always doing many things at once. There would be very little use of our having hands and feet, tongues and eyes, ears and nose, unless each of our organs with a little practice could go on quite quietly in its little workshop, without disturbing the others. Indeed it is very serviceable sometimes to give our more volatile members something light to do, when we are employing others upon more serious business, just to keep them out of the way, as we do with noisy children. So also is it with the mind and its faculties, and it is not only quite possible, depend upon it, dear reader, to think of two subjects at once, but very common also.

Totally unacquainted with Mr. Beauchamp's habits and character, or what topics he could converse upon; and what not, Ned Hayward naturally chose one which seemed perfectly indifferent and perfectly easy; but it led them soon to deeper considerations, as a very small key will often open a very large door. It led to some political discussions too; but let it be remarked, this is not a political novel, that most wearisome and useless of all the illegitimate offspring of literature, and therefore if I give a few sentences of their conversation, it is not to insinuate sneakingly my own opinions, but merely to display my characters more fully.

"This seems a pretty little town," said Ned Hayward, choosing the first free subject at hand; "quite rural, and with all the tranquillity of the country about it."

"It is indeed," answered Mr. Beauchamp; "but I should almost have supposed that a gayer place would have pleased you more. Were you never here before?"

"Never in my life," replied his companion; "but you are quite mistaken about my tastes. London, indeed, is a very pleasant place for three months or so; but one soon gets tired of it. It gets slow, devilish slow, after a while. One cannot go to the theatre every night. There is little use of going to balls and parties, and risking falling in love, if one has not got money enough to marry. One gets weary of the faces and the houses in St. James's street. Morning visits are the greatest bores in the world. Epsom and Ascot are good enough things in their way, but they are soon over for one who does not bet and runs no horses. The newspapers tire me to death—romances I abominate; and though a good opera comes in twice a week to lighten the load a little, it gets desperate heavy on one's shoulders before the first of July. Antiquarians, connoisseurs, lawyers, physicians, fiddlers, and portrait-painters, with merchants, and all the bees of the hive, may find London a very pleasant and profitable place. I am nothing but a drone, and so I fly away in the country. Of all towns after the second month, I hate London the most—except a manufacturing town indeed, and that is always horrible, even to change horses in."

"And yet perhaps," answered Beauchamp, "a manufacturing town offers subjects of deeper interest than any other spot of the earth—especially at the present moment."

"Not in themselves, surely," said Ned Hayward; "the abstract idea of broadcloth is to me very flat, cotton-spinning not particularly exciting, iron ware is far too hard for me to handle, and as for the production of soda and pearlash, I have no genius that way. But I suppose," he continued, "you mean that the manufacturing towns are interesting from their bearing upon the prosperity of the country; but in that case it is your speculations regarding them that interest you, not the places themselves."

"So it is with everything," answered Mr. Beauchamp; "no single image or impression gives us great pleasure. It is in their combination that our engagement dwells. Single ideas are but straight lines, blank plains, monotonous patches of color. Associate them with other shapes and hues, and you produce beauty and pleasure. Thus with the manufacturing towns: if I only went to see a steam-engine work, a shuttle play, or a spindle turn, I should soon be tired enough; but when in all that I see there, I perceive a new development of man's mind, a fresh course opened for his energies when old ones are exhausted, when I behold the commencement of a great social change, which shall convert the pursuits of tribes and nations from agricultural to manufacturing—we rather shall throw the great mass of human industry, for which its former sphere was too small, into another and almost interminable channel, I feel that I am a spectator of a great social phenomenon, as awful and as grand as the lightning that rends the pine, or the earthquake that overthrows the mountain. It is magnificent, yet terrible; beautiful, but still sad."

"Why sad?" demanded Ned Hayward. "I have considered the matter in the same light a little, and have talked with various grave manufacturers about it; but they all seem to see nothing in it but what is very fine and pleasant. They have no apprehension for the result, or doubts about its doing a great deal of good to everybody in the end."

"The end!" said Beauchamp, "where is the end? What will the end be? They see nothing but good; they augur nothing but good, because they are actively employed in that one particular course, and buoyed up with those sanguine expectations which active exertion always produces. Neither do I doubt that the end will be good; but still, ere that end be reached, how much misery, how much strife, how much evil, must be encountered. One needs but to set one's foot in a factory, ay, or in a manufacturing town, to see that the evil not only will be, but is; that we are wading into a dark stream which we must pass over, and are already knee-deep. I speak not of the evils inseparable from the working of any great change in the relations of society or in its objects. As we can never climb a hill without some fatigue, so we can never reach a higher point in social advance without some suffering, but that inevitable evil I look upon as light, compared with many other things before us. I doubt not that in God's good providence new resources will be ever opened before mankind for the employment of human industry; but when I see a temporary superfluity of labor, I tremble to think of what vast power of grinding and oppressing that very circumstance places in the hands of the employer. Combine that power with the state of men's minds at present, and all the tendencies of the age; remember that to accumulate wealth, to rival others in luxury and display, to acquire at any price and by any means, is a part not of the manufacturer's spirit, but of the spirit of the age, and especially of this country, and then see to what purposes must and will be applied that vast authority or command, which the existing superabundance of labor brought about by mechanical inventions and the natural increase of population intrusts to those who have already the power of wealth. Were it not for this spirit acting through this power, should we see in our manufactories such squalid misery, such enfeebled frames, such overtasked exertions, such want of moral and religious culture, such recklessness, such vice, such infamy, such famine!"

"Perhaps not," answered Ned Hayward, "but yet something is to be said for the manufacturers too. You see, my good sir, they have to compete with all Europe. They are, as it were, running a race, and they must win it, even if they break their horses' wind."

"If they do that, they will lose it," replied Beauchamp; "but yet I do not blame them. I allow for the spirit of the times we live in. They only share it with other men; many of them are humane, kind, generous, just, who do as much good and as little evil as the iron band of circumstances will permit; and were all to strive in the same manner, and to the same degree, that iron band would be broken, and all would be wiser, happier, better — ay, even wealthier than they are; but, alas! the example of the good has little influence on the rest on the same level with themselves, and the example of the bad, immense influence on every grade beneath them. The cupidity of the great mill-owner is imitated and exceeded by those below him. He robs the poor artisan of his labor, by allowing him as little out of the wealth his exertions earn as the superfluity of industry compels the artisan to take, and justifies himself with the cold axiom, that he is not bound to pay more than other men; those below him rob the same defenceless being of a great part of those poor wages themselves by a more direct kind of plunder, and have their axiom too. One of the great problems of the day is this: what proportion of the profits accruing from the joint operation of capital and labor is to be assigned to each of those two elements? And the day will come ere long, depend upon it, when that great problem must be solved—I trust not in bloody characters. At present, there is no check to secure a fair division; and so long as there is none, wealth will always take advantage of poverty, and the competition for mere food will induce necessity to submit to avarice, till the burden becomes intolerable—and then—"

"What then?" asked Ned Hayward.

"Nay, God forbid," answered Beauchamp, "that the fears which will sometimes arise should ever be verified. A thousand unforeseen events may occur to waft away the dangers that seem to menace us; but I cannot help thinking, that in the mean time there are many duties neglected by those who have the power to interfere; for surely, if any foresight be wisdom, any human providence a virtue, they are the foresight that perceives the future magnitude of evils yet in the bud, and the providence that applies a remedy in time."

"Very true," answered Ned Hayward; "things do look rather badly; but I dare say all will get right at last. I have not thought of such things very deeply—not half so deeply as you have done, I know; but still I have been sorry to see, in many of our great towns, the people so wretched-looking; and sometimes I have thought that if better care were taken of them —I mean both in mind and body—our judges at the assizes would not have so much to do. Just as fevers spread through whole countries from a great congregation of sickly people, so crime extend through a land from great congregations of vicious people. For my part, if, like our good friend Abon Hassan, I could but be caliph for a short time, I'd open out all the narrow streets, and drain all the foul lands, and cultivate all ignorant minds, and try to purify all the corrupt hearts by the only thing that can purify them. But I am not caliph, and if I were, the task is above me, I fancy; but still, if it could be accomplished, even in part, I am quite sure that jurymen would dine earlier, lawyers have less to do, courts would rise at three o'clock, and the lord mayor and sheriffs eat their turtle more in peace. But talking of that, do you know I have been thinking all this while now we could get some insight into this affair of the highway robbery; for I am determined I will not let the matter sleep. Highway robberies are going quite out of fashion. I have not heard of one for these four months. Hounslow Heath is almost as safe as Berkeley-square, and Bagshot no more to be feared than Windsor Castle. It is a pity to let such things revive; and there is something about that old fellow Wittingham which strikes me as odd. Another thing too was funny enough. Why should they pull the young lady out of the chaise? She could just as well have handed her purse and her trinkets out of the window!"

"That seemed strange to me also," answered Beauchamp. "But how do you propose to proceed?"

"Why, I think the best way will be to frighten the post-boy," replied Ned Hayward. "He's in league with the rogues, whoever they are, depend upon it; and if he thinks his neck's in a noose, he'll 'peach."

"That is not improbable," said his companion; "but we had better proceed cautiously, for if we frighten him into denying all knowledge of the parties, he will adhere to his story for mere consistency's sake."

"Oh, I'll manage him, I will manage him," answered Ned Hayward, who had carried so many points in his life by his dashing straightforwardness, that he had very little doubt of his own powers. "Come along, and we will see. Let us saunter out into the yard, in a quiet careless way, as if we were sentimental and loved moonlight. We shall find him somewhere rubbing down his horses, or drinking a pint on the bench."

The two gentlemen accordingly took their hats and issued forth, Ned Hayward leading the way first out into the street through a glass door, and then round into the yard by an archway. This manœuvre was intended to elude the vigilant eyes of Mr. Groomber, and was so far successful that the landlord, being one of that small class of men who can take a hint, did not come out after them to offer his services, though he saw the whole proceeding, and while he was uncorking sherry, or portioning out tea, or making up a bill, kept one eye—generally the right—turned toward a window that looked in the direction of the stables. Before those stables the bright moon was laying out her silver carpeting, though, truth to say, she might have found a cleaner floor to spread it on; and there too paraded up and down our friends, Ned Hayward and Mr. Beauchamp, looking for the post-boy who had driven Mrs. Clifford and her daughter, but not perceiving him in any direction, Ned Hayward began to suspect he had reckoned without his host. The man was not rubbing down his horses, he was not drinking a pint on the bench, he was not smoking a pipe at the inn door.

"Well," he said at length, "I will look into all the stables to see after my horse. It is but right I should attend to his supper now I have had my own, and perhaps we may find what we are looking for on the road. Let us wait awhile, however, till that one-eyed ostler is passed, or he will tell us where the horse is, and spoil our manœuvre." And, walking on, he pointed out to Beauchamp a peculiar spot upon the moon's surface, and commented upon it with face upturned till the inconvenient ostler had gone by.

At that moment, however, another figure appeared in the yard, which at once brought light into Ned Hayward's mind. It was not a pretty figure, nor had it a pretty face belonging to it. The back was bowed and contorted in such a manner as to puzzle the tailor exceedingly to fit it with a fustian jacket when it required a new one, which luckily was not often; the legs were thin, and more like a bird's than a human being's, and though the skull was large and not badly shaped, the features that appeared below the tall forehead seemed all to be squeezed together, so as to acquire a rat-like expression, not uncommon in the deformed. The head, which was bare, was thatched with thin yellow hair, but the eyes were black and clear, and the teeth large and white, the garments which this poor creature wore were those of an inferior servant of an inn; and his peculiar function seemed to be denoted by a tankard of beer, which he carried in his hand from the door of the tap toward the stables.

"He is carrying our friend his drink," said Ned Hayward, in a whisper to Beauchamp, "let us watch where the little pot-boy goes in, and I'll take seven to one we find the man we want."

The pot-boy gave a shrewd glance at the two gentlemen as he passed them, but hurried on toward one of the doors far down the yard, which when it was opened displayed a light within; and as soon as he had deposited his tankard and returned, those who had watched him followed his course and threw back the same door without ceremony. There before them, seated on a bench at a deal-table, was the post-boy of whom they were in search. They had both marked him well by the evening light, and there could be no doubt of his identity, though by this time he had got his hat and jacket off, and was sitting with a manecomb on one hand and a currycomb on the other, and the tankard of beer between them. He was a dull, unpleasant, black-bearded sort of fellow of fifty-five or six, with a peculiarly cunning gray eye, and a peculiarly resolute slow mouth, and as soon as Ned Hayward beheld the expression by the light of a tallow-candle in a high state of perspiration, he muttered, "We shall not make much of this specimen."

Nevertheless, he went on in his usual careless tone addressing the lord of the posting-saddle, and saying, "Good night, my man; I want you to tell me where I can find a gentleman I wish to see hereabout."

The post-boy had risen, and pulled the lock of short black and white hair upon his forehead, but without looking a bit more communicative than at first, and he merely answered, "If I knows where he lives, sir. What's his name?"

"Why, that's another matter," replied Ned Hayward; "perhaps he may not much like his name mentioned; but I can tell you what people call him sometimes. He goes by the name of Wolf occasionally."

The slightest possible twinkle of intelligence came into the man's eyes for a moment, and then went out again, just as when clouds are driving over the sky at night we sometimes see something sparkle for an instant, and then disappear from the heavens, so faint while it is present, and so soon gone, that we cannot tell whether it be a star or not.

"Can't say I ever heard of such a gemman here, sir," replied the post-boy. "There's Jimmy Lamb, sir, the mutton-pieman, but that's the nearest name to Wolf we have in these parts."

"Why, my good friend, you saw him this very night," said Mr. Beauchamp, "when the chaise was stopped that you were driving. He was one of the principals in that affair."

"Likely, sir," answered the other, "but they were all strangers to me—never set eyes on one on 'em afore. But if you knows 'em, you'll soon catch 'em; and that will be a good job, for it is very unpleasant to be kept a waiting so. It's as bad as a 'pike."

"I've a notion," said Ned Hayward, "that you can find out my man for me if you like; and if you do, you may earn a crown; but if you do not you may get into trouble, for concealing felons renders you what is called an accessory, and that is a capital crime. You know the law, sir," he continued, turning to Beauchamp, and speaking in an authoritative tone, "and if I am not mistaken, this comes under the statute of limitations as a clear case of misprision, which under the old law was merely burning in the hand and transportation for life, but is now hanging matter. You had better think over the business, my man, and let me have an immediate answer with due deliberation, for you are not a person I should think to put your head in a halter, and if you were, I should not advise you to do so in this case."

"Thank you, sir," said the post-boy, "I won't; but I don't know the gemmen as showed themselves such rum customers, nor him either as you are a axing arter."

"It is in vain, I fear," said Beauchamp to his companion in a very low voice, as their respondent made this very definite answer, "the magistrates may perhaps obtain some further information from him when he finds that the matter is serious, but we shall not."

The post-boy caught a few of the words apparently, and perhaps it was intended that he should do so, but they were without effect; and when at length they walked away baffled, he twisted the eyelids into a sort of wreath round his left eye, observing with his tongue in his cheek, "Ay, ay, my covies, go go!"

Ned Hayward opened the door somewhat suddenly, and as he went out, he almost tumbled over the little humpbacked pot-boy. Now whether the young gentleman—his years might be nineteen or twenty, though his stature was that of a child of eight—came thither to replenish the tankard he had previously brought, or whether he affected the moonlight, or was fond of conversation in which he did not take a part, Ned Hayward could not at the moment divine; but before he and Beauchamp had taken a dozen steps up the yard, Hayward felt a gentle pull at his coat-tail.

"What is it, my lad?" he said, looking down upon the pot-boy, and at the same time stooping his head as if with a full impression that his ears at their actual height could hear nothing that proceeded from a point so much below as the deformed youth's mouth.

Instantly a small high-pitched but very musical voice replied, "I'll come for your boots early to-morrow, sir, and tell you all about it."

"Can't you tell me now?" asked the young gentleman; "I am going into the stable to see my horse, and you can say your say there, my man."

"I daren't," answered the pot-boy, "there's Tim the ostler, and Jack Millman's groom, and Long Billy, the Taunton post-boy, all about. I'll come to-morrow and fetch your boots."

At the same moment the landlord's voice exclaiming in sharp tones, "Dicky! Dicky Lamb!—what the devil are you so long about?" was heard, and the pot-boy ran off as fast as his long thin legs would carry him.

"Well, this affair promises some amusement," said Ned Hayward, when they had again reached the little parlor, which in his good-humored easy way he now looked upon as common to them both. "Upon my word I am obliged to these highwaymen, or whatever the scoundrels may be, for giving me something fresh to think of. Although at good Sir John Slingsby's I shall have fishing enough, I dare say, yet one cannot fish all day and every day, and sometimes one gets desperately bored in an old country-house, unless fate strikes out something not quite in the common way to occupy one."

"Did you ever try falling in love?" asked Beauchamp, with a quiet smile, as he glanced his eyes over the fine form and handsome features of his companion; "it is an excellent pastime, I am told."

"No!" answered Ned Hayward quickly and straightforwardly; "I never did, and never shall. I am too poor, Mr. Beauchamp, to marry in my own class of society, and maintain my wife in the state which that class implies. I am too honest to make love without intending to marry; too wise I trust to fall in love where nothing could be the result but unhappiness to myself, if not to another also." He spoke these few sentences very seriously; but then, resuming at once his gay rattling manner, he went on: "Oh, I have drilled myself capitally, I assure you. At twenty I was like a raw recruit, bungling at every step; I found myself saying all manner of sweet things to every pretty face I met; felt my heart beating whenever, under the pretty face, I thought I discovered something that would last longer. But I saw so much of love in a cottage and its results, that, after calculating well what a woman brought up in good society would have to sacrifice who married a man with 600*l.* a year, I voted it unfair to ask her, and made up my mind to my conduct. As soon as I find that I wish to dance with any dear girl twice in a night, and fall into reveries when I think of her, and feel a sort of warm blood at my fingers' ends when my hand touches hers, I am off like a hair trigger, for if a man is bound to act with honor to other men, who can make him if he does not willingly, he is ten times more strongly bound to do so toward women, who can neither defend nor avenge themselves."

With a sudden impulse Beauchamp held out his hand to him, and shook his heartily, and that grasp seemed to say, "I know you now to the heart. We are friends."

Ned Hayward was a little surprised at this enthusiastic burst of Mr. Beauchamp, for he had set him down for what is generally called a very gentlemanlike person, which means, in the common parlance of the world, a man who has either used up everything like warm feeling, or has never possessed it, and who, not being troubled with any emotions, suffers polite manners and conventional habits to rule him in and out. With his usual rapid way of jumping at conclusions, which he often found very convenient, though to say the truth he sometimes jumped over the right ones—he said to himself at once, "Well, this is really a good fellow, I do believe, and a man of some heart and soul."

But though Beauchamp's warm shake of the hand had led him to this conviction, and he thought he began to understand him, yet Ned Hayward was a little curious as to a question which his new friend had asked him once before. He had answered it, it is true, by telling him that he took care not to fall in love; but he fancied that Mr. Beauchamp had inquired in a peculiar tone, and that he must have had some meaning more than the words implied, taken in their simple and straightforward application.

"Come now, tell me, Beauchamp," he said, after just five seconds' consideration, "what made you ask if I had ever tried falling in love by way of amusement! Did you ever hear any story of my being guilty of such practices! If you have it was no true one—at least for six or seven years past."

"Oh, no," replied Beauchamp laughing, "I have had no means of learning your secret history. I only inquired because, if you have never tried that pleasant amusement, you will soon have a capital opportunity. Sir John Slingsby's daughter is one of the loveliest girls I ever saw."

"What, old Jack with a daughter!" exclaimed Ned Hayward; then added after a moment's thought, "by the way, so he had. I remember her coming to see him when we were at Winchester. He was separated from her mother, who was a saint, I recollect. Nobody could accuse old Jack of that himself, and his daughter used to come and see him at times. A pretty little girl she was; I think five or six years old. Let me see, she must be about sixteen or seventeen now; for that is just ten years ago, when I was an ensign."

"She is more than that," answered Beauchamp, "by two or three years; and either it must be longer since you saw her, or—"

"Oh, no, it is just ten years ago," cried Mr. Hayward: "ten years next month, for I was then seventeen myself."

"Well, then, she must have been older than you thought," replied his companion.

"Very likely," said Mr. Hayward. "I never could tell girls' ages, especially when they are children. But there is no fear of my falling in love with her, if she is what you tell me. I never fell in love with a beautiful woman in my life—I don't like them; they are always either pert, or conceited, or vain, or haughty, or foolish. Sooner or later they are sure to find some ass to tell them how beautiful they are, and then they think that is quite sufficient for all the purposes of life."

"Perhaps, because they are first impressed with a wrong notion of the purposes of life," answered Beauchamp; "but yet, I never heard of a man before who objected to a woman because she was pretty."

"No, no," answered Ned Hayward, "that is a very different thing. I did not say pretty. I am very fond of what is pretty. Oh, the very word is delightful. It gives one such a nice, good-humored, comfortable idea; it is full of health, and youth, and good spirits, and light-heartedness — the word seems to smile and speak content; and when it is the expression that is spoken of, and not the mere features, it is very charming indeed. But a beautiful woman is a very different thing. I would as soon marry the Venus de Medicis, pedestal and all, as what is usually called a beautiful woman. But now let us talk of this other affair. I wonder what will come of my mysterious post-boy."

"Why, I doubt not you will obtain some information regarding the gentleman calling himself Wolf," replied Beauchamp; "but if you do, how do you intend to proceed?"

"Hunt him down as I would a wolf," answered Ned Hayward.

"Then, pray let me share the sport," rejoined Beauchamp.

"Oh, certainly, certainly," said Ned Hayward; "I'll give the view halloo as soon as I have found him; and so now, good night, for I am somewhat sleepy."

"Good night, good night!" answered Beauchamp; and Ned Hayward rang for a bed-candle, a boot-jack, a pair of slippers, and sundry other things that he wanted, which were brought instantly and with great good-will. Had he asked for a night-cap it would have been provided with the same alacrity; for those were days in which night-caps were furnished by every host to every guest; though now (alas! for the good old times) no landlord ever thinks that a guest will stay long enough at his house to make it worth while to attend to his head-gear. But Ned Hayward needed no night-cap, for he never wore one, and therefore his demands did not at all overtax his host's stock.

CHAPTER V.

THE OLD MILL.

It was just in the gray of the morning, and the silver light of dawn was stealing through the deep glens of the wood, brightening the dewy filaments that busy insects had spun across and across the grass, and shining in long, glistening lines, upon the broad, clear stream. It was a lovely stream as ever the eye of meditation rested on, or thoughtful angler walked beside and from about two miles beyond Slingsby Park to within half a mile of the small town of Tarningham, it presented an endless variety of quiet English scenery, such as does the heart of man good to look upon. In one part it was surrounded by high hills, not unbroken by jagged rocks and lofty banks, and went on tumbling in miniature cascades and tiny rapids. At another place it flowed on in greater tranquillity through green meadows, flanked on either hand by tall, stately trees, at the distance of eighty or ninety yards from the banks; not in trim rows, all ranged like rank and file upon parades, but straggling out as chance or taste had decided, sometimes grouping into masses, sometimes protruding far toward the stream, sometimes receding coyly into the opening of a little dell. Then again the river dashed on at a more hurried rate through a low copse, brawling as it went over innumerable shelves of rock and masses of stone, or banks of gravel, which attempted to obstruct its course; and nearer still to the town it flowed through turfy banks, slowly and quietly, every now and then diversified by a dashing ripple over a shallow, and a tumble into a deep pool.

It was in the gray of the morning, then, that a man in a velveteen jacket was seen walking slowly along by the margin at a spot where the river was in a sort of middle state, neither so fierce and restive as it seemed among the hills, nor so tranquil and sluggish as in the neighborhood of the little town. There were green fields around; and numerous trees and copses approaching sometimes very close to the water, but sometimes breaking away to a considerable distance, and generally far enough off for the angler to throw a fly without hooking the branches around. Among some elms, and walnuts, and Huntingdon poplars on the right bank, was an old square tower of very rough stone, gray and cold-looking, with some ivy up one side, clustering round the glassless window. It might have been mistaken for the ruin of some ancient castle of no great extent, had it not been for the axle-tree and some of the spokes and fellies of a dilapidated water-wheel projecting over the river, and at once announcing for what purposes the building had been formerly used, and that they had long ceased. There was still a little causeway and small stone bridge of a single arch spanning a rivulet that here joined the stream, and from a doorway near the wheel still stretched a frail plank to the other side of the dam, which, being principally constructed of rude layers of rock, remained entire, and kept up the water so as to form an artificial cascade. Early as was the hour, some matutinal trout, who, having risen by times and perhaps taken a long swim before breakfast, felt hungry and sharp-set, were attempting to satisfy their voracious maws by snapping at a number of fawn-colored moths which imprudently trusted themselves too near the surface of the water. The relibirds were singing their sweet hymns all around, and a large goatsucker whirled by on its long wings, depriving the trout of many a delicate fly before it came within the reach of the greedy jaws that were waiting for it below the ripple.

But what was the man doing while fish, flies, and birds were thus engaged Marry, he was engaged in a very curious and mysterious occupation. With a slow step and a careful eye fixed upon the glassy surface beneath him, he walked along the course of the current down toward the park paling that you see there upon the left. Was he admiring the speckled tenants of the river? Was he admiring his own reflected image on the shining mirror of the stream? He might be doing either, or both; but, nevertheless, he often put his finger and thumb into the pocket of a striped waistcoat; pulled out some small round balls, about the size of a pea or a little larger, marvelously like one of those boluses which doctors are sometimes fain to prescribe, and chemists right willing to furnish, but which patients find it somewhat difficult to swallow. These he dropped one by one into the water, wherever he found a quiet place, and thus proceeded till he had come within about three hundred yards of the park wall. There he stopped the administration of these pills; and then, walking a little farther, sat down by the side of the river, in the very midst of a tall clump of rushes.

In a minute or two something white, about the length of eighteen inches, floated down; and instantly stretching forth a long hooked stick, our friend drew dextrously in to the shore a fine large trout of a pound and a half in weight. The poor fellow was quite dead, or at least so insensible that he did not seem at all surprised or annoyed to find himself suddenly out of his element, and into another gentleman's pocket, though the transition was somewhat marvelous, from the fresh clear stream to a piece of glazed buckram. Most people would have disliked the change, but Mister Trout was in that sort of state that he did not care about anything. Hardly was he thus deposited when one of his finny companions—perhaps his own brother, or some other near relation—was seen coming down the stream with his stomach upward, a sort of position which, to a trout, is the same as standing on the head would be to a human being. This one was nearer the bank, and first he hit his nose against a stump of tree, then, whirling quietly round, he tried the current tail foremost; but it was all of no avail, he found his way likewise into the pocket, and two more were easily consigned to the same receptacle, all of them showing the same placid equanimity. At length one very fine fish, which seemed to weigh two pounds and a half, at the least, followed; advice, and took a middle course. He was out of reach of the stick; the water was too deep at that spot to wade, and what was our friend of the pocket to do? He watched the fish carried slowly down the stream toward the place where the river passed under an archway into Sir John Slingsby's park. It was fat and fair, and its fins were rosy as if the morning sun had tinged them. Its belly was of a glossy white, with a kindly look about its half-expanded gills, that quite won our friend's affection. Yet he hesitated; and being a natural philosopher, he knew that by displacing the atoms of water the floating body might be brought nearer to the shore. He therefore tried a stone: but whether he threw it too far, or not far enough, I cannot tell; certain it is, the trout was driven farther away than before, and to his inexpressible disappointment, he saw it carried through the arch. He was resolved, however, that it should not thus escape him. Difficult circumstances try, if they do not make, great men; and taking a little run, he vaulted over the park paling and into the park.

He was just in the act of getting over again, perhaps feeling if he stayed too long it might be considered an intrusion, and had the fish in his hand, so that his movements were somewhat embarrassed, when a little incident occurred which considerably affected his plans and purposes for the day.

I have mentioned an old mill, and sundry trees and bushes at different distances from the bank, breaking the soft green meadow turf in a very picturesk manner. In the present instance, these various objects proved not only ornamental but useful—at least to a personage who had been upon the spot nearly as long as our friend in the velveteen jacket. That personage had been tempted into the mill either by its curious and ancient aspect, or by the open door, or by surprise, or by some other circumstance or motive; and once in he thought he might as well look out of the window. When he did look out of the window, the first thing his eyes fell upon, was the first-mentioned gentleman dropping his pills into the water; and there being something curious and interesting in the whole proceeding, the man in the mill watched the man by the river for some minutes. He then quietly slipped out, and as the door was on the opposite side from that on which the operations I have described were going on, he did so unperceived. It would seem that the watcher became much affected by what he saw; for the next minute he glided softly over the turf behind a bush and thence to a clump of trees, and then to a single old oak with a good wide trunk—rather hollow and somewhat shattered about the branches, but still with two or three of the lower boughs left, having a fair show of leaves, like a fringe of curly hair round the poll of some bald Anacreon. From that he went to another, and so on; in fact, dodging our first friend all the way down, till the four first trout were pocketed, and the fifth took its course into the park. When the betrayer of these tender innocents, however, vaulted over the paling in pursuit, the dodger came out and got behind some bushes — brambles, and other similar shrubs that have occasionally other uses than bearing blackberries; and no sooner did he see the successful chaser of the trout, with his goodly fish in his hand and one leg over the paling, about to return to the open country, than taking two steps forward, he laid his hand upon his collar, and courteously helped him over somewhat faster than he would have come without such assistance.

The man of fishes had his back to his new companion at the moment when he received such unexpected support; but as soon as his feet touched the ground on the other side, he struggled most unreasonably to free his collar from the grasp that still retained it. He did not succeed in this effort, far from it; for he well-nigh strangled himself in the attempt to get out of that iron clutch; but, nevertheless, he contrived, at the risk of suffocation, to bring himself face to face with his tenacious friend, and beheld, certainly what he did not expect to see. No form of grim and grisly gamekeeper was before him; no shooting-jacket and leathern leggings; but a person in the garb of a gentleman of good station, furnished with arms, legs, and chest of dimensions and materials which seemed to show that a combat would be neither a very safe nor pleasant affair.

"Who the devil are you?" asked the lover of trout, in the same terms which Mr. Wittingham had used the night before to the very same personage.

"Ha, ha, my friend!" exclaimed Ned Hayward; "so you have been hocusing the trout, have you?" And there they stood for a few minutes without any answers to either question.

CHAPTER VI.

IN WHICH NED HAYWARD PLAYS THE PART OF THIEF-TAKER.

Of all the turnings and windings in this crooked life, one of the most disagreeable is turning back; and yet it is one we are all doomed to from childhood to old age. We are turned back with the smaller and the greater lessons of life, and have, alas, but too often, in our obstinacy or our stupidity, to learn them over and over again. I with the rest of my herd must also turn back from time to time; but on the present occasion it shall not be long, as I am not in a sportive mood this morning, and could find no pleasure in playing a trout or a salmon, and should be disgusted at the very sight of a cat with a mouse.

We have seen our good friend, Ned Hayward, lay his hand stoutly on the collar of a gentleman who had been taking some unwarrantable liberties with the finny fair ones of the stream; but the question is, how happened Ned Hayward to be there at that particular hour of the morning? Was he so exceedingly matutinal in his habits as to be usually up, dressed, and out and walking by a piece of water at a period of the day when most things except birds, fish, and poachers are in their beds? Had he been roused at that hour by heartache, or headache, or any other ache? Was he gouty and could not sleep—in love, and not inclined to sleep? No, reader, no. He was an early man in his habits, it is true, for he was in high health and spirits, and with a busy and active mind which looked upon slumber as time thrown away; but then though he rose early he was always careful as to his dress. He had a stiff beard which required a good deal of shaving, his hair took him a long time, for he liked it to be exceedingly clean and glossy. Smooth he could not make it, for that the curls prevented, curls being obstinate things and resolved to have their own way. Thus with one thing or another, sometimes reading scraps of a book that lay upon his dressing table, sometimes looking out of window, and thinking more poetically than he had any notion of, sometimes cleaning his teeth till they looked as white and as straight as the keys of a new pianoforte, sometimes playing a tune with his fingers on the top of the table, and musing philosophically the while, it was generally at least one hour and a half from the time he arose before he issued forth into the world.

This was not always the case indeed, for on May mornings, when the trout rise, in August, if he were near the moors, on the first of September, wherever he might be, for he was never at that season in London, he usually abridged his toilet, and might be seen in the green fields, duly equipped for the sport of the season, very shortly after daybreak.

On the present occasion, and the morning of which I have just spoken, there cannot be the slightest doubt that he would have lain in bed somewhat longer than usual, for he had had a long ride the day before, some excitement, a good supper, and had sat up late; but there was one little circumstance which roused him and sent him forth. At about a quarter before five he heard his door open, and a noise made among the boots and shoes. He was in that sleepy state in which the events of even five or six hours before are vague and indefinite, if recollected at all, and although he had some confused notion of having ordered himself to be called early, yet he knew not the why or the wherefore, and internally concluded that it was one of the servants of the inn come to take his clothes away for the purpose of brushing them; he thought, as that was a process with which he had nothing to do, he might as well turn on his other side and sleep it out. Still, however, there was a noise in the room, which in the end disturbed him, and he gave over all the boots, physical or metaphysical, to the devil. Then raising himself upon his elbow, he looked about, and by the dim light which was streaming through the dimity curtains—for the window was unfurnished with shutters—he saw a figure somewhat like that of a large goose wandering about amid the fragments of his apparel.

"What in the mischief's name are you about?" asked Ned Hayward, impatiently. "Can't you take the things and get along?"

"It's me, sir," said the low sweet-toned voice of the humpbacked pot-boy, who had not a perfect certainty in his own mind that neuter verbs are followed by a nominative case, "you were wishing to know last night about—"

"Ah, hang it, so I was," exclaimed Ned Hayward, "but I had forgotten all about it—well, my man, what can you tell me about this fellow, this Wolf? Where does he live, how can you get at him? None of the people here will own they know anything about him, but I believe they are lying, and I am very sure of it. The name's a remarkable one, and not to be mistaken."

"Ay, sir," answered the pot-boy, "they knew well enough whom you want, though you did not mention the name they chose to w him by. If you had asked for Ste Gimlet, ney'd have been obliged to answer, for they can't deny having heard of him. Wolf's a cant name, you see, which he got on account of his walking about so much at night, as they say wolves do, though I never saw one."

"Well, where is he to be found?" asked Ned Hayward, in his usual rapid manner, and he then added, to smooth down all difficulties, "I don't want to do the man any harm if I can help it, for I have a notion, somehow, that he is but a tool in the business; and therefore, although I could doubtless, with the information you have given me of his real name, find him out, and deal with him as I think fit, yet I would rather have his address privately, that I may go and talk to him alone."

"Ah, sir, he may be a tool," answered the pot-boy, "but he's an awkward tool to work with; and I should think you had better have two or three stout hands with you."

"Well, I will think of that, my man," answered the young gentleman; "but at all events I should like to know where to find him."

"That's not quite so easy, sir," replied the hunchback, "for he wanders about a good deal; but he has got a place where he says he lives on Yaldon Moor, behind the park, and that he's there some time in every day is certain. I should think the morning as good a time as any, and you may catch him on the lookout if you go round by the back of the park, and then up the river by the old mill. There's an overgo a little higher up, and I shouldn't wonder if he were dabbling about in the water; for it isn't the time for partridges or hares, and he must be doing something."

"But what sort of place has he on the moor?" asked Ned Hayward, beginning to get more and more interested in the pursuit of his inquiries; "how can I find it, my man?"

"It's not easy," answered his companion, "for it's built down in the pit. However, when you have crossed by the overgo, you will find a little path just before you, and if you go along that straight, without either turning to the right or the left, it will lead you right up to the moor. Then I'm sure I don't know how to direct you, for the roads go turning about in all manner of ways."

"Is it east, west, north, or south?" asked Captain Hayward, impatiently.

"Why, east," answered the boy; "and I dare say if you go soon you will find the sun just peeping out over the moor in that direction. It's a pretty sight, and I've looked at it often to see the sunshine come streaming through the morning mist, and making all the green things that grow about there look like gold and purple, and very often, too, I've seen the blue smoke coming up out of the pit from Ste's cottage-chimney. Perhaps it may be so when you go, and then you'll easily find it."

"And whose park is it that you speak of, boy?" said Ned Hayward. "There may be half-a-dozen about here."

"Why, Sir John Slingsby's," answered the boy, "that's the only one we call the park about here."

"Oh, then I know it," rejoined the gentleman, stretching out his hand at the same time, and taking his purse from a chair that stood by his bedside; "there's a crown for you; and now carry off the boots and clothes, and get them brushed as fast as possible."

The boy did as he was told, took the crown with many thanks, gathering together the various articles of apparel which lay scattered about, and retired from the room. Ned Hayward, however, without waiting for his return, jumped out of bed, drew forth from one of his portmanteaus another complete suit of clothes, plunged his head, hands, and neck in cold water, and then mentally saying, "I will shave when I come back," he dressed himself in haste, and looked out for a moment into the yard, to see whether many of the members of the household were astir. There was a man at the very farther end of the yard cleaning a horse, and just under the window, the little deformed pot-boy, whistling a plaintive air with the most exquisite taste, while he was brushing a coat and waistcoat. The finest and most beautiful player on the flageolet never equaled the tones that were issuing from his little pale lips, and Ned Hayward could not refrain from pausing a moment to listen, but then putting on his hat, he hurried down stairs, and beckoned the boy toward him.

"Do not say that I am out, my man, unless any questions are asked," he said; "and when you have brushed the clothes, put them on a chair at the door."

The boy nodded significantly, and our friend, Ned Hayward, took his way out of the town in the direction that the boy had indicated. Of all the various bumps in the human head, the bump of locality is the foremost. This best the reader is well aware is merely a phrenological essay in a new form. So the bump of locality is the most capricious, whimsical, irrational, unaccountable, perverse, and unmanageable of all bumps. To some men it affords a faculty of finding their way about houses—I wish to heaven it did so with me, for I am always getting into wrong rooms and places where I have no business—others it enables to go through all sorts of tortuous paths and ways almost by intuition; with others it is strong regarding government offices, and the places connected therewith; but in Ned Hayward it was powerful in the country, and it would have been a very vigorous ignis fatuus indeed that would lead him astray either on horseback or on foot. Three words of direction generally sufficed if they were clear, and he was as sure of his journey as if he knew every step of the way. There might be a little calculation in the thing—a sort of latent argumentation—for no one knew better that if a place lay due north, the best way to arrive at it was not to go due south, or was more clearly aware that in ordinary circumstances the way into a valley was not to climb the hill; but Ned Hayward was rarely disposed to analyze any process in his own mind. He had always hated dissecting puzzles even in his boyhood; and as his mind was a very good mind, he generally let it take its own way, without troubling it with questions. Thus he walked straight on out of the little town along the bank of the river, and finding himself interrupted, after about three miles, by the park-wall, he took a path through the fields to the left, then struck back again to the right, and soon after had a glimpse of the river again above its passage through Sir John Slingsby's park.

All this time Ned Hayward's mind was not unoccupied. He saw everything that was passing about him and meditated upon it without knowing that he was meditating. The sky was still quite gray when he set out, but presently the morning began to hang out her banners of purple and gold to welcome the monarch of day, and Ned Hayward said to himself, "How wonderfully beautiful all this is, and what a fine ordination is it that every change in nature should produce some variety of beauty." Then he remarked upon the trees, and the birds, and the meadows, and the reflections of the sky in a clear, smooth part of the river, and with somewhat of a painter's mind, perceived the beautiful harmony that is produced by the effect that one color has upon another by its side. And then he passed a little village church, with the steeple shrouded in ivy, and it filled his mind full of quiet and peaceful images, and simple rural life (with a moral to it all), and his thoughts ran on to a thousand scenes of honest happiness, till he had the game at skittles and the maypole on the green up before him as plain as if it were all real; and the ivy and two old yews carried him away to early times when that ancient church was new. Heaven knows how far his fancy went galloping!—through the whole history of England at least. But all these reveries went out of his head almost as soon as the objects that excited them, and then, as he went through some neat hedge-rows and pleasant corn-fields, which promised well in their green freshness for an abundant harvest, he began to think of partridges and an occasional pheasant lying under a holly-bush, and pointing dogs and tumbling birds, a full game-bag, and a capital dinner, with a drowsy evening afterward. Good heaven! what a thing it is to be young, and in high health, and in high spirits; how easy the load of life sits upon one; how insignificant are its cares to its enjoyments; every moment has its flitting dream; every hour its becoming enjoyment, if we choose to seek it; every flower, be it bitter or be it sweet, be it inodorous or be it perfumed, has its nectarial fall of honeyed drops, ripe for the lip that will vouchsafe to press it. But years, years, they bring on the autumn of the heart, when the bright and blooming petals have passed away, when the dreams have vanished with the light slumbers of early years, and everything is in the seed for generations to come; we feel ourselves the husks of the earth, and find that it is time to fall away, and give place to the bloom and blossom of another epoch.

Our friend, however, if not in the budding time of life, had nothing of the sere and yellow leaf about him; he was one of those men who was calculated to carry on the day-dream of boyhood, even beyond its legitimate limit; nothing fretted him, nothing wore him, few things grieved him. It required the diamond point to make a deep impression, and though he reflected the lights that fell upon him from other objects, it was but the more powerful rays that penetrated into the depth, and that not very frequently. Thus on he went upon his way, and what he had got to after partridges and field-swamps, and matters of such kind, heaven only knows. He might be up in the moon for aught I can tell, or in the Indies, or riding astride upon a comet, or in any other position the least likely for a man to place himself in, except when aided by the wings of imagination; and yet, strange to say, Ned Hayward had not the slightest idea that he had any imagination at all. He believed himself to be the most simple jog-trot, matter-of-fact creature in all the world: but to return, he was indulging in all sorts of fantasies, just when a little path between two high hedges opened out upon a narrow meadow, by the side of the river at a spot just opposite the old mill, and not more than forty or fifty yards distant from the door thereof. He saw the old mill and the stream, but saw nothing else upon my word, and thinking to himself, "What a picturesque ruin that is, it looks like some feudal castle built beside the water, parting two hostile baron's domains. What the deuce can it have been?"

Doubt with him always led to examination, so without more ado, he crossed over the open space with his usual quick step, entered the mill, looked about him, satisfied himself in a minute as to what had been its destination, and then gazed out of the windows, first up the stream, and next down. Up the stream he saw some swallows skimming over the water, the first that summer had brought to our shores; and, moreover, a sedate heron, with its blue back appearing over some reeds, one leg in the water, and one raised to its breast. When he looked down, however, he perceived the gentleman I have described, dropping some pellets into the water, and he thought "That's a curious operation, what can he be about?"

The next minute, however, the legitimate wooer of the fishes turned his face partly toward the mill, and Ned Hayward murmured, "Ah, ha, Master Wolf, alias Ste Gimlet, I have you now, I think." And issuing forth, he dogged him down the bank as I have before described, till at length, choosing his moment dextrously, he grasped him by the collar, in such a manner, that if he had had the strength of Hercules, he would have found it a more difficult matter to escape, than to kill forty Hydras, or clean fifty Augean stables.

"Hocusing the fish!" said the prisoner, in answer to one of Captain Hayward's first intimations of what he thought of his proceedings. "I don't know what you mean by hocusing the fish—I've got a few dead 'uns out of the river, that's all; and no great harm, I should think, just to make a fry."

"Ay, my good friend," replied Ned Hayward, "dead enough, I dare say they were when you got them; but I'm afraid we must have a coroner's inquest upon them, and I do not think the verdict will be 'Found drowned.' What I mean, my man, is that you have poisoned them—a cunning trick, but one that I know as well as your name or my own."

"And what the devil is your name?" asked the captive, trying to twist himself round, so as at least to get a blow or a kick at his captor.

"Be quiet—be quiet!" answered Ned Hayward, half strangling him in his collar. "My name is my own property, and I certainly will not give it to you; but your own you shall have, if you like. You are called Ste Gimlet, or I am mistaken, but better known at night by the name of Wolf."

The man muttered an angry curse, and Ned Hayward continued—

"You see I know all about you; and, to tell you the truth, I was looking for you."

"Ah, so he's had some 'un down from London," said Wolf, entirely mistaking the nature of Captain Hayward's rank and avocation. "Well, so help me ——, if I ever did this on his ground afore, sir."

"Well, Master Gimlet," answered Ned Hayward, perfectly understanding what was passing in the man's mind, and willing to encourage the mistake, "I have been asked down certainly, and I suppose I must take you before Sir John Slingsby at once—unless, indeed, you like to make the matter up one way or another."

"I haven't got a single crown in the world," answered the poacher; "if you know all, you'd know that I am poor enough."

"Ay, but there are more ways than one of making matters up," rejoined Ned Hayward, in a menacing tone. "You know a little bit of business you were about last night."

The man's face turned as white as a sheet, and his limbs trembled as if he had been in the cold fit of an ague. All his strength was gone in a moment, and he was as powerless as a baby.

"Why," faltered he at length, "you could not be sent for that affair, for there's not been time."

"No, certainly," replied the young gentleman; "but having been asked down here on other matters, I have just taken that up, and may go through with it or not, just as it suits me. Now you see, Ste," he continued, endeavoring to assume, as well as he could, somewhat of the Bow-street-officer tone, and doing so quite sufficiently to effect his object with a country delinquent, "a nod is quite as good as a wink to a blind horse."

"Ay, ay, I understand, sir," answered Mr. Gimlet.

"Well then," continued Ned Hayward, "I understand, too; and being quite sure that you are not what we call the principal in this business, but only an accessory, I am willing to give you a chance."

"Thank'ee, sir," replied Wolf, in a meditative tone, but he said no more; and his captor, who wished him to speak voluntarily, was somewhat disappointed.

"You are mighty dull, Master Wolf," said Ned Hayward, "and therefore I must ask you just as plain a question as the judge does when he has got the black cap in his hand ready to put on. Have you anything to say why I should not take you at once before Sir John Slingsby?"

"Why, what the devil should I say?" rejoined the man, impatiently. "If you know me, I dare say you know the others, and if you're so cunning, you must guess very well that it was not the money that we were after; so that it can't be no felony after all."

"If it is not a felony, it is not worth my while to meddle with it," answered Ned Hayward, "but there may be different opinions upon that subject; and if you like to tell me all about it, I shall be able to judge. I guessed it was not for money; but there is many a thing as bad as that. I don't ask you to speak, but you may if you like. If you don't, come along."

"Well, I'll speak all I know," answered Wolf, "that's to say, if you'll just let me get breath, for, hang me, if your grip does not half strangle me. I'll not mention names though, for I won't peach; but just to show you that there was nothing so very wrong, I'll tell you what it was all about—that's to say, if you'll let me off about these devils of fish."

"Agreed as to the fish," replied Ned Hayward, "if you tell the truth. I don't want to throttle you either, my good friend; but mark me well, if I let go my hold, and you attempt to bolt, I will knock you down, and have you before a magistrate in five minutes. Sit down there on the bank then." And without loosening his grasp, he forced his prisoner to bend his knees and take up a position before him, from which it would not have been possible to rise without encountering a blow from a very powerful fist. When this was accomplished he let the man's collar go, and standing directly opposite, bade him proceed.

This seemed not so easy a task as might have been imagined, at least to our friend Mr. Gimlet, who, not being a practiced orator, wanted the art of saying as much as possible upon everything unimportant, and as little as possible upon everything important. He scratched his head heartily, however, and that stimulus at length enabled him to produce the following sentence:

"Well, you see, sir, it was nothing at all but a bit of love-making."

"It did not look like it," answered Ned Hayward.

"Well, it was, though," said Mr. Gimlet, in a decided tone. "The young gentleman, whom I'm talking of, wanted to get the young lady away; for you see her mother looks very sharp after her, and so he had a chaise ready, and me another to help him, and if those two fellows had not come up just as we were about it, he'd have had her half way to Scotland by this time."

"And where is the young gentleman, as you call him, now?" asked Ned Hayward, in that sort of quiet, easy tone, in which people sometimes put questions, which, if considered seriously, would be the least likely to receive an answer, just as if a straightforward reply were a matter of course.

But his companion was upon his guard. "That's neither here nor there," he replied.

"It is, I can assure you, my good friend Wolf," said the young gentleman; "for whatever you may think, this was just as much a felony as if you had taken a purse or cut a throat. Two pistols were fired, I think—the young lady is an heiress; and forcibly carrying away an heiress is as bad as a robbery; it is a sort of picking her pocket of herself. So, if you have a mind to escape a noose, you'll instantly tell me where he is."

The man thrust his hands into his pockets, and gazed at his interrogator with a sullen face, in which fear might be seen struggling with dogged resolution; but Ned Hayward the moment after, added as a sort of rider to his bill,

"I dare say he is some low fellow who did it for her money."

"No, that he's not, by ——!" cried the other. "He's a gentleman's son, and a devilish rich un's too."

"Ah ha! Mr. Wittingham's!" cried Ned Hayward, "now I understand you;" and he laughed with his peculiar, clear, merry laugh, which made Mr. Gimlet at first angry, and then inclined to join him. "And now, my good friend," continued Ned Hayward, laying his hand upon his companion's shoulder, "you may get up and be off. You've made a great blunder, and mistaken me for a very respectable sort of functionary, upon whose peculiar province I have no inclination to trespass any further—I mean a thief-taker. If you will take my advice, however, neither you nor Mr. Wittingham will play such tricks again, for if you do you may fare worse; and you may as well leave off hocusing trout, snaring pheasants and hares, and shooting partridges on the sly, and take to some more legitimate occupation. You would make a very good gamekeeper, I dare say, upon the principle of setting a thief to catch a thief, and some of these days I will come up to your place upon the moor, and have a chat with you about it; I doubt not you could show me some sport with otters, or badgers, or things of that kind."

"Upon my soul and body you're a cool hand," cried Ste Gimlet, rising and looking at Captain Hayward, as if he did not well know whether to knock him down or not.

"I am," answered our friend Ned, with a calm smile, "quite cool, and always cool, as you'll find when you know me better. As to what has passed to-day I shall take no notice of this fish affair, and in regard to Mr. Wittingham's proceedings last night, I shall deliberate a little before I act. You'd better tell him so when you next see him, just to keep him on his good behavior, and so good morning to you, my friend."

Thus saying, Ned Hayward turned away, and walked toward the town, without once looking back to see whether his late prisoner was or was not about to hit him a blow on the head. Perhaps had he known what was passing in worthy Mr. Gimlet's mind, he might have taken some precaution; for certainly that gentleman was considerably moved; but if the good and the bad spirit had a struggle together in his breast, the good got the better at length, and he exclaimed, "No, hang it, I won't," and with a slow and thoughtful step he walked up the stream again, toward the path which led to the moor.

Upon that path I shall leave him, and begging the reader to get upon any favorite horse he may have in the stable—hobby or not hobby—canter gayly back again to take up some friends that we have left far behind.

CHAPTER VII.

INTRODUCES MISS SLINGSBY TO THE READER.

The reader may remember that we left a lady and daughter, whom Ned Hayward afterward discovered to be a Mrs. and Miss Clifford, standing at the door of Sir John Slingsby's house, in the heart of what was called Tarningham Park. All that Ned Hayward (or the reader either) knew of their history at the moment that he quitted them, after having assisted them to alight from their carriage, was as follows: that the elder lady had been sent for to see her elder brother in his last moments, he having been accused of having gout in the stomach, and that she and her daughter had been stopped on the king's highway by three personages, two of whom, at least, had pistols with them, that they had been rescued by Captain Hayward himself, and another gentleman, that on arriving at Tarningham House it did not look at all like the dwelling of a dying man, and that the answer of the butler to Mrs. Clifford's inquiries regarding her brother's health was, "Quite well, thank you, ma'am," delivered in the most commonplace tone in the world.

At the precise point of time when this reply was made, Ned Hayward took his leave, remounted his horse, and rode back to Tarningham, and after he was gone Mrs. Clifford remained for at least thirty seconds somewhat bewildered with what seemed to her a very strange announcement. When she had done being bewildered, and seemed to have got a slight glimpse of the case, she turned an anxious glance to her daughter, to which Miss Clifford, who fully understood what it meant, replied at once, without requiring to have it put into words, "You had better go in, dear mamma," she said, "it will grieve poor Isabella if you do not, and beside, it might be risking a great deal to go back at night with nobody to protect us."

Mrs. Clifford still hesitated a little, but in the mean time some by-play had been going on which decided the question. The butler had called a footman, the footman had taken a portmanteau and some smaller packages from the boot of the carriage. The name of Mrs. Clifford had been mentioned once or twice, a lady's-maid crossing the hall had seen the two ladies' faces by the light of a great lamp, and in a moment after, from a door on the opposite side of the vestibule, came forth a fair and graceful figure, looking like Hebe dressed for dinner.

"Oh, my dear aunt!" she exclaimed, running across to Mrs. Clifford and kissing her, "and you, too, my dear Mary! This is indeed an unexpected pleasure; but come in, come into the drawing-room; they will bring in all the things—there is no one there," she continued, seeing her aunt hesitated a little, "I am quite alone, and shall be for the next two hours, I dare say."

Mrs. Clifford suffered herself to be led on into a fine large old-fashioned drawing-room, and then began the explanations.

"And so, Isabella, you did not expect me to night," said the elder lady, addressing Hebe. "Either for jest or for mischief some one has played us a trick. Have you got the letter, Mary?"

It was in Miss Clifford's writing-desk, however, as letters always are in some place where they cannot be found when they are wanted; but the fact was soon explained that Mrs. Clifford that very day about four o'clock had received a letter purporting to come from the housekeeper at Tarningham House, informing her that her brother, Sir John Slingsby, had been suddenly seized with gout in the stomach, and was not expected to live from hour to hour; that Miss Slingsby was too much agitated to write, but that Sir John expressed an eager desire to see his sister before he died.

"Good gracious!" exclaimed the fair Isabella, "who could have done such a thing as that?" and then she laughed quietly, adding, "well, at all events I am very much obliged to them; but it was a shameful trick, notwithstanding."

"You haven't heard the whole yet, Isabella," replied Mrs. Clifford, "for we have been stopped between this and Tarningham, and should have been robbed—perhaps murdered—if two gentlemen had not come up to our rescue—good heaven, it makes me feel quite faint to think of it." And she sat down in one of the large arm-chairs, and put her hand to her head, while her cheek turned somewhat pale.

"Take a little wine, my dear aunt," cried Isabella, and before Mrs. Clifford could stop her she had darted out of the room.

As soon as she was alone with her daughter, the widow lady gazed round the chamber in which she sat with a thoughtful and melancholy look. She was in the house where her early days of girlhood had passed—she was in the very room where she had gone in all the agitation of happy love as a bride to the altar. She peopled the place with forms that could no longer be seen, she called up the loved and the dead, the parents who had cherished and instructed her, the fair sister who had bloomed and withered by her side. How many happy, how many a painful scene rose to the eye of memory on that stage where they had been enacted. All the material objects were the same, the pictures, the furniture, the old oak paneling with its carved wreaths; but where were they who moved so lately beside her in that chamber—where was all that had there been done? The grave and the past—man's tomb, and the tomb of man's actions, had received them, and in the short space of twenty years all had gone, fading away and dissolving into air like a smoke rising up unto heaven, and spreading out thinner and thinner, till naught remains. Herself and a brother, from whom many circumstances had detached her, were all that were left of the crowd of happy faces that remembrance called back as she sat there and gazed around. Some tears rose to her eyes, and Mary, who had been standing by gazing at her face, and reading in it with the quick appreciation of affection all the emotions which brought such shadows over the loved mother's brow, knelt down beside her, and taking her hand in hers said earnestly, "Mamma, dear mamma, I know this is painful, but pray for my sake and Isabella's let the shameful deceit that has been played upon us produce a good and happy result. You are here in my uncle's house; be reconciled to him fully, I beseech you. You know that he is good-humored notwithstanding all his faults, and I cannot but think that if those who might have led him to better things had not withdrawn from him so completely, he might now have been a different man."

Mrs. Clifford shook her head mournfully.

"My dear child," she said, "you know that it is not resentment; it was your good father who did not feel it consistent with his character and station to countenance all that takes place here."

"But for Isabella's sake," said Miss Clifford, earnestly, and before her mother could answer, the young lady of whom she spoke reëntered the room with a servant carrying some refreshments.

"Oh dear aunt," she said, while the wine and water and biscuits were placed upon a small table at Mrs. Clifford's elbow, "it makes me so glad to see you, and I have ordered the blue room at the south side to be got ready for you directly, and then there is the corner one for Mary, because it has a window both ways, and when she is in a gay mood she can look out over the meadows and the stream, and when she is in her high pensiveness she can gaze over the deep woods and hills. Then she is next to me too, so that she may have merry nonsense on one side, and grave sense on the other; for I am sure you will stay a long while with us now you are here, and papa will be so glad."

"I fear it cannot be very long, my love," replied Mrs. Clifford. "In the first place I have come it seems uninvited, and in the next place you know, Isabella, that I am sometimes out of spirits, and perhaps fastidious, so that all guests do not at all times please me. Who have you here now? There seemed a large party in the dining-room."

"Oh, there are several very foolish men," answered Sir John Slingsby's daughter, laughing, "and one wise one. There is Mr. Dabbleworth, who was trying to prove to me all dinner-time that I am an electrical machine; and in the end I told him that I could easily believe he was one, for he certainly gave me a shock, and Sir James Vestage, who joined in and insisted that instead of electrical machines men were merely improved monkeys. I told him that I perfectly agreed with him, and that I saw fresh proofs of it every day. Then up by papa was sitting old Mr. Harrington, the fox-hunter; what he was saying I do not know, for I never listen to anything he says, as it is sure either to be stupid or offensive. Then there was Charles Harrington, who lisped a good deal, and thought himself exceedingly pretty, and Mr. Wharton, the lawyer, who thought deeply and drank deeply, and said nothing but once."

"But who was your wise man, dear Isabella?" asked Mary, very willing to encourage her fair cousin in her light cheerfulness, hoping that it might win Mrs. Clifford gently from sadder thoughts.

"Oh, who but good Dr. Miles," answered Miss Slingsby, "who grumbled sadly at everybody, and even papa did not escape, I can assure you. But all these people will be gone in an hour or two, and in the mean time I shall have you all alone."

"Then there is no one staying in the house, Isabella?" said Mrs. Clifford. "I heard at Tarningham that your father expected some people from London."

"Only one, I believe," answered the fair daughter of the house, "but he has not arrived yet, and perhaps may not. He is a Captain Hayward, who was ensign in papa's regiment long ago. I never saw him, but people say

'he's the best fellow in the world.' You know what that means, Mary: a man that will drink, or hunt, or shoot, or fish with anybody or everybody, and when none of these are to be done, will go to sleep upon the sofa. Pray, pray, do stay, dear aunt, till he is gone, for I know not what I should do with him in the house by myself. I positively must get papa to ask somebody else, or get the good doctor to come up and flirt with him to my heart's content, just as a diversion from the pleasures of this Captain Hayward's society."

"A very disagreeable person, I dare say," replied Mary Clifford; "it is very odd how names are perverted, so that 'a good creature' means a fool in the world's parlance; 'a very respectable man' is sure to be a very dull one; and 'the best fellow in the world' is invariably—"

But her moralizing fit was suddenly brought to an end by the door of the drawing-room being thrown open, and Sir John Slingsby rushing in.

Stay a moment, reader, and observe him before he advances. Honest Jack Slingsby! Roystering Sir John! Jolly old Jack! Glorious Johnny! By all these names was he known, or had been known by persons in different degrees of acquaintanceship with him. That round and portly form, now extending the white waistcoat and black-silk breeches, had once been slim and graceful; that face, glowing with the grape in all its different hues, from the œil de perdrix upon the temples and forehead to the deep purple of old port in the nose, had once been smooth and fair. That nose itself, raising itself now into mighty dominion over the rest of the face, and spreading out, heaven knows where, over the map of his countenance, like the kingdom of Russia in the share of Europe, was once fine and chiseled like Apollo's own. That thin white hair, flaring up into a cockatoo on the top of his head to cover the well-confirmed baldness, was once a mass of dark curls that would not have disgraced the brow of Jove. You may see the remains of former dandyism in the smart shoe, the tight silk-stocking, the well cut blue coat; and you may imagine how much activity those limbs once possessed by the quick and buoyant step with which the capacious stomach is carried into the room. There is a jauntiness, too, in the step which would seem to imply that the portion of youthful vigor and activity, which is undoubtedly gone, has been parted from with regret, and that he would fain persuade himself and others that he still retains it in his full elasticity; but yet there is nothing affected about it either, and perhaps after all it is merely an effort of the mind to overcome the approach of corporeal infirmity, and to carry on the war as well as may be. Look at the good-humored smile, too, the buoyant, boisterous, overflowing satisfaction that is radiating from every point of that rosy countenance. Who on earth could be angry with him? One might be provoked, but angry one couldn't be. It is evidently the face of one who takes the world lightly—who esteems nothing as very heavy—retains no impressions very long—enjoys the hour and its pleasures to the very utmost, and has no great consciousness of sin or shame in anything that he does. He is, in fact, a fat butterfly, who, though he may have some difficulty in fluttering from flower to flower, does his best to sip the sweets of all he finds, and not very unsuccessfully.

With that same jaunty light step, with that same good-humored, well-satisfied smile, Sir John Slingsby advanced straight to his sister, took her in his arms, gave her a hearty kiss, and shook both her hands, exclaiming in a round, full, juicy voice, almost as fat as himself,

"Well, my dear Harriet, I'm very happy to see you; this is kind, this is very kind indeed; I could hardly believe my ears when the servants told me you were here, but I left the fellows immediately to fuddle their noses at leisure, and came to assure myself that it was a fact. And my dear Mary, too, my little saint, how are you, my dear girl?"

"We were brought here, John," replied Mrs. Clifford, "by a very shameful trick." And she proceeded to explain to him the trick which had been practiced upon her.

"Gout!" exclaimed Sir John, "gout in the stomach! It would be a devilish large gout to take up his abode in my stomach, or else he'd find the house too big for him;" and he laid his hand upon his large paunch with an air of pride and satisfaction. "Gout! that does not look like gout, I think," and he stuck out his neat foot, and trim well-shaped ankle; "never had but one threatening of a fit in my life, and then I cured it in an afternoon—with three bottles of champagne and a glass of brandy," he added, in a sort of loud aside to Mary, as if she would enter into the joke better than her mother. "And so really, Harriet, you would not have come if you had not thought me dying. Come, come now, forget and forgive; let bygones be bygones; I know I'm a d——d fool, and do a great many very silly things; but 'pon my soul I'm very sorry for it, I am indeed; you can't think how I abominate myself sometimes, and wonder what the devil possesses me. I'll repent and reform, upon my life I will, Harriet, if you'll just stay and help me—it's being left all alone to struggle with temptation that makes me fail so often, but every ten minutes I'm saying to myself, 'What an old fool you are, Jack Slingsby!' so now you'll stay like a dear good girl, as you always were, and help to make my house a little respectable. Forget and forgive, forget and forgive."

"My dear John, I have nothing to forgive," answered Mrs. Clifford. "You know very well that I would do anything in the world to promote your welfare, and always wished it, but—"

"Ay, ay, it was your husband," answered Sir John, bringing an instant cloud over his sister's face. "Well, he was a good man—an excellent man—ay, and a kind man too, and he was devilish right after all; I can't help saying it, though I suffer. In his station, what could he do? An archdeacon and then a dean, it was not to be expected that he should countenance rioting, and roaring, and drinking, and all that, as we used to do here; but 'pon my life, Harriet, I'll put an end to it. Now you shall see, I won't drink another glass to-night, and I'll send all those fellows away within half an hour, by Jove! I'll just go back and order coffee in the dining-room, and that'll be a broad hint, you know. Bella will take care of you in the mean time, and I'll be back in half an hour —high time I should reform indeed—even that monkey begins to lecture me. I've got a capital fellow coming down to stay with me—the best fellow in the world—as gay as a lark, and as active as a squirrel; yet somehow or other he always kept himself right, and never played at cards, the dog, nor got drunk either, that I ever saw; yet he must have got drunk too, every man must sometimes, but he kept it devilish snug if he did—by the by, make yourselves comfortable." And without waiting to hear his sister's further adventures on the road, Sir John Slingsby tripped out of the room again, and notwithstanding all his good resolutions, finished two-thirds of a bottle of claret while the servants were bringing in the coffee.

"Rather a more favorable account of your expected guest, Isabella, than might have been supposed," said Mrs. Clifford, as soon as Sir John Slingsby was gone. "A young man who did not drink or play in your father's regiment, must have been a rare exception; for I am sorry to say that it had a bad name in those respects long before he got it, and I believe that it did him a great deal of harm."

"Papa is so good-humored," replied Miss Slingsby, "that he lets people do just what they like with him. I am sure he wishes to do all that is right."

Mrs. Clifford was silent for a moment or two, and then turned the conversation; but in the house of her brother she was rather like a traveler who, riding through a country, finds himself suddenly and unexpectedly in the midst of what they call in Scotland a shaking moss; whichever path she took, the ground seemed to be giving way under her. She spoke of the old park and the fine trees, and to her dismay, she heard that Sir John had ordered three hundred magnificent oaks to be cut down and sold. She spoke of a sort of model farm which had been her father's pride, and after a moment or two of silence, Isabella thought it better, to prevent her coming upon the same subject with her father, by telling her that Sir John, not being fond of farming, had disposed of it some three months before to Mr. Wharton, the solicitor.

"He could not find a tenant easily for it," she continued, "and it annoyed him to have it unoccupied, so he was persuaded to sell it, intending to invest the money in land adjoining the rest of the property."

"I hope Mr. Wharton gave him a fair price for it?" said Mrs. Clifford.

"I really don't know," answered her niece · "I dislike that man very much."

"And so do I," said Mary Clifford.

"And so do I," added her mother, thoughtfully.

Mr. Wharton had evidently not established himself in the favor of the ladies, and as ladies are always right, he must have been a very bad man indeed.

To vary the pleasures of such a conversation, Miss Slingsby soon after ordered tea, trusting that her father would return before it was over. Sir John Slingsby's half-hour, however, extended itself to an hour and a half, but then an immense deal of loud laughing and talking, moving feet, seeking for hats and coats, and ultimately rolling of wheels, and trotting of horses, was heard in the drawing-room, and the baronet himself again appeared, as full of fun and good-humor as ever. He tried, indeed, somewhat to lower the tone of his gayety, to suit his sister's more rigid notions; but although he was not in the least tipsy—and indeed it was a question which might have puzzled Babbage's calculating machine to resolve what quantity of any given kind of wine would have affected his brain to the point of inebriety—yet the potations in which he had indulged had certainly spread a genial warmth through his bosom, which kept his spirits at a pitch considerably higher than harmonized very well with Mrs. Clifford's feelings.

After about half an hour's conversation, then, she complained of fatigue, and retired to bed, and was followed by her niece and her daughter, after the former, at her father's desire, had sung him a song to make him sleep comfortably. Sir John then stretched his legs upon a chair to meditate for a minute or two over the unexpected event of his sister's arrival. But the process of meditation was not one that he was at all accustomed to, and consequently he did not perform it with great ease and dexterity. After he had tried it for about thirty seconds, his head nodded, and then looking up, he said, "Ah!" and then attempted it again. Fifteen seconds were enough this time; but his head, finding that it had disturbed itself by its rapid declension on the former occasion, now sank gradually on his shoulder, and thence found its way slowly round to his breast. Deep breathing succeeded for about a quarter of an hour, and then an awful snore, loud enough to rouse the worthy baronet by his own trumpet. Up he started, and getting unsteadily upon his legs, rubbed his eyes, and muttered to himself, "Time to go to bed." Such was the conclusion of his meditation, and the logical result of the process in which he had been engaged.

The next morning, however, at the hour of half-past nine, found Sir John in the breakfast-room, as fresh, as rosy, and as gay as ever. If wine had no effect upon his intellect at night, it had none upon his health and comfort in the morning; the blushing banner that he bore in his countenance was the only indication of the deeds that he achieved; and kissing the ladies all round, he sat down to the breakfast-table and spent an hour with them in very agreeable chat. He was by no means ill-informed, not without natural taste, a very fair theoretical judgment, which was lamentably seldom brought into practice, and he could discourse of many things, when he liked it, in as gentlemanlike and reasonable a manner as any man living; while his cheerful good-humor shed a sunshine around that, in its sparkling warmth, made men forget his faults and over-estimate his good qualities. He had a particular tact, too, of palliating errors that he had committed, sometimes by acknowledging them frankly, and lamenting the infatuation that produced them, sometimes by finding out excellent good reasons for doing things which had a great deal better been left undone. Mary and Isabella had been walking in the park before breakfast, talking of all those things which young ladies find to converse about when they have not met for some time; and Sir John, at once aware that his niece's eye must have marked the destruction going on among the old rees, asked her in the most deliberate tone in he world, if she had seen the improvements ie was making.

Mary Clifford replied "No," and looked at ier cousin as if for explanation, and then Sir ohn exclaimed,

"God bless my soul, did you not see the illey I am cutting! It will make the most eautiful vista in the world. First you will go ound from the house by the back of the wood, lowly mounting the hill, by what we call the Broad Walk, and then when you have reached he top, you will have a clear view down through a sort of glade, with the old trees on your right and left hand, over the clumps of young firs in the bottom, catching the stream here and there, and having the park-wall quite concealed, till the eye, passing over the meadows, just rests upon Tarningham church, and then running on, gets a view of your own place, Steenham, looking like a white speck on the side of the hill, and the prospect is closed by the high grounds beyond. My dear Mary, it is the greatest improvement that ever was made —we will go and see it."

Now the real truth was, that Sir John Slingsby, some four or five months before, had very much wanted three thousand pounds, and he had determined to convert a certain number of his trees into bank-notes; but being a man of very good taste, as I have said, he had arranged the cutting so as to damage his park scenery as little as possible. Nevertheless, in all he said to Mary Clifford, strange as the assertion may seem, he was perfectly sincere; for he was one of those men who always begin by deceiving themselves, and having done that, can hardly be said to deceive others. It is a sort of infectious disease they have, that is all, and they communicate it, after having got it themselves. Before he had cut a single tree, he had perfectly persuaded himself that to do so would effect the greatest improvement in the world, and he was quite proud of having beautified his park, and at the same time obtained three thousand pounds of ready money.

Doubtless, had the conversation turned that way, he would have found as good an excuse, as valid a reason, as legitimate a motive, for selling the model farm; but that not being the case, they went on talking of different subjects, till suddenly the door opened, the butler, who was nearly as fat as his master, advanced three steps in a solemn manner, and announced, "Captain Hayward."

Sir John instantly started up, and the three ladies raised their eyes simultaneously, partly with that peculiar sort of curiosity which people feel when they look into the den of some rare wild beast, and partly with that degree of interest which we all take in the outward form and configuration of one of our own species, upon whom depends a certain portion of the pleasure or pain, amusement or dullness, of the next few hours. The next moment our friend Ned Hayward was in the room. He was well-dressed and well-looking, as I have already described him in his riding costume. Gentleman was in every line and every movement, and his frank, pleasant smile, his clear, open countenance, were very engaging even at the first sight. Sir John shook him warmly by the hand, and although the baronet's countenance was so burgeoned and blossomed since he last saw him, that the young gentleman had some difficulty in recognizing him, his former colonel, yet Ned Hayward returned his grasp with equal cordiality, and then looked round, as his host led him up toward Miss Slingsby, and introduced them to each other. Great was the surprise of both the baronet and his daughter, to see Mrs. Clifford rise, and with a warm smile extend her hand to their new guest, and even Mary Clifford follow her mother's example, and welcome, as if he were an old friend, the very person with whose name they had seemed unacquainted the night before.

"Ah, ha, Ned!" cried Sir John; "how is this, boy? Have you been poaching upon my preserves without my knowing it? 'Pon my life, Harriet, you have kept your acquaintance with my little ensign quite snug and secret."

"It is an acquaintance of a very short date, John," replied Mrs. Clifford; "but one which has been of inestimable service to me already."

And she proceeded in a very few words to explain to her brother the debt of gratitude she owed to Captain Hayward for his interference the night before, and for the courtesy he had shown in escorting and protecting her to the doors of that very house.

Sir John immediately seized his guest by the two lappels of the coat, exclaiming,

"And why the devil didn't you come in, you dog? What, Ned Hayward at my gates, an expected guest, and not come in! I can tell you we should have given you a warm reception, fined you a couple of bottles for being late at dinner, and sent you to bed roaring drunk."

Ned Hayward gave a gay glance round at the ladies, as if inquiring whether they thought these were great inducements; he answered, however,

"Strange to say, I did not know it was your house, Sir John."

And now having placed our friend Ned Hayward comfortably between two excessively pretty girls of very different styles of beauty, and very different kinds of mind, I shall leave Fate to settle his destiny, and turn to another scene which had preceded his arrival at Tarningham House.

CHAPTER VIII.

NED HAYWARD AND BEAUCHAMP PAY A VISIT TO MR. WITTINGHAM.

Man never sees above half of anything, never knows above half of anything, never understands above half of anything; and upon this half-sight, half-knowledge, and half-understanding, he acts, supplying the deficiency of his information by a guess at the rest, in which there is more than an equal chance that he is wrong instead of right. That is the moral of this chapter.

After Ned Hayward's interview with Stephen Gimlet, alias Wolf, our friend turned his steps back toward Tarningham, and arrived at the White Hart by eight o'clock. About three quarters of an hour had shaved him, dressed him, and brushed his hair, and down he went to the little parlor in which he had passed the preceding evening, just in time to find Mr. Beauchamp beginning his breakfast. Although the latter gentleman shook his companion cordially by the hand, and seemed to look upon his presence in the parlor as a matter of course, Ned Hayward thought fit to apologize for his intrusion, adding, "I shall not maroon myself upon you very long, for soon after breakfast I shall decamp to Sir John Slingsby's."

"I am sorry, I assure you, to lose the pleasure of your society so soon," replied Beauchamp; and then added, addressing the maid, who had just brought in some broiled ham, "you had better bring some more cups and saucers, my good girl."

"And some more ham, and also a cold fowl," added Ned Hayward. "I have the appetite of an ogre, and if you do not make haste, I must have a bit out of your rosy cheek, my dear, just to stay my stomach."

"La, sir!" cried the maid, with a coquetish little titter; but she ran away to get what was wanted, as if she were really afraid of the consequences of Ned Hayward's appetite, and as soon as she was gone, he said,

"I have got news for you, Beauchamp; but I will wait till the room is clear before I give it. I have been up and out, over the hills and far away, this morning; so I have well earned my breakfast."

"Indeed!" exclaimed his companion with a look of surprise, "really you are an active general, but you should have given your fellow-soldiers information of your movements, and we might have combined operations."

"There was no time to be lost," answered Hayward.

But at that moment the maid returned with the cold fowl; the ham was still in the rear, and it was not till breakfast was half over that the young officer could tell his tale. When he had got as far with it as the first explanations of Mr. Gimlet, Beauchamp exclaimed eagerly, "And what did it turn out to be?"

"Nothing after all but a love affair," answered Ned. "Now, my dear Beauchamp, I have as much compassion for all lovers as an old match-making dowager, and therefore I think it will be better to let this matter drop quietly."

"Oh, certainly," answered his new friend. "I am quite as tender-hearted in such matters as yourself; but are you quite sure of the fact? for this seems to me to have been a very odd way of making love."

"It was so assuredly," replied Hayward, "but nevertheless the tale is true. The fact is the young lady is an heiress, the mother strict—most likely the latter looks for some high match for her daughter, and will not hear of the youth's addresses. He falls into despair, and with a Roman courage resolves to carry off a bride. Unfortunately for his purpose, we come up, and the rape of the Sabines is prevented; but 'pon my honor, I admire the fellow for his spirit. There is something chivalrous, nay more, feudal about it. He must fancy himself some old baron who had a right prescriptive to run away with every man's daughter that suited him; and, on my life, my dear Beauchamp, I can go on no further in attempting to punish him for a deed whose hot and proof spirit shames this milk-and-water age. Oh, the times of carrying off heiresses, of robbing in cocked hats, and full-bottomed wigs, of pinking one's adversary under the fifth rib in Leicester Fields, with gentlemen in high shoes and gold lace for seconds, and chairmen for spectators, when will they come again? Gone, gone forever, my dear Beauchamp, into the same box as our grandmother's brocade-gown, and with them the last spark of the spirit of chivalry has expired."

"Very true," answered Beauchamp, smiling at his companion's tirade, "there was certainly an adventurous turn about those days which saved them from dullness; but yet there was a primness about them which was curious, a formality mingling with their wildest excesses, a prudery with their licentiousness, which can only be attributed to the cut of their clothes. There is some mysterious link between them, depend upon it, Hayward, and whether it be that the clothes affect the man, or the man the clothes, it is not for me to say; but the grand internal harmony of nature will not be violated, and the spirit of the age is represented in the coats, waistcoats, and breeches of the people of the period much better than in all the stupid books written from time to time to display it."

This was the first sentence that Ned Hayward had ever heard his companion speak in a jocular tone, but Beauchamp immediately went on in a graver manner to say, "Yet after all, I do not see how we can drop this matter entirely. Far be it from me, of all men on earth, to persecute another, but yet, having already given information of this attempt at robbery, as it seemed to us, and tendered our evidence on oath, we cannot well draw back. A gross offense has indubitably been committed, not only in the attack upon these two ladies, but also in the very violent and murderous resistance which was made when we arrived to their rescue; and this young gentleman should have a warning at least."

"To be sure, to be sure," answered Ned Hayward, "I have got the pistol ball singing in my ear now, and I am quite willing to give him a fright, and old Wittingham too. The latter I will, please heaven, torment out of the remnant of seven senses that he has left, for a more pompous, vulgar old blockhead I never saw; and therefore I should propose at once—that is to say, as soon as I have done this cup of coffee—you have finished, I see—to go to good Mr. Wittingham's and belabor him with our small wits till he is nearly like the man who was scourged to death with rushes."

"Nay, nothing quite so sanguinary as that, I trust," said Beauchamp, "but I will accompany you willingly, and see fair play between you and the magistrate."

According to this arrangement, as soon as breakfast was over, and Ned Hayward had given some directions with regard to preparing his horse, his baggage, and a conveyance for the latter, the two gentlemen sallied forth to the magistrate's room in the town, where they found Mr. Wittingham seated with a clerk, the inferior attorney of the place. The latter was a man well fitted to prompt an ignorant and self-conceited magistrate in a matter of difficulty, if its importance were not very great, and he knew all he particulars. He was a little fat compact man, in form, feature, and expression like a Chinese pig. His nose had the peculiar turn-up of the snout of that animal, his small eyes the same sagacious twinkle, his retreating under-jaw the same voracious and ever-ready look, and when at all puzzled he would lift his head and give a peculiar snort, so exceedingly porcine in its tone, that one could scarcely divest one's self of the idea that he was one of the mudoving herd.

On the present occasion, indeed, he was ignorant of the facts of the case about to be brought before Mr. Wittingham. The latter gentleman had considered with great solicitude whether he should make him acquainted with all that had occurred and seek his advice and coöperation. But Mr. Wittingham was cautious, exceedingly cautious, as I have already shown, when no strong passion caused him to act in a decided manner upon the spur of the moment. His natural impulse might indeed be vehement, and he frequently had to repeat to himself that sage adage, "The least said soonest mended," before he could get himself to refrain from saying a word to the clerk, Mr. Bacon, except that two men had come to him the night before with a cock-and-a-bull story about a highway robbery, of which he did not believe a word, and they were to come again that morning, when he should sift them thoroughly.

Now it is wonderful how the very least bits of art will frequently betray the artist. Mr. Wittingham merely said "Two men," which led his clerk, Mr. Bacon, to suppose that he had never seen either of the two men before; but when Mr. Beauchamp appeared in company with Ned Hayward, and the clerk recollected that the magistrate had very frequently wondered in his presence, who Mr. Beauchamp could be, and had directed him to make every sort of inquiry, he naturally said to himself, "Ha, ha, Wittingham has got something that he wishes to conceal; if not, why didn't he say at once that Beauchamp was one of the two. There's a screw loose somewhere, that's clear."

On Ned Hayward the clerk's small eyes fixed with a keen, inquisitive, and marveling glance, as with his gay, dashing air, half-military, half-sporting, firm and yet light, measured and yet easy, he advanced into the room and approached the table. It was a sort of animal that Mr. Bacon had never seen in his life before, and he looked just like a young pig when it sees a stage-coach dash by, standing firm for a minute, but ready in an instant to toss up its snout and curl up its tail, and caper off with a squeak as fast as it can go.

"Well, Mr. Witherington," said Ned Hayward, perfectly aware that nothing so much provokes a pompous man as mistaking his name, "here we are according to appointment, and doubtless you are ready to take our depositions, Mr. Withe..gton."

"Wittingham, sir," said the magistrate, impressively, laying strong emphasis on each syllable; "I beg you'll give me my own name and nobody else's.'

"Ay, ay, Whittington," said Ned Hayward, with the utmost composure, "I forgot; I knew it was some absurd name in an old ballad or story, and confounded you somehow or other with the man in 'Chevy Chase,' who

> 'When his legs were smitten off,
> He fought upon his stumps.'

But I remember now, you're the son of the Lord Mayor of London, the cat-man."

"No, sir, no," exclaimed Mr. Wittingham, whose face had turned purple with rage, "I am not his son, and you must be a fool to think so, for he died two hundred years ago."

"Oh, I know nothing of his history," said Ned Hayward, laughing, "and beside, I dare say it's all a fable."

"This gentleman's name is Wittingham, sir," said the clerk, "W-I-T wit, T-I-N-G ting, H-A-M ham, Wittingham."

"Oh, thank you, thank you, sir," said the young gentleman, "I shan't forget it now, 'Littera scripta manet,' Mr. What's-your-name."

"My name is Bacon, sir," said the clerk, with a grunt.

"Ah, very well, very well," replied Ned Hayward, "now to business. Wittingham, Bacon, and Co., I shan't forget that; an excellent good firm, especially when the junior partner is cut into rashers and well roasted. We are here, sir, to tender information upon oath, when it can no longer be of any avail, which we tendered last night, when it might have been of avail, in regard to an attempt at highway robbery committed yesterday evening upon the persons of two ladies in this neighborhood, namely, Mrs. Clifford and her daughter."

"Tendered last night, sir," exclaimed the clerk in spite of a tremendous nudge from Mr. Wittingham, "pray whom did you tender it to?"

"To the right reverend gentleman on the bench," said Ned Hayward with a profound bow to the worthy magistrate; and then looking at him full in the face with a significant smile, the young gentleman added, "he refused to take our depositions on secret motives, or information of his own, which, as it was kept in the profound depth of his mind, I will not pretend to penetrate."

Mr. Wittingham was in a state of most distressing perplexity. His fears were a powder magazine, Ned Hayward's smile was a spark, and there was a terrible explosion in his chest, which had nearly blown the window out.

"I—I—you see, Bacon," he whispered to the clerk. "I thought it was all nonsense, I was sure it was all nonsense—you may see by the fellow's manner that it is so—Who'd attend to such stuff!"

"I don't know, sir," said the clerk, "magistrates are bound to take informations of felonies tendered on oath; but we shall soon see who he is; we'll swear him," and taking up a paper from the table he began to write, lifting up his head after a moment and inquiring, "What is your name and profession?"

"My name is Edward Hayward," answered our friend, "late captain in his majesty's 40th regiment, now unattached."

Mr. Wittingham's face grew blanker and blanker. Yamen's own could not have looked a more russety brown. He did not know how to interfere with the clerk, or how to proceed himself; but at length, after sundry hems and haws, he said, "I think we had better hear the whole story first, and then take down the deposition if we should find it necessary. If Mrs. Clifford was robbed, or attempted to be robbed, why the devil doesn't Mrs. Clifford come to give me information herself? I see no reason why we should suffer such accounts to be gone into by deputy. The offense was against Mrs. Clifford, and we shall always be ready to balance."

"The offense was against the law of the land, sir," said Mr. Beauchamp, stepping forward, "and we, who witnessed the offense, and prevented it from being carried further, now come forward to demand that interference of justice which cannot be refused without great danger to those who deny it."

"Well, well," said Mr. Wittingham, "I am not going to deny it; let us hear your story, and as you are one of the informers, be so good as to favor us with your name, profession, etc."

"My name, sir, is Beauchamp," replied the gentleman he addressed, "profession, I am sorry to say, I have none."

"Ah," said the magistrate dryly, but the clerk whispered sharply in his ear: "He has two thousand pounds in the bank, paid in the day before yesterday. Jenkins told me last night at the Free and Easy, so it's all a mistake about his being—you know what."

The clerk had a reverence for gentlemen who had two thousand pounds at one time in a country bank—much greater reverence than for captains of infantry, unattached; and consequently he proceeded to take Mr. Beauchamp's deposition first, with all due respect, notwithstanding everything Mr. Wittingham could do to embarrass his course of operations. Then came Ned Hayward's turn, but our good friend thought fit to be more serious when an oath had been administered, and delivered his evidence with gravity and propriety. As soon, however, as Mr. Wittingham began to meddle with the matter again, and to treat the affair as one of little consequence, and not deserving much consideration, the spirit of malicious fun seized upon Ned once more, and he said with a mysterious air, "Sir, I beg you will give this your most serious attention, for you cannot yet tell what parties may be implicated. In giving our testimony of course we speak to facts alone. I have strictly confined myself to what I saw, and have not even mentioned one circumstance of which I have even a shade of doubt; but without interfering with your business, Mr. Skittington—for I never take another man's trade upon me—yet I shall certainly feel myself called upon to investigate quietly, and by all lawful means, the whole particulars of this business. That a felony has been committed there can be no doubt; two pistols were fired at me with intent to take my life, or do me some grievous bodily harm; one ball went through my hair, and the matter is a grave one, which may probably bring some respectable persons into a noose under a gallows. Look to it, look to it, Mr. Whittington, for I shall certainly look to it myself."

"Well, sir, well, do anything you please," said the magistrate, "I will do my duty without being tutored by you. I consider your conduct very disrespectful and—"

But ere he could finish the sentence the door of the justice-room opened, and a young man entered, dressed in the garb of a gentleman. Mr. Wittingham's face turned as pale as death, and Ned Hayward fixed his eyes for an instant—a single instant—upon the countenance of the new comer. It was by no means a prepossessing one, and the expression was not improved by a black handkerchief being tied over one eye, and hiding part of the nose and cheek. The young officer instantly withdrew his eyes, and fixed them sternly on the ground. "This is too impudent," he thought, and there was a momentary hesitation in his mind as to whether he should at once point out the intruder as the chief offender in the acts lately under discussion. Good-nature, however, prevailed, and while Henry Wittingham advanced straight to his father's side, and with a look of bold fierceness whispered a word in his ear, Ned Hayward turned to the door, saying, "Come, Beauchamp, our business here is over, and I must go up to Sir John Slingsby's."

Beauchamp followed him, after giving a sharp glance at Henry Wittingham, and at the door of the house they saw a horse standing which seemed to have been ridden hard.

CHAPTER IX.

IN WHICH A VERY YOUNG ACTOR MAKES AN UNEXPECTED APPEARANCE ON THE SCENE.

Mr. Beauchamp was sitting alone in the little room of the inn about five hours after Ned Hayward had left him. The day had been very warm for the season of the year, and though he had taken his walk as usual in the most shady and pensive places he could discover, he had found it oppressive, and had returned sooner than he ordinarily did. Mr. Groomber, worthy Mr. Groomber, the landlord of the White Hart, had perceived his return through the glass-doors of the bar, and had rolled in to tell him as a piece of news, that the postboy who had driven Mrs. and Miss Clifford had been, as he termed it, "had up" before Mr. Wittingham and examined, but had been speedily dismissed, he having sworn most valorously that he could not identify any of the persons concerned in stopping the chaise on the preceding night.

Mr. Beauchamp merely replied, "I thought so," and taking up a book, gave quiet intimation that he wished to be alone. As soon as the host had retired, however, he suffered the open volume to drop upon his knee, and gave himself up to thought, apparently of not the most cheerful kind, for the broad open brow became somewhat contracted, the fine dark eyes fixed upon one particular spot on the floor, the lip assumed a melancholy, even a cynical expression, and without moving limb or feature, he remained for at least a quarter of an hour in meditation most profound.

For my own part I do not see what business men have to think at all. If it be of the past, can they recall it? If it be of the future, can they govern it? No, no, and the present is for action, not for meditation. It was very foolish of Mr. Beauchamp to think, but yet he did so, and profoundly. But of what were his thoughts? I cannot tell. Some I know, some I do not know; or rather, like an intercepted letter, the actual course of his meditation was plain enough, written in clear and forcible lines, but the wide world of circumstances to which it referred, its relations with his fate, with his past history, with his present condition, with his future prospects, were all in darkness.

"It is in vain," he said to himself, "all in vain! Peace, happiness, tranquillity—where do they dwell? Are they the mere phantasms of man's ever-building imaginations? creations of fancy to satisfy the craving need of the soul? And yet some men can obtain them. This very Captain Hayward, he seems at least as well contented, as well satisfied with himself, the world, and all the world gives, as it is possible to conceive. But it is not so—it cannot be so. There is a black spot somewhere, I am sure — some bitter memory, some disappointed hope, some aspiration ever desired. He owned he dared not venture to love—is not that to be in a continued chain, to bear a fetter about one? and yet he seemed contented with such a fate. It is the regulation of our desires that makes us happy, the bounding them to our means—ay, with those who have no already existing cause for sorrow, but the cup of our fate is ever open for each passing hand to drop a poison into it, and once there, it pervades the whole—the whole! by every drop down to the very dregs, turning the sweetness and the spirit of the wine of life to bitterness and death. What is it that I want that can make existence pleasant? Wealth, health, a mind carefully trained and furnished with the keys to every door of mental enjoyment—with love for my fellow-creatures, good-will to all men, I have all—surely all; but, alas! I have memory too, and like the pillar of the cloud, it sometimes follows me, darkening the past, sometimes goes before me, obscuring the future. Yet this is very weak. An effort of the mind —the mind I have vainly thought so strong—should surely suffice to cast off the load. I have tried occupation, calm enjoyments, fair scenes, tranquil pleasures, peaceful amusements. Perhaps in a more fiery and eager course, in active, energetic pursuits, in passions that absorb all the feelings, and wrap the soul in their own mantle, I may find forgetfulness. In all that I have hitherto done—there have been long intervals—open gates for bitter memory to enter, and the very nature of my chosen objects has invited her. Oh, yes, there must be such a thing as happiness: that girl's fair joyous face, her smile teeming with radiance, told me so. But I will not think of her. She is too bright, and fair, and happy to be made a partner in so hazardous a speculation as mine. I will go away from this place: it has given my mind some little repose, and I could have made a friend of that light, good-humored Hayward if he would have let me; but he has left me too—all things leave me, I think. Well, he is gone, and I will go too—'tis not worth while lingering longer."

At this point of his meditations some horses passed the window, and shadows darkened the room; but Beauchamp took no notice, till he heard a voice which had become somewhat familiar to him during the last eighteen hours, exclaiming, "Ostler, ostler!" and in a moment after, Ned Hayward was in the room again, but not alone. He was followed by the portly figure of Sir John Slingsby, dressed in riding costume, and though somewhat dusty, and certainly very round and heavy, yet bearing that undefinable and almost ineffaceable look of a gentleman which not even oddities and excesses had been able to wipe out.

Ned Hayward's words were few and soon spoken: "Mr. Beauchamp, Sir John Slingsby; Sir John, Mr. Beauchamp," were all he said, but the old baronet soon took up the conversation, shaking his new acquaintance warmly by the hand.

"Glad to see you, Mr. Beauchamp, very glad to see you. I find my family are under a great obligation to you—that is to say, my sister Harriet, Mrs. Clifford. Devilish impudent thing, by Jove, for those fellows to attack a carriage at that time of the evening, and very lucky you happened to be there, for my friend Ned Hayward here—though he has a notion of tactics, haven't you, Ned?—and is a stout fellow — could hardly have managed three of them."

"I look upon myself as very fortunate, Sir John," replied Mr. Beauchamp, "in having taken my evening walk in that direction; but at the same time, it is but fair to acknowledge that my share in the rescue of your sister and her daughter was but small. I only kept one man in play, while Captain Hayward had to contend with two."

"All the same! all the same, my dear sir," said the baronet; "the reserve shares all the glory of a battle even if it does not pull a trigger. The ladies, however, are exceedingly obliged to you—very good girls, both of them—not that they have commissioned me to express their thanks, far from it, for they are particularly anxious to do so themselves if you will give them the opportunity; and therefore they have begged me to ask if you would favor us by your company at dinner to-day, and to say that they will be devilish sorry if any previous engagement should prevent you, though they calculate upon to-morrow, if not to-day."

"I am quite an anchorite here, Sir John," answered Mr. Beauchamp, with a grave smile; but before he could finish his sentence, the old baronet, thinking it was the commencement of an excuse, hastened to stop it, saying,

"Quite a quiet dinner, I assure you—all as grave and proper as possible; no drinking, no laughing, no fun—all upon our good behavior. There will be nobody but you, Ned Hayward, I, and the doctor there; Harriet, Mary, and my girl—who, by the way, says she knows you —has seen you twice at the good doctor's—Doctor Miles's."

"I have had the pleasure of meeting Miss Slingsby," said Beauchamp. "I was only about to answer you just now, Sir John, that I am quite an anchorite here, and therefore not likely to have many invitations to dinner. As I have not much cultivated the people of the place, they have not much cultivated me; and I believe they look upon me as a somewhat suspicious character, especially our friend Mr. Wittingham, who I find has been very curious in his inquiries as to whether I pay my bills, and where I go to when I walk out."

"Wittingham's an old fool!" exclaimed Sir John Slingsby, "and like all other old fools, he thinks himself the wisest man in the world. I wonder what the lord lieutenant could be dreaming of when he put him in the commission of the peace—a man no more fit for it than my horsewhip. I'll pay him for it all—I'll pay him—ask him to dinner—make him beastly drunk, and lodge him for the night in a horse-trough."

"I hope not this evening, Sir John," said Beauchamp, with a smile.

"Oh dear no," replied the baronet, with a look of rueful fear, "all very prim to-night—all as grave as judges—quite proper and discreet while my sister Harriet is with us—an archdeacon's widow, you know—a dean's, after all—though he was only dean for a couple of months—a very good man indeed, but exceedingly proper, terribly proper: the very sound of a cork frightened him out of his wits. I do believe he fancied that port and madeira are sent over in decanters, and claret in jugs with handles. However, you'll come, that's settled: half-past five, old-fashioned hours, gives plenty of time after dinner. But now that's no use," added the baronet, with a sigh, "we might as well dine at seven now—no use of a long evening. However, the girls will give us a song, or music of some kind, and perhaps we can make up a rubber at long whist, which will make us sleep as sound as dormice. No sin in that—no, Ned."

"None in the world, Sir John," answered Ned Hayward, "but a great deal of dullness. I never could make out in my life how men, with their wits about them, could spend hours throwing bits of painted pasteboard in a particular order for shillings and sixpences."

"Just as reasonable as standing up for hours to be showed for shillings and sixpences," answered Sir John Slingsby, "and both you and I have played at that, you dog. Everything is folly if you take it in the abstract—love, war, wine, ambition; and depend upon it, Ned, the lightest follies are the best—isn't it so, Mr. Beauchamp?"

"There is indeed some truth in what you say, Sir John," replied Beauchamp, with a thoughtful smile; "and I believe amusing follies are better than serious ones—at least I begin to think so now."

"To be sure, to be sure," answered Sir John Slingsby; "man was made for fun and not for sadness. It's a very nice world if people would let it be so. Oh, we'll show you some sport, Mr. Beauchamp, before we have done with you; but to-day you know we'll all be very proper—very good boys indeed—and then when the cat's away the mice will play. Ha! ha! ha! At half-past five, you know, and in the mean time, Ned and I will ride off and abuse old Wittingham. I'll give him a pretty lecture."

Good Sir John was disappointed however; his horses, his groom, and his bulky person had all been seen from the windows of Mr. Wittingham's house as he rode into the town with Ned Hayward, and as a matter of course, Mr. Wittingham was over the hills and far away before the visit to Mr. Beauchamp was concluded.

When Sir John and Ned Hayward left him, Beauchamp remained for some minutes with a smile upon his countenance—a meditative—nay, a melancholy smile.

"So fleet our resolutions," he said to himself, "so fade away our schemes and purposes. Who can say in this life what he will do, and what he will not do the next day—nay, the next minute? Which is the happiest after all, the man who struggles with fate and circumstance, and strives to perform the impracticable task of ruling them, or he who, like a light thing upon the waters, suffers himself to be carried easily down the current, whirling round with every eddy, resting quietly in the still pool, or dashing gayly down the rapids! Heaven knows, but at all events, fate has shown herself so resolute to take my affairs into her own hands, that I will not try to resist her. I will indulge every whim, and leave fortune to settle the result. I may as well purchase that property: it is as good an investment as any other, I dare say, and if not, it does not much signify. I will write to my agent to transmit the money to-day."

With this resolution he sat down, and had soon dispatched a few lines, which he carried to the post himself; then strolled out of the town for an hour, and then returned to dress, ordering a post-chaise for Tarningham House.

How different are the sensations with which one goes out to dinner at different times—ay, even when it is to the house of a new acquaintance, where we have little means of judging previously whether our day will be pleasant or unpleasant, joyous or sad. As there must be more than one party to each compact, and as the age and its object act and react upon each other, so the qualities of each have their share in the effect upon either, and the mood of the visitor has at least as much to do with the impression that he receives as the mood of the host. Wonderfully trite, is it not, reader? It has been said a thousand times before, but it will not do you the least harm to have it repeated, especially as I wish you clearly to understand the mood in which Mr. Beauchamp went, for the first time, to the house of Sir John Slingsby. It was then in that of an indifferent mood of which I have shown some indications, by describing what was passing in his mind after the baronet and Ned Hayward left him. There are, however, various sorts of indifferent moods; there is the gay indifferent, which is very commonly called, devil-me-carishness; then there is the impertinent indifference, with a dash of persiflage in it, just to take off the chill—as men put brandy into soda-water—which very empty and conceited men assume to give them an air of that superiority to which they are entitled by no mental quality. Then there is the indifference of despair, and the indifference of satiety. But none of these was the exact sort of indifference which Mr. Beauchamp felt, or thought he felt. It was a grave indifference, springing from a sort of morbid conviction that the happiness or unhappiness of man is not at all in his own hands, or that if it be at all so, it is only at his outset in life, and that the very first step so affects the whole course of after events, as to place the control over them totally beyond his own power. It is a bad philosophy, a very unsafe, untrue, unwise philosophy, and a great author has made it the philosophy of the devil:

"Thus we
In our first choice are ever free;
Choose, and the right of choice is o'er,
We who were free, are free no more."

So says Göethe, according to Anster's beautiful translation, and I think it much better to give that translation which everybody can understand, than the original which one half of my readers cannot, and which would not be a bit better if they could.

Now Mr. Beauchamp was not the devil, nor anything the least like it, but yet this philosophy had been driven into him by his own previous history, and though he often resisted its influence, and strove to struggle with it, and by new acts to shape a new fate, yet he had been so often disappointed in the attempt, he had found every course, indeed, so constantly lead to the same result, that the philosophy returned as soon as the effort was over, and he looked upon almost every event with indifference, as destined to end in one manner, and that not a pleasant one.

Nevertheless, he could enjoy for the time: there was no man by nature better fitted for enjoyment. He had a fondness for everything that was great and beautiful; for everything that was good and noble; he loved flowers, and birds, and music, and the fair face of nature. His breast was full of harmonies, but unfortunately the tones were never prolonged; to borrow a simile from the musical instrument, there was a damper that fell almost as soon as the chord was struck, and the sound, sweet as it might be, ceased before the music was complete.

In driving along, however, the post-boy went somewhat slowly, and with a peculiarly irritating jog in the saddle, which would have sadly disturbed a person of a less indifferent mind—there was plenty of room for pleasant observation if not reflection. The road ran through wooded groves, and often turned along the bank of the stream. At times it mounted over a hill-side, and showed beyond a rich and leafy foreground, the wide extended landscape, undulating away toward the horizon, with the lines of wood and slope beautifully marked in the aerial perspective, and filling the mind with vague imaginations of things that the eye could not define. It dipped down into a valley too, and passed through a quiet, peaceful little village, with a group of tall silver poplars before the church, and a congregation of fine old beech-trees around the rectory. The whole aspect of the place was home tranquillity; that of a purely English village under the most favorable circumstances. Cleanliness, neatness, rustic ornament, an air of comfort, a cheerful openness, a look of healthfulness. How different from the villages one sometimes sees, alas! in every country—but less in England than anywhere else in the wide world—the abodes of fever, dirt, penury, wretchedness.

As he passed the rectory, with its smooth, well-mown lawn, and green gate, Beauchamp put his head to the carriage-window and looked out. He expected to see, perhaps, a neat one-horse chaise at the door, and a sleek, well-fed beast to draw it; but there was nothing of the kind there, and he remarked the traces of a pair of wheels from the gates on the road before him. Half a mile farther were the gates of Sir John Slingsby's park. It cannot be said that they were in very good order, the iron-work wanted painting sadly, one or two of the bars had got a sad twist, the columns of stone-work to which they were fixed needed pointing, if not more solid repairs. The lodge had all the shutters up, and the post-boy had to get down and open the gates.

Beauchamp sighed, not because he took any great interest in the place or the people it contained, but because the aspect of desolation—of the decay of man's works—especially from neglect, is well worth a sigh. The drive through the park, however, was delightful. Old trees were all around, glorious old trees, those ever-growing monuments of the past, those silent leafy chroniclers of ages gone. Who planted them, who nourished, who protected them? what times have they seen, what deeds have they witnessed, what storms have passed over them, what sunshine have they drunk, what sorrows, and what joys have visited the generations of man, since first they sprang up from the small seed till now, when they stretch out their giant arms to shelter the remote posterity of those whom they have seen flourish and pass away? Who can wander among old trees, and not ask such questions, ay, and a thousand more?

The sight was pleasant to Mr. Beauchamp, it had a serious yet pleasing effect upon his mind, and when the chaise drew up at the door of Tarningham House, he felt more disposed than before to enjoy the society within, whatever it might be.

The outer door was open, the fat butler threw open pompously the two glass doors within, a couple of round footmen, whose lineaments were full of ale, flanked the hall on either side, and thus Mr. Beauchamp was marshaled to the drawing-room, which he entered with his calm and dignified air, not in the slightest degree agitated, although he was well aware that two very pretty faces were most likely looking for his arrival.

Sir John Slingsby, in the blue coat, the white waistcoat, the black breeches and stockings, with the rubicund countenance and white hair, advanced at once to receive him, and presented him to Mrs. Clifford and her daughter.

"This young lady you already know, Mr. Beauchamp," he said, pointing to his daughter, "so I shan't introduce you here."

But that gentleman shook hands with Miss Slingsby first, proving that their acquaintance, however short, had made some steps toward friendship.

Isabella was a little fluttered in her manner, why, she scarcely knew herself, and the color grew a little deeper in her cheek, and her smile wavered, as if she would fain have seemed not too well pleased. All this, however, did not at all take from her beauty, for as a fair scene is never lovelier than when the shadows of drifting clouds are passing over it, so a pretty face is never prettier than under the influence of slight emotions.

Miss Slingsby and Mary Clifford were standing both together, so that Beauchamp had both those sweet faces before him at once. Isabella was as fair as a lily, with eyes of a deep blue, and warm brown hair, neither light nor dark, clustering richly round her brow and cheek in willful curls that would have their own way. Mary Clifford was darker in complexion, with the hair braided on her brow, there was deep but gentle thought in her dark eyes, and though the short chiseled upper lip could at times bear a joyous smile enough, yet the general expression was grave, though not melancholy.

Beauchamp was a serious man, of a calm, quiet temper, somewhat saddened by various events which had befallen him, but which of those two faces, reader, think you he admired the most? The gay one, to be sure, the one the least like himself. So it is wisely ordained by nature, and it is the force of circumstances alone that ever makes us choose a being precisely similar to ourselves to be our companion through existence. Two tones, exactly the same, even upon different instruments, produce unison, not harmony, and so it is throughout all nature.

After a few words to Isabella, Mr. Beauchamp turned again to Mrs. Clifford, who at once spoke of their adventure of the night before, and thanked him for his kind assistance. Beauchamp said all that courtesy required, and said it gracefully and well. He expressed the pleasure that he felt to see that neither of the ladies had suffered from the fear or agitation they had undergone, and expressed great satisfaction at having been near the spot at the moment the attack was made.

While they were speaking, Sir John Slingsby had twice taken out his watch—it was a large one, hanging by a thick gold chain, and Mr. Beauchamp, thinking that he divined the cause of his disquiet, observed with a smile,

"Dr. Miles must be here, I think, for judging by small signs, such as the traces of wheels and an open gate, I imagine that he had left home before I passed."

"Oh yes, he is here," answered Sir John Slingsby, "he has been here ten minutes; but the old boy, who is as neat in his person as in his ideas, had got a little dust upon his black coat, and is gone to brush it off and wash his hands. That open chaise of his costs him more time in washing and brushing, than writing his sermons; but I can't think what has become of that fellow, Ned Hayward. The dog went out two hours ago for a walk through the park up to the moor, and I suppose 'thoughtless Ned,' as we used to call him, has forgotten that we dine at half-past five. Well, we won't wait for him; as soon as the doctor comes we will order dinner, and fine him a bumper for being late."

While he was speaking, Dr. Miles, the clergyman of the village through which Beauchamp had passed, entered the room, and shook him warmly by the hand. He was a tall, spare man, with a look of florid health in his countenance, and snow-white hair; his face was certainly not handsome, and there was a grave and somewhat stern expression in it, but yet it was pleasing, especially when he smiled, which, to say the truth, was not often. It may seem a contradiction in terms to say that he laughed oftener than he smiled, yet so it was, for his laugh was not always good-humored, especially in the house of Sir John Slingsby. There was, from time to time, something bitter and cynical in it, and generally found vent when anything was said, the folly of which he thought exceeded the wickedness. He was one of the few men of perfect respectability who was a constant visitor at Tarnigham House; but the truth was, that he was the rector of Sir John Slingsby's parish. Now no consideration of tithes, perquisites, good dinners, comforts, and conveniences, would have induced Dr. Miles to do anything that he thought wrong, but he argued in this manner:—

"Sir John Slingsby is an old fool, and one who is likely to get worse instead of better, if nobody of more rational views, higher feelings, and more reasonable pursuits takes any notice of him. Now I, from my position, am bound to do the best I can to bring him to a better state of mind. I may effect something in this way, by seeing him frequently, at all events, I can do much to prevent his becoming worse; my presence is some check upon these people, and even if it does little good to the father, there is that sweet, dear, amiable girl, who needs some support and comfort in her unpleasant situation."

Such were some of the considerations upon which Dr. Miles acted. There were many more, indeed, but these are enough for my purpose. He shook Beauchamp warmly by the hand, as we have seen, and seemed to be more intimate with him than anybody in the room, taking him aside, and speaking to him for a moment or two in private, while Sir John Slingsby rang the bell, and ordered dinner without waiting for Captain Hayward.

"William Slack, Sir John, has seen him," said the butler, "coming down the long avenue with something in his arms—he thinks it's a fawn."

"Well, then, he'll be here soon," said the master of the mansion, "serve dinner, serve dinner, by Jove, I won't wait. Devil take the fellow, the ensign shouldn't keep his colonel waiting. It's not respectful. I'll fine him two bumpers if the soup's off before he makes his appearance."

In the mean time the first words of Dr. Miles to Mr. Beauchamp were, "I have made the inquiries, my dear sir, according to your request, and it is well worth the money. It will return they say four per cent. clear, which in these times is well enough."

"I have already determined upon it," said Beauchamp, "and have written to London about it."

"Ay, ay," said the worthy doctor, "just like all the rest of the world, my young friend—asking for advice, and acting without it."

"Not exactly," answered Beauchamp, "you told me before what you thought upon the subject, and I knew you were not one to express an opinion except upon good grounds. The only question is now what lawyer I can employ here to arrange minor matters. The more important must, of course, be referred to my solicitors in London."

"We have no great choice," replied Dr Miles, "there are but two in Tarnigham, thank God. The one is a Mr. Wharton, the other a

Mr. Bacon, neither of them particularly excellent specimens of humanity; but in the one the body is better than the mind, in the other the mind better than the body."

"Probably I should like the latter best," answered Beauchamp; "but pray, my dear doctor, give me a somewhat clearer knowledge of these two gentlemen for my guidance."

"Well then, though I do not love in general to say aught in disparagement of my neighbors behind their backs," Dr. Miles replied, "I must, I suppose, be more definite. Mr. Wharton is a quiet, silent man, gentlemanlike in appearance, and in manners, cautious, plausible, and affecting friendship for his clients. I have never known him set the poor by the ears for the sake of small gains, or promote dissensions among farmers in order to make a lawsuit. On the contrary, I have heard him dissuade from legal proceedings, and say that quarrels are very foolish things."

"A good sort of person," said Beauchamp.

"Hear the other side, my dear sir," rejoined the doctor, "such game as I have been speaking of is too small for him. He was once poor; he is now very rich. I have rarely heard of his having a client who somehow did not ruin himself; and although I do not by any means intend to say that I have been able to trace Mr. Wharton's hand in their destruction, certain it is that the bulk of the property—at least a large share of what they squandered or lost, has found its way into his possession. I have seen him always ready to smooth men's way to destruction, to lend money, to encourage extravagance, to lull apprehension, to embarrass efforts at retrenchment, and then, when the beast was in the toils, to dispatch it and take his share. No mercy then, when ruin is inevitable; the lawyer must be paid, and must be paid first."

"And now for Mr. Bacon!" said Beauchamp.

"Why, he is simply a vulgar little man," answered the clergyman, "coarse in manners and in person: cunning and stolid, but with a competent knowledge of law; keen at finding out faults and flaws. His practice is in an inferior line to the other's, but he is, at all events, safer, and, I believe, more honest."

"How do you mean, cunning and stolid!" asked Beauchamp; "those two qualities would seem to be incompatible."

"Oh dear, no," replied Dr. Miles; but before he could explain, the butler announced dinner, and as Sir John gave his arm to Mrs. Clifford, Beauchamp advanced toward Isabella. The doors were thrown wide open, and the party were issuing forth to cross the vestibule to the dining-room, when suddenly Sir John and his sister halted, encountered by an apparition which certainly was unexpected in the form that it assumed. In fact they had not taken two steps out of the drawing-room ere the glass doors were flung open, and Ned Hayward stood before them as unlike the Ned Hayward I first presented to the reader as possible. His coat was covered with a dull whitish gray powder, his linen soiled, and apparently singed, his hands and face as black as soot, his glossy brown hair rugged and burnt, no hat upon his head, and in his arms a very pretty boy of about two years old, or a little more, perhaps, on whose face were evident marks of recent tears, though he seemed now pacified, and was staring about with large eyes at the various objects in the large house to which he was just introduced.

"Why Ned, Ned, Ned, what in the mischief's name has happened to you?" exclaimed Sir John Slingsby, "have you all at once become a poor young man with a small family of young children?"

"No, my dear sir," answered Ned Hayward, in a hurried tone, "but, if you have any women in the house, I will give this little fellow into their care, and tell you all about it in a few minutes. Hush, my little man, hush. We are all friends: we will take care of you. Now don't cry again: no harm shall happen."

"Women! to be sure!" cried Sir John, "call the housekeeper, one of you rascals. Women! Hang it, Ned, do you think I could live in a house without women? A bottle of claret is not more necessary to my existence than the sight of a cap and a petticoat flying about the house—in the distance, Ned, in the distance! No brooms and dust-pans too near me; but in a discreet position, far enough off, yet visible: woman is the sunshine of a house."

"Give him to me, Captain Hayward," said Miss Clifford, holding out her arms for the boy. "He will be quiet with me, I am sure. Won't you, my poor little fellow?"

The child gazed at her strangely as she took him, letting go Dr. Miles's arm to do so; but meeting the sweet smile that lighted up her beautiful face, he put his little arms round her neck the next moment, and hid his large blue eyes upon her shoulder. She held him kindly there, speaking a few gentle words to him, while Ned Hayward, looking round the party, addressed himself to the worthy clergyman, inquiring, "You are the rector of this parish, sir, I think?"

Dr. Miles made a stiff bow, not prepossessed in favor of any of Sir John Slingsby's old friends, and answered as briefly as possible, "I am, sir."

"Then can you tell me," asked the young gentleman, eagerly, "if there was any woman up at the cottage on the moor?"

Dr. Miles started, and replied, with a look of much greater interest, "No, sir, no. What has happened? Why do you ask? What cottage do you mean?— there are three."

"I mean the cottage of a man called Gimlet," answered Ned Hayward. "I saw some women's clothes—gowns and things; and I thought there might be a woman there, that's all. There was none, then?"

"There was one six months ago," replied the clergyman, in a very grave tone, "as lovely a creature as ever was seen, but she lies in my church-yard, poor thing. She is at peace."

"Thank God," said Ned Hayward, in a tone of relief. "Ah, here comes somebody for the child. My good lady, will you have the kindness to take good care of this little fellow. See that he is not burnt or hurt, and let him have some bread-and-milk, or things that children eat—I don't know very well what they are, but I dare say you do."

"Oh, by Jove, that she does!" exclaimed Sir John Slingsby, "she feeds half the children in the parish. You take good care of him, Mrs. Hope—and now, Ned," he continued, turning from the housekeeper to his guest, "what the devil's the meaning of all this?"

"I will tell you by and by, Sir John," answered Captain Hayward. "Pray go to dinner, and I will be down directly. Many apologies for being late; but it was not to be helped. I will not be ten minutes; but do not let me detain you—"

"But what is it all about? What has happened? Who the deuce is the child?" exclaimed Sir John. "Do you think either men or women can eat soup or digest fish with their stomachs full of curiosity?"

"By and by, Sir John, by and by," said Ned Hayward, making toward the stairs. "You shall have the whole story for dessert. At present I am dirty, and the dinner's waiting. It will get cold, and your curiosity keep hot."

Thus saying, he left them, and the rest of the party proceeded to dinner.

CHAPTER X.

THE POACHER'S COTTAGE.

If you quit the high-road from Tarningham on the right-hand side by that little sandy path, just a hundred yards on the other side of the stone-pump, equidistant from it and the milestone which marks, on the hither-side, five miles and a half from Tarningham, and walk straight on, it leads you over the moor, and through the midst of scenery very common in England; not much loved by ordinary ramblers, but which for me and a few others has a peculiar and almost indescribable charm. The ground is broken, undulated, full of deep sand-pits and holes frequently covered with gorge and heath, spotted occasionally with self-sown shrubs, a stunted hawthorn here and there, two or three melancholy firs, gathered together on the top of a mound, like a party of weary watchers trying to console each other by close companionship, while from time to time a few light birches, with their quivering leaves, and thin, graceful arms, and ragged coats of silver and brown, are seen hanging over the edge of a bank, or decorating the side of a hollow. If you dip down into one of the low dells, a sensation of hermit-like solitude comes upon you. You believe that there at least you may be, and you feel an irresistible desire to sit down at the foot of this shrub, or that, where the roots, like a well-governed state, serve to keep together, in close union, the light and incoherent materials that sustain them, and there to commune with your own thoughts in the silent presence of Nature. If you mount one of the little hills, the scene and the sensation is very different. The solitude is as deep as striking; no living thing is to be seen, unless it be a wild curlew, with its thin arched wings, whirling away with a shrill cry in the enjoyment of its own lonelipess; but there is an expansion, a grandeur, a strange sublimity in the extent of waste, with the long lines waving off in different hues like the billows of the ocean, first yellow sand, and green short turf, then a brown mass, where the sight loses its distinctness, then perhaps a gleam of water, then a blue line, deep as indigo, where the azure air and the black shade mingle together under some threatening cloud; then long undulations of purple, fainter and fainter, till who shall say where earth ends and sky begins. The bleakness, the stillness, the solitariness, the varied coloring, the vast extent, the very monotony of the forms mingle together in a whole that has not less grandeur in it than the highest mountain that ever raised its proud brow above its brother giants.

"The world forgetting, by the world forgot;"

I have said you would have to go straight on, but what I said was quite untrue, and it is wonderful how many little falsehoods slip out of the innocent and unconscious pen, either in the haste of writing—which is very pardonable—or for the sake of a little graceful turn, a neat expression, or a pretty figure, which is not so small a fault. I do not believe there were ever ten sentences written by poet, historian, or romance-writer, in ancient or modern times, that had not some lie in them, direct or implied. I stand self-convicted. It is not true that you would have to go straightforward, for if you did you would walk into a pond, and moreover, might never chance to get out again; for what between rushes and reeds, and weeds and water-lilies, to say nothing of sundry deep holes at the bottom, there is every risk that you would get your feet entangled, and plunge headforemost into a place where you could neither swim nor disengage yourself. No, the path does not go straightforward. Of all man's circuitous ways, and every one who knows the human heart is well aware that it is too fond of crooked paths ever to pursue a straightforward course in anything—of all man's circuitous ways, I say, there never was one more serpentine or meandering than that which leads from the high-road upon the moor. First it turns round that pond I have mentioned, then it glides about the base of a little hill, then it forces its way in a slanting direction, through a bank of sand, then it turns aside from a deep pit, then it respectfully passes at a little distance from a tumulus, where sleep the ashes of the forgotten brave; and even when it gets upon the flat green turf, it twists about like a great snake, giving sad indications of man's vagabond fancies that lead him hither and thither, without rhyme or reason, wherever he may be going, and whatever may be the object before him.

But after all, why should he not be thus led? why should he not follow these fancies? Life's but a walk over a moor, and the wild-flowers that grow upon our path are too few not to gather them when they come within sight, even though it cost us a step or two aside. It's all in the day's journey, and we shall get home at last.

Yet it is curious to consider all these various bends and turnings in any little foot-way such as that we are now following. There is very often a reason for that which seems to us to be the effects of mere caprice. Now why did the fellow who first beat this road with his wandering foot, turn away here to the right, when it is as evident as the sun at noonday (that's to say in fine weather), that his object was to pass straight between those two little hillocks before us? Oh, I see, the grass is very green there; there is either some little spring, or else the ground is soft and marshy in wet weather, and so he went round to avoid it. But if he did so, why did he not keep to the right of the hillock, that one with the hawthorn upon it, that is now in flower, scenting the solitary air with a perfume that no art could ever extract? Could it be to take a look at that wide view over the tall, magnificent trees of the park, with the wide-spread country beyond, and the little tower of Tarningham church, rising up between those tall silver poplars? Perhaps it might be so; for there is an inherent sense of the picturesque in the breast of most men, which, unlike any acquired taste, grows and refines, and becomes stronger and more overpowering the more it is indulged, and the more opportunities of indulgence that it has. It is perhaps the only thing of which it can be truly said that "increase of appetite grows by that it feeds on." And it is a beautiful scene, too, which might well temper a little out of the way. As to the rest it is clear enough, that when he had got there—the first wanderer over the moor, I mean—he was obliged to turn away to the right, in order to come into the proper direction again, so here are four of his deviations completely accounted for, and indeed, dear reader, I cannot help thinking, that if we were once or twice in life to examine curiously the motives of our own actions, or even of others, taking care to be impartial in both cases, we should find cause to cast away our critical spirit, and to believe that there are very often good and rational reasons for a turn to the right or a turn to the left, which we have been inclined to blame, simply because we did not perceive what those reasons were. Oh, charity, charity, rightly understood in thy largest and holiest sense, what a beautiful thing thou art; and did men but practice thee, how often should we be spared the crime and folly of condemning unwisely and unjustly.

But to return to my path: upon my life, after having regained the direction, the fellow has followed it straight on for more than a quarter of a mile. It is wonderful, it is marvelous! I never saw such a thing before! But nevertheless, it is true that there was nothing either to attract or drive him to one side or the other; and then, as if to make up for lost time, what zigzags he takes afterward! Round that clump of firs, under that bank, through between the birch-trees, here and there over the wildest part of the moor, till he passes close by the edge of that deep sand-pit, which must have rested a long time since it contributed any of its crumbling particles to strew the floor of the public-house, or sprinkle the passage of the cottage; for the bushes are growing thick down the slope, and there seems as if there had been a little kitchen-garden in the bottom, and a human habitation.

In the reign of that King George, under whose paternal sceptre flourished the English nation in the times whereof I am writing, there was a cottage in that sand-pit, a small lonely house, built of timber, laths, and mud, and containing two or three rooms. The materials, as I have shown, were poor, ease and comfort seemed far from it, yet there was something altogether not unpleasant in the idea of dwelling in that sheltered nook, with the dry sand and green bushes round, and feeling, that, let the wind rave as it would over the hill, let it bend down the birch-trees, and make the pines rustle and crack, and strike their branches against each other, the fury of the tempest could not reach one there—that, let the rain pour down in ever such heavy torrents, as if the windows of heaven were open, the thirsty ground would drink up the streams as they fell, as if its draught were insatiable. There were signs of taste, too, about the building, of a humble and natural kind. Over the door had been formed with some labor a little sort of trellised portico, of rough wood-work, like an arbor, and over this had been trained several plants of the wild-hop and wild-clematis, with one solitary creeping garden-rose. Sticks had been placed across the house, too, to afford a stay for these shrubs to spread themselves over the face of the cottage, if they had any strength to spare, when they had covered the little portico, and two or three wandering shoots, like truant children, were already sporting along the fragile path thus afforded them.

The interior of the house was less prepossessing than the outside; the mud floor, hard beaten down and very equally flattened, was dry enough, for the sand below it carried off all moisture; but in the walls of the rooms there was, alas! many a flaw through which sun or moon might shine, or the night-wind enter, and to say the truth, the inhabitants of the cottage were as much indebted to the banks of the pit for protection against such a cold visitant, as to the construction of their dwelling. The furniture was scanty and rude, seeming to have been made by a hand not altogether unaccustomed to the use of a carpenter's tools, but hastily and carelessly, so that in gazing round the sleeping-chamber, one was inclined to imagine that the common tent-bed that stood in one corner was the only article that had ever tenanted a shop. The great chest, the table, the two or three chairs, all spoke plainly the same artificer, and had that been all the room contained, it would have looked very miserable indeed; but hanging from nails driven into the wall, were a number of very peculiar ornaments. There was a fox's head and a fox's brush, dried, and in good preservation; there was the gray skin of a badger, and the brown skin of an otter; birds of prey of various sizes and descriptions, the butcher-bird, the sparrow-hawk, and the buzzard, as well as several owls. Beside these zoological specimens, were hung up in the same manner a number of curious implements, the properties and applications of some of which were easy to divine, while others remained mysterious. There were two or three muzzles for dogs, which could be distinguished at once, but then by their side was a curious-looking contrivance, which appeared to be a Lilliputian wire-mousetrap, sown on to some straps of leather. Then came a large coil of wire, a dog's collar, and a pair of greyhound-slips. Next appeared something difficult to describe, having two saw-like jaws of iron like a rat-trap, supported on semi-circular bars which were fixed into a wooden handle, having a spring on the outside, and a revolving plate within. It was evident that the jaws could be opened and kept open in case of need, and had I been a hare, a rabbit, or any other delicate-footed animal, I should not have liked to trust my ankle within their gripe. I could describe several other instruments both of leather and iron, which were similarly suspended from the wall; but as I really cannot tell the reader what was the use of any one of them, it would be but labor thrown away. However, there were other things, the intent and purport of which were quite self-evident. Two or three small cages, a landing-net, fishing-rods, a gun, powder-flasks, shot-belts, a casting-net, a clap-net, and by the side of a window hung four small cages, containing singing-birds.

But who was he in the midst of all this strange assortment? Was he the owner of this wild, lonely dwelling? Oh no, it was a young man dressed as none could be dressed who frequented not very different scenes from those that lay around him. His clothes were not only those of a gentleman, but those of a gentleman who thought much of his own personal appearance—too much indeed to be perfectly gentlemanly. All that the tailor, the boot-maker, the hat-maker could do had been done to render the costume correct according to the fashion of the day; but there was a certain something which may be called a too-smartness about it all; the colors were too bright, the cut too decidedly fashionable, to be quite in good taste. Neither was the arrangement of the hues altogether harmonious. There are the same colors in a China-aster and a rose, but yet what a difference in the appearance of the two flowers; and the same sort of difference, though not to the same extent, existed between the dress of the person before us, and that of the truly well-dressed man even of his own time. In most other respects, his appearance was good; he was tall, rather slightly formed than otherwise, and had none of that stiffness and rigidity which might have been anticipated from his apparel. Demeanor is almost always tinged more or less by character, and a wild, rash, vehement disposition will as in his case give a freedom to the movements which no drilling can altogether do away with. His features in themselves were not bad. There was a good high forehead, somewhat narrow indeed, a rather fine pair of eyes (if one could have seen them both), a little close together, a well-formed nose, and a mouth and chin not badly cut, though there was a good deal of animal in the one, and the other was somewhat too prominent. The whole countenance, however, was disfigured by a black silk shade which covered the right eye, and a fresh scar all the way down the same side of the nose, while from underneath the shade, which was not large enough for its purpose, peeped out sundry rainbow rings of blue and yellow, invading both the cheek and the temple.

By these marks the reader has already perceived that this gentleman has been presented to him before, but in a very different garb, which he had thought fit to assume for his own particular purposes on the preceding night, and now he sat in the cottage of Stephen Gimlet the poacher, judging it expedient to keep himself at a distance from the peopled haunts of man, during the bright and bustling day at least. At night he proposed to betake himself to the inn which had been mentioned in his conversation with the housekeeper; but after his pleasant and hopeful conversation with his father, he had ridden straight to the dwelling of his companion, Wolf, where on the preceding day his portmantles had been left after they had arranged their plans; and having stabled his horse in a shed at the back of the building, had passed the heavy hours of darkness partly in bitter meditations, and partly in conversation with his comrade. Sleep could hardly be said to have visited his eyelids, for though after he cast himself down to rest he had dozed from time to time, yet agitating thoughts continually returned and deprived him of all real repose.

At an early hour of the morning, and while it was still dark, Ste Gimlet had gone out, as was his wont, and rising with the first rays of the sun, Henry Wittingham employed himself in dressing with scrupulous care, and then filled up about half an hour more in making a black patch to hide his disfigured eye, out of an old silk handkerchief. When this was accomplished, wanting something or another to tie this covering in its right place, he looked round the room, but in vain. Leather straps, dog-collars, rat-traps, brass-wire, would none of them do, and although near the nets there was lying a ball of whipcord, he thought that such a decoration as a string made with that material would but ill accord with the rest of his habiliments. He therefore walked across the little passage to the next room, and lifted the coarse wooden latch of the door. He found the door locked however, and muttering to himself, "D—n the fellow, did he think I would steal anything!" he was turning away, when a small sweet voice from within exclaimed, "I'm ready, daddy, I've got my stockings on."

"Oh, he's locked the child in, that's it," said Henry Wittingham to himself, and then raising his voice, he said, "Your daddy's not come back, Charley, so lie still and be quiet."

Then returning to the next room, the brilliant thought struck him of cutting off the hem of the old silk handkerchief to make a string for the black patch, which task being accomplished, and all complete, he sat down and thought.

Oh, how many sorts of misery there are in the world! In giving to man his fine organization, in raising him above the brute by delicate structure, by intellect, by imagination, and by infinitely extended hope and long-persisting memory, nature, indeed, did afford him infinite sources of enjoyment, but at the same time laid him open on every side to the attack of evils. In perfect innocence, indeed, man and his whole race might find nearly perfect happiness. The Garden of Eden is but a type of the moral paradise of a perfectly virtuous state; but the moment that sin entered, the thorns and briers grew up to tear all feet; and the very capabilities of refined happiness became the defenceless points for pain and wretchedness to assail us. Infinite, indeed, are their attacks, and innumerable the forms that they assume; but of all the shapes of misery, what is to be more dreaded, what is more terrible than thought to a vicious mind? And there he sat in thought, with the morning sunshine streaming around him, calm, and pure, and tranquil. The light that gave deeper depth to the shadows of his own heart. What did he think of? Where did his meditations rest? On the happiness that was passed away, on the gay hours of childhood, on the sports of his boyish days, on the times when the world was young for him, and everything was full of freshness and enjoyment? Or did he think of the blessing cast away, of wealth, and comfort, and ease, with no reasonable wish ungratified, no virtuous pleasure denied? Or did he look forward to the future with fear and anguish, and to the past with remorse and grief? Heaven only knows, but there he sat, with his head bent forward, his brow contracted, his teeth tight shut, his right arm fallen listlessly by his side, his left hand contracting and expanding involuntarily upon some fragments of silk on the table. He gazed forward through the window, from under his bent brows. He saw not the sunshine, but he felt it and loved it not; and ever and anon the dark shadows of strong emotion crossed his countenance like misty clouds swept over the face of the mountain. He sat long, and was at heart impatient for his companion's return; but so strong was the hold that thought had got upon him, he knew not how time went. He heard not even the child cry in the neighboring room, when, wearied with waiting, it got terrified at the unusual length of his father's absence.

At length, however, the stout form of the poacher was seen descending the small steep path which led from the moor into the sand-pit. His step was slow and heavy, his air dull and discontented; but Harry Wittingham as soon as he beheld him started up and opened him the door of the cottage exclaiming, "Well, Wolf, what news?"

"Neither the best in the world nor the worst," answered the man somewhat sullenly.

"And what have you got for breakfast?" inquired the young gentleman; "I am as hungry as the devil!"

"You must wait a bit though," answered Wolf, descending, "I must look after the boy first. Poor little man, I dare say he has cried his eyes out, I've been so long—but if you're in a great hurry, you'd bettor light the fire, Master Harry; you'll find some wood in the corner there, and you can strike a light with the pistol flint."

Harry Wittingham did not look well pleased, and turning into the house again walked to the window, and affected to hum a tune, without undertaking the menial office that the other had assigned him. In the mean while, Wolf walked straight to the other door, unlocked it, and catching up the beautiful boy, who was sitting half-dressed on a stool crying, he pressed him eagerly to his breast, and kissed him once or twice. There were strange and salutary thoughts passing through his brain at that moment. He asked himself what would have become of that child if he had been detained and taken to prison, as indeed had been very likely. Who would have let the boy out of that solitary room, who would have given him food, who would have nursed and tended him? And once or twice while he was finishing what the child's tiny hands had left undone, in attempting to dress himself, the father rubbed his brow and thought heavily. Say what man will of the natural affections, they are the best ties to good conduct.

When he had done, he took the boy by the hand and led him into the other room, gave a glance to the fireplace, and then to Harry Wittingham as he stood at the window, and his brow gathered into a frown. He said nothing, however, lighted the fire himself, and taking the fish from his pocket proceeded to broil them. Then from the great chest he drew out a knife or two, a cut loaf of coarse bread, and two or three glasses, which he placed upon the table, and giving his child a large hunch of the bread, told him in a whisper, as if it were a mighty secret, that he should have a nice trout in a minute. To Harry Wittingham he said not a word, till at length the other turning round exclaimed, "Well, Wolf, you have not told me what news you bring."

"And you have not lighted the fire," said Ste Gimlet. "If you think, Master Wittingham, that you can live in a place like this and keep your hands clean, you are mistaken. You must shape your manners to your company, or give it up."

Harry Wittingham felt inclined to make an angry answer; but recollecting how much he was in his companion's power, prudence came to his aid, and he only replied, "Pooh, pooh, Wolf, I am not accustomed to lighting fires, and I do not know how to set about it."

"Faith, you may have to learn some day," answered his comrade. "When I built all this house and made all these chairs and tables with my own hands, I knew as little about a trade I never thought to practice, as you about this."

"Ay, you have practiced many a trade in your day," said Harry Wittingham, "and I never but one."

"Nor that a very good one," murmured Wolf to himself; but the storm thus passed away for the time, and the trout were broiled and put in a plate, from which the two men and the little boy made each a hearty meal.

The magistrate's son suffered their breakfast to pass over without making any further inquiry respecting the tidings which his companion had obtained in his morning's expedition; but after Ste Gimlet had produced a bottle of very fine white brandy, which certainly had not turned pale at the sight of a custom-house officer, and each had taken a glass mixed with some of the cold water which formed the purer beverage of the child, the poacher vouchsafed the information unasked, relating to Harry Wittingham a great part of what had taken place between himself and Ned Hayward. What he did not relate he probably thought of no consequence, though men's opinions might perhaps differ upon that subject; but at all events Harry Wittington gathered that he had been met and narrowly escaped being apprehended by a man, who had questioned him closely about the adventures of the night before, and who was acquainted with his name, and the share he had had in a somewhat perilous and disgraceful enterprise.

Such tidings cast him into another fit of dark and gloomy thought, in which he remained for about five minutes without uttering a word; but then he gave a start, and looked up with a gleam of satisfaction on his face, as if some new and pleasant conclusion had suddenly presented itself to his mind.

"I'll tell you what, Ste," he said, "I've just thought of something. You must go down to Tarningham for me, and gather all the news you can about this fellow—find out who he is, and whether he is a London beak or not; and then when you have done all that—"

"I shall do none of it, Master Harry," answered the poacher, "I won't stir another step in this business—I don't like it, sir; it's not in my way. I undertook it just to please you for old companionship's sake, and because you told me the young lady would have no objection; and then when I was in it, I went through with it, though I saw well enough that she liked the thought of going as much as I should like to dance on a rope. But I will have no more to do with it now; it has done me enough harm already, and now I shall be watched ten times closer than ever, and lose my living—so go, I do not."

"Come, come, Wolf, there's a good fellow—this is all nonsense," said Harry Wittingham in a coaxing tone.

But the man cut him short, repeating sternly that he would not go.

"Then, by ——, I will go myself," exclaimed the young gentleman, with a blasphemous oath, "if you are afraid, I am not."

And starting up, he walked out of the cottage, took his way round to the shed at the back, trampling upon several of the flowers, which the poacher loved to cultivate, as he went; and in about a quarter of an hour he was seen riding up the little path toward the moor.

After he was gone, Ste Gimlet remained for some time in very thoughtful mood: now gazing idly at vacancy, now playing with the child's hair, or answering its infantine questions with an abstracted air. At length he muttered, "What's to be done now?" and then added aloud, "well, something must be done. Go out and play in the garden, Charley."

The child toddled out right gladly, and the poacher set himself down to mend his bird-net; but ever and anon he laid down the cunning meshes on his knee and let his thoughts entangle themselves in links not less intricate.

"I'll try the other thing," he said, after a time, "this does not do. I should not care for myself, but it's the poor baby. Poor dear Mary, that always rested on her heart, what I should do with the boy when she was gone. Well, I'll try and do better. Perhaps she is looking down on us—who knows?"

And then he fell to his work again with a sigh. He employed himself with several things for two or three hours. He finished the net; he made a wicker-basket—it was the first he had ever attempted, but he did it better than might have been expected, and then he called the boy into his dinner, giving him a trout he had saved when he broiled the others; for his own part he contented himself with a lump of the bread. When that was done, he went and caught some small birds on the moor, just above the edge of the pit, where he could see the child playing below. When he had thus provided their light supper—for the luxury of tea was unknown in Ste Gimlet's cottage, he came back and sat down by the boy, and played with him fondly for several minutes, gazing at him from time to time with a melancholy earnestness, which mingled even with the smile of joy and pride that lighted his eyes, as some movement of childish grace called forth the beauties of his child. Nevertheless, from time to time, there was a sort of absent look, and twice he went up to the bank above and gazed out over the moor toward Tarningham. At length he went away far enough to climb to the top of the neighboring barrow or tumulus, after having told the boy not to venture up the path. From the position in which he then stood, he had a fair view of the scene I have already described, and caught the windings of the high road down the hill more distinctly than from below.

"I shouldn't wonder if they had caught him," said Wolf to himself with a frown, and an anxious expression of countenance, "and then he will say it was my fault, and that I was afraid to go, and all that—Hang it! why should I care what he says, or what he thinks!" And with this reflection he turned round and went back homeward. He found the boy at the top of the bank, however, and gave him a gentle shake, scolding him till the big drops began to gather in his large blue eyes.

Stephen Gimlet was not satisfied with himself, and scolding the child he found did not act as a diversion to his own self-reproaches. After he had set his son playing again, he walked about moodily for near a quarter of an hour, and then burst forth impetuously, saying,

"I can't stand this, I must go and see what's become of him—they'll know at the turnpike if he's passed, and the old woman won't blab. Here, Charley, boy, you must go and play in the house now—it's growing late, and I'm going away—I shan't be long, and you shall have the bird-cages to play with."

The boy seemed to be well accustomed to it, and trotted away to the house before his father, without any signs of reluctance. He was placed in the same room where he had been in the morning, some empty bird-cages and two or three other things were given him for his amusement, and locking the door of the chamber, the poacher walked away, saying with a sigh, "There can no harm happen this time, for I am going to do no wrong to any one."

Vain, however, are all such calculations. The faults and virtues of others, as well as our own faults and virtues, enter into the strange composition of our fate, and affect us darkly and mysteriously, in a manner which we can never foresee. If we reflected on the eve of action on the number of beings throughout all time, and throughout our whole race, who may be affected, nay, who must be affected by any deed that we are about to perform, how many men would never act at all from hesitation, how many would still act rashly and heedlessly as they do now, from the impossibility of seeing the results. Happy is he who acts deliberately, wisely, and honestly, leaving the consequences with a clear conscience to Him who governs all aright.

The poacher had left his own door about a quarter of an hour, when two men took their way down into the sand-pit, the one on horseback, the other on foot. Harry Wittingham fastened his horse's bridle to the latch of the door, and going in with his companion looked round for Wolf, then crossing over to the other chamber, and finding it locked, he said,

"Stephen isn't here; there, take that up, and be off with it," and he pointed to his portmanteau in the corner where it lay.

The other man, who seemed a common farm-servant, or one of the inferior stable-men of an inn, got the portmanteau on his shoulder, and walked away with it, and Harry Wittingham remained for a minute or two with his hands behind his back looking out of the window. At the end of that time he said aloud: "Well, it's no use waiting for him, we should only have a ow, I dare say, so I'll be off too."

Before he went, however, he looked round the place for a moment, with an expression of mockery and contempt. What was in his bosom, it would be difficult to say, for the heart of man is full of strange things. Perhaps he felt it unpleasant to be under an obligation to the owner of that poor tenement, even for a night's shelter, and strove to salve the wound of pride by reducing the obligation to the lowest point in his own estimation. He might think that the misery he saw around did not make it a very desirable resting-place, and that he had little to be thankful for in having been permitted to share a beggar's hut. His eyes, as he looked around, fell upon some embers of smoldering wood on the hearth, and that called to mind one of the many bad habits which he had lately acquired, and in which he had not yet indulged through the whole of that day. He accordingly put his hand in his pocket, and pulled out some cigars, then not very common in England. Next taking up with the tongs a piece of the charred and still burning wood, he lighted one of the rolls of weed, cast down the ember, and threw the tongs back upon the hearth; after which, mounting his horse, he cantered away as blithely as if his heart had been innocent as a child's.

The embers fell upon the earthen floor, where, under ordinary circumstances they could do no harm; but it so happened that Stephen Gimlet, when he had done mending the net, had cast down the hank of twine close by the table. A long end of the string had fallen toward the fireplace, and a moment or two after Henry Wittingham had quitted the cottage, the piece of charred wood itself became black, but a small spot of fire was seen close to it, and a thin filing curl of smoke arose. It went on smoldering for about five minutes, creeping forward inch by inch, and then a gust of wind through the door, which he had left open, fanned it, and a flame broke out. Then it ran rapidly along, caught the hank of twine, which was in a blaze in a moment. It spared the netting needle, which was of hard box-wood, and for an instant seemed to promise to go out of itself; but then the flame leaped up, and the meshes of the net, which had been left partly on the table, partly on a chair, showed a spark here and there, flashed with the flame, and then, oh, how eagerly the greedy element commenced devouring all that it could meet with! Wherever there was a piece of wood-work it seized upon it; the table, the chair, the poles of the net, the upright posts of the wall, the beams of the roof, the thatch itself, and then instantly a cloud of dull black smoke, mixed with sparks, rose up upon the moor, from the sand-pit. The heat became intense, the smoke penetrated into the other chamber, the sparks began to fall before the window, a red light spread around, and then the terrified screams of a child were heard.

About a quarter of an hour before, a gentleman had appeared upon the moor, from the side of Sir John Slingsby's park. He had come up the hill as if he were walking for a wager, for there was something in the resistance of the acclivity to his progress, which made the vigorous spirit of youth and health resolute to conquer it triumphantly. When the feat was done, however, and the hill passed as if it had been a piece of level ground, Ned Hayward slackened his pace and looked about him, enjoyed to the full all that the wide expanse had of grand and fine, breathed freer in the high air, and let the spirit of solitary grandeur sink into his heart. He had none of the affected love of the picturesque and the sublime, which makes the folks who assume the poetical so ridiculous. He was rather inclined to check what people call fine feelings than not; he was inclined to fancy himself, and to make other people fancy him a very commonplace sort of person, and he would not have gone into an ecstasy for the world, even at the very finest thing that the world ever produced; but he could not help, for the life of him, feeling everything that was beautiful and great, more than he altogether liked, so that, when in society, he passed it off with a touch of persiflage, putting that sort of shield over what he felt to be a vulnerable point. Now, however, when he happened to be alone, he let Nature have her way, and holding his riding-whip by both ends, walked here and walked there, gazing at the prospect where he could get a sight of it, and looking to the right and the left as if not to let any point of loveliness escape him. His eyes soon fell upon the little tumulus already mentioned, with the sentinel fir-trees keeping guard upon the top, and thinking that there must be a good lookout from that high position, he walked slowly up and gazed over the park toward Tarningham. Suddenly, however, his eyes were withdrawn, as a cloud of white smoke came rolling up out of the sand-pit.

"Ha, ha!" he said, "my friend Master Wolf lighting his fire, I suppose."

But the smoke increased. Ned Hayward thought he saw some sparks rising over the bushes. A sudden sensation of apprehension crossed his mind, and he walked rapidly down the side of the hillock, and crossed the intervening space with a step quick in reality, though intended to appear leisurely; but in a moment a cloud of deeper-colored smoke, tinged with flame, burst up into the evening air, and he sprang forward at full speed. A few bounds brought him to the side of the pit, and as he reached it a scream met his ear. It was the easily-recognized voice of childhood, in terror or in pain, and Ned Hayward hesitated not an instant. There was a path down a couple of hundred yards away to the left, but the scene before his eyes counseled no delay. There was the cottage, with the farther part of the thatch all in a blaze, the window of the room beneath it fallen in, and the flame rushing forth, a cloud of smoke issuing from the door, and scream after scream proceeding from the nearer end of the building. His riding-whip was cast down at once, and grasping the stem of the birch-tree rooted in the very edge, he swung himself over, thinking to drop upon a sloping part of the bank about ten feet below. The filmy roots of the shrub, however, had not sufficient room hold upon the sandy soil to sustain his weight; the tree bent, gave way, and came down over him with a part of the bank, so that he and his frail support rolled together to the bottom of the pit. He was up in an instant, however, he might be hurt or he might not, he knew nothing about it, but the shrill cry of the child rang in his ear, and he darted forward to the cottage-door. It was full of fire, and dark with suffocating vapor, but in he rushed, scorching his hair, hands, his face, and his clothes, found the other door blackened, and in some places alight with the encroaching fire, tried to open it, but failed, and then shouted aloud, "Keep back, keep back, and I will burst it open," and then, setting his foot against it, he cast it with a vigorous effort into the room. A momentary glance around showed him the child, who had crept as near to the window as possible, and, darting forward, Ned Hayward caught the boy up in his arms, and rushed out with him, covering his head with his arm, that none of the beams, which were beginning to fall, might strike him as they passed; then setting him down on the green turf when they were at a little distance, he asked eagerly, "Are there any more?"

The child, however, stupefied with terror, gazed in his face and cried bitterly, but answered not. Seeing he could obtain no reply, Ned Hayward ran back to the cottage and tried to go in again, but it was now impossible; the whole way was blocked up with burning rafters, and large detached masses of the thatch, which had fallen in, and were now sending up vast showers of sparks, as the wind stirred them. He hurried to the window and looked in, and though the small panes were cracking with the heat, he forced it open, and shouted at the extreme pitch of his voice, to drown the rushing sound of the fire, "Is there any one within?"

There was no answer, and the moment after, the dry beams being burnt away, and the support at the other end gone, the whole thatch above gave way, and fell into the room, the flame above carried up into a spire as it descended.

The heat was now intolerable, and forced a retreat to a distance. Captain Hayward took the boy up in his arms, and strove to soothe him, and gain some information from him. It was all in vain, however, and after a moment's thought, the gentleman said to himself, "I will carry him away to Tarningham House. Jack Slingsby will never refuse him food and shelter, I am sure, and in case there should be any one else in the place, it is vain to hope that one could save them now. We can send up people to look for the bodies. But let us see what's at the back of the house." He accordingly walked round, still carrying the boy in his arms, but found nothing there, except a low detached shed, which seemed in security, as the wind blew the other way. A long trough and spout, indeed, between the shed and the cottage, seemed in a somewhat perilous position, and as it was likely that they might lead the fire to the building yet uninjured, Ned Hayward thought fit to remove them before he left the ground. This cost him some trouble, as they were rooted in the sand; but when it was once accomplished, the took up the boy again, sought his hat, and crossing the moor, entered the western gates of Sir John Slingsby's park without meeting any one from whom he could obtain information, or to whom he could communicate the event which had just occurred.

CHAPTER XI.

A CHAPTER ON GHOSTS, AND A GHOST STORY.

The events detailed in the last chapter, or at least that portion of them in which he himself had borne a share, were related by Ned Hayward to the party at Sir John Slingsby's after he had rejoined them at the dinner table, having done his best to remove the traces of his adventure from his personal appearance. The smoke and sand were washed away, the burnt and singed garments had been changed for others, and Ned Hayward still appeared a very good-looking fellow, not the less interesting perhaps in the eyes of the ladies there present for all that he had done and suffered. Nevertheless, the fine wavy curls of his brown hair, which had been burnt off, were not to be recovered in so short a time, and both his hands showed evident signs of having been injured by the fire. He was in high spirits, however, for the assurance that there could be nobody else in the cottage but the boy, unless it was Gimlet the poacher himself, of which there was no probability, had relieved the young gentleman's mind of a heavy weight, and he jested gayly with Sir John Slingsby, who vowed that with those hands of his he would not be able to throw a line for a fortnight, replied that he would undertake to catch the finest trout in the whole water before noon the next day.

"And now, my dear sir," he continued, turning to the clergyman, "as you seem to know something of this good gentleman, Gimlet, and his affairs, I wish you'd give me a little insight into his history."

"It is a sad and not uncommon one," answered Dr. Miles, gravely, "and I will tell it to you some other time. My poor parishioners have a superstitious feeling about that pit, and that cottage, for a man was murdered there some years ago. You will find multitudes of people who will vouch for his ghost having been seen sitting on the bank above, and under a solitary birch-tree."

"It won't sit there any more," answered Ned Hayward, laughing, "for the birch-tree and I rolled down into the pit together, as I tried to drop down by its help, thinking it was quite strong enough to support me."

"Then I am afraid the ghost is gone altogether for the future," said Dr. Miles, in a tone of some regret.

"Afraid! my dear doctor," exclaimed Miss Slingsby, "surely you do not want ghosts among your parishioners!"

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughed Sir John Slingsby, with a merry, fat, overflowing chuckle, "Isabella means, my dear doctor, that you may make your flock as spiritual as you please, but not reduce them quite to spectres."

"No, papa, you are a wrong interpreter," rejoined his daughter; "I meant to say that of all men on earth, I should have thought Dr. Miles was the last to patronize a ghost."

"I don't know, my dear," replied the worthy clergyman, "a ghost is sometimes very serviceable in a parish. We are but children of a bigger growth, and a bugbear is as necessary sometimes for great babies as small ones, not that I ever used it or should use it; but the people's own imagination did that for me. I have heard, Sir John, that some men, when they were lying out to shoot your deer, were scared away by one of them fancying he saw the ghost, and you saved two good haunches of venison, to say nothing of the pasty."

"By Jove, that was a jolly ghost indeed," answered Sir John Slingsby, "and I'll give him a crown the first time I meet him. Doctor, a glass of wine."

"If ghosts have such effects upon poachers," said Beauchamp, who had been speaking in a low tone to Miss Slingsby, "how happens it that this man, the father of the boy whom Captain Hayward brought hither, fixed his abode in the spirit's immediate neighborhood?"

"Oh, he is a sad unbelieving dog," said Dr. Miles; but then suddenly checking himself he added, "and yet I believe in that I do him injustice; there is some good in the man, and a great deal of imagination. Half his faults proceed from an ill-disciplined fancy; but the truth is, being a very fearless fellow, and of this imaginative disposition, I believe he would just as soon have a ghost for a next door neighbor as not. Therefore I do not suppose that it was from any doubt of the reality of the apparition, but rather in defiance of it, that he set up his abode there; and perhaps he thought, too, that it might serve as a sort of safeguard to him, a protection against the intrusion of persons less bold than himself at those hours when ghosts and he himself are wont to wander. He knew well that none of the country people would come near him then, for all the ignorant believe in apparitions more or less."

"Now, dear Dr. Miles, do tell me," cried Isabella Slingsby with a gay laugh, "whether some of the learned do not believe in them too. If it were put as a serious question to the Rev. Dr. Miles himself, whether he had not a little quiet belief at the bottom of his heart in the appearance of ghosts, what would he answer?"

"That he had never seen one, my dear," replied the clergyman, with a good-humored smile, "but at the same time I must say that a belief in the occasional appearance of the spirits of the dead for particular purposes, is a part of our religion. I have no idea of a man calling himself a Christian and taking what parts of the Bible he likes, and rejecting or explaining away the rest. The fact of the reappearance of dead people on this earth is more than once mentioned in Scripture, and therefore I believe that it has taken place. The purposes for which it was permitted in all the instances there noticed, were great and momentous, and it may very possibly be that since the Advent of our Savior, no such deviations from usual laws have been requisite. Of that, however, I can be no judge; but at all events, my own reason tells me that it is not probable a spirit should be allowed to revisit the glimpses of the moon for the purpose of making an old woman say her prayers, or frightening a village girl into fits."

"You are speaking alone of the apparition of the spirits of the dead," said Mr. Beauchamp; "did you ever hear of the apparition of the spirits of the living?"

"Not without their bodies, surely?" said Miss Clifford.

"Oh, yes, my dear Mary," answered Dr. Miles, "such things are recorded, I can assure you, ay, and upon testimony so strong that it is impossible to doubt that the witnesses believed what they related, whether the apparition was a delusion of their own fancy or not—indeed it is scarcely possible to suppose that it was a delusion, for in several instances the thing, whatever it was, made itself visible to several persons at once, and they all precisely agreed in the description of it."

"One of the most curious occurrences of the kind that ever I heard of," said Beauchamp, "was told me by a German gentleman to whom it happened. It was the case of a man seeing his own spirit, and although we are continually told we ought to know ourselves, few men have ever had such an opportunity of doing so as this gentleman."

"Oh do tell us the whole story, Mr. Beauchamp," cried Isabella, eagerly, "I must beg and entreat that you would not tantalize us with a mere glimpse of such a delightful vision, and then let fall the curtain again."

"My dear Bella, you are tantalizing him," exclaimed her father. "Don't you see that you are preventing him from eating his dinner; at all events we will have a glass of wine first; shall it be Hermitage, Mr Beauchamp? I have some of 1808, the year before that rascal Napoleon mixed all the vintages together."

The wine was drunk, but immediately this was accomplished, Isabella renewed her attack, calling upon Mr. Beauchamp for the story, and in her eagerness laying one round taper finger upon his arm as he sat beside her, to impress more fully her commands upon him, as she said, "I must and will have the story, Mr. Beauchamp."

"Assuredly," he replied, in his usual quiet tone, "but first of all, I must premise one or two things, that you may give it all the weight it deserves. The gentleman who told it to me was, at the time of my acquaintance with him, a man of about seventy years of age, very simple in his manners, and, however excitable his fancy might have been in youth, he was, at the time I speak of, as unimaginative a person as it is possible to conceive. He assured me most solemnly, as an old man upon the verge of eternity, that every word he spoke was truth, and now I will tell it as nearly in his own language as I can, and my memory is a very retentive one. You must remember, however, that it is he who is speaking, and not I; and fancy us sitting together, the old man and the young one, warming ourselves by a stove on a winter's night, in the fine old town of Nuremberg."

BEAUCHAMP'S STORY.

"I am of an Italian family," said my friend, "but my father and my grandfather were both born in Germany; exceedingly good people in their way, but by no means very wealthy. My elder brother was being educated for a physician, and had just finished his course of study, when my father, having given me as good an education as he could in Nuremberg, thought fit to send me to Hamburg, that I might pursue my studies there, and take advantage of any opportunity that might occur for advancing myself in life. My stock of all kinds was exceedingly small when I set out; my purse contained the closely-estimated expenses of my journey, and the allowance made for my maintenance during six months, which did not admit the slightest idea of luxury of any kind. I was grateful however for what was given, for I knew that my father could afford no more, and I had no hope of another "heller" till my half-year was out. I had my ordinary traveling dress, and my mother gave me six new shirts, which she had spun with her own hands; beside these my portmanteau contained one complete black suit, two pair of shoes and a pair of silver buckles, which my father took off his own feet, and bestowed them upon me with his benediction. My elder brother always loved me, and was very kind to me; and when my going was first talked of, he regretted deeply that he had nothing to give me; but my little preparations occupied a fortnight, and during that time good luck befriended him and me, and he treated and killed his first patient. Thus he obtained the means of making me a sumptuous present for my journey, which consisted of a straight-cut blue mantle, with a square collar. Let me dwell upon the mantle, for it is important. It was in the Nuremberg fashion, which had gone out of vogue over all Germany for at least thirty years, and when I first put it on, I felt very proud of it, thinking that I looked like one of the cavaliers in the great picture in the town-hall. However, there was not another mantle like it in all Germany, except in Nuremberg—sky-blue, falling three inches below the knee, with a square-cut collar. I will pass over my journey to Hamburg, till my arrival in a little common inn, in the old part of the town. Not having a pfennig to spare, I set out early the next morning to look out for a lodging, and saw several that would have suited myself very well, but which did not suit my finances. At length, seeing the wife of a grocer standing at the door, with a good-humored countenance, in a narrow and dark street, containing some large fine houses, which had seen the splendors of former times, I walked up to her and asked if she could recommend a lodging to a young man who was not over-rich. After thinking for a moment, she pointed over the way to a house with a decorated front, which had become as black as ink with age. The lower story was entirely occupied by an iron-warehouse; but she said that up above on the first floor I should find Widow Gentner, who let one room, and who had, she believed, no lodger at the time. I thanked her many times for her civility, and walking across the street to the point she indicated, I looked up at the cornices and other ornaments which were displayed upon the façade. Dirty they were beyond all doubt. A pair of stone ladies with baskets in their hands, which had probably been once as white as snow, now displayed long, dripping lines of black upon their garments; their noses had disappeared, but the balls of the eyes were of the deepest brown, though above the center appeared a white spot, which seemed to show the presence of cataract. The fruit in the baskets, however, consisted apparently of black cherries, and a dingy cornucopia, which stood by the side of each, vomited forth swarthy fruit and flowers of a very uninviting quality. I gazed in surprise and admiration, and asked myself if it ever would be my fate to live in so fine a mansion. Taking courage, however, I inquired at the ironmonger's which was the door of Widow Gentner, and of the three which opened into the lower part of the house, I was directed to the second. On the first floor I found a tidy little maid, who introduced me to the presence of her mistress, a quiet dry old lady, who was seated in a room which had apparently formed part of a magnificent saloon —I say formed part, for it was evident that the size of the chamber had been much curtailed. On the ceiling, which was of the most magnificent stucco work I ever saw, appeared various groups of angels and cherubs in high relief, as large as life, and seated amid clouds and bunches of flowers as big as feather-beds. But that ceiling betrayed the dismemberment of the room; for all along the side where ran the wall behind the good lady were seen angels' legs without the heads and bodies, baskets of flowers cut in two, and cherubs with not above one-half of the members even, which sculptors have left them. This was soon explained: the widow informed me that she had divided her chamber into three, of which she reserved one for herself, another for her little maid, and let the third, which had a staircase to itself opening from the street. She had done so with a good wall, she said, to support the plafond, so that if I wanted to see the room she had to let, I must go down again with her and mount the other stairs, as there was no door of communication. I admired her prudence, and accompanied her at once to a small room, arrived at by a small stair-case with its own street-door; and there I found on the ceiling above my head the lost legs and wings of the angels on the other side, beside a very solid pair of cherubims of my own. It contained a little narrow bed, a table, a scanty proportion of chairs and other things necessary for the existence of a student; and though an unpleasant feeling of solitude crept over me as I thought of inhabiting an apartment so entirely cut off from all human proximity, yet, as the widow's rent was small, I closed the bargain at once, and soon was installed in my new abode. The good lady was very kind and attentive, and did all she could to make me comfortable, inquiring, among other things, what letters of introduction I had in Hamburg. I had but one which I considered of any value, which was addressed with many of those flourishes which you know are common among us, to Mr. S., a famous man in his day, both as a philosopher and literary man, and who was also a man of sense of the world, and what is more than all, of a kind and benevolent heart. I went to deliver it that very day, and met with a most kind and friendly reception from a good-looking old gentleman, of perhaps sixty-three or four, who at once made me feel myself at home with him, treating me with that parental air which inspired both respect and confidence. He asked several questions about my journey, where I lodged, how I intended to employ my time, and last, what was the state of my finances. I told him all exactly as it was, and when I rose to depart, he laid his hand on my arm with the most benevolent air in the world, saying, 'You will dine with me to-morrow at twelve o'clock, and I shall expect to see you at dinner three days in the week as long as you stay. From eight to ten at night I am always at home, and whenever you have nothing else to do, come in and spend those hours with us, I will not pretend to say I was not quite well aware that the place thus granted me at his dinner-table was offered from a knowledge of the limited state of my finances; but pride in my case was out of the question, and I was exceedingly grateful for the act of kindness, which saved me a considerable sum in my housekeeping, and enabled me to indulge in a few little luxuries which I could not otherwise have commanded.

"It was the autumn of the year when I arrived at Hamburg, but the time passed very pleasantly. All the day I was engaged in my studies; at twelve o'clock I dined, either at my own chamber or at worthy Mr. S.'s, and almost every evening was spent at his house, where he failed not to regale me, either with a cup of fine coffee, or sometimes, as a great treat, with a cup of tea, according to your English mode. In short, I became his nightly guest, and as the evenings grew dark and sometimes foggy, I bought a little lantern to light myself through the long and lonely streets which I had to pass from his house to my own. On these occasions, too, as the weather grew intensely cold, my blue cloak with the square collar proved a most serviceable friend, and every night at ten o'clock I might be seen in precisely the same attire, with my black suit, in great part covered by the azure mantle, and the small lantern in my hand, finding my way homeward to my solitary abode. Mr. S. lived in the fine new part of the town, where he had a handsome house, with two maid-servants and his coachman, but the latter slept at the stables. I lived, as I have before said, in the old part of the town, well nigh a mile distant; thus, in coming and going, I got exercise at night, if I did not in the day, and I mark it particularly, that I used to enjoy my walk to his house and back, and used to look forward to it with pleasure during my hours of study, in order that you may see, that on the occasion of which I am about to speak, I was affected by no fantastical melancholy.

"At length, one night in the winter of 17—, after passing the evening at the house of Mr. S., where I had taken nothing but a cup of coffee and a slice of brown bread-and-butter, I took leave of my friend, put on my blue mantle with the square collar, lighted my lantern at the housemaid's candle, and having safely shut the glass, set out on my walk home. It was about a quarter past ten, and the night was clear and very dark; the sky, indeed, was full of stars, which looked peculiarly bright as I gazed up at them, between the tall houses, as if from the bottom of a well, and I felt a sort of exhilarating freshness in the air that raised my spirits rather than otherwise. I walked along to the end of the first street with a light step, turned into the second, and was just entering the third, when I saw a figure some thirty or forty paces before me, standing in a corner as if waiting for some one. Although the streets, in the good old days of Hamburg, were generally by that time of night quite deserted, yet there was nothing extraordinary in my meeting one or two persons as I went home, so that I took little or no notice of this figure, till I had advanced to within about twenty paces, when it turned itself full toward me, and at the same time the light of my lantern fell direct upon it. Guess my surprise when I saw a being so exactly like myself, that I could have imagined I was looking in a glass. There were the black legs, the shoes and silver buckles, the blue mantle with the square-cut collar, and the little lantern with the handle at the back, held just as I held mine. I stopped suddenly, and rubbed my eyes with my left hand; but the figure immediately turned round and walked away before me. At the same time my heart beat violently, and a sort of strange dreamy sensation of horror came over me, like that which takes possession of one sometimes when laboring under the nightmare. An instant's reflection made me ashamed of what I felt, and saying to myself, 'I'll look a little closer at this gentleman,' I walked on, hurrying my pace. The figure, however, quickened its steps in the same proportion. I did not like to run, but I was always a quick walker, and I hastened as fast as ever I could; but it had no effect; the figure, without the least apparent effort, kept always at the same distance, and every moment I felt the sort of superstitious dread which had taken possession of me increasing, and struggling against the efforts of resolution. Resolution conquered, however, and determined to see who this was that was so like me, without showing him too plainly that I was chasing him, I stopped at a corner where a street wound round, and entered again the one that I was pursuing at some distance, and then taking to my heels, I ran as hard as I could to get before my friend in the blue mantle. When I entered the other street again, though I must have gained two or three minutes at least, instead of seeing the figure come from the side where I had left it, there it was, walking on deliberately in the direction I usually followed toward my own house. We were now within three streets of widow Gentner's, and though they were all of them narrow enough, I generally took those which were most open. There was a lane, however, to the left, which, passing by the grocer's I have mentioned, cut off at least a quarter of the way, and as I was now overpowered by feelings I cannot describe, I resolved to take the shortest path, and run as hard as I could, in order to get home, and shut myself in before the figure in the blue mantle reached the spot. Off I set then down the narrow lane like lightning, but when I came to the grocer's corner, my horror was complete, on beholding the same figure walking along past the closed windows of the iron-shop, and I stopped with my heart beating as if it would have burst through my ribs. With eyes almost starting from my head, and the light of the lantern turned full upon it, I gazed at its proceedings, when behold, it walked quietly up to my door, stopped, turned round toward the house, put the right hand in its pocket, and seemed feeling for my key. The key was produced, and stooping down, just as I should have done, after a little searching for the keyhole, the door was opened, the figure went in, and instantly the door closed again.

"If you had given me the empire of a world, I could not have made up my mind to go in after it, and setting off more like a madman than anything else, I returned to the house of Mr. S., with the intention of telling him what had occurred. The bell was answered quickly enough by the housemaid, who gazed at my wild and scared appearance with some surprise. She told me, however, that the old gentleman had gone to bed, and that she could not think of waking him on any account; and resolved not to go home, and yet not liking to walk the streets of Hamburg all night, I persuaded her, with some difficulty, to let me sit in the saloon till I could speak with Mr. S. in the morning. I will not detain you by describing how I passed the night; but when my friend came down the next day, I related to him all that occurred, with many excuses for the liberty I had taken. He listened gravely, and his first question naturally was, if I were quite sure I had gone straight homeward, without entering any of those places where strong drinks were sold. I assured him most solemnly that the only thing that had entered my lips that night was the cup of coffee which I had taken at his house.

"'The maid can tell you,' I said, 'that I had not been absent more than three quarters of an hour when I returned.'

"'Well, my young friend,' he replied, 'I believe you fully; very strange things occasionally happen to us in life, and this seems one. However, we will have some breakfast, and then go and inquire into it.'

"After breakfast we set out and walked to my house, I pointing out by the way, all the different spots connected with my tale. When we reached the gloomy old mansion, with its decorated front, I was going direct to my own door, but Mr. S. said, 'Stay, we will first talk to your landlady for a minute.' And we accordingly walked up to the rooms of Widow Gentner by the other door and the other stair-case. The widow was very proud of the visit of so distinguished a person in the town as Mr. S., and answered his questions with due respect. The first was a very common one in that part of Germany, namely, whether she had slept well that night. She assured him she had, perfectly well; and he then proceeded with a somewhat impressive air, to inquire if nothing had occurred to disturb her. She then suddenly seemed to recollect herself, and answered, 'Now you mention it, I recollect I was awoke about eleven o'clock, I think, by a noise on the other side of the wall; but thinking that Mr. Z. had thrown over his table, or something of that kind, I turned on the other side, and went to sleep again.'

"No further information being to be obtained, we descended to the street, and taking out my keys, I opened the door, and we went in. My heart beat a little as we mounted the stairs, but resolving not to show any want of courage, I boldly unlocked the room door and threw it open. The sight that presented itself made me pause on the threshold, for there on my bed, where I should have been lying at the very moment of its fall, was the whole ceiling of that part of the room, angels' legs, and cherubim's wings, flower-baskets, and everything, and so great was the weight and the force with which it had come down, that it had broken the solid bedstead underneath it. As I do not suppose my head is formed of much more strong materials, it is probable that it would have been cracked as well as the bed, and I heartily thank God for my preservation. All my good old friend ventured to say, however, was, 'A most fortunate escape! Had you slept here last night, you would have been killed to a certainty.' Though a doctor of philosophy, he did not risk any speculations upon the strange apparition which I had beheld the night before; but invited me to take up my abode in his house till my room could be put in order, never afterward mentioning the appearance of my double; and I have only to add that from that time to this, now between fifty and sixty years, I have never seen myself again except in a looking-glass."

"Such," continued Beauchamp, "is the story of my German friend, exactly as he told it to me. I must leave you to judge of it as you will, for unless you could see the old man, and know his perfect simplicity of character, and quiet matter-of-fact temper of mind, you could not take the same view of his history that I do."

"In short, Mr. Beauchamp, you are a believer in ghosts," said Sir John Slingsby, laughing; "well, for my part, I never saw any better spirit than a bottle of brandy, and hope never to see a worse."

"Take care you don't find yourself mistaken, Sir John," answered Dr. Miles, "for although it is rather difficult to meet with good spirits, the bad ones are much more easily conjured up."

"I am not afraid, doctor," answered Sir John, "and mind, I've only had three or four glasses of wine, so mine is not Dutch courage now; but let us talk of something else than ghosts and such things, or we shall all have the blue devils before we've done—a capital story, nevertheless, Beauchamp; but this is a good story too, doctor, about my sister being stopped on the king's highway. Has she told you about it?"

Dr. Miles merely nodded his head, and Sir John went on.

"I can't make out the game of that old rascal Wittingham, who seems devilish unwilling to catch the thieves, and had taken himself out of the way when Ned Hayward and I called this morning. The old linen-drapering scamp shall find that he can't treat Jack Slingsby in this way."

"Indeed, my dear brother, I wish you would let the matter rest," said Mrs. Clifford; "no harm was done, except frightening me very foolishly, and to pursue it further may, perhaps, lead to disagreeable consequences. The letter written beforehand, to bring me over by a report of your illness, shows that this was no ordinary affair."

"A fig for the consequences," cried Sir John Slingsby, "if it were to set half the town on fire, I would go on with it. Why, my dear Harriet, am not I a magistrate, one of his majesty's justices of the peace for the county of —— ? Such a conscientious woman as you are, would never have me neglect my solemn duties." And Sir John chuckled with a low merry laugh, at the new view he chose to take of his responsibilities.

In such conversation the evening went on to its close, the subjects changing rapidly, for the worthy baronet was not one to adhere tenaciously to any particular line of thought, and Mrs. Clifford, but more particularly still her daughter, being anxious to quit the topic just started as soon as possible. Miss Clifford, indeed, seemed so much agitated and embarrassed, while the adventures of the preceding night were under discussion, that Ned Hayward, who was the kindest-hearted man alive, and not without tact, especially where women were concerned, came zealously to her relief, and engaged her in low and earnest conversation.

It was one of those cases in which two people, without well knowing what they are about, go on puzzling each other, though both may be as frank as day. They talked of every simple subject which all the world might have heard discussed—music, painting, poetry; but yet the whole was carried on in so low a tone that to any one who did not know them it would have appeared that they were making love. Miss Clifford was puzzled, perplexed, to make out her companion's character, for she certainly expected nothing from a man familiarly called Ned Hayward, and more especially from a particular friend of her uncle's, but a gay, rattling, good-humored scapegrace at the best; yet in order to gain her full attention, and withdraw her thoughts from a subject which he saw annoyed her, Captain Hayward put off for the time his usual careless, rapid manner, and spoke with so much feeling and good taste, and what is more, good sense also, upon all the many topics upon which their conversation ran—he showed her that he had read so much, and thought so much, and felt so much, that she became convinced before he had done of the complete fallacy of all her preconceived notions of his disposition. Such a change of opinion is always very favorable to a man with a woman; for they are such generous creatures, those women, that if they find they have done one injustice, they are sure to go to the opposite extreme, and give us credit for more than is our due.

Ned Hayward's puzzle was of a different kind, but it proceeded from the same source, namely, an erroneous preconception. He saw that Mary Clifford was embarrassed, whenever the subject of the attack upon their carriage was mentioned, that she changed color, not from red to white, as would have been the case had terror had aught to do with it, but from white to red, which is generally a change produced by other emotions. He therefore set it down as a certain fact, that the fair lady's heart was a little engaged in the transaction; and yet, as they went on talking in that same low voice, she twice returned to the subject herself, not without some degree of embarrassment it is true, but still as if she wished to say more, and Ned Hayward thought with some degree of pique, "Well, my pretty friend, I am not quite old enough to be made a confidant of yet."

At length, just as the dessert was being put upon the table, tiresome Sir John Slingsby harked back upon the subject, asking Mr. Beauchamp if he thought he could swear to any of the persons concerned; and taking advantage of a quick and somewhat loud conversation which went on between those two gentlemen and Dr. Miles, Miss Clifford suddenly broke through what she was talking of with her companion on the right, and said earnestly, but still almost in a whisper, "Captain Hayward, you rendered me a very great service last night, for which I shall ever feel grateful, and it will add immensely to the favor, if you can prevent my uncle from pursuing the matter in the manner he seems inclined to do. Particular circumstances, which I may some time have an opportunity of explaining, would render it most painful to me to have the scandalous outrage which was committed upon us last night dragged into a court of justice; indeed, I think it would half kill me, especially if I had to give evidence, as I suppose would be the case."

"I will do my best," answered Ned Hayward, "but you must not be angry or surprised, at any means I may take for that purpose. I could act better, indeed, if I knew the circumstances."

"All I can say at present," answered the young lady, in a low tone, "is, that this was not a case of robbery, as you all seem to suppose."

The color mounted into her cheek as she spoke, and she added quickly, "I cannot reproach myself with anything in the affair, Captain Hayward, although I have scrutinized my own conscience severely; but yet at the same time, even to have my name talked of in connection with such a proceeding, and with such — such a person, would distress me more than I can describe. I will say more another time."

"In the mean while, I will do my best," replied the other, and even while he was speaking, the roll of wheels was heard driving up to the door, and a minute or two after, one of the servants entered, announcing that Mr Wittingham was in the library.

"Let him stay, let him stay," said Sir John Slingsby, "he'll have an opportunity there of improving his mind. What, what do you say?" he continued, as the man whispered something over his shoulder, "we've neither secrets of state nor high treason here—speak out."

"Please you, Sir John, two of Mr. Wittingham's men have brought up Stephen Gimlet, whom they call Wolf, with irons upon him. I have kept him in the hall."

"Hang it!" cried Ned Hayward, "my little boy's father. I hope he has not been doing any serious mischief!"

"I don't think it, I don't think it," said Dr. Miles, eagerly, "the man has a heart and a conscience, a little warped, it is true; but still sound—sound, I think—I will go and speak to him."

"Hang him, he steals my pheasants!" exclaimed Sir John Slingsby.

"Then why don't you put him to keep them, colonel?" asked Ned Hayward. "He would make a capital keeper, I am sure. Set a thief to catch a thief, Sir John."

"Not a bad idea, Ned," answered the baronet.

"Stay, stay, doctor, he's not condemned yet, and so does not want the parson. We had better talk to old Wittingham first. We'll have him in and fuddle him. Give my compliments to Mr. Wittingham, Matthews, and beg him to walk in. You need not go, Harriet. He's quite a lady's man."

But Mrs. Clifford rose, not at all anxious to witness the process of fuddling a magistrate, and withdrew with her daughter and her niece.

CHAPTER XII.

IN WHICH THE MAGISTRATE IS FUDDLED BY THE BARONET.

"Ah! Wittingham! Wittingham!" cried the baronet, stretching forth his hand without rising, as the servant introduced the worthy magistrate, "is that you, my old buck? If you haven't come in pudding time, you have come in wine time, and will get what so few men get in life—your dessert. Sit down and pledge me, old fellow. What shall it be in? Here's port that was bottled when I came of age, so you may judge that it is good old stuff! madeira that has made more voyages than Cook, Comet claret of 1811, and a bottle of Burgundy that smells under my nose like oil of violets."

"Why, Sir John," replied Mr. Wittingham, taking the seat just left vacant by Mrs. Clifford, and very well pleased with so familiar a reception, when he expected quite the reverse; for to say the truth, although some circumstances had happened to make him resolve upon taking the bull by the horns, and visiting the old lion of Tarningham Park in his den, it was nevertheless with great pain and difficulty that he had screwed his courage to the sticking point, "why, Sir John, I come upon business, and it is better to transact affairs of importance with a clear head."

"Pooh, nonsense!" exclaimed the baronet; "no man ever did business well without being half-drunk. Look at my old friend Pitt, poor fellow! and Charley Fox, too, Sir William Scott, and Dundas, and all of them, not a set of jollier topers in the world than they were, and are still—what are left of them. Well, here's health to the living and peace to the dead—Burgundy, eh?" and he filled a glass for Mr. Wittingham to the brim.

The worthy magistrate took it, and, drinking Sir John Slingsby's toast, was about to proceed to business, when the baronet again interrupted him, saying, "Let me introduce you to my friends, Wittingham; there's no fun in drinking with men you don't know. Dr. Miles you are acquainted, this is my friend Mr. Beauchamp, and this, my friend Captain Hayward. Gentlemen both, know, esteem, and admire Henry Wittingham, Esq., one of the ornaments of the bench of the county of ——, one of the trustees of the turnpike roads, a very active magistrate, and a very honest man. Sink the shop, Witty," he continued, in a friendly whisper to his companion, for Sir John seldom, if ever, allowed Mr. Wittingham to escape without some allusion to his previous occupations, which naturally made that gentleman hate him mortally. "But before we have another glass, my good friend, I must make you acquainted with these gentlemen's high qualities," proceeded the baronet. "Here's Ned Hayward, the most deadly shot in Europe, whether with pistol, rifle, or fowling-piece, nothing escapes him, from the human form divine down to a cock sparrow. The best angler in England, too; would throw a fly into a teaspoon at fifty yards' distance. He has come down for an interminable number of months to catch my trout, kill my game, and drink my claret. Then there is my friend Mr. Beauchamp, more sentimentally given, a very learned man and profound, loves poetry and solitary walks, and is somewhat for musing melancholy made; but is a good hand at a trigger, too, I can tell you—a light finger and a steady aim; ha! Beauchamp;" and the baronet winked his eye and laughed.

Beauchamp smiled good-humoredly, and in order to change the course of the conversation, which was not exactly what suited him, he said that he had the pleasure of a slight acquaintance with Mr. Wittingham.

Ned Hayward, however, somewhat to Beauchamp's surprise, seemed determined to encourage their host in his light and rattling talk, and taking the latter up where Sir John had left it, he said, "Oh dear yes, I dare say we shall have capital sport down here. The old work of the 51st, Sir John; clearing all the fences, galloping over all the turnips, riding down the young wheat, forgetting the limits of the manor, letting the beasts out of the pound, making a collection of knockers and bell-pulls, fighting the young men, and making love to the young women—Mr. Wittingham, the wine stands with you."

Mr. Wittingham filled his glass and drank, saying with a grave and somewhat alarmed air, "I don't think that would exactly do in this county, sir; the magistrates are rather strict here."

"The devil they are," said Ned Hayward, with a good deal of emphasis, the meaning of which Mr. Wittingham could not well help understanding; but the next moment the young gentleman went on: "but who cares a pin for magistrates, Mr. Wittingham? They're nothing but a parcel of old women."

"Halloo, halloo, Ned," cried Sir John, "you forget in whose presence you are speaking; reverence the bench, young man, reverence the bench; and if you can't do that, reverence the colonel."

"Oh, you're a great exception to the general rule," replied Captain Hayward, "but what I say is very true, nevertheless; and as I like to define my positions, I will give you a lexicographical description of the magistrates. They should be called in any dictionary, a body of men selected from the most ignorant of the people, for the mal-administration of good laws."

"Bravo, bravo," shouted Sir John Slingsby, roaring with laughter, and even Dr. Miles nodded his head with a grave smile, saying, "Too just a definition indeed."

Mr. Wittingham looked confounded, but Sir John passed him the bottle, and for relief he again fell to his glass and emptied it. Now to men not quite sure of their position, there is nothing so completely overpowering as jest and merriment with a dash of sarcasm. In grave argument, where they have their own vanity for their backer, they will always venture to meet men both of superior abilities and superior station, whether in so doing they expose themselves or not; for in that case, their notions are generally formed beforehand, and they are fully convinced that those notions are just; but in a combat of the wit, it requires to be a very ready man, and also to have all those habits of society which enable one to make the reply tart enough, with every semblance of courtesy. On the bench and in the justice room Mr. Wittingham would often venture to spar with Sir John Slingsby, and sometimes with a good deal of success; for although the baronet had much greater natural abilities and information, yet he had so many foibles and failings, and occasionally such a degree of perversity, that from time to time his adversary would get hold of a weak point, and drive him into a corner. It always ended, however, by Sir John coming off triumphant; for when he found that argument failed him he had recourse to ridicule, and in two minutes would utterly confound his antagonist, and overwhelm him amid peals of laughter.

In the present instance, Mr. Wittingham found that Sir John was in one of his jocular moods, and scarcely dared to say a word lest he should bring some of his hard jests upon his head, especially when he had the strong support which Ned Hayward seemed capable of giving. He was therefore anxious to proceed to the business that brought him as speedily as possible; and giving up the defense of the magistracy, after a momentary pause, he said, "Really, Sir John, as I must get home soon—"

"Not till you have finished your bottle, man," cried Sir John Slingsby, pushing the Burgundy to him; "whoever comes to see me after dinner, must fight me or drink a bottle with me; so here's to your health, Witty—a bumper, a bumper, and no heel-taps."

Now the glasses at Sir John Slingsby's table might well be called wine-glasses, for they seldom had any other liquor in them; but at the same time, in size they were not much less than those vessels which are named tumblers, I suppose from their being less given to tumbling than any other sort of glass. Mr. Wittingham had drank three already, beside the moderate portion which he had taken at his own dinner; but in order to get rid of the subject, he swallowed another of strong Burgundy, and then commenced again, saying, "Really, Sir John, we must go to business. We can sip your good wine while we are talking the affair over."

"Sip it!" exclaimed his host, "who ever heard of a man sipping such stuff as this! Nobody ever sips his wine but some lackadaisical, lovelorn swain, with a piece of Cheshire cheese before him, making verses all the time upon pouting lips and rounded hips, and sparkling eyes and fragrant sighs, and pearly teeth and balmy breath, and slender nose and cheek that glows, and all the O's! and all the I's! that ever were twisted into bad metre and bad sense; or else the reformed toper, who is afraid of exceeding the stint that his doctors have allowed him, and lingers out every drop with the memory of many a past carouse before his eyes. No, no, such wine as this is made to be swallowed at a mouthful, washing the lips with a flood of enjoyment, stimulating the tongue, spreading a glow over the palate, and cooling the tonsils and the throat only to inflame them again with fresh appetite for the following glass—sip it! why hang it, Wittingham, it is to insult a good bottle of wine, and I trust that you may be shot dead by a champagne cork to teach you better manners."

"Well, then," cried Mr. Wittingham, stimulated to répartie by impatience, "I will say, Sir John, that we can swill your wine while we are talking of business."

"Ay, that's something like," cried Sir John Slingsby, not at all discomposed, "you shall swill the wine, and I will drink it, that'll suit us both. Beauchamp we will let off, because he's puny, and Doctor Miles because he's reverend; Ned Hayward will do us justice, glass for glass, I'll answer for it. So another bumper, and then to business; but first we'll have lights, your worship, for it's growing dusky," and Sir John rose to ring the bell.

Scarcely, however, had he quitted his seat, when there was heard a loud report. One of the panes of glass in the window flew in shining splinters into the room, and a ball whistling through, passed close to the head of Mr. Wittingham, knocked off his wig, and lodged in the eye of a Cupid who was playing with his mother in large picture on the other side of the room.

CHAPTER XIII.

IN WHICH BETTER DAYS SEEM TO DAWN UPON THE POACHER.

A HIGH-SOUNDING oath from Sir John Slingsby passed unnoticed, for though every one had heard the shot, each person's attention was suddenly called to an object of his own. Ned Hayward sprang to the window and looked out, Dr. Miles started up and turned toward Mr. Wittingham; and Beauchamp, who was sitting next to that gentleman suddenly stretched out his hand and caught him by the arm and shoulder, so as to break his fall to the ground, though not to stop it; for the worthy magistrate, with a low exclamation of horror, which reached no ear but one, pressed his hand upon his heart, and fell fainting to the ground, just as if the ball, which had entered the window, had found out the precise spot in his skin, which had not been dipped in the Styx. Nevertheless, when Sir John, and Mr. Beauchamp, and Dr. Miles lifted him up off the floor, and seated him on his chair again, though they undoubtedly expected to find one of those small holes which I should call a life-door, were it not that they never let life in, if they often let life out, yet no wound of any kind was to be perceived, except in the wig. Lights were brought, servants hurried in and out, cold water was sprinkled on the old gentleman's face, the butler recommended sal volatile, Sir John Slingsby tried brandy; and at length Mr. Wittingham was brought to himself. Every one was busy about him but Ned Hayward; and as Ned was a very charitable and benevolent man, it may be necessary to say why he bestowed no care or attention on Mr. Wittingham. The fact was, that he did not know anything was the matter with him; for Ned Hayward was no longer in the room; the window was open, indeed, and Ned Hayward had jumped out.

To return to Mr. Wittingham, however, no sooner did he recover breath enough to articulate, than he declared in a low voice, he must go home.

"Why, my dear fellow!" exclaimed Sir John Slingsby, "you're not hurt, only frightened, devilish frightened, that's all, and you're still white about the gills, and fishy in the eyes. Come, come, finish your bottle, and get rid of that haddock-look before you go, or you may faint again in the carriage."

"I must go home," repeated Mr. Wittingham, in a dismal tone.

"Then what's to become of the business you came about?" inquired the baronet.

"I must leave it in your hands, Sir John," replied Mr. Wittingham, rising feebly; "I have no head for it to-night. It was about that notorious poacher, Gimlet, I came; the constables will tell you how I happen to have him apprehended; but I must go, I must go, I have no head for it."

"Though the bullet kept out, plenty of lead has got in, somehow or other," muttered Sir John Slingsby, as his fellow-magistrate tottered toward the door; but the baronet was not a bad-hearted man, and taking compassion on Mr. Wittingham's state, he followed him with a large glass of madeira, insisted upon his drinking it, and supported him under the right arm to the hall-door, where he delivered him over to the hands of the butler to put him safely into his carriage. While this was being effected, Sir John turned round and gazed upon the figure of Stephen Gimlet, and the two officers who had him in charge; and if his look was not peculiarly encouraging to the poacher, it certainly was much less so toward the constables. To say the truth, a constable was an animal, toward which, for some reason or another, Sir John Slingsby entertained a great dislike. It is not impossible that his old roving propensities, and sundry encounters with the particular kind of officer which was now under his thumb, had impressed him with a distaste for the whole species; but, assuredly, had he been called upon to give a Linnæan description of the creature, it would have been: "A two-legged beast of the species hound, made to be beaten by blackguards and bullied by magistrates."

Waving his hand, therefore, with an air of dignity, over his extended white waistcoat, he said—

"Bring him in," and leading the way back to the dining-room, he seated himself in his great chair, supported on either side by decanters; and while the constables were entering, and taking up a position before him, he pushed a bottle either way, to Dr. Miles and Mr. Beauchamp, saying, in as solemn a tone as if he were delivering sentence of death, "A bumper, gentlemen, for a toast—now, Master Leathersides, why do you bring this man before me?"

"Why, please your worship's honor," replied the constable, "we apprehended him for poaching in the streets of Tarningham, and—"

"Halloah!" cried Sir John, "poaching in the streets of Tarningham, that's a queer place to set springes. Leathersides, you're drunk."

"No, please your honor's worship, I arn't, whimpered the constable, who would at any time rather have been sent for a week to prison than be brought up before Sir John Slingsby, "I said as how we apprehended him in the streets of Tarningham, not as he was a-poaching there."

"Then where was he poaching when you apprehended him?" demanded Sir John, half in fun, half in malice, and with a full determination of puzzling the constable.

"Can't say he was poaching anywhere just then," replied Mr. Leathersides.

"Then you'd no business to apprehend him," replied the baronet; "discharge the prisoner, and evacuate the room. Gentlemen, are you charged? The king, God bless him!" and he swallowed down his glass of wine, winking his eye to Beauchamp, at what he thought his good joke against the constables.

Mr. Leathersides, however, was impressed with a notion, that he must do his duty, and that that duty was to remonstrate with Sir John Slingsby; therefore, after a portentous effort, he brought forth the following words:—

"But, Sir John, when we'd a got 'un, Mr. Wittingham said we were to keep 'un."

"Where's your warrant?" thundered Sir John.

"Can't say we've got one," said the other constable, for Mr. Leathersides was exhausted.

"If you apprehended him illegally," said Sir John Slingsby, magisterially, "you detained him still more illegally. Leathersides, you're a fool. Mr. What's-your-name, you're an ass. You've both violated the law, and I've a great mind to fine you both—a bumper—so I will, by Jove. Come here and drink the king's health;" and Sir John laughed heartily while inflicting this very pleasant penalty, as they thought it, upon the two constables; but resolved to carry the joke out, the baronet, as soon as the men had swallowed the wine, exclaimed in a pompous tone: "Stephen Gimlet, you are charged with poaching in the streets of Tarningham, and convicted on the sufficient testimony of two constables. Appear before the court to receive sentence. Prisoner, your sentence is this: that you be brought up to this table, and there to gulp down, at a single and uninterrupted draught, one glass of either of those two liquors called port or madeira, at the discretion of the court, to the health of our sovereign lord the king; and that, having so done, you shall be considered to have made full and ample satisfaction for the said offense."

"With all my heart, sir," said Ste Gimlet, taking the glass of wine which Sir John Slingsby offered him. "Here's to the king, God bless him! and may he give us many such magistrates as Sir John Slingsby."

"Sir, I've a great mind to fine you another bumper for adding to my toast," exclaimed the baronet; and then waving his hand to the constables, he continued: "Be off, the prisoner is discharged: you've nothing more to do with him—stay here, Master Gimlet, I've something to say to you;" and when the door was shut, he continued, with a very remarkable change of voice and manner: "Now, my good friend, I wish to give you a little bit of warning. As I am lord of the manor for many miles round the place where you live, the game you have taken must be mine, and, therefore, I have thought myself justified in treating the matter lightly, and making a joke of it. You may judge, however, from this, that I speak disinterestedly, and as your friend, when I point out to you, that if you follow the course you are now pursuing, it will inevitably lead you on to greater offenses. It will deprave your mind, teach you to think wrong right, to resist by violence the assertion of the law, and, perhaps, in the end, bring you to the awful crime of murder, which, whether in this world or not, is sure to meet its retribution hereafter."

"Upon my life and soul, Sir John," said Ste Gimlet, earnestly, "I will never touch a head of game of yours again."

"Nor any one else's, I hope," answered Sir John Slingsby; "you are an ingenious fellow I have heard, and can gain your bread by better means."

"How!" inquired the man, emphatically; but the moment after he added, "I will try at all events. This very morning, I was thinking I would make a change, and endeavor to live like other people; but then I fancied it would be of no use. First, people would not employ me, and I feared to try them. Next, I feared myself; for I have led a wild and rambling kind of life, and have got to love it better than any other. If there were a chance of men treating me kindly and giving me encouragement, it might answer; but if I found all faces looking cold on me, and all hearts turned away from me, though perhaps I have deserved it, I am afraid I should just fall back into my old ways again. However, I will try—I will try for the child's sake, though it will be a hard struggle at first, I am sure."

Sir John Slingsby laid his finger upon his temple and thought for a moment. He had been serious for a long while—fully five minutes—and he had some difficulty in keeping up his grave demeanor: but that was not all: some words that Ned Hayward had let fall, almost at random, suggested a plan to his mind which he hesitated whether he should adopt or not. Perhaps—though he was a kind-hearted man, as we have seen and said before—he might have rejected it, had it not been for its oddity; but it was an odd plan, and one that jumped with his peculiar humor. He was fond of doing all sorts of things that other men would not do, just because they would not—of trying experiments that they dared not try—of setting at defiance everything which had only custom and convention for its basis; and, therefore, after an instant's meditation, given to the consideration of whether people would suppose he was actuated by benevolence or eccentricity (he would not have them think he did an odd thing from benevolence for the world), he went on as the whim prompted to reply to Stephen Gimlet's last words, mingling a high degree of delicacy of feeling with his vagaries, in the strangest manner possible, as the reader will see.

"Well, Ste," he said, "perhaps we may make it less of a struggle than you think. I'll tell you what, my fine fellow, you're very fond of game—a little too fond, perhaps. Now, my friend, Ned Hayward—that's to say, Captain Hayward. Where the deuce has he gone to!—I don't know—ran after the clumsy fellow, I suppose, who fired through the window and missed the deer too, I'll be bound. It must have been Conolly, the under-keeper; nobody but Conolly would have thought of firing right toward the window—but as I was saying, my friend, Ned Hayward, said just now that you'd make a capital keeper. What do you think of it, Gimlet? Wouldn't it do?"

"Not under Mr. Hearne, sir," answered Ste Gimlet. "We've had too many squabbles together;" and he shook his head.

"No, no, that would never do," replied Sir John, laughing; "you'd soon have your charges in each other's gizzards. But you know Denman died a week ago, over at the Trottingham Hall manor, on t'other side of the common—you know it, you dog—you know it well enough, I can see by the twinkling of your eye. I dare you have looked into every nest on the manor, since the poor fellow was bagged by the grim archer. Well, but as I was saying, there's the cottage empty and eighteen shillings a week, and you and Hearne can run against each other and see which will give us the best day's sport at the end of the year. What do you say, Gimlet? you can go and take possession of the cottage this very night; I don't want it to stand empty an hour longer."

"Thank you a thousand times, Sir John," said the man heartily; "you are a kind gentleman indeed, but I must go up to my own place first. There's my little boy, you know. Poor little man, I dare say he has cried his heart out."

"Pooh, nonsense, not a bit," said the baronet, "I'll take care of all that. I'll send up and have him fetched."

The man smiled and shook his head, saying, "He would not come with a stranger."

"What will you bet?" cried Sir John Slingsby, laughing. "I'll bet you a guinea against your last ferret, that he'll come directly. Here, Matthew — Moore — Harrison," he continued, first ringing the bell, and then opening the door to call, "some of you d—d fellows run up and bring Ste Gimlet's little boy. Tell him his daddy's here," and Sir John Slingsby sat down and laughed prodigiously, adding every now and then, "I'll take any man five guineas of it that he comes."

There is an exceedingly good old English expression, which smart people have of late years banished from polite prose, but which I shall beg leave to make use of here. Sir John Slingsby then was known to be a comical fellow. Stephen Gimlet was well aware that such was the case; and though he thought the joke was a somewhat extravagant one, to send a man-servant up to the moor at that hour of the evening, to fetch down his little boy, yet still he thought it a joke. His only anxiety, however, was to prevent its being carried too far, and, therefore, after twirling his hat about for a minute in silence, he said—

"Well, Sir John, perhaps if he's told that I am here, he may come; but now I recollect, I locked the door; and besides, there are all my things to be fetched down; so if you will be kind enough to give me till to-morrow, sir, I will accept your bounty with a grateful heart, and do my best to deserve it—and I am sure, I am most grateful to the gentleman who first spoke of such a thing. I am, indeed," he added, with some degree of hesitation, and cheek rather reddened; for while Sir John was still laughing heartily, he saw that Mr. Beauchamp's fine lustrous eyes were fixed upon him with a look of deep interest, and that Doctor Miles was blowing his nose violently, while his eyelids grew rather red.

"I don't doubt it in the least, Ste," said Sir John; "Ned Hayward is a very good fellow—a capital fellow—you owe him a great deal, I can tell you. There! there!" he continued, as the door opened to give admission to the servant, "I told you he would come—didn't I tell you? There he is, you see!"

Stephen Gimlet gazed for an instant in silent astonishment when he beheld the boy in the butler's arms, wrapped warmly up in the housekeeper's shawl; for at Sir John's indisputable commands, they had taken him from his bed. He was confounded—he was as one thunderstruck; but the moment after, the child, recovering from the first dazzling effect of the light, held out his little hands to his father with a cry of delight, exclaiming, "There's my daddy, there's my daddy!" and the poacher sprang forward and caught him to his heart.

Sir John Slingsby was himself overset by what he had done: the tears started in his eyes; but still he laughed louder than ever; outtrumpeted Doctor Miles with blowing his nose, wiped away the tears with the back of his hand, put on his spectacles to hide them, and then looked over the spectacles to see Ste Gimlet and his boy.

The child was nestling on his father's breast and prattling to him; but in a moment the man started and turned pale, exclaiming, "Fire!—the place burnt! What in heaven's does he mean?"

"There, there!" cried Doctor Miles, coming forward and making the man sit down, seeing that he looked as ghastly as the dead, with strong emotion. "Don't be alarmed, Stephen. Don't be agitated. Lift up the voice of praise and thanksgiving to God, for a great mercy shown you this day, not alone in having saved your child from a terrible death, but in having sent you a warning with a most lenient hand, which will assuredly make you a better man for all your future days. Lift up the voice of praise, I say, from the bottom of your heart."

"I do indeed!" cried the poacher, "I do indeed!" and bending down his head upon the boy's neck, he wept. "But how did it happen?—how could it happen?" he continued, after a while, "and how, how was he saved?"

"Why, Ned Hayward saved him, to be sure," cried the baronet. "Gallant Ned Hayward—who but he? He saw the place burning from the top of the barrow, man, rushed in, burnt himself, and brought out the boy."

"God bless him! God bless him!" cried the father. "But the fire," he added, "how could the place take fire?"

"That nasty cross man set it on fire, daddy, I'm sure," said the boy; "the man that was there this morning. He came when you were away, and he wouldn't answer when I called, and I saw him go away, through the peep-hole, with a lighted stick in his mouth. I didn't do it indeed, daddy."

A glimpse of the truth presented itself to Stephen Gimlet's mind; and though he said nothing, he clenched one hand tight, so tight that the print of the nails remained in the palm; but then his thoughts turned to other things, and rising up out of the chair in which Doctor Miles had placed him, he turned to Sir John Slingsby, and said, "Oh, sir, I wish I could say how much I thank you!"

"There, there, Stephen," replied the baronet, waving his hand kindly, "no more about it. You have lost one house and you have got another; you have given up one trade and taken a better. Your boy is safe and well; so, as the good doctor says, praise God for all. Take another glass of wine, and when you have talked a minute with the little man, give him back to the housekeeper. He shall be well taken care of till you are settled, and, in the mean time, you can go down to the Marquis of Granby in the village, and make yourself comfortable till to-morrow. Hang me if I drink any more wine to-night. All this is as good as a bottle;" and Sir John rose to join the ladies.

The other two gentlemen very willingly followed his example; but before they went, Beauchamp, who had had his pocket-book in his hand for a minute or two, took a very thin piece of paper out of it, and went round to Stephen Gimlet.

"You have lost all your furniture, I am afraid," he said, in a low voice; "there is something to supply its place with more."

"Lord bless you, sir, what was my furniture worth?" said the poacher, looking at the note in his hand, with a melancholy smile; but by that time Beauchamp was gone.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE PURSUIT.

"I WONDER where the deuce Ned Hayward can be gone," was the exclamation of Sir John Slingsby about ten o'clock at night when he found that his young guest did not reappear; and so do I wonder, and, perhaps, so does the reader too. It will, therefore, be expedient, in order to satisfy all parties, to leave the good people at Tarningham Park, and pursue our friend at once, for we have no time to spare if we would catch him. He is a desperate hard rider when there is any object in view, and he certainly left the park on horseback.

When last we saw him, the hour was about half-past seven or a quarter to eight, night was beginning to fall, and without doing anything figurative in regard to the evening—without comparing the retiring rays of light to the retreat of a defeated army, or the changing color of the sky to the contents of a London milkmaid's pail under the influence of the pump—we may be permitted to say that the heavens were getting very gray; the rose and the purple had waned, and night, heavy night, was pouring like a deluge through the air. Nevertheless, the night was fine, a star or two shone out, and the moment Ned Hayward sprang to the window through which the ball had come, he saw a figure hurrying away through the trees at the distance of about three hundred yards. They were fine old trees with no underwood—English park trees, wide apart, far-spreading, gigantic; and Ned Hayward paused an instant to gaze after he had jumped out of the window, and then took to his heels and ran on as fast as a pair of long, strong, well-practiced legs would carry him. There was turf below him, and his feet fell lightly; but he had not gained more than fifty yards upon the figure, when he saw through the bolls another figure, not human but equine. For a short distance the person he pursued did not seem aware that he had a follower, but before the time arrived when the horse became apparent some indications seemed to reach his ear, and, if Ned Hayward ran quick, the other seemed to run nearly as fast. When the young gentleman was within about a hundred yards of him, however, the man was upon the horse's back and galloping away.

Ned Hayward stopped and followed him with his eyes, marking the course he took as far as the light would permit. He then listened, and heard the noise of the horse's feet distinctly beating the ground in one direction. The next moment the sounds became confused with others, as if another horse were near, and turning round to the road which led from the gate on the side of Tarningham, the young officer saw a mounted man coming slowly up toward the house.

"By Jove, this is lucky!" said Ned Hayward, as he recollected having heard Sir John Slingsby tell a groom to carry a note to Mr. Wharton, the lawyer: and running down to the road as fast as possible, he stopped the servant, and bade him dismount, and let him have the horse immediately.

The groom recognized his master's guest; but he had some hesitation, and began his reply with a "please, sir—" But Ned cut him short at once, in a very authoritative tone; and in two minutes he was in the saddle. He paused not an instant to think, for calculation was a very rapid process with him, and, during his morning's rambles, he had marked, with a soldier's eye, all the bearings and capabilities of the park and the ground round about it. The result of his combinations was thus expressed upon the mental tablet, or nearly thus:—

"The fellow cannot get out by the way he has taken; for there is no gate, and the park paling is planted at the top of the high bank, so that no man in England dare leap it. He must take to the right or left. On the left he will be checked by the river and the thick copse, which would bring him round close to the house again. He will, therefore, take to the right, and pass the gates on the top of the hill. He must come down half-way to the other gates, however, before he can get out of the lane; and I shall not be much behind him."

He rode straight, therefore, to the gates on the Tarningham side, passed them, turned sharp to the left, galloped up the sandy lane under the park wall, and blessed his stars as he saw the edge of the moon beginning to show itself in the east.

"Hang me if I give up the chase till I have run him down," said Ned Hayward; but when a man sets out hunting a fox with such a determination, he never knows how far the fox or the determination may lead him. Away he went, however, like a shot. The horse was a strong, well-built cob, of about fourteen hands three, which had been accustomed to bear the great bulk and heavy riding of Sir John Slingsby to cover; and it sprang out under the lighter weight and better balance of the younger man, as if it had a feather on its back. Up this hill they went, all gathered together like a woolpack: an easy hand, an easy seat, and an exact poise, made the rider feel to the beast not half his real weight; and, in two minutes, Ned Hayward's quick ear caught the sound of other hoofs beside those underneath him. "I shall have him now!" he said; but suddenly the sounds became fainter. Three springs more and he had the horseman before him—but at a hundred and fifty yards' distance, going over the moor. There was a fence and ditch on the right hand; and Ned Hayward pushed his horse at them. The good little beast rose gallantly by the moonlight; but there was a ditch on the other side also, which neither saw. He cleared it with his forefeet, but his hind went in, and over he came sprawling. Neither rider nor beast were hurt; and Ned Hayward picked him up in a minute, and away again.

The fugitive had gained ground, nevertheless, and was shooting off like a falling star; but the moonlight was now bright, lying in long misty lines upon the moor. A few rapid steps brought them to the sandy road, and on—on they dashed as if for life. On, however, dashed the other horseman likewise. He knew the ground well, his horse was good, he really rode for life. It was as even a race as ever was seen. The wide moor extended for miles, every tree and bush was visible, and even the distant belts of planting where the common ended on the right could be seen lying black and heavy against the moonlight sky; but yet there was a darkness over the ground which showed that it was not day; and still, as he urged the willing beast forward, Ned Hayward kept a ready hand upon the bridle in case of need. Soon he thought he gained upon the other, but then he saw him turn from the sandy road and take over the turf to the left. Ned Hayward ran across, and pressed hard the beast's sides. On, on they went; but the next instant the ground seemed darker than before, and the pursuer checked up his horse suddenly upon the very edge of a deep pit, while the other rode on unobstructed on the further side.

Not more than a moment was lost or gained, however, for turning quickly round the edge of the pit, though keeping a sharper eye upon the ground than before, Ned Hayward still followed a diagonal course, which saved him as much of the distance between him and the fugitive as he had lost by the temporary check. When he, too, had got to the other side of the pit, the space between them was about the same that it had been at first, but the ground sloped gently downward, and then spread out in a perfect flat with neither trees nor bushes, although some thick rushy spots assumed here and there the appearance of bunches of bramble, or bilberry, but afforded no interruption to the horses' speed, and on they went, helter skelter, over the moor, as if the great enemy were behind them.

In a few minutes a light was visible on the right, and Ned Hayward said to himself, "He is making for some house;" but the next instant the light moved, flitting along from spot to spot, with a blue, wavering, uncertain flame, and with a low laugh, the young gentleman muttered, "A will-o'-the-wisp, that shan't lead me astray this time at least."

On he dashed, keeping the horseman before him; but ere he had passed the meteor a hundred yards, he felt the pace of his horse uneasy, the ground seemed to quiver and shake under his rapid footfalls, and a plashy sound was heard, as if the hoofs sank into a wet and marshy soil.

"A shaking bog, upon my life," said Ned Hayward, "but as he has gone over it, so can I."

With his horse's head held lightly up, his heels into his sides, the bridle shaken every minute to give him courage, and a loud "Tally ho!" as if he were in sight of a fox, on went Ned Hayward, with the water splashing up around him till the hoofs fell upon firmer ground, and a slight slope upward caught the moonlight, and showed the fugitive scampering away with a turn to the right.

"Hoiks, hoiks! halloo!" cried Ned Hayward, applying the flat of his hand to the horse's flank, and, as if inspired by the ardor of the chase, the brave little beast redoubled its efforts, and strained up the hill after the larger horse, gaining perceptibly upon it.

Clear and full in the moonlight the dark figure came out from the sky as he cleared the edge of the hill, and in two seconds, or not much more, Ned Hayward gained the same point.

The figure was no longer visible. It had disappeared as if by magic; horse and rider were gone together, and all that could be seen was the gentle slope downward that lay at the horse's feet, a darkish spot beyond, which the moon's rays did not reach, and then the moor extending for about a couple of miles farther, marked in its undulations by strong light and shade.

"Why what the devil is this!" exclaimed Ned Hayward; but though he sometimes indulged in an exclamation, he never let astonishment stop him, and seeing that if the figure had taken a course to the right or left he must have caught sight of it, he rode straight at the dark spot in front, and found that it consisted of one of the large pits, with which the moor was spotted, filled to the very top of the banks with low stunted oaks, ashes, and birch-trees.

"Earthed him! earthed him!" said Ned Hayward, as he looked round, but he made no further observation, and soon perceived the sandy cart-road which the man must have taken to descend into the pit.

The young gentleman was now a little puzzled; the natural pertinacity and impetuosity of his disposition would have led him to plunge in after the object of his chase, like a terrier dog after a badger, but then he saw that by so doing, the man, who knew the ground apparently much better than he did, would have the opportunity of doubling upon him, and escaping his pursuit, while he was losing himself among the trees and paths. Rapid in all his calculations, and seeing that the extent of the hollow was not very great, so that, by the aid of the moonlight, any figure which issued forth would become visible to him as long as he remained above, Ned Hayward trotted round the edge of the pit to make himself perfectly sure that there was no small path or break in the banks, by which the object he had lodged in the bushes beneath him, might effect its flight without his perceiving it. Having ascertained this fact, he took up his position on the highest ground near, that he might command the whole scene round, and then dismounting, led his horse up and down to cool it gradually, saying to himself, "I will stop here all night rather than lose him. Some person must come by in the morning who will help me to beat the bushes."

Ned Hayward concluded his reflections, however, with a sentence which seemed to have very little connection with them.

"She's an exceedingly pretty girl," he said, "and seems to be as amiable as she is pretty, but I can't let that stop me."

I do not at all understand what he meant, but perhaps the reader may find some sense in it. But while he was reflecting on pretty girls, and combining them in the honestest way possible with his hunt after a man who had fired a shot into the window of Tarningham House, an obtrusive recollection crossed his mind that moons will go down, and that then wide open moors with many a shaking bog and pitfall were not the most lustrous and well-lighted places upon earth, which remembrance or reflection puzzled him most exceedingly. Though we have never set up Ned Hayward for a conjuror, he was an exceedingly clever, dashing, and amiable person; but he was far from being either a magician or an astronomer, and not having an almanac in his pocket, nor able to read it if he had, he was not at all aware of the hour at which the moon went down. He saw, indeed, that she had already passed her prime, and was verging toward decline, and it was with a very unpleasant sensation that he thought, "Hang her old untidy horns, she will be gone before the day breaks, and a pleasant dark place it will be when she no longer gives me light. I will stop and watch, however, but I must change my tactics, and hide under the hill. Perhaps he may think I am gone, and come out with fresh courage. The young blackguard! it would be a good turn to all the world to hang him, if it is but to prevent him marrying such a nice girl as that, who is a great deal too good for him. He won't thank me, however, for my pains."

This thought, somehow or other, was not pleasant to our friend Ned Hayward, and, indeed, like most of us, in many even of the ordinary circumstances of life, he was affected by very different emotions. Why it was, or wherefore, he could not tell, but he had been seized with a strong inclination to hang, or otherwise dispose of any gentleman whom he could suspect of being a favored lover of Mary Clifford's; and yet, on the other hand, he had every disposition in the world to oblige Mary Clifford himself. These two objects seemed incompatible, but there is a fashion in the world which has a strange knack of trying to overcome impossibilities, and sometimes succeeds too—at least in overcoming those things which fathers and mothers, relations, guardians, and friends, have pronounced to be insurmountable. At all events, Ned Hayward made up his mind that it was his duty not to abandon his pursuit, so long as there was a chance of its being successful, and, consequently, he drew his horse a little farther from the edge of the pit, as soon as he had considered the peculiar circumstances of Mistress Moon, and endeavored to keep out of sight as far as possible, while he himself watched eagerly, with nothing but his head as far as the eyes above the edge of the acclivity.

Fancy is a wonderful thing, and it has been accounted for some people as good as physic. I should say it was better for most men, but yet, taken in too large doses it is dangerous, very dangerous. Now Ned Hayward had, that night, taken too large a dose, and the effect was this: he imagined he was perfectly well acquainted with the figure, person, and appearance of the horseman whom he had hunted from under the walls of Tarningham Park to the spot where he then stood, with his horse's bridle over his arm. He could have sworn to him!—very lucky it was that nobody called upon him to do so, as he found out within a quarter of an hour afterward. Fancy painted his face and his figure, and a tremendous black eye, and a bruised cut down the side of his nose. Now as the man lay there quietly ensconced in the pit, his face was very different, his figure not at all the same, and no black eye, no bruised cut, gave evidence of the scuffle which took place two nights before. It was, in fact, quite a different person, and all the young gentleman's calculations were wrong together. It is a very happy thing indeed for a man in the wrong, when he acts in the same manner as he would if he were right. His doing so, it is true, sometimes proceeds from good feeling, sometimes from fortunate circumstances, but, at all events, such was Ned Hayward's case in the present instance, for he had made up his mind to remain upon the watch, and he would have watched as zealously and only a little more pleasantly, if he had known perfectly well who the man was, instead of mistaking him for another. When he had remained about seven minutes and a half, however—I cannot speak to a few seconds more or less, and a slight mistake will make no great difference, as the first heat was over, and our friends were only taking breathing time; but when he had remained for about seven minutes and a half, his horse shied at something behind him, and when the young gentleman turned round, he perceived a long shadow cross the space of moonlight on the common, showing that some living object was moving in a slanting direction between him and the southwestern side of the sky. The first question he asked himself was naturally, who he could be, and the first answer that suggested itself was, "Perhaps one of this fellow's comrades."

Two to one, however, were not odds that at all daunted our young friend; and turning quite round, for an instant he looked at the figure as it came down, and then directed his eyes toward the edge of the pit again. He kept a sharp look upon the approaching party however; though the step upon the soft turf made no great sound, his eyes were suddenly brought round upon the visitor of his solitary watch, when about ten yards still remained between them. The moon now served our good friend as well as if he had been a lover, showing him distinctly the face, features, and figure of the person before him, and he instantly exclaimed,

"Ah, Stephen, this is lucky! What brought you here?"

"Why, sir," answered the man, "this is part of my beat, and as soon as I had got some supper down at the village, as it is not fair to take a gentleman's money without doing something for it, and as I am rather accustomed to a walk on a moonlight night, I might as well just come out to see that all is safe. I can guess what brought you here, for Ned, the groom, told me you had taken his horse and were off like a shot."

"Hush," said Ned Hayward, "don't speak so loud, my good fellow; I have earthed him among those trees in the pit there, but I could not dig him out, for I was afraid he would escape one way while I was hunting him the other."

"Ah! ah! you have got him, then?" said Gimlet, "then, that's a piece of luck. If he swings it will be no bad job; a bloody-minded scoundrel!"

Ned Hayward was somewhat surprised to hear his friend Wolf qualify by so unsavory an epithet a gentleman, whose friend and companion he had very lately been; the young officer, however, knew a good deal of the world and the world's ways, and he was not at all inclined to honor the ci-devant poacher for so sudden a change of opinion. His first thought was, this man must be a scoundrel at heart, after all, to abuse a man whom he has been consorting with in this manner, without any motive for so doing, except the simple fact of a change in his own avocations. If he thought young Wittingham a very respectable person two or three hours ago, when he himself was only Wolf the poacher, I do not understand why he should judge him a bloody-minded villain, now that he himself has become Stephen Gimlet, second keeper to Sir John Slingsby. This does not look like honesty.

A second thought, however, upon all he had seen of the man's character, the frankness, the hardihood, even the dogged determination he had shown, induced Captain Hayward to say to himself, "The fellow can't know who it is;" and as thought is a very rapid thing, he replied with a perceptible pause, "Yes, I have got him, safe and sure, and if you'll help, he cannot get away. You guess who he is, I dare say, Stephen!"

"Oh, to be sure, sir," answered Gimlet; "it is that young scoundrel, Harry Wittingham. Bad's the crow and bad's the egg," he continued, without knowing he was using a Greek proverb, "I suppose it can be no one else; for I heard from the old housekeeper down in the town, that he swore like fury that he would have vengeance on his father if he laid the information against him before Sir John."

"Humph!" said Ned Hayward: "but then," he thought, "I am rather hard upon the man too. The idea of any one in cold blood firing a shot at his own father is certainly enough to rouse the indignation and disgust even of men who would wink at, or take part in, lesser crimes to which they are more accustomed. Come, Sephen," he continued aloud, "now you are here, we may do better than I could alone. Let us see what is to be done."

"Oh, we'll soon manage it, sir," answered Wolf, "I know every bit of the pit well enough; there is but one place he can go to with his horse, and but one road up the bank. He can round the inside of the pit two ways, sure enough, but what we had best do is, to go in till we can see what he is about, and then have a rush upon him together or separate, or cut him off either way."

Captain Hayward agreed in this view of the case, and after a few more words of consultation, the horse was fastened to a scraggy hawthorn tree, and stooping down as low as possible to conceal their approach, Captain Hayward and his companion advanced along the cart-road down into the pit. The moment after they began to descend, the bank on the right cast a shadow over them, which favored their operations, and Gimlet, taking the lead, crept silently along a path which had once served for the waggons that carried the sand out of the pit, but was now overgrown with grass, and hemmed in with bushes, shrubs, and trees of forty or fifty years' growth. No moonlight penetrated there, and all was dark, gloomy, and intricate. Now the path turned to the right, now to the left, then proceeded straightforward again, and then began to mount a little elevation in the surface, or floor, as the miners would call it, of the pit itself, still thickly surrounded by green shrubs, through which, however, the slanting beams of the moon were shining over the edge of the pit. Stephen Gimlet's steps became still more quiet and cautious, and he whispered to Ned Hayward to walk lightly, for fear the fugitive should catch a sound of their approach, and make his escape. Each step occupied several seconds, so carefully was it planted; the slight rustling of the leaves, catching upon their clothes, and each falling back upon a branch, which, pushed aside as they passed, was dashed back upon those behind, made them pause and listen, thinking that the object of their eager pursuit must have caught the sound as well as their own nearer ears. At length, Stephen Gimlet stopped, and putting back his hand, held his companion aloof for an instant, while he leaned forward and brought his eyes close to a small hole between the branches. Then, drawing Ned Hayward forward, he pointed in the same direction in which he had been looking, with his right finger, and immediately laid it upon his lips as a token to be silent. Ned Hayward bent his head and gazed through the aperture as his companion had done. The scene before him was a very peculiar one. In broken beams, filtered, as we may call it, by the green leaves and higher branches, the moonlight was streaming upon a small open space, where the ground rose into a swelling knoll, covered with green turf and moss. There was one small birch-tree in the midst, and a hawthorn by its side, but all the rest was clear, and on the right hand could be seen, marked out by the yellow sand, the cart-road which led to the moor above. Standing close to the two little trees was a horse, a fine, strong, powerful bay, with a good deal of bone and sinew, long in the reach, but what is unusual in horses of that build, with a chine and shoulder like those of a wild boar. Close to the horse, with the bridle thrown over his arm, and apparently exceedingly busy upon something he was doing, stood a tall, powerful man, whose face, from the position in which he had placed himself, could not be seen; his back, in short, was toward Ned Hayward and his companion, but from under his left arm protruded part of the stock of a gun, which a moonbeam that fell upon it, showed as plainly as the daylight could have done. From the position in which he held the firelock it seemed to Ned Hayward as if he were attending to the priming, and the moment afterward the click of the pan showed that the supposition was correct.

At the same time this sound met his ear, the young gentleman was drawn gently back by the hand of his companion, and the latter whispered, "That's Harry Wittingham's horse, I'd swear to him among a thousand, but that's not Henry Wittingham himself, of that I'm quite sure."

"I cannot see his face," answered Ned Hayward, in the same low tone, "but the figure seems to me very much the same."

"Hush! he's moving," said the man; "better let us go round and cut him off by either road, you to the right and I to the left—straight through that little path there—we shall have a shot for it, but we must not mind that—see, he is looking at his girths."

The man whom they spoke of had seemed perfectly unconscious of the presence of any such unwelcome visitors near him. His motions were all slow and indifferent, till the last words had passed Stephen Gimlet's lips; then, however, he turned suddenly round, displaying a face that Captain Hayward did not at all recollect, and gazing direct to the spot where they stood, he raised his gun, already cocked, to his shoulder, and fired.

Fortunately, it so happened that Ned Hayward had taken one step in the direction which his companion had pointed out, otherwise the ball, with which the piece was charged, would have passed right through his breast. As it was, it grazed his left arm, leaving a slight flesh wound, and, seeing that they were discovered, both he and Stephen Gimlet dashed straight through the trees toward the object of their pursuit. He, in the mean time, had put his foot in the stirrup, and sprung upon his horse's back. One rushed at him on either side, but perchance, at all hazards and at all events, without a moment's consideration, the man dashed at the poacher, brandishing the gun which he held in his hand like a club. As he came up without giving ground an inch, Stephen clutched at his bridle, receiving a tremendous blow with the stock of his gun, and attempting to parry it with his left hand. The man raised his rein, however, at the same moment he struck the blow, and Stephen missed the bridle. He struck at him with his right, however, in hope of bringing him from his horse, and with such force and truth did he deliver his reply to the application of the gun-stock, that the man bent down to the horse's mane, but at the same time he struck his spurs deep into the beast's flanks, passed his opponent with a spring, and galloped up to the moor.

"I am away after him," cried Ned Hayward, and darting along the road like lightning, he gained the common, unhooked his own horse from the tree, and recommenced the pursuit with the same figure still flying before him.

The steep rise of the pit had somewhat blown the fugitive's horse, and for the first hundred yards or so Captain Hayward gained upon him, but he soon brought all his knowledge of the country to bear, every pond, every bank, every quagmire, gave him some advantage, and when, at the end of about ten minutes, they neared the plantations at the end of the moor, he was considerably farther from his pursuer than when their headlong race began. At length he disappeared where the road led in among trees and hedge-rows, and any further chase seemed to promise little. Ned Hayward's was a sadly persevering disposition, however; he had an exceedingly great dislike to be frustrated in anything, and on he therefore rode without drawing a rein, thinking, "in this more populous part of the country I shall surely meet with some whom he has passed, and who will give me information."

It was a wonderfully solitary, a thinly peopled district, however, which lay on the other side of the moor from Tarningham. They went early to bed, too, in that part of the world, and not a living soul did Ned Hayward meet for a full mile up the long lane. At the end of that distance, the road branched into three, and in the true spirit of knight-errantry, the young gentleman threw down his rein on the horse's neck, leaving it to carry him on in search of adventures, according to its own sagacity. The moor was about four miles and a half across; but in the various turnings and windings they had taken, now here, now there, upon its surface, horse and man had contrived to treble that distance, or perhaps something more. There had been a trot to the town before and back again, a hand-canter through the park, and then a tearing burst across the moor. The horse therefore thought, with some reason, that there had been enough of riding and being ridden for one night, and as soon as Ned Hayward laid down the reins, it fell from a gallop to a canter, from a canter to a trot, and was beginning to show an inclination to a walk, if not to stand still, when Ned Hayward requested it civilly with his heels to go on a little faster. It had now selected its path, however, remembering Ovid's axiom, that the middle of the road is the safest. This was all that Ned Hayward could have desired at his hands, if it had had any; but of its hoofs he required that they should accelerate their motions, and on he went again at a rapid pace, till, suddenly turning into a high road, he saw nearly before him on the left hand, six large elms in a row, with a horse-trough under the two nearest; an enormous sign swinging between the two central trees, and an inn, with four steps up to the door, standing a little back from the road.

There was a good light streaming from some of the windows; the moon was shining clear, but the dusty old elms were thick with foliage, which effectually screened the modest figures on the sign from the garish beams of either the domestic or the celestial luminary.

Ned Hayward drew in his rein as soon as he beheld the inn and its accompaniments; then approached softly, paused to consider, and ultimately rode into the court-yard, without troubling the people of the house with any notification of his arrival. He found two men in the yard in stable dresses, who immediately approached with somewhat officious civility, saying, "Take your horse, sir?"

And Ned Hayward, dismounting slowly, like a man very much tired, gave his beast into their hands, and affected to saunter quietly back to the inn, while they led his quiet little cob into the stables. Then suddenly turning, after he had taken twenty steps, he followed at a brisk pace, he passed the stable door, walked deliberately down the whole row of horses in the stalls, till he stopped opposite one—a bright bay, with a long back, and thick, high crest, which was still covered with lather, and had evidently been ridden furiously not many minutes before.

Turning suddenly to the ostler and his help, who had evidently viewed his proceedings with more consternation than was quite natural, he placed himself between them and the door, and demanded with a bent brow and a stern tone, "Where is the master of this horse?"

The help, who was nearest, gasped in his face like a caught trout, but the ostler pushed him aside, and replied instantly, "He is indoors, sir, in number eleven."

And turning on his heel, Ned Hayward immediately entered the inn.

CHAPTER XV.

THE LETTER.

We left Sir John Slingsby with an exclamation in his mouth. An expression of wonder it was, at what could have become of his friend Ned Hayward, and the reader may recollect that it was then about ten o'clock at night. Quitting the worthy baronet in somewhat abrupt and unceremonious haste, we hurried after the young officer ourselves, in order to ascertain his fate and fortune with our own eyes; and now, having done that, we must return once more to Tarningham Park, and make an apology to Sir John, for our rude dereliction of his house and company. He is a good-natured man, not easily put out of temper, so that our excuses will be taken in good part; nor was he inclined to make himself peculiarly anxious or apprehensive about any man on the face of the earth; so that, even in the case of his dear friend Ned Hayward, he let things take their chance, as was his custom, trusting to fortune to bring about a good result, and philosophically convinced, that if the blind goddess did not choose to do so, it was not in his power to make her. During the evening he had once or twice shown some slight symptoms of uneasiness when he looked round and remarked his guest's absence; he had scolded his daughter a little, too, for not singing as well as usual; and, to say the truth, she had deserved it; for, whether it was the story told by the gentlemen on their return from the dining-room had frightened her—it not being customary at Tarningham House to have shots fired through the windows—or whether it was that she was uneasy at Captain Hayward's prolonged absence, she certainly did not do her best at the piano. Sing as ill as she would, however, Mary Clifford, who sang with her, kept her in countenance. Now Mary was a very finished musician, with an exceedingly rich, sweet-toned voice, flexible, and cultivated in a high degree, with which she could do anything she chose; so that it was very evident that she either did not choose to sing well, or else that she was thinking of something else.

But to return to Sir John. Perhaps, if we could look into all the dark little corners of his heart—those curious little pigeon-holes that are in the breast of every man, containing all the odd crotchets and strange feelings and sensations, the unaccountable perversities, the whimsical desires and emotions, that we so studiously conceal from the common eye—it is not at all improbable that we should find a certain degree of satisfaction, a comfort, a relief, derived by the worthy baronet, from the unusual events which had chequered and enlivened that evening; he had looked forward to the next six or seven hours with some degree of apprehension; he had thought it would be monstrous dull, with all the proprieties and decorums which he felt called upon to maintain before his sister; and the excitement of the interview with Mr. Wittingham, the examination of Stephen Gimlet, and the unaccountable disappearance of Ned Hayward, supplied the vacancy occasioned by the absence of the bottle and jest. Soon after the gentlemen had entered the drawing-room, Sir John placed his niece and his daughter at the piano, and engaged Dr. Miles, his sister, and even Mr. Beauchamp, in a rubber at whist; and though from time to time he turned round his head to scold Isabella for singing negligently, yet he contrived to extract amusement from the game, laughing, talking, telling anecdotes, commenting upon the play of his partner and his opponents, and turning everything into jest and merriment. Thus passed the evening to the hour I have mentioned, when Mrs. Clifford rose and retired to bed; and the first exclamation of Sir John, after she was gone, was that which I have recorded.

"It is strange, indeed," said Beauchamp, in reply; "but you know his habits better than I do, and can better judge what has become of him."

"Indeed, my dear uncle," said Miss Clifford with an earnest air, "I think you ought to make some inquiries. I do not think Captain Hayward would have gone away in so strange a manner, without some extraordinary motive, and after the alarming circumstance that has happened to-night, one cannot well be without apprehension."

"A harum-scarum fellow!" answered Sir John; "nobody ever knew what he would do next. Some wild-goose scheme of his or another; I saw him once jump off the mole at Gibraltar, when he was a mere boy, to save the life of a fellow who had better have been drowned, a sneaking Spanish thief, a half-smuggler and half-spy."

"And did he save him?" exclaimed Miss Clifford, eagerly.

"Oh, to be sure," answered Sir John; "he swims like a Newfoundland dog, that fellow."

"Your carriage, sir," said a servant, entering and addressing Mr. Beauchamp.

"Here, Jones," cried Sir John Slingsby; "do you know what has become of Captain Hayward? we have not seen him all night."

"Why, Sir John," answered the man, "Ralph, the under-groom, told me he had met the captain in the park, as he was returning from taking your note to Mr. Wharton, and that Captain Hayward made him get down, jumped upon the cob, and rode away out at the gates as hard as he could go."

"There, I told you so," said Sir John Slingsby; "heaven only knows what he is about, and there is no use trying to find it out; but this is too bad of you, Mr. Beauchamp, ordering your carriage at this hour; the days of curfew are passed, and we can keep the fire in a little after sundown."

"You should stay and see what has become of your friend, Mr. Beauchamp," said Isabella Slingsby; "I don't think that is like a true companion-in-arms, to go away and leave him, just when you know he is engaged in some perilous adventure."

Beauchamp was not proof against such persuasions; but we are all merchants in this world, trafficking for this or that, and sometimes bartering things that are of very little value to us in reality for others that we value more highly. Beauchamp made it a condition of his stay, that Isabella should go on singing; and Mary Clifford engaged her uncle in a tête-à-tête, while Beauchamp leaned over her cousin at the piano. The first song was scarcely concluded, however, when the butler again made his appearance, saying—

"You were asking, Sir John, what had become of Captain Hayward, and Stephen Gimlet has just come in to say that he had seen him about an hour ago."

"Well, well," said Sir John, impatiently, "what the devil has become of him? what bat-fowling exhibition has he gone upon now? By Jove! that fellow will get his head broken some of these days, and then we shall discover whether there are any brains in it or not. Sometimes I think there is a great deal, sometimes that there is none at all; but, at all events, he is as kind, good-hearted fellow as ever lived, that's certain."

"Stephen Gimlet says, Sir John," replied the butler, with his usual solemnity, "that the captain went out on horseback to hunt down the man who fired through the window."

"Whew!" whistled Sir John Slingsby, "was it not one of those cursed fools of game-keepers, shooting a deer?"

"No, Sir John," answered the man, "it was some one who came in on horseback by the upper gates. Captain Hayward got upon the cob and hunted him across the moor, till he lodged him in one of the pits on the other side, and was watching him there by the moonlight when Stephen Gimlet came up; for he was afraid, if he went in one way, that he might get out the other."

"Well, have they got him? have they got him?" cried Sir John; "by Jove! this is too bad, one must have his plate made bomb-proof, if this is to go on."

"They have not got him, please you, Sir John," replied the butler, "for when Stephen came up, he and the captain went in, and both got close up to the fellow, it seems, but he had time to charge his gun, and he fired straight at them. Wolf—that is, Mr. Gimlet—says he is sure Captain Hayward is wounded, for the man rode away as hard as he could go before they could stop him, and the captain jumped upon the cob and went after him again at the full gallop."

"Where did they go? which way did they take?" exclaimed the baronet, bustling up warmly; "by Jove! this is too bad, it must be put down! Tell Matthews and Harrison, and two or three more, to get out horses as fast as possible—which way did they take!—can't you answer!—have you got no ears!"

"Stephen said, sir, that they seemed to go toward Buxton's inn," replied the butler, "but he could not well see, for they got in among the woods."

"By Jove, I'll soon settle this matter," cried Sir John; "I'll just get on a pair of boots and be off—Mr. Beauchamp, you must stay till I come back, so come, be friendly, send away your carriage, and take a bed."

"Upon one condition, Sir John," replied Beauchamp, "that you allow me to be the companion of your ride."

"No, no," cried Sir John, rubbing his hands, "my dear fellow, you must stay and protect the ladies."

"Oh, we shall do very well, papa," cried Isabella; "only order all the doors and windows to be shut, and I will command in camp till your return."

"There's a hero," cried Sir John Slingsby, "agreed! Jones, Jones, you dog, tell the boy to take away his horses, and not to come for Mr. Beauchamp till this time to-morrow night—nay, I insist, Beauchamp—no refusal, no refusal—capital haunch of venison just ready for the spit—bottle of Burgundy, and all very proper—everything as prim as my grandmother's maiden aunt—but come along, I'll equip you for your ride—ha, ha, ha, capital fun, by Jove! Ned Hayward's a famous fellow to give us such a hunt extempore; as good as a bagged fox, and a devil a deal better than a drag."

Thus saying, Sir John Slingsby rolled out of the room, followed by Mr. Beauchamp, to prepare themselves for their expedition from a vast store of very miscellaneous articles, which Sir John Slingsby's dressing-room contained. He was, heaven knows, anything but a miser, and yet in that dressing-room were to be found old suits of clothes and equipments of different kinds, which he had had, at every different period, from twenty to hard upon the verge of sixty; jack-boots, dress pumps, hobnailed shoes, Hessians, and pen-dragons, great coats, small coats, suits of regimentals, wrap-rascals, the complete costume of a harlequin, which now scarcely would have held one of his thighs, and a mask and domino. But with each of these pieces of apparel was connected some little incident, or tale, or jest, which clung lingering to the old gentleman's memory, associating with events sweet, or joyous, or comic, sometimes even with sad events, but always with something that touched one or other of the soft points in his heart; and he never could make up his mind to part with them. From these he would have fain furnished his guest with a wardrobe, but unfortunately the baronet's and Mr. Beauchamp's were of very different sizes, and he laughingly put away the pair of boots that were offered, saying, "No, no, Sir John, my shoes will do very well; I have ridden in every sort of foot-covering under the sun, I believe, from wooden boots to morocco leather slipper; but I will take this large cloak that is hanging here, in case we should have to bivouac."

"Ha, ha, ha!" cried Sir John again; "a capital notion; I should not mind it at all:—light a great fire on the top of the moor, turn our toes in, and put a bundle of heath under our heads:—we have got capital heath here. Were you ever in Scotland, Mr. Beauchamp!"

"I was, sir, once," answered Beauchamp, in a tone so stern and grave, that Sir John Slingsby suddenly looked up and saw the countenance of his guest clouded and gloomy, as if something exceedingly offensive or painful had just been said to him. It cleared up in a moment, however, and as soon as the baronet was ready they issued forth again and descended into the hall.

In the mean while, Isabella and her cousin had remained sitting near the piano, both rather thoughtful in mood. For a minute or two each was silent, busied, apparently, with separate trains of thought. At length Mary looked up, inquiring, "What do you intend to do, Isabella!"

"What do you mean, Mary, love!" replied her cousin; "if you mean to ask whether I intend to marry Ned Hayward, as I have a slight notion papa intends I should, I say no, at once:" and she laughed gayly.

"Oh, no," answered Miss Clifford; "my question was not half so serious a one, Isabella; though I do not see why you should not, either. I only wished to ask whether you intended to sit up or go to bed."

"Why I should not," exclaimed Isabella, gayly, "I can give you twenty good reasons in a minute. We are both so thoughtless; we should ruin ourselves in a couple of years; we are both so merry, we should laugh ourselves to death in a fortnight; we are both so harum-scarum, as papa calls it, that it would not be safe for one to trust the other out of sight; for, a thousand to one, we should never meet again; he would go to the East Indies, and I to the West seeking him; and then each would go to meet the other, and we should pass each other by the way."

Mary Clifford smiled thoughtfully; and after pausing in meditation for a moment or two, she answered, "After all, Isabella, I have some doubts as to whether either of you is as thoughtless as you take a pleasure in seeming."

"Oh, you do me injustice—you do me injustice, Mary," cried Miss Slingsby; "I seem nothing but what I am. As to Captain Hayward," she added, with a sly smile, "you know best, Mary dear. He is your preux chevalier, you know; delivered you from lions and tigers, and giants and ravishers, and, as in duty bound, has talked to nobody but you all day."

Mary colored a little, but replied straightforwardly, "Oh yes, we have talked a good deal, enough to make me think that he is not so thoughtless as my uncle says; and I know you are not so thoughtless as you say you are yourself. But what do you intend to do while they are gone!"

"Oh, I shall sit up, of course," answered Isabella; "I always do, till papa goes to bed. When he has a large party, and I hear an eruption of the Goths and Vandals making its way hither—which I can always discover by the creaking of the glass door—I retreat into that little room and fortify myself with lock and key, for I have no taste for mankind in a state of drunkenness; and then, when they have roared and bellowed, and laughed, and quarreled, and drank their coffee and gone away, I come out and talk to papa for half an hour, till he is ready to go to bed."

"But is he always in a very talking condition himself!" asked Mary Clifford.

"Oh, fie! now, Mary," exclaimed her cousin; "how can you suffer your mind to be prejudiced by people's reports. My father likes to see every one happy, and even jovial under his roof—perhaps a little too much—but if you mean to say he get's tipsy, it is not the case; I never saw him the least so in all my life; in fact I don't think he could if he would; for I have seen him drink as much wine as would make me tipsy twenty times over, without its having any effect upon him at all—a little gay, indeed; but he is always gay after dinner."

Mary Clifford listened with a quiet smile, but replied not to Isabella's discourse upon her father's sobriety, merely saying, "Well, if you sit up, my dear cousin, I shall sit up too to keep you company;" but scarcely had the words passed her sweet lips, when in came Sir John Slingsby and Mr. Beauchamp, the baronet holding a note open in his hand.

"Ha, ha, ha," he cried, "news of the deserter, news of the deserter, we had just got to the hall door, horses ready, cloaks on our backs, servants mounted, plans arranged, a gallop of five or six miles, and a bivouac on the moor before us, when up walks one of the boys from Buxton's inn with this note from the runaway; let us see what he says," and approaching the lamp, he read by its light several detached sentences from Ned Hayward's letter, somewhat to the following effect: "Dear Sir John, for fear you should wonder what has become of me—so I did, by Jove—I write this to tell you—ah, I knew all that before—cantered him across the common—earthed him in old sand-pit—rascal fired at me—not much harm done—chased him along the road, but lost him at the three turnings—came on here—very tired—comfortable quarters—particular reason for staying where I am—over with you early in the morning—Ned Hayward."

"Ah, very well, very well," continued Sir John, "that's all right; so now, Beauchamp, if you are for a game at piquet I am your man; if not, some wine and water, and then to bed. I'll put you under the tutelage of my man Galveston, who knows what's required by every sort of men in the world, from the Grand Turk down to the Methodist parson, and he will provide you with all that is necessary."

Mr. Beauchamp, however, declined both piquet and wine and water; and, in about half an hour, the whole party had retired to their rooms; and gradually Tarningham Hall sank into silence and repose.

One of the last persons who retired to rest was Sir John Slingsby himself; for, before he sought his own room, he visited the library, and there, lying on the table where his letters were usually placed, he found a note, neatly folded and sealed, and directed in a stiff, clear, clerk-like hand. He took it up and looked at it; laid it down again; took it up once more; held it, for at least three minutes, in his hand, as if irresolute whether he should open it or not; and at length tore open the seal, exclaiming,

"No, hang me if I go to bed with such a morsel on my stomach."

Then, putting it on the other side of the candle, and his glass to his eye, he read the contents. They did not seem to be palatable; for the first sentence made him exclaim,

"Pish! I know you, my buck!"

After this he read on again; and though he made no further exclamation, his brow became cloudy, and his eye anxious. When he had done, he threw it down, put his hands behind his back, and walked two or three times up and down the room, stopping every now and then to gaze at the Turkey carpet.

"Hang him!" he cried, at length. "By Jove! this is a pretty affair."

And then he walked up and down again.

"Well, devil take it!" he cried, at length, tearing the note to pieces, and then throwing the fragments into the basket under the table, "it will come, some how or other, I dare say. There is always something turns up—if not, the trees must go—can't be helped—improve the prospect—landscape gardening—ha! ha! ha!"

And laughing heartily, he rolled off to bed.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE CHANCE-MEETING IN THE PARK.

The morning sky was very gray. There was a thin film of vapor over the greater part of the heavens, retarding, as it were, the advance of dawn, as a mother keeps back her wayward child struggling forward too fast upon all the varied ways of life. Yet toward the east there was a bright streak of gold, which told that the star of light, and warmth, and genial influences, was coming up rapidly from below the round edge of the rolling ball. It was a line, defined and clear, marked out from the vapor, which ended there by an edge of lighter yellow; and as the strong golden tints became more and more intense, the filmy cloud split and divided into fragments of strange shapes, while the beams streamed through, and, passing across the wide extent of air, tinted with purple the vapors above. Toward that glowing streak all things seemed to turn; the sunflower inclined her head thither; the lark bent his flight in that direction; toward it all the songsters of the wood seemed to pour the voices of their choir. It is a strange thing, the East; full of curious associations with all the marvelous history of man. Every good thing and almost every bright thing, has come from the East; religion, salvation's hope; daylight and the seeming movement of the stars and moon; summer and sunshine and Christianity have sprung thence, as if there were the fountain of all the best gifts to man. There have all nations risen, and still the progress is from the East toward the West; as if there were some law by which all things on the earth followed the course of the great light-giver. Nevertheless, how have these blessings been mingled with many evils! The cutting winds of spring and winter, pestilence and destruction, earthquakes and wars, have there arisen to sweep over the world, and blacken it with grief and mourning. It is a strange place, the East; and I can never look toward it and see the rising sun, without a strange feeling of awe and mystery, from the various associations which exist between it and the wonders of the past.

The scene from the windows of Tarningham

Hall was not a very extensive one, but it was fine in its peculiar character: the sweeps of the park; the dewy lawns; the large old trees; the broad and feathery fern; the stately deer, walking along with unconfirmed steps and half-awakened deliberation; the matutinal hares, scudding about in the gray twilight; and the squirrels, rushing from tree to tree; were all pleasant to the eye that looked upon them, though that eye could only at one small point, where the break in the wood gave a wilder view, catch anything beyond the domain, and all that even there was gained, consisted of a narrow portion of that same streak of yellow light, which broke the monotonous curtain of the cloud toward the east.

Nevertheless, for several minutes, Mary Clifford gazed upon the whole with pleasure and interest. She was early in her habits; a familiar child of the morning; and the dew on the leaves was a delight to her; the soft gray of the early day, a sort of invitation to contemplation and enjoyment. After marking the deer, and smiling at the sportive gambols of the hares, who, as it was forbidden to shoot near the house, played fearless on the lawns, she turned her eyes toward the spot where the dawning morning-light was visible, and recollecting that not far from the house, and what was called the terrace, there was a point whence the whole scene over the country was visible, and where she could watch, with uninterrupted pleasure, all the effects of the breaking day upon that beautiful landscape, she sallied forth to enjoy a peculiar sort of pleasure, which requires a very pure and unsullied mind, and a heart naturally elevated and devout, to understand it fully.

The hour was a very early one; for, at that season of the year, Dan Phœbus, as the ancient poets call him, shaking off the lazy habits of the winter, gets up betimes; and, as the servants of good Sir John Slingsby were not subjected to very severe discipline, not a single soul in the house was up to give our sweet friend exit. There is always a curious sensation in walking alone through a house, all the other tenants of which are still sleeping; there is a deathly feeling about it; a severing of the ties, which so lately existed between us and those who are now insensible; but that sensation is most strongly felt, when the morning sunshine is on the world; when nature has revived, or is reviving from the trance of night; and other things are busy in restless activity, though the gay companions of a few hours gone by are silent and still, as if death had struck them.

Down the broad oak stairs, with its narrow strip of carpet, along the old marble hall with its tesselated floor, Mary Clifford went slowly and quietly, lighted alone by a skylight overhead, and a large window over the great doors; but she could hear the gay birds singing without; the thrush upon the tree-top; the wood-lark in the shade; the linnet, with its small, sweet song, and the chaffinch, in his spring dress and his spring notes, among the bushes. She opened the door of the library and went in, leaving it unclosed behind her, then unbarred and unlocked the glass door, went out and gazed about her. Some deer that were near the house started and withdrew a few steps, and then paused to stare at her; but whether it was that they had never seen any of their companions slaughtered by a being in a woman's dress, or that they thought she looked, as she really did, sweet and gentle as the morning, they did not take fright, trotting a few steps farther, after a long look, and then stopping with their heads to converse over the matter.

After closing the door, Mary walked on toward the terrace, which was at the distance of about a couple of hundred yards, climbed the steps and proceeded toward the end, where the finest view was to be obtained, at a spot sheltered by six rugged yews, underneath which there was a seat: and there she paused, for at least ten minutes, drinking in the beauty of the scene, as if changed to a thousand hues under the influence of the rising sun. All was still and tranquil; but at length she heard some voices speaking, and looked in the direction in which they came.

Some of the grooms, she thought, as her eyes rested on the stables at some little distance in the rear of the house; and although it was not at all probable that they would disturb her reveries, yet she prepared to go back, for one half of the pleasure which she derived from her early walk lay in its solitude. She was wishing that the grooms had thought fit to lie in bed for half an hour longer, when she heard proceeding from the lower ground under the bank of the terrace, the light and rapid footfalls of some one apparently walking from the stables to the mansion; and, not at all wishing to meet any one, she turned back again toward the yews. At the end of the terrace, however, the footsteps stopped; there was a momentary pause, and then they mounted the steps and came along the gravel toward her. Mary walked on to the end, and then turned, when straight before her appeared Captain Hayward, coming on with his usual light and cheerful air, though the sleeve of his coat was cut open, and it was evident that he had bandages round his arm.

"Good morning, good morning, Miss Clifford," he said, advancing frankly and taking her hand; "what a magnificent morning! I see you are as early in your habits as myself. But did you ever see such a rich dove-color as has come upon those clouds! I love some of these calm gray mornings, with the promise of a bright day they give, better far than those skies all purple and gold, such as are described by that rhodomontade fellow, Marmontel, in his 'Incas,' which are always sure to end in clouds and rain. I have always thought those very bright mornings like a dashing woman of fashion, tricked out in her best smiles and her brightest colors, promising all sorts of things with her eyes, which she does not intend to perform, and cold or frowning before half an hour is over."

"And the gray morning, Captain Hayward," asked Mary, with a smile, "what is that like?"

"Oh, I don't know," answered Hayward, laughing, "you must not drive my imagination too hard, dear lady, lest it stumble—perhaps the gray morning is like a calm, quiet, well brought up country girl, with a kind heart under the tranquil look that will give a long day of sunshine after its first coolness is passed."

Mary Clifford cast down her eyes, and did not answer; but, as she was walking on toward the house, Ned Hayward continued in his usual straightforward way; "You must not go in yet, my dear Miss Clifford; I want you to take a turn or two with me upon this delightful terrace. You must, indeed, for I have got a thousand things to say, and I know I shall find nobody else to say them to for the next two or three hours."

His fair companion did not think fit to refuse, though some prudish people might have thought it a little improper to take a walk at five o'clock in the morning with a young captain of infantry unattached; but Mary Clifford had only known Captain Hayward six-and-thirty hours, and therefore she saw nothing in the least improper in it in the world. Young ladies, who guard so very scrupulously against being made love to, forget that they show what they expect. She turned, therefore, with him at once, and replied, "You must, indeed, have a long series of adventures to tell us; I am delighted to forestall the rest of the family, and to have the news myself three hours before any one. We were all in great alarm about you last night. My uncle and Mr. Beauchamp, and half-a-dozen servants were setting out to seek you, upon the report of Stephen Gimlet, as they call him, the father of the little boy you saved; but your note just arrived in time to stop them."

"Oh, then, Master Gimlet, I suppose, has told my story for me?" said Ned Hayward.

"Only very briefly," answered the young lady; "he said you had chased some man over the common, who had fired at you, and he was afraid had wounded you; and I fear, from what I see, he was right."

"Oh, it was nothing, nothing at all," replied Ned Hayward; "but I'll tell you all about it as circumstantially as a newspaper;" and he went on in a gay and lively tone to give an account of his adventures of the preceding night, till his arrival at Buxton's inn. Sometimes he made Mary Clifford laugh, sometimes look grave and apprehensive, but he always interested her deeply in his tale; and she showed that she had marked one part particularly by asking, "Then did you know the man when you saw his face so distinctly in the pit?"

"Up to that moment I thought I did," replied her companion, "but then I saw I was utterly mistaken. I will acknowledge to you, my dear Miss Clifford, that, till he turned round, I fancied he was one I had seen before—the same height, the same make—and, under existing circumstances, I felt that nothing would justify me in giving up the pursuit, although it was most painful to me, I assure you, to follow, with the purpose of punishing a young gentleman, in whom, from what you said yesterday at dinner, I conceive you take a considerable interest."

"Who? Mr. Wittingham!" exclaimed Mary Clifford, her face turning as red as scarlet. "Oh, Capain Hayward, you are mistaken, I take no interest in him, I abhor him; or, at least—at least I dislike him very much."

Ned Hayward looked puzzled; and he really was so in a considerable degree. His own prepossessions had done something to mislead him; and a man never conceives a wrong opinion but a thousand small circumstances are sure to arise to confirm it. A man may long for green figs, but in any country but England he will not get them in the month of March; he may desire grapes, but he cannot find them in May; but if he have a suspicion of any kind, he will meet with, whenever he likes, all sorts of little traits and occurrences to strengthen it, for the only fruit that is ripe in all seasons is corroborative evidence; and, among the multitude of events that are ever in the market of life, it must be a hard case if he do not find enough of it. After a moment given to consideration, he replied more cautiously than might have been expected, "I have somehow mistaken you, my dear lady," he said at length, "and such mistakes may be dangerous. I have no right to force myself into your confidence; but really the whole of this affair is becoming serious. When first I had the pleasure of seeing you, I found you subjected to what was certainly a great outrage. I call it so; for I am perfectly certain that you yourself must have considered it as such; and there could not even be a palliation for it except—" he paused an instant, and then added, gravely, "except love on both sides, disappointed by objections arising in the prejudices of others."

Mary Clifford colored deeply, but suffered him to proceed. "I need not tell you, after what I have said," he continued, "that I have recognized and identified the principal person concerned in this business. At dinner you expressed a very strong desire that the offender should not be punished; but the former offense was followed by a very serious crime. A shot was fired last night into your uncle's dining-room amid a party of gentlemen quietly drinking their wine, which very nearly struck the father of the very man who had already rendered himself amenable to the laws of his country by his attack upon you. I had suspicions that he was the perpetrator of this crime, and although he certainly was not the person I pursued across the moor, yet I have some very strong reasons to think that he was a participator in the offense. These are all very serious circumstances, my dear young lady; but I am ignorant of those which have preceded these events, and if without pain to yourself you could give me any explanations which might guide my mind to the causes of all that has occurred, it might be very serviceable in many respects. I am sure you will answer me frankly, if it be possible, and believe me, I am not one to act harshly, or to abuse your confidence—nay, more, thoughtless as I may seem, and as I am called, be assured I will do naught without consideration and forethought."

"I am sure you will not, Captain Hayward," answered Mary Clifford, warmly—"quite sure and I have no hesitation in giving you my confidence, though, indeed, I have very little to tell. These things are always unpleasant to speak about, and that is the only motive I could have for remaining silent; but this gentleman's conduct has been so very public, that I am saved from all scruples on his account. About two years ago, I met Mr. Henry Wittingham at the county ball, danced with him there, and observed nothing in his behavior which should make me treat him differently from other new acquaintances. I did not think him agreeable, but he was not offensive. He asked me to dance again the same night, and I refused; but, shortly after, he was formally introduced at our house; my father asked him to dinner, and was, indeed, very kind, both to him and to Mr. Wittingham, his father, because he thought that they were unjustly looked down upon and treated coldly by the county gentry on account of their family. I soon began to find that—that—I really do not well know how to go on—but that this young gentleman's visits were more frequent than was pleasant, and that he always contrived to be near me, especially when we met in public. His conversation, his manners, as I knew more of him, became insupportably disagreeable: I tried, as much as I could, to avoid him—to check his advances—at first quietly, but decidedly, without speaking to any one else, for I did not wish to produce any breach between my father and Mr. Wittingham; but, at last, I found that he made a parade and a boast of his intimacy, and then I thought it best to speak both to mamma and my dear father. What was done I really do not know; but certainly something took place which very much enraged both father and son, and the latter was forbidden to visit at our house. The result was anything but deliverance from his persecution. From that moment he chose to assume that the objection was on the side of my parents, and I cannot tell you how I have been annoyed. I have not ventured to walk out alone; for, although once when I met him in the village, I told him plainly my sentiments toward him, he still persisted, in the most unpleasant manner, that I spoke alone from mamma's dictation, and for months he used to hang about the place, till I really grew nervous at the sight of every human being whom I did not instantly recognize. This last outrage has been worse than all, and I will admit that it deserves punishment; but I am afraid, from various circumstances which accompanied it, that the law, if carried into effect, would punish it too severely. My uncle declared he would hang the man if he could catch him; and oh! think, Captain Hayward, what a horrible reflection that would ever be to me through life, to think that I had been even the innocent cause of bringing a fellow-creature to a disgraceful death."

"Painful, indeed, I do not doubt," answered Ned Hayward; "but yet—"

"Nay, nay," cried Mary; "do not say but yet, Captain Hayward. I could never make up my mind to give evidence against him; and, to speak selfishly, the very fact of having to appear in a court of justice, and of having my name in public newspapers, would render the punishment nearly as great to me as to him. These were my sole motives, I can assure you, in what I said yesterday, and not the slightest personal interest in one who has, I am afraid, in all situations disgraced himself."

For some reason or another, Ned Hayward was glad to hear Mary Clifford defend herself, and so warmly, too, from the imputation of any feeling of regard for Harry Wittingham; but he took care not to show, to its full extent, all the pleasure that he felt.

"I thought it strange, indeed," he said, "that you should entertain any great feeling of esteem for a person who certainly seemed to me not worthy of it; but there are often circumstances, my dear Miss Clifford, unseen by the general eye, which endear two persons to each other, who seem the most dissimilar—youthful companionship, services rendered, old associations—a thousand things build up this between persons the least likely to assimilate, which are stronger than all opposing principles. I thought that such might be the case with you; but as it is not, let me tell you what was the end of my adventure last night, and then you will see what cause I have for suspicion. I must inform you, in the first instance, that I marked the person of Mr. Henry Wittingham well on the evening of the attack, notwithstanding the twilight, and that I saw him yesterday in Tarningham. His father's unwillingness to enter into the charge, when made against some unknown person, excited suspicion; but I found, afterward, from other sources, that Mr. Wittingham and his son had quarreled, and were completely at variance; and, in the justice-room, the young man whispered something to the old one, of which I heard only two or three words, but they were of a threatening nature. I have told you that I thought I recognized the figure of the man who fired the shot, and Stephen Gimlet declared he could swear the horse he rode was Henry Wittingham's; but I found, as I have said, that the man in the pit was a stranger. When, after pursuing him as long as I had any trace, I at length arrived at a place called, I find, Buxton's Inn, I saw the very horse in the stable, in a state which left no doubt that it had been ridden hard for several hours, and had not been in five minutes. I inquired for the master, and was told the number of the room where he was to be found. I walked straight in, and found Mr. Henry Wittingham sitting quietly at supper. Some conversation ensued, in the course of which I told him the cause of my intrusion, and his whole manner was confused and agitated. He swore violently at the idea of anybody having ridden his horse, and affected not to believe it; but I made him come down to the stable, when, of course, his mouth was closed."

"But who did ride it, then?" exclaimed Miss Clifford.

"Nay, that I cannot tell," answered Ned Hayward; "but I resolved to wait at the inn, and see if I could discover anything. I was shown into a very neat little sitting-room, and wrote a note to your uncle, Sir John, while they were getting my coffee. It was now nearly ten o'clock, and there was a room, apparently similar to my own, on each side of me, with a door of communication with either. I suppose they were locked, so as to prevent the passage of anything very fat or corporeal from one room into the other, but certainly were not so well closed as to exclude all sound. It may seem a strange thing for me, my dear Miss Clifford, to give you an account of the sitting-rooms of an inn; but so much depends in this world upon what is called juxtaposition, that very important events have depended upon the keyhole of a door. You must not suppose, however, that I made use of either of the keyholes in my room for the laudable and honorable purpose of eaves-dropping; on the contrary, I spoke loud enough to the waiter to give sufficient notice to my neighbors, if I had any, that voices were distinguishable from one room to the other; and it would seem that Mr. Henry Wittingham, who was on the left-hand side, was determined to impress me, not only with the same fact, but also with a notion that he was in a towering passion on account of the usage his horse had met with; for he cursed and swore very severely, to which the waiter, or whosoever he spoke to, did not reply. There seemed to be nobody on the other side for about half an hour, when, as I was sitting at my coffee, after having dispatched my note, I heard steps come up from below, a door open, and the voice of the waiter say, most respectfully, 'I will tell the captain you are here, Mr. Wharton.'"

"It is Mr. Wharton, the lawyer, then!" exclaimed Mary, with some degree of eagerness.

"I really cannot tell," answered Ned Hayward; "but I suspect it was, from what passed afterward. All was silent for about three minutes, except when I heard a step walking up and down the room. As your uncle had mentioned Mr. Wharton's name more than once in the course of yesterday, I fancied he might have come upon business to some one, which there was no necessity for my hearing; and, therefore, I rattled the cups and saucers, moved about the chair, tumbled over a footstool, and left them to take their own course."

"Mr. Wharton is a very shrewd man," said Mary Clifford, "and one, I should think, a hint would not be thrown away upon."

"He did not choose to take mine, however," replied Ned Hayward; "for, at the end of a few minutes, some one seemed to join him, saying, in a loud and familiar tone, 'Ha! how do you do, Wharton?—very glad to see you again! I hope you have brought me some money.'"

"Was it Mr. Wittingham's voice?" asked Miss Clifford.

"Oh, dear no," replied Captain Hayward: "one quite of a different tone—a good deal of the same swaggering insolence in it, but, to my fancy, there was more bold and dogged determination. Every now and then there was a small pause, too, before a word was pronounced, which one generally finds in the speech of a cunning man; but yet there was a sort of sneering persiflage in the words, that I have more generally met with in the empty-headed coxcombs of fashion, who have nothing to recommend them but impertinence and a certain position in society. However, it could not be Mr. Wittingham, for him this lawyer must have known very well, and his reply was, 'Indeed, Captain Moreton, I have not; but I thought it better to come over and answer your note in person, to see what could be done for you.'"

"Captain Moreton!" cried Mary; "I know who it is very well—not that I ever saw him, as far as I can remember; for he quitted this part of the country ten or twelve years ago, when I was quite a child; but I have often heard my father say that he was a bad, reckless man, and had become quite an adventurer, after having broken his mother's heart, ruined his other parent, and abridged poor old Mr. Moreton's days also. He died quite in poverty, three years ago, after having sold his estate, or mortgaged it, or something of the kind, to this very Mr. Wharton, the attorney."

"Indeed!" said Ned Hayward, "that explains a great deal, my dear young lady. Where did this property lie?"

"Just beyond my uncle's, a little way on the other side of the moor," replied Miss Clifford.

Ned Hayward fell into a fit of thought, and did not reply for some moments; at length he said with a laugh, "Well, I do not know that their conversation would interest you very much, though, in spite of all I could do, I heard a great part of it, and as for the rest, I must manage the best way I can for myself."

"You are very tantalizing, Captain Hayward," said his fair companion, "and you seem to imply that I could aid in something. If I can, I think you are bound to tell me. Confidence for confidence, you know," and when she had done she colored slightly, as if feeling that her words implied more than she meant.

"Assuredly," replied Ned Hayward; "but I only fear I might distress you."

"If what you say has reference to Mr. Wittingham," the young lady answered, raising her eyes to his face with a look of ingenuous frankness, "let me assure you, once for all, that nothing you can say will distress me, if it do not imply that I feel something more than the coldest indifference."

"Nay, it does not refer to him at all," replied Ned Hayward, "but to one you love better."

"Indeed!" exclaimed his companion, her lip trembling with eagerness, "tell me—tell me, Captain Hayward! After what you have said, I must beg and entreat that you would."

"I will, then," answered Ned Hayward, gazing upon her with a look of admiration blended with sorrow at the pain he was about to inflict. "I believe, Miss Clifford, I am about to commit an indiscretion in mentioning this subject to you at all; for I do not know that you can assist materially; and yet it is something to have one to consult with—one, in whose generosity, in whose kindness, sympathy, ay, and good sense too, I can fully trust Beside, you know, I dare say, all the people in the neighborhood, and may give me some serviceable hints."

"But speak—speak," said Miss Clifford, pausing in their walk up and down the terrace, as she saw that he fought round the subject which he thought would distress her, with a timid unwillingness to do so; "what is it you have to tell me?"

"Why, I very much fear, my dear young lady," answered Captain Hayward, "that your uncle is very much embarrassed—nay—why should I disguise the matter?—absolutely ruined."

Mary Clifford clasped her hands together, and was about to answer with an exclamation of sorrow and surprise; but I do believe that no person on earth was ever permitted to give an explanation uninterrupted. The Fates are against it: at least they were so in this instance; for just as Ned Hayward had uttered the last very serious words, they heard a light step tripping up behind them, and both turning suddenly round, beheld Miss Slingsby's French maid.

"Ah, ma'amselle," she said as soon as she reached them, "I saw you out in this early morning without anything on, and so I have brought you a shawl."

"Thank you, thank you, Minette," replied Mary, and as she was well accustomed to early walks, was about to decline the shawl; but, judging the quickest mode of getting rid of the maid would be to take it, she added, "very well—give it to me," and cast it carelessly round her shoulders.

The maid would not be satisfied with that arrangement, however, adjusted it herself, showed how the ladies of Paris shawled themselves, and occupied full ten minutes, during which her poor victim remained in all the tortures of suspense.

CHAPTER XVII.

MISS CLIFFORD IS MADE ACQUAINTED WITH HER UNCLE'S EMBARRASSMENTS BY CAPTAIN HAYWARD.

As soon as the maid had taken herself away, Ned Hayward said in a kind and feeling tone, "I fear I have distressed you much, Miss Clifford; let us walk quite to the other end and talk over this matter: for I have only been hurried into revealing this painful fact by my anxiety to consult with some one as to the possibility, if not of remedying the existing evil, at least of preventing it from going further."

Mary walked on by his side in silence, with her hands clasped and her eyes cast down with a look of deep thought; but at length she looked up, saying in a tone of one communing with herself—"Is it possible! what, with this fine property! But how can it be, Captain Hayward? here he is, with an estate of at least eight thousand a-year in his own possession, to do with it what he chooses."

"To explain all, I had better tell you what I have heard," said her companion. "The tale may be false; I trust part of it is so; but a great part must be true; and the man spoke as if from authority. The first part of their conversation was in a light tone; for a time the lawyer seemed to avoid grappling with the subject, and asked his companion after madam, in not the most respectful manner. The captain replied, she was very well, and in the other room; but pressed the lawyer to the point. He turned away again, and inquired whether Captain Moreton had been successful at the card-table lately. He answered 'Tolerably; he had won a thousand pounds just before he came from London;' but then added, 'Come, come, Wharton, no bush-fighting; you know you owe me five hundred pounds, and I must have it.' To this the lawyer answered: 'No, indeed, Captain Moreton, you are mistaken; I have told you so twice: the property was sold to a client of mine; and if I had chosen to send in my whole bill, your father would have been greatly my debtor instead of I being yours. The sum given was fifty-four thousand pounds; forty thousand went to pay off the mortgage and your debts; twelve thousand your father had; and my bill, together with that of the solicitor's of the opposite party, amounted in fact and reality to two thousand four hundred and seventy-two pounds. You recollect, I had not been paid for six years.'

"The next thing I heard," continued Ned Hayward, "was a loud laugh; and then Captain Moreton exclaimed, 'Your client! Wharton! very good, very good, indeed; you must think me exceedingly green: I know as well as possible who bought the property for two thirds of its value; employed other solicitors for a fictitious client; pocketed one half of their bill, and added thereto a bill of his own, which was more than the double of what he was entitled to—come, come, sir; don't affect to sham a passion, for we have business to talk upon, and that of a very serious kind. You are just going to sell the property again for the full value; and, before you do so, you shall disgorge a little.' The lawyer attempted to bluster, but unsuccessfully; for when he asked how Captain Moreton would stop him from selling the property, even if all he said were true, that worthy gentleman reminded him that his signature had been necessary to one of the papers, and then when he asserted it had been given, informed him with a laugh, that the signature he had obtained was that of a marker at a billiard-table; the lawyer's clerk sent after him to Paris, having been unacquainted with his person. Mr. Wharton attempted to show that it was of no consequence; but the matter so far ended by his giving a check for five hundred pounds, on Captain Moreton's signing another paper, which I suppose was drawn up in the room, for a silence succeeded for some minutes. A part of what took place then was not distinct; and I certainly made no effort to hear it."

"But my uncle," said Miss Clifford, "how does this affect my uncle?"

"He came upon the carpet next," replied Ned Hayward; "Captain Moreton asked who was going to buy the property; and when the lawyer made a mystery of it, saying that he really did not know the true parties, but that Doctor Miles had meddled in the business, the other named Sir John as the probable purchaser. Thereat Mr. Wharton laughed heartily, and said, 'I'll tell you what, captain, Sir John Slingsby is at this moment next thing to a beggar.'"

Mary put her hands before her eyes and turned very pale.

"Forgive me, my dear Miss Clifford," continued Ned Hayward, "for repeating such unpleasant words; but it is better you should hear all. I will hasten, however: Captain Moreton affected not to believe the tale; and then the lawyer went on to mention the facts. He stated that your uncle's property was mortgaged to the utmost extent, that the interest of two half-years would be due in four or five days; that notice of foreclosure had been given, and the time would expire before six weeks are over; that there are considerable personal debts, and that Sir John had written to him this very day to get a further advance of ten thousand pounds, which are absolutely necessary to stave off utter ruin even for a short time. Now I happen to know that Sir John did actually write to this man; and as Mr. Wharton could have no object in deceiving the person he was speaking to, I fear the tale is too true."

"Good heavens! what is to be done?" exclaimed Mary Clifford; "Oh, Captain Hayward, how terrible it is to know this, and not to be able to assist!"

Captain Hayward paused a single instant, and then replied with a look of deep feeling and interest, "Perhaps I ought not to have told you this, Miss Clifford," he said; "but I am a very thoughtless person, I am afraid, and yet I did not do this without thought, either; you know that I have a deep regard for your uncle, he was a very kind friend to me in days gone by, but having observed him well and with that accuracy which, strange as it may seem to say, is only to be found in extreme youth; I know that it is perfectly in vain to talk with him on the subject of his embarrassments, unless at the very moments when they are the most pressing and severe. To talk with him then may be too late. He is one of those—and there are many of them—who, with a hopeful disposition, many resources in their own minds, and a happy faculty of banishing unpleasant thoughts, go on from one difficulty to another, finding means through a great part of life of putting off the evil day, and who, thinking the chapter of accidents inexhaustible, come suddenly to a full stop in the end, with all their resources exhausted, and no possible means of disentangling themselves from their embarrassments. It has been his constant axiom for years, to my certain knowledge, that something would turn up, and when such is the case, it is perfectly in vain to attempt to consult with a person so circumstanced as to the means of extricating him from difficulties, of which he always expects to be delivered by a lucky chance. Having found fortune his best friend, he goes on trusting to her, till the fickle dame deserts him, and then looks around in bewilderment for assistance which cannot arrive."

"Too true a picture, too true a picture," replied Miss Clifford, in a sorrowful tone; "I have seen it myself, Captain Hayward, and have been grieved to see it."

"Well, do not let us grieve, but act, my dear lady," said Ned Hayward; "let us consult together, and see what can be done, for good Sir John must be saved at any cost."

"But what can I do, Captain Hayward?" she inquired. "Perhaps you do not know that the whole of my fortune is tied up by my father's will so strictly, that I can dispose of nothing till I have reached one-and-twenty years of age; and though I would willingly, most willingly sacrifice anything to relieve my uncle, I am as powerless in this business as a child."

"This is unfortunate, indeed," said Ned Hayward in reply, "very unfortunate; I had hoped that you had command of your own property, or that you might be able to point out one, who would be able and willing to take this mortgage and relieve your uncle."

"I know of no one, no one on earth," she answered; "my mother's is but a jointure; I am not of age for nine or ten months, and before that time it will be all over."

"The security is perfectly good," continued Ned Hayward in a musing tone, as if he had not heard her, "and I feel very sure that the property is worth a great deal more than this man has advanced, or any of his clients, as he calls them. Otherwise it would not have been done. We should easily find some one, I think, to take the mortgage, if we could but pay this accursed interest and stop the foreclosure—perhaps at a less per centage, too—that man is a rogue, I am sure, and we may very likely cut down a great many of the charges; for I feel very certain he has been purposely entangling good Sir John, till at length, when he thinks there is no possibility of escape, he pounces upon him to devour him."

"But what is to be done? what is to be done?" reiterated Miss Clifford.

"Well, it does not matter," said Captain Hayward, in the same thoughtful tone; "I'll tell you what we must do: I have a sum of sixteen thousand pounds in the funds. Ten thousand, it seems, will be wanted for the most pressing matters—we will call it twelve thousand; for no man in your uncle's position reckons very closely what is needed, and his calculation is always below instead of above the mark. I will go up to town and sell out; that will put off matters for six weeks or two months; and, in the mean time, we must set all our wits to work for the purpose of finding some one who will take the mortgage at reasonable terms, and of putting your uncle's affairs altogether into order."

"Oh, how can I thank you, Captain Hayward?" said Mary Clifford, putting her hand upon his arm; "indeed, indeed, I am very grateful."

"Without the slightest occasion," replied Ned Hayward. "I wish to heaven I had the means of taking the mortgage myself; but the fact is, my poor father—as good a man as ever lived—was too kind and easy a one. He put me very early into what is called a crack regiment, which in plain English means, I suppose, a regiment likely soon to be broken, or, at all events, likely to break those that enter it. I had my expensive habits like the rest, and never fancied that I should not find five or six thousand a-year, when I returned from Gibraltar at my father's death. Instead of that, I found the unentailed property totally gone; the entailed property was mine, as I was the last of my race; but there were debts to the amount of forty thousand pounds; but if I did not pay them, who would? The men would have had to go without their money; so I sold the property, paid the debts, put the little that remained, between fifteen and sixteen thousand pounds, in the funds, and have lived within my income ever since. Thus, you see, I have not the means of taking the mortgage."

Mary Clifford cast down her eyes, and was silent for minute or two; for there were very tions at her heart—sincere respect ion; more powerful, far, than they been had she conceived a high led Hayward's character at first, or ade a parade of his feelings and his treated it also lightly, however, so natter of course, both what he had hat he was about to do, that many y-minded person would have taken n showing, and thought it a matter o. But Mary Clifford was not an inded person, and she felt deeply.

it will you do yourself, Captain Hay- said, at length; "my uncle will be he is able to repay you, and the want may be a serious inconvenience t r, no!" replied Ned Hayward, wit air in the world, "I have four thou- s left, which will enable me to get ay again, and, though this is a sad ie we are in, may have some oppor- led me. I had held this sum, which ite sacred, and would never touch a t, though I was very much tempted ce to buy a fine horse or a fine pic- it off as I am, my dear Miss Clifford, of fortune, from forming those ties he comforts and happiness of latter st men, I may as well go and serve as well as I can to the best of my inger out my days in hunting, and id fishing, reading poetry, and look- res. Sir John will pay me when he ; for he will look upon it as a debt nd, if he never can, why, it can't be all events, I do not wrong my heirs, got none;" and he laughed right ford looked in his face with a smile; rt of philosophy so new to her, so nerous, so self-devoted, and yet so at she felt strongly infected by it. en bred up among people equally ly generous in all great things; but igid in smaller ones; severe if not re if not harsh: and they committed ul mistake of thinking, and of trying er to think, that true piety is not ler father had been the person from st this spring of chilling waters had l forth; and Mary's mother, though if a gay disposition, had been very d by the petrifying influence of the he contrast, too, in Mrs. Clifford's en her brother and her husband; whom she might love, but could not e other, whom she loved and re- , somewhat feared, tended to clench , which the dean had striven to im- to make her believe that cheerful- olly, if not vice, were companions rate. Mary Clifford saw the mis- hough her own heart had told her that an error existed somewhere. t at the same time, that she also had ay toward one who had sacrificed so he nearest relation she had except ; and with a beaming smile upon her id:

Hayward, I shall never forget your is day; but at the same time, you must not run any risk, or be any loser. If I had any power over my own fortune, I would do what you are now kind enough to do; but, at all events, I give you my word, that the moment I am of age, I will repay you."

"Oh, I dare say Sir John will do that," answered Ned Hayward, "but at all events, my dear young lady, pray say nothing to him on this subject till the last moment. We must let the matter press him very hard before he will hear reason; then, when he sees no means of escape whatever, he will consent that others shall find one for him. You had better talk to his daughter, but enjoin her to secrecy. If I have an opportunity, I will sound Beauchamp; I have a notion that he is rich; I feel very sure he is liberal and kind, and may take the mortgage if he finds it a reasonable security. That it is so, I am quite certain—nay, more, I am convinced, that if Sir John would let me manage all his affairs for one year, I would remove all his difficulties, and leave him a better income, in reality, than he has had for a long while. But now I must run away and leave you, for I see the people are getting up about the place, and I have two important pieces of business to do before noon."

"Indeed," said Mary, struck by something peculiar and indefinable in his manner; "I hope nothing unpleasant?"

"I will tell you what they are," said Ned Hayward, in a gay tone; "and then you shall judge for yourself. I have first to catch the largest trout in the river; I made a bet last night with your uncle that I would do so, and I always keep my engagements; and then I have to make ready for London to sell out this money."

"But need you go yourself!" said Miss Clifford, with a look of interest, "can you not send?"

"True, I can," said Ned Hayward, "I never thought of that—but yet I had better go myself. Good-by, good-by!" and he turned away; then pausing for a moment, something which he struggled against got the better of him, and, coming back, he took Mary Clifford's hand in his and pressed it gently, saying, "Farewell! There are some people, Miss Clifford, whose society is so pleasant, that it may become dangerous to one, who must not hope to enjoy it long or often."

CHAPTER XVIII.

NED HAYWARD'S MISSIVE TO THE YOUNGER WITTINGHAM.

"What hour does the coach start for London?"

"Half-past four, sir."

"Arrives in town at twelve to-morrow, I think?"

"No, sir; last time I went up, we got there by eleven."

"Then down again at half-past four?"

"Yes, sir—gets to the White Hart at half-past eleven—longer coming down than going up."

"That will do very well." And Ned Hayward, who had held the above conversation with one of Sir John Slingsby's servants, hurried up stairs. His room was all in the most exact order. His fishing tackle, two fowling-pieces in their cases, shot-pouches, game-bags, powder-flasks, &c., were in array, on the top of the drawers. His clothes were all in their separate places, his boots arranged under the dressing-glass, his writing-desk upon the table, flanked on either side by half-a-dozen volumes. Everything could be found in a moment, so if called upon suddenly to march, the baggage would require no time to pack. It was to the writing-desk he first went, however; he opened it, unscrewed the top of the inkstand, took out a sheet of note-paper and a memorandum-book, and then sat down deliberately in the chair. The memorandum-book was first called into service, and in the column of accounts he put down what he had paid at the inn that morning, and then, on another page, wrote down the following list, which I will not attempt to explain:—

"Catch trout.
"Write to H. W.
"See Ste Gim.
"Make inquiries.
"Provide for boy.
"Pack car. bag.
"Coach to London.
"Sell out 12,000*l*.
"Alter will.
"Pistols.
"Friend—qy. Beauchamp.
"Talk to him of No. 2 and No. 8."

When this was done, he put the memorandum-book in the pocket of a frock-coat, sat down again, drew the sheet of note-paper toward him, and on it wrote as follows, with a bold, free, rapid hand.

"Captain Hayward presents his compliments to Mr. Henry Wittingham, and begs to inform him that since he had the honor of seeing him last night, some business has occurred which compels him to go to London for a short time. He goes by the coach this day at half-past four, returns by the coach which leaves London at the same hour to-morrow, and expects to arrive at the White Hart by half-past eleven or twelve. If by that time Mr. Wittingham has found some gentleman of honor to use as his friend, Captain Hayward will have much pleasure in seeing that gentleman at the White Hart any time between the arrival of the coach and one o'clock. If not, he will be found for about a fortnight at Tarningham Park."

The note was then addressed and sealed, and as soon as that was done, without a moment's pause, Ned Hayward threw off the dress-coat in which he was still habited, put on a sporting costume, looked through his book of flies, and taking fishing-rod and basket in one hand, and the note in the other, descended the stairs.

The house was now in the bustle of morning preparation; housemaids were sweeping, men-servants were taking away lamps and candlesticks, and to one of the latter the note was delivered, with a half-crown, and directions to send some lad immediately to Buxton's inn. That being done, Ned Hayward strolled out into the park, taking his way toward the stream, where we will join him by and by.

We must now return to Mary Clifford, however, who stood where Ned Hayward had left her in deep thought for several minutes. Had she been the least of an actress she would not have done so, for she might have fancied that it would betray to her companion, as he walked away, what was passing in her mind; but Mary was not the least of an actress. Graceful by nature, ladylike and polished by heart and education, it had never been necessary for her to picture to her imagination what others would think of any of her movements or words. She was unaccustomed to do so. She never did it. She did not feel herself upon a stage; she was never acting a part. How few there are of whom we can say the same! But there she stood, silent, grave, and thoughtful, with Hayward's words still ringing in her ear, his manner still before her eyes; and both had been somewhat marked and peculiar. But three minutes were all that she would give to such thoughts. They came upon her in confused crowds, so numerous, so busy, so tumultuous, that they frightened her; and not being very brave by nature, she ran away from them, to take refuge with the calmer but sterner meditations regarding her uncle's situation. What was to be done, and how it was to be done, were very puzzling questions, which she asked herself over and over again, without receiving any satisfactory reply from her own mind. Under the pressure of difficulties and dangers, whether affecting ourselves, or those near and dear to us, there comes upon us a necessity for action, a cacoethes agendi, which we can scarcely restrain. We cannot sit down quietly and wait for time and circumstances to present favorable opportunities, as we should do, when the affairs in our hands were but matters of indifference to ourselves; calm, business-like transactions, in which we have no personal feeling. The heart comes in at every turn, and perplexes all the fine plans of the head; and we must be up and doing, whether the moment be favorable or not. Mary Clifford felt all this, and was, in some degree, aware of the unreasonableness of precipitancy. She thought it might be better to wait and see, and yet anxiety, eagerness, affection, urged her to do something, or something, at least, for her uncle, as soon as possible. She could not rest under the load; she felt as if activity would be almost a crime; and thought she could see no light whichever way she turned, yet she resolved to attempt something, not feeling very sure, whether she should do injury or not.

Such were the course of her meditations for nearly half an hour, after Ned Hayward left her; and yet it must be confessed that, though these meditations were upon painful subjects, they were not altogether painful. Did you ever listen attentively, dear reader, to one of those fine and masterly pieces of Beethoven's writings, where the great composer seems to take a delight in puzzling and perplexing the hearer, drowning him, as it were, under a flood of harmony, where discords are as frequently introduced as anything else? But still, through them all runs a strain of melody, which links them all together.

Such was very much the case of Mary Clifford. For, although the general train of her thoughts was somber, and there was much cause for sadness in all she had heard, there was something very sweet—she herself knew not what—that mingled with the old current of reflection, and harmonized it beautifully. It was something hopeful—expectant—trustful—a belief that by the agency of some one all would go right. Was it love? Was it the first dawn of that which, to the young mind, is like the dawn of the morning, that softens and beautifies everything? I cannot tell; but at all events, it was so far undeveloped, that, like the strain of melody which pours through the whole of a fine composition, giving a tone of richness and sweetness to every part, it was undistinguishable from the rest, felt and known to be there as a thing separate and alone, and yet inseparable.

Whenever she tried to distinguish it, fear seized upon her, and she flew away again. Why was she happy, when all that she had heard was the most likely to render her otherwise? She did not know, she would not know; but still she gave way to the feeling, although she would not give way to the thought; and while she shrunk from clothing her own sensations in distinctness, longed to render them distinct, that she might enjoy them more fully.

"I will go and seek Isabella," she said at length, "she must know of this; and then we can all consult together, perhaps, if one can but teach her light gay heart to be prudent and discreet—and yet," she continued, thoughtfully, "she has, perhaps, more worldly wisdom than myself, more knowledge of life and all life's things. Those who are accustomed to commune much with their own thoughts, gain, I am afraid, a conceit in their own opinion, which makes them undervalue those which are formed upon a practical knowledge of the world. Isabella is full of resources, and, perhaps, may devise many means that would never strike me."

These thoughts passed through her mind as she was approaching the house, and very soon after she stood in her cousin's dressing-room, finding her, even at that early hour, up and partly dressed.

"Why, dearest Mary," exclaimed Isabella, "where have you got all those roses? The morning air must be very good for the health, as every one says, to change your cheek, which was yesterday as pale as twilight, into the very aspect of the dawn."

"I have been out walking on the terrace, more than an hour," replied Mary, "and I was pale yesterday, I suppose, from the fright of the night before. I have had a companion too, Isabella," she continued gayly, though her voice trembled a little; "Captain Hayward came up and joined me, and told me all his adventures of the night before."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Miss Slingsby, "his adventures must be very wild and singular, I suppose; for his is just the spirit to seek them, and to make the most of them when he has got them. But what has happened since, Mary? We had all the details, you know, up to the period at which, like Don Quixote, he arrived at an inn."

"I do not think there is anything in the least like Don Quixote about him, Isabella," replied Mary Clifford, gravely; "if he seeks adventures, it is for the advantage of others."

"So did Don Quixote," replied her cousin, giving her a sly smile; "but what did he say, dear cousin?"

"Oh, there was a great deal beside what you heard last night," replied Miss Clifford, "you only had the sketch, the picture is still to be filled up, and he had better do it for himself. However, I have other things to talk to you about, Isabella, of more importance;" and she glanced at the maid that was arranging her mistress's hair.

"I shall be ready in a minute," answered Miss Slingsby; "make haste, Minette, I think you have been longer than usual this morning."

The maid, however, had a thousand reasons to give for being longer, all perfectly valid in her own estimation; and, whether out of spite, or in the hope that the two young ladies would grow tired of waiting and say plainly all they had to say, I cannot tell, but she contrived to occupy a full quarter of an hour more in dressing her mistress's hair. Those who calculate upon the difficulty of carrying a secret are rarely mistaken; but in this case Mademoiselle Minette did not arrive at her end. Mary said nothing more; and, at length, the girl was dismissed, and the two cousins were left alone together.

"In the name of fortune!" exclaimed Miss Slingsby, as soon as the maid was gone; "what solemn thing have you got to tell? Has he proposed already? On my word, it is a very speedy declaration."

Mary colored like a rose, but answered gravely, "Dear Isabella, how can you be so light? If you speak of Captain Hayward, our conversation has been upon very different subjects, and was a very serious one. I am afraid I shall have to distress you, Isabella, as much or more, than his information distressed me."

"I hope not," replied Isabella. "I did not know at all that he was a distressing person. I always thought him a very pleasant fellow, and imagined you thought so too, dear cousin; but how has he contrived to distress you?"

"Why, by some news of no very pleasant character," answered Mary Clifford, "he overheard, accidentally it seems, some conversation relating to your father, from which he learned some particulars that grieve me greatly to hear."

"Indeed!" cried Miss Slingsby, with a start; "they are not going to shoot at him, I hope?"

"Oh, dear, no," replied Mary, "nothing of that kind; but about his affairs generally."

"Well, speak out boldly, Mary, dear," answered her cousin, "I see you are going round the matter, love, for fear of vexing me; tell it at once, whatever it may be. You know I have a bold heart, not easily put down; and, though you judge me light and thoughtless, I know, believe me, Mary, it is more a necessity of my situation than anything else. If I were to think by the hour together over all the things that are unpleasant to me, as you or my dear aunt would do, I should only kill myself without altering them. Papa has his own ways, which were formed before I was born; and coming so late in the day, I don't think I have any right to meddle with them. I get out of the way of all that is disagreeable to me as much as I can; and, when I can't, like a good, dutiful daughter, I submit. You know that he is, to use our good old gardener's expression, 'as kind as flowers in May;' and I should be very ungrateful if I teased him by constantly opposing habits which I cannot change, and which are my elder brothers and sisters. My philosophy may be a bad one, but pray leave it to me, Mary, for I could not be happy with any other."

Mary Clifford took her cousin's hand and pressed it kindly in her own; "I would not take it from you for the world," she said, "for I know and understand all you feel, and am quite well aware that you are performing the first of duties in endeavoring to make your father's house as happy for him as you can, while you don't suffer your own mind and manners to be tainted by customs you do not approve. You have had a hard part to play, dear cousin, and you have played it well; but it is not upon these subjects I come to speak to you, but upon one, which, though perhaps of less vital importance, unfortunately affects the happiness of this life more. Your father's means and fortunes, which I am sorry to say, from all I hear, are very much embarrassed."

"Good heavens! what do you mean?" exclaimed Isabella, gazing anxiously in her face; and Mary went on as delicately as she could to tell her all that Ned Hayward had communicated. At first the poor girl seemed overwhelmed, exclaiming, "A week before they call for such a large sum! six weeks before the whole is finally gone from us! Good heavens, Mary, what is to be done?"

In a moment, however, she rallied: "Well," she exclaimed, "I have been very blind—as blind as a great politician, Mary. A thousand things should have prepared me for this that I now recollect, letters, and messages, and intimations of various kinds. That sleek knave, Wharton, is at the bottom of it all; but he shall not crush me; and I dare say we shall do very well with what is left. I have jewels and trinkets of my own, and poor mamma's, to keep house for a long time; and there must be something left out of the wreck."

"But the thing is, if possible, to prevent the ship from being wrecked at all," answered Mary Clifford; and she then went on to tell all that Captain Hayward proposed to do, in order to prevent any immediate catastrophe, not trusting her voice to comment upon his conduct for a moment.

But Isabella did it for her, "Oh, dear, kind, generous fellow," she cried, "how I love him! Don't you, Mary? Although papa may have many bad and foolish friends, you see there are some noble and wise ones—but I'll tell you what, Mary, we'll go down and talk to him after breakfast, and we'll all consult and see what is to be done; we'll have a plot to serve papa, whether he will or not; and I declare Mr. Beauchamp shall be one of the conspirators."

"Just what I should propose," answered Mary Clifford; "for although you have known Mr. Beauchamp but a very short time—"

"A good deal longer than you have known Ned Hayward," answered Miss Slingsby with a smile.

"Nay, nay, pray do be serious, Isabella," answered her cousin; "I was going to say though we have known Mr. Beauchamp but a very short time, I do believe from various traits I have seen, I do think he is an amiable and kind-hearted man, though perhaps somewhat cold and stately."

"Oh, he may be warm enough for aught we know," replied Miss Slingsby, "but there is the breakfast bell; papa will be down and want his coffee."

CHAPTER XIX.

THE STRUGGLE NEAR THE RIVER.

Nobody could perceive at the breakfast-table that Sir John Slingsby had suffered from the strong emotions by which we have seen him influenced on the preceding night. No one could have conceived that his state and fortune were in the tottering condition which Ned Hayward had represented. He was as gay, as happy, as full of jest and merriment, as a schoolboy of seventeen. And as his sister was peculiarly cheerful, it seemed to excite in him even a more merry and jocund liveliness. To say the truth, Mrs. Clifford felt that her bond was broken; that her visit to her brother's house, and her stay with him, had unlinked one of the chains of cold and formal proprieties which had been wound round her for so many years. Heaven knows, she never wished to see, hear, or do, think, or countenance anything that was evil; but yet her heart felt freer and lighter—it had more room to expand. In fact the sunshine of early days seemed to be reflected upon it, and it opened out to the light like a flower. She was gayer than her daughter, though silent and still, except when called into conversation by some lively sally; but she smiled, was good-humored, and answered even merrily, when a jest passed round, and seemed to wonder at the more than wonted gravity of her Mary. Isabella was almost too gay; as gay as the habits of the world and her own sense of propriety permitted; but, to an observing eye, this cheerfulness was rather assumed than real; and to any one who, like Mary, had the secret of her heart, it was very evidently affected to cover a deeper and a graver current beneath.

"Well, what's the news this morning?" said Sir John, as Isabella poured out the tea and coffee; "a quarter to nine and no tidings stirring? This seems to promise a dull day. Nobody's mill burnt down? Nobody's cat killed? Nobody's wife eloped? Nobody's daughter gone to Gretna-green? Nobody's house been broken open, game stolen, hen-roosts been plundered, pocket been picked, or nose been pulled? Faith we shall never get through the four-and-twenty hours without something to enliven us. All the objects of country life are gone. It seems to me that the world has turned as dead as a horsepond, and men and women nothing but the weed at the top, waiting coolly in green indifference for the ducks to come and gobble them up. Lack-a-day! lack-a-day! if we had but Ned Hayward here to cheer us up! What can have become of him?"

"Oh, he has come back, my dear uncle," replied Mary; "I saw him up on the terrace as I was taking my morning's walk."

"Then why is he not here?" exclaimed Sir John Slingsby, "why is he absent from his post? What business has he at Tarningham Park, unless it be like a ray of the summer sunshine to make everything gay around him?"

"He told me that he was going down to catch a trout," replied Miss Clifford; "he has some bet with you, my dear uncle, it seems!"

"The boy is mad! irretrievably gone! Bedlam or Saint Luke's, or some of those places they call a private asylum, is the only place for him now," exclaimed Sir John Slingsby; "what, gone down to catch a trout, without pausing to take either rest or breakfast, with his hands burnt and a shot in his arm—so that fellow Gimlet said, they tell me."

"He seemed very well," answered Miss Clifford; "and he said he had his breakfast before he left the inn."

"I don't believe a word of it," answered her uncle; "that's just one of his old tricks, Mary; if there was anything to be done, he used never to mind breakfast, or dinner, or supper, or anything else; the matter was always done first, and then he did not mind a good dinner and a bottle of claret, or even two, as the case might be. I never saw such a fellow! We used to call him 'thoughtless Ned Hayward;' but the fact is, he used to think more in five minutes than the rest of us altogether in four-and-twenty hours, and then he was free for the whole day—but here come the letters, and papers; we shall have some news now, and we shall have something to laugh at, with, or because of."

Thus saying, Sir John took the bag which was brought to him by the butler, opened it with a key attached to his watch-chain, and drew forth the articles it contained, one by one. First came a newspaper in its cover—it was, I suppose, the Times, by its bulk—then another and another. All these were laid down beside him; and next came the small packet of letters, and then, oh! how eager all were to devour the contents. Strange and mysterious mixture of old rags and size, what a world of emotions have you conveyed about this earth! Not the most terrible stage that has ever represented to the eyes of admiring thousands the works of the poet, or displayed the skill of the actor, has produced such deep tragedy as you. How often has the sight of the thin folded sheet, with its strange, crooked, black hieroglyphics, overwhelmed the lightest and the gayest heart with heaviness and mourning! how often changed the smile into the tear! how often swept away the gay pageants of imagination, and memory, and hope, and left the past all darkness, and the future all despair! But, on the contrary, how often have ye been the unexpected messengers of happiness and joy! how often have ye brought sunshine and light into the benighted breast! how often dispelled in a moment the dark thunder-clouds of the world's blackest storms,—ay, and sometimes, too, have closed, as with a lightning-flash, the black tempestuous day of a long sorrowful life, with a gleam of ecstasy, too intense and potent to survive!

All eyes turned eagerly to Sir John Slingsby, while he looked over the letters. The first was in a stiff and clerk-like hand, which he put down beside him with a low chuckle, which probably indicated an intention of not reading it at all. The next displayed a scrawl, written as if with a butcher's skewer, thin, straggling, and irregular, like the scratching of a hen in the last agony. That met the fate of the former one. Then came an address in a good, bold, dashing hand, with a name written in the corner.

"Ah, ah!" cried he, "from Tom South, about the borough of Twistandskin. Before I stand, I'll see him—Lord bless me, what was I going to say?" and putting his hand to his mouth, he looked to his sister with a low laugh; but that letter was put at a little distance from the two others. "Ah! Mr. Beauchamp, here is one for you," continued the baronet, "sent up with the postmaster's compliments! damn his compliments! who wants his compliments?" and he gave the letter over to Beauchamp, who was sitting at the opposite side of the table next his daughter. "My dear Harriet, do try that pasty, it is excellent; or take something, in the name of Heliogabalus; this is not a fast-day, is it? There's the best ham that ever came out of Yorkshire, on the side-board. There, Isabella, there's an epistle for you, from one of your sweet, maudlin, blond and satin friends in London, as soft and insipid as a glass of orgeat, I'll answer for it; full of loves, and dears, and sweet friends, and languishing for your darling society, and wondering what you can be doing in the country, spending your beauty on the desert air. Don't let me hear a word of it; I hate them all; and, if I had my will, would smother them all to death under eider-down quilts. Pray read your letter, Mr. Beauchamp. Everybody in this world is anxious to read their letters but me; and as yours may very likely require an answer, you had better look at it at once; for one post here goes out at eleven."

Now, Sir John Slingsby, in the latter part of his speech, showed himself considerate; for Mr. Beauchamp, during the first part of breakfast, had borne a very grave and business-like air. He had given himself up, it is true, to a more cheerful spirit on the day before; he had been calmly cheerful at dinner; gay in the evening; especially when he was near Miss Slingsby. But who is not gay in the evening hours, when the whole nervous fluid seems to have accumulated about the brain and the heart, when the anticipated, or actual labors of the day are over, the apportioned task of care and anxiety is done? The load of the four-and-twenty hours is thrown off, and we snatch at the brief portion that remains between labor and repose for enjoyment. Who is not gay, when beauty and cheerfulness pour their mingled rays upon us, flooding our feelings and our thoughts with a bright, happy, and congenial stream? Take a glass of iced-water, dear reader—as cold as you will, so that it be not actually frozen—and pour into it a merry glass of warm champagne; see how it will sparkle and dance up to the brim; and, unless the heart of man is a mass of ice indeed, such will be the effect upon it of mere association with youth, beauty, and innocent gayety.

But since then, Beauchamp had slept upon the matter. The night before he had gone on with the current; and now time had been afforded him to ask himself how far that current had carried him. He was doubtful whether he had not been borne too far; there were doubts, hesitations, apprehensions in his mind; and he was grave—very grave indeed. He had wished Miss Slingsby good-morning, he had expressed a hope she had rested well, he had been most gracefully courteous—too courteous; for very polished surfaces are generally cold; and Isabella, who had come down with the intention of speaking to him frankly and freely upon matters that interested her deeply, had shrunk into herself more than was her wont.

Beauchamp opened the letter, however, with rather a languid and unexpectant air, but the first words seemed to rivet his attention. The eye of Isabella, without her will, or rather against it, fixed upon him. She saw his cheek turn pale, then glow again warmly, and then a glad and well-satisfied smile curled his lip. He ended the letter, and, looking toward the ceiling, his lips moved for an instant, and folding up the paper, he put it in his pocket, giving way for a few seconds to thought, which did not seem unsatisfactory.

Isabella Slingsby was the most straightforward girl in the world, by nature; and she had but one class of experimental teaching in regard to concealing her feelings. She could hide, occasionally, how much she disliked some of her father's guests; she could conceal from him how painful to her was much that she saw under his own roof. In everything else, however, she was frank as the day; and, seeing Mr. Beauchamp receive a letter, and look not discontented with it, she said, somewhat inconsiderately:

"You seem to have had pleasant intelligence, Mr. Beauchamp!"

That gentleman turned his eyes suddenly upon her, and very fine and lustrous eyes they were, and he gazed at her for an instant with a smile so blended with many emotions, that Isabella, she knew not why, cast down her eyes, and colored. After a brief pause, he replied:

"Not unpleasant, Miss Slingsby; for so strange a thing is the heart of man, or, rather I should say, so strange a thing is his fate, that, in the course of years and with the change of circumstances, there will be pleasure even in the total ending of what were once bright hopes. The things we coveted and obtained, in the world's variation become burdensome to us; as, at the end of a long day's journey, we lay down with relief the weight which, at the outset, we carried with joy or pride."

"That is because men are so fickle, I suppose," answered Isabella. "The only constant beings on earth are women and Newfoundland dogs, Mr. Beauchamp—it is so, I assure you, whatever you may think of it. I know the wicked world takes a different view of the subject; but the world is man's; and woman might very well say a different picture would be produced, 'if we lions were painters!'"

"Nay," said Beauchamp, laughing, "I am not one of those evil speakers and slanderers. I have had time to observe in the world where I have been these many years as a mere spectator, watching the characters of men and women; and I can justly say, that there are, at least, ten good women for one good man. Circumstances may have something to do with it; education, opportunity for good or evil; but still there must be a fine and pure spirit at the heart, teaching to avoid evil and to seek good."

"I believe, in truth, there is," answered Mrs. Clifford, joining in the conversation; "and that the bent of almost every woman's mind is toward that which is right. But if you are the creatures of circumstances, Mr. Beauchamp, we are, in many respects the creatures of your hands; you give the bent and the direction of somewhat more than half our thoughts, I am afraid, and are—"

"To be blamed, if you go wrong," exclaimed Sir John Slingsby, with a loud laugh; "to be sure; that is a woman's philosophy, my dear Harriet; all that she does good is her own, all that she does wrong is man's; but let me tell you, my dear sister, that there is no little doubt, in the minds of the best informed, which has the most influence; man over woman, or woman over man. I am of the last opinion; and I see it every day in my case and that of others; here this girl, Isabella, rules me with a rod of iron, does anything she likes with me; but, by my faith, for this day I shall abstract myself from her authority; for I have business to settle during the morning; and she must entertain her guests as she can. Mr. Beauchamp, if you leave my house during the next four-and-twenty hours, it will be a clear proof that Miss Slingsby does not entertain you properly; and I shall be very angry with her inhospitality, if I do not find you at lunch and dinner, tea, and supper, and breakfast to-morrow morning; for I shall be quite sure she has not made my house agreeable."

"An imputation that I should be the last to bring upon Miss Slingsby," said Mr. Beauchamp; and in truth he seemed to feel what he said; for when they rose from the breakfast-table, and the party sauntered to the window, in that pleasant indolence which generally succeeds the first meal of the day—that five minutes that succeeds to breakfast, in short, before we put on the armor of active exertion—he attached himself closely to Miss Slingsby's side, engaged her in conversation so light and cheerful, that the whole character of the man seemed changed. Not that what he said was without thought; for there was a deep undercurrent of reflection running all the time, which gave it quite a different tone from what is called small-talk. It was sparkling, brilliant, even playful; but its principal effect on the minds of those who heard was to set them thinking. There was a marked attention in his manner toward Isabella Slingsby, which flattered her a little. She might have perceived before that he was struck with her beauty, that he admired her, that he liked her society, when he had twice or thrice met her at Dr. Miles's. She had thought him exceedingly agreeable, and had fancied that he thought her so too; but there had been nothing said or done—not one word, one look, one gesture, that could set imagination flying any further, and she had rested satisfied with letting things take their course, without any other feeling than a slight degree of regret that her father had not made the acquaintance of one so superior in manners and in mind to the generality of those around. During the preceding evening, Beauchamp had appeared in no other character than that of the calm, dignified, quiet, and well-informed gentleman. But after breakfast his attentions were more pointed; and Isabella felt a little agitated, and doubtful of what all this would come to. She was not fond of anything that agitated her: and, therefore, somewhat more abruptly than was necessary, she broke through the conversation that was going on, saying:

"Mr. Beauchamp, Mary and I have entered into a compact to go down and see Captain Hayward win his bet."

"What bet?" asked Beauchamp, who had forgotten all about it.

"To catch the largest trout in the river before twelve o'clock," replied Isabella; "will you escort us? My dear aunt, won't you come too?"

"No, my dear," answered Mrs. Clifford; "I have letters to write, too, like your father."

"I have no letters to write," exclaimed Sir John Slingsby, somewhat petulantly; "I wish I had nothing less pleasant to do; but I have to see the steward and a damned lawyer about business—the greatest bores on the earth. I wish to heaven Peter the Great had been autocrat of England for but one bare month. Heaven and earth! how he would have thinned the roll of attorneys! or if we could but bring them under the cutting and maiming act, what hanging and transporting we should have. I am sure they cut up our time and our comforts, maim our property, and cripple our resources. But the devil never abandons his own; and so they slip out of every noose that is made to catch them. There's that fellow, Stephen Gimlet, can make, they say, springes that will catch woodcocks and snipes, hares, pheasants, partridges, ruffs, and rees; hang me, if I don't ask him if he has not got any trap that will strangle an attorney."

"If he fails, ask Ned Hayward," said Isabella, half-jokingly, half-earnestly; "I have no doubt he would furnish you with what you want."

"Perhaps he would, perhaps he would," answered Sir John; "not a bad thought, Bella: but hang it, I must go and see the steward before that fellow Wharton comes. So good-bye, good-bye, for the present. Mind the luncheon time; and if Ned loses and does not bring me home a trout of at least three pounds, we'll drink his health in a bottle of the old hermitage—get your shawls and bonnets, get your shawls and bonnets; and now, Harriet, if you want to send over to your place, be quick with your letters, for I have got a man going to Tarningham at twelve."

Mrs. Clifford left the room with her brother, and was followed immediately by her daughter and niece. Beauchamp walked out into the hall, and got his hat, gave some directions to one of the servants in regard to sending up some of his clothes from the inn at Tarningham, when anybody was sent down to the town; and then returned to the window of the breakfast-room. There he paused and looked out, revolving various things in his mind, and coming to the half-muttered conclusion, at length: "It must be so, it is quite clear—it is certain." But when any one determines that a thing is quite clear, is certain, before we agree with him in opinion, we should know what other trains of thought are going on in his mind at the moment, jostling this idea and that out of their right places, leaving others far behind, and stimulating others again to run at lightning speed, the Lord knows whither, to win their race. It is not at all impossible, that if you or I, dear reader, could see into Mr. Beauchamp's mind at this moment, we might come to a very different conclusion on the premises, and think that the proposition was anything but quite clear, the result not at all certain.

However that might be, there he stood with his hat in his hand, in very good spirits, when Miss Slingsby and her cousin appeared.

Isabella was rather fluttered, as we have said, about something or another; she felt a timidity that was not usual with her, and she got her cousin between herself and Mr. Beauchamp before they reached the door, as if she intended that he should offer Mary Clifford his arm. Beauchamp manœuvred so skillfully, however, that before they were through the door and down the steps, he was by Isabella's side again, and, as she had two sides, one of which was certain to be unprotected, while that side was almost certain to be the point of attack to a dextrous enemy, she gave up the battle at once, and let things take their course.

The walk, as Isabella managed it, was an exceedingly pleasant one. In the first place, there were the beauties of nature. To what heart, under what circumstances, do the beauties of nature fail to bring sweet feelings? There is something in the universe, of which we have no definite conception; perhaps, it is too universal, too wide, too vast, to submit itself to anything like demonstration. We all feel it, we all know it, we all enjoy it. The ancients and some of the moderns have deified it, and called it Pan. It is, in fact, the universal adaptation of one thing to another: the harmony of all God's works; the infinite music of an infinite variety. It is figured in music—faintly figured; for music is only the image of the whole by a part; the sequence of bright things is the melody of creation; their synchronous existence, the harmony of God's almighty will. But in this, as in all else, woe be unto those who have worshiped the creature for the Creator, and who have mistaken this great harmony in the infinity of created things, for the Godhead itself. It is but one of the expressions of Almighty love, and those expressions are as infinite as the love from which they emanate. It is our finite, our contracted, our exceedingly minute view of all things, that constantly keeps us down from the contemplation and the conception of the immeasurable, to that which is within the ken of our own microscopic vision. If creation itself is infinite, the infinite harmony thereof is but a part of creation, and is in itself a proof of that intelligent Providence, which man denies, because he does not see.

The walk was an exceedingly pleasant one, coming in varied scenes upon the mind, each contrasted with the other, yet each harmonizing beautifully. After about a hundred and fifty or two hundred yards of short turf they entered a glade, where tall trees, backed by deep shrubs, cut off the sunbeams, except where here and there they struggled through an open spot. Tall beeches, more than a century old, crossed their arms above to give shade to the ground below, and though the walk, nearly fifty feet in breadth from bole to bole of the old trees, was mown along its whole extent, yet a little to one side and the other, the wild flowers appeared gemming the earth like stars upon a firmament of green. There was the purple columbine and the blue periwinkle, and the yellow primrose, and the pale bending anemone; the hyacinth and the violet; and if art had had any share therein, the arrangement of the flowers was so skillfully managed, that all seemed owing but to nature's hand. The deep branches of the beech, and the green shade that they cast through the air, gave a solemn and elevating tone to the whole. The flowers and the occasional burst of sunshine, the rich colors of the moss, yellow, and brown, and green, enlivened the scene, and made the solemn stillness of the long avenue seem like a thoughtful countenance brightened by a smile. Then, suddenly, when they had walked on for about a quarter of a mile, they turned to the left through a wide break in the alley, and all was wonderfully changed. Shade and melancholy were gone; and they stood upon the edge of a round sloping descent of some three or four hundred feet covered with green short turf, and marked out, at short distances, by chumps of birches and hawthorns. On the right was the woody crest of the hill, concealing in its bosom the continuation of the avenue, which they had just quitted; but on the left, wide over the tree-tops and waving ground beyond, stretched out an extensive prospect in the sunshine, all light and loveliness. It was one of the bright days of early summer. Scarcely a cloud was in the sky, and yet there was a softening effect in the atmosphere, which mellowed the lights and shades into each other, and suffered the light to pass softly and gently from each line of the distance to that which succeeded with a sort of dreamy pleasure, vague and indefinite, but very sweet, like the sounds that sometimes come upon our sleeping ears in the visions of the morning.

Skirting along the hill with a gradual descent, the broad gravel-walk plunged into the valley, and there all was altered once more. A wide and uncultivated wood swept round, a small sparkling rivulet, dashing on toward the broader stream, amid bushes, and shrubs, and water-plants; a willow here and there bending down its long, pliant branches over the glittering stream, and a patch of tall bulrushes raising their long green stems, where any occasional interruption occasioned the water to spread out. The trees were far apart, though the ground was broken and uneven, and the flapping wing of a heron, with his gray shadowy form rising up at some fifty or sixty yards' distance, added to the saddening and sombering effect. It was like a discord in a fine piece of music: just protracted long enough to make what had gone before and what followed after more delightful, and the next minute they issued forth upon the warm green meadows, gilded with buttercups, that lay by the side of the wider river.

Heaven only knows what Isabella meant in bringing Beauchamp by that path, if she did not intend him to make love to her. She could have taken him round by the other side of the house, and the straight horse-road to the bridge, or down over the turf through the open parts of the park, among the deer and fern to the further end of the river, where it issued out of the grounds. But no, whether from something that was going on in her own bosom, which made her instinctively choose the scenes that most assimilated with her feelings, or from accident, caprice, or design, she led him through a path full of the sense of love. There was one too many for a declaration, it is true; and she knew she was so far guarded; but yet it was a very dangerous walk for any two people, whose hearts had no better security than the simple presence of another, to stray along upon such a day as that.

The letter, which Beauchamp had received at breakfast, had evidently either pleased, or entertained, or relieved him; but the effect was, that he was infinitely gayer when he set out than he had ever been since we have first met with him. He crossed the open ground by Isabella's side with a firmer and more elastic step, with his head high and his shoulders back, he gazed over the wide-spread park scenery around, and seemed to snuff the air like a horse about to start upon a race. He commented upon the loveliness of such views, remarked how very English they were—how very seldom one ever saw anything similar in any other land—and seemed to enjoy the whole so highly, as to leave an impression that the pleasure of the walk was heightened by the society in which it was taken. When he came under the shade of the tall trees his tone was somewhat changed, it became softer, more serious, more earnest; and so he went on, his thoughts seeming to receive a coloring from the scenery through which he passed, without losing their general character, or particular train for the moment. It was evident through all that he was thinking of Isabella Slingsby; and though, with finished courtesy, he divided his conversation very equally—not quite—between her and her cousin, yet even when he was speaking to Mary Clifford, it was very evident that his words, or, at all events, his thoughts, were addressed to Isabella.

Mary said little, except just to keep up the conversation and deprive it of anything like awkwardness; but she felt, and indeed nobody could help feeling, that Mr. Beauchamp's manner toward her cousin was too marked and particular to be mistaken. Isabella, on her part, gave way to all the gayety of her heart, sometimes with bright and laughing sallies playing round Beauchamp's more earnest and deep-toned thoughts, sometimes yielding to the impulse which she imparted, and venturing into the deep waters of feeling and reflection, whither he led her, till startled at herself she took fright and retreated. She was very happy, too; secure in Mary's presence from anything that might agitate or alarm, she felt that she could give way to the pleasure of the moment; and even the knowledge of her father's situation, and of the dangers and difficulties that beset him, acted but as a softening and subduing power, which brought down her spirits from their habitual gayety, and rendered her heart more susceptible of tenderer and deeper impressions

Beauchamp felt that he was listened to, that he pleased, that he might be beloved. He had seen nothing coquetish about Isabella; he had heard a high character of her; he had been told by one, who had known her from childhood, that she seemed lighter than she really was; that if there was anything assumed, it was the gayety; that all the more profound things that occasionally appeared in her character, might be trusted and relied upon, and that the seemingly high spirits were but as the breeze, that ruffled the tree-tops without touching the depth of the forest. He felt sure, therefore, that she would not sport with him, if she believed he was in earnest, and he took care, that upon that subject she should have little doubt.

Thus passed away their walk; and though Mary Clifford would have given a great deal, had she dared to venture, to make Mr. Beauchamp a sharer in the secret of Sir John Slingsby's affairs, and asked the advice and assistance of one who had evidently gained much experience of the world, without being spoiled by the world, yet she knew not how to begin; a feeling of timidity came over her that stopped her; and the course of the conversation—its sparkling rapidity at some times, its deep and intense feelings at others—gave no opportunity of introducing a subject entirely discordant, without forcing it in a manner both harsh and discourteous. She determined, therefore, as they approached the river, to leave the matter to Captain Hayward, whose frank straightforwardness, she thought, would soon either find or make an opportunity.

When they reached the bank, however, Captain Hayward was not to be seen; but Isabella pointed to an elbow of the wood, which concealed a turn in the stream, saying that he was most likely higher up, and accordingly they walked on. As they were passing through the little path that cut through an angle of the woodland, they heard suddenly a loud exclamation, then a very ungentlemanly oath, and the next moment, as they issued forth, they saw Ned Hayward grappling with a tall, powerful man, in what may be called a semi-military dress. The two were, apparently, well matched, though few, either in strength, activity, or skill, could match our friend. But the stranger, whoever he was, practiced a trick, which he thought likely to free himself from his adversary, even at the risk of his own life. He struggled hard, and in the struggle drew toward the brink. Ned Hayward made a violent effort to resist the impulse, and most likely would have been successful; for if anything, he was the stronger man of the two. But a part of the green turf gave way, undermined by the course of the current, and both plunged in together into a deep pool, and disappeared for an instant in the water.

CHAPTER XX.

A MAP is a very useful thing: I wonder what people did without it before it was invented. Yet there were great travelers in those days, too, both by land and water. Adam began the first, and Noah the second, and they managed very well without either chart or compass, so that it it is evident these instruments are nothing but luxuries, and ought to be done away with. Nevertheless, I feel that I should be better off, and so would the reader too, if I could give here, on this page, a map of the county of ——, just to show him the relative position of the place called Buxton's Inn and the little village of Coldington-cum-Snowblast, which lay nearly northwest of Buxton's Inn, and at the distance, by the road, of about six miles. The innkeepers charged seven miles' posting, because it was the seventeenth part of a furlong beyond the six miles. However, a dreary little village it was, situated on one of the two roads to London, which was indeed somewhat shorter than the other, but so hilly, so tiresome, so bleak, and so stiff, as the postboys termed it, that man and beast alike preferred the other road, and generally went to and from Tarningham by Buxton's Inn. Nevertheless, it was absolutely necessary that a pair or two of posters should be kept at Coldington, as that was the only direct road to several considerable towns; and though it was only an eight-mile stage, yet the cattle, when they had got over the hills, had no inclination to go farther. The post-horses had engendered a public house, which was designated by courtesy an inn, but it was a very solitary one, with very few visitors but those who took a glass of beer or spirits at the bar, and a chance mercantile traveler, who came to supply the two shops that ornamented the village, and slept there for the night.

At a very early hour of the morning, however, on the day of which we have just been speaking, a post-chaise drew up to the door with horses from Buxton's Inn, and a fresh relay was immediately ordered to carry the travelers on toward Bristol. A tall, powerful, showily-dressed man got out with a lady closely veiled, whose costume spoke of Parisian manufacture; and while the portmanteaus and other articles of baggage were being taken into the doorway till they could be placed upon the new chaise, the gentleman paid the postboy, and then asked if he was going back directly.

"In about an hour, sir," replied the man, touching his hat, with the look of one well satisfied with his fee.

But at this reply the traveler looked blank, and said, "Well, it does not matter. I must get some lad to run over across the moor with this note to Mr. Wittingham. Just see for some one, my good fellow. He shall have half-a-crown for his pains."

But the postboy was not such a goose as to let the half-crown slip by him, and, with the most respectful air in the world, he assured the gentleman that he was quite ready to go that minute, and that he had only proposed to stay an hour because he did not know—how should he?—that the other wanted to send back.

The note and the half-crown were immediately given, the postboy got into his saddle again; resisted the soft entreaties of the ostler to take a glass of something, and trotted away. No sooner was he gone, however, in the full persuasion that ere a quarter of an hour was over his two travelers would be on their way to Bristol, than the gentleman he left behind seemed to have suddenly changed his mind.

The horses were countermanded, a room up stairs looked at, some breakfast ordered, and there he and his fair companion seemed disposed to pass the day. After a short but hearty breakfast, which was crowned by a glass of brandy, upon the strength of such an early drive, the gentleman himself sallied forth, saying to the lady, "I must see that fellow Stephen, and find out if he has peached. If he has, we had better get over the water for a while, at all events; though they can prove nothing, I am sure."

"You will take your rash, wild ways, love," answered the lady, in a languid tone; "and then you are sure to get into a scrape." But the gentleman did not wait for the end of the admonition, leaving the room and shutting the door behind him.

We will stay with the lady, however, and a very pretty woman she was, though, indeed, there had been a time when she was prettier. She was certainly not less than three or four-and-thirty, with good, small features, and a complexion which had once been exceedingly fine. It had become somewhat coarse now, however, and looked as if the process of deterioration had been assisted by a good deal of wine, or some other stimulant perhaps still more potent. Her eyes were fine dark eyes, but they had grown somewhat watery, and there was an occasional vacancy in them, a wandering uncertainty that bespoke either some intense preoccupation with other subjects than those immediately in question, or some failure of the intellect, either from temporary or permanent causes. Her figure was tall and fine, and her dress very handsome in materials and make; but yet there was a something about it too smart. There was too much lace and ribbon, too many bright and gaudy colors, too much flutter and contrast, to be perfectly ladylike. There was also a negligence in the way of putting it on—almost a slovenliness, if one may go that length, which made things nearly new look old and dirty.

Her air and manner, too, were careless and languid; and as she set herself down on one chair, then moved to another, and rested her feet upon a third, it seemed as if something was continually weighing upon her mind, which yet wanted vigor and solidity enough to make an effort to cast it off.

It was not that she seemed to mope at being left alone by her male companion, or that she felt or cared for his absence very much, although she evidently deemed his plans and purposes imprudent and perilous. Far from it; she was as gay, or perhaps gayer, when he was gone than before; sung a little bit of an Italian song, took a small note-book out of her bag and wrote in it some lines, which seemed, by their regular length, to be verses; and then, getting up again, she opened a portmanteau, brought out a book, and began to read. She had not continued long, however, when she seemed to become tired of that also, and putting back the book again, gave herself up to thought, during the course of which her face was chequered with slight smiles and slight frowns, neither of which had the most pleasant expression in the world. There was a littleness in it all, indeed, a sort of careless indolence, which, perhaps, bespoke a disposition hackneyed and spoiled by the pleasures, if not the pains of life. And there she sat, casting away from her everything but thought, as if there were nothing in the world valuable or important, except the little accidents, that might disturb or promote her own individual comfort. The maid who carried away the breakfast things informed the landlady, that "the woman up stairs was a-taking on it easy, a-sitting with her feet on one of the best chears." And although the good dame did not think fit to object to this proceeding, she mentally commented on it thus: "Them quality-folks is always giving themselves airs; but if she spiles my new kivers, I'll take it out in the bill, anyhow."

After this state of things had continued for somewhat more than an hour and a half, the gentleman came back, apparently in great haste, dripping like a Newfoundland dog, and, calling to the ostler before he ran up stairs, directed him to put-to the horses as soon as possible. Then, running up, he entered the room where he had left the lady, exclaiming, "Quick, Charlotte, we must be off like the devil!"

"Why, what's the matter, Moreton?" she said, without moving an inch. "You are dripping wet; you have met with some adventure."

"And something else, too," answered the gentleman. "I have met with that devil of a fellow again, and he recognized me and tried to stop me, but I pulled him into the river, and left him there, getting to the other bank, heaven knows how. All I am sure of is, that I kept his head under water for two or three minutes; for he fell undermost. But I have not time to talk more now, for we must go as if Satan drove us, and I will tell you more as we go along."

"I hope he's drowned," said the lady, with the sweetest possible smile; "it is an easy death, they say. I think I shall drown myself one day or other."

"Pooh!" said the gentleman. "But come along, come along! I have something to tell you of Charles; so make haste."

"Of Charles!" exclaimed the lady, starting up as if suddenly roused from a sort of stupor, while a look of intense and fiery malignity came into her face. "What of him? Have you seen him? Did he see you?"

"I don't know," answered her companion. "But come along;" and taking up one of the portmanteaus as the chaise drove up to the door, he hurried down, and sent up for the other. The lady followed with a quick step, drawing her veil over her face; for she now seemed to be all life and eagerness; and while the gentleman was paying the bill, she got into the chaise and beat the bottom of the vehicle with her small foot, as if impatient for his coming.

Before he could reach the door, after having paid the bill, however, a man on horseback galloped quickly up, and, springing to the ground, caught the gentleman by the arm, exclaiming, "Why, hang it, Moreton, you have played me a scurvy trick, to go off and leave me before it was daylight."

"I could not help it, my dear Wittingham," replied the other: "I was obliged to be off; there is a d—— cousin of mine down here whom I would not have see me for the world. You must not stop me now, by Jove; for they have found out where I am, and I expect him to pay his respects very soon."

"Devil take it! that's unfortunate," cried Wittingham; "I wanted you to go and call out that meddling scoundrel, Hayward, whom I told you of. He bolted into my room last night, and we had a regular set-to. I told him he was a blackguard, and he told me he had horsewhipped me once, and would horsewhip me again whenever he met me, if I could not get some gentleman of honor to arrange a meeting with him."

"Upon my life, I can't stay," cried the other, "though I should like to see you shoot him, too, if he is alive, which I have some doubts of—but stay," he continued, after a moment's thought, "I will find a man for you, and I will send him down without loss of time—Major Woolstapler; he has been lately in foreign service, but that's all the same, and he's a capital hand at these things; and, if you follow his advice, you will shoot your man to a certainty—he shall be down before three days are over; I am off for Bristol, and so up the Cath road to London. We shall get there to-night; and he will be down to-morrow or the next day early. He'll hear of you at Baxton's, I suppose. Good-bye, good-bye." And he jumped into the chaise.

A moment after, as soon as the door was shut, he seemed to recollect something, and putting his head out of the window he beckoned up young Wittingham, saying in a low voice, "You'll need the bull-dogs, so I'll send you down mine. Tell Woolstapler to contrive that you have number one. It will do his business if tolerably well handled—and I say, Wittingham, don't mention to any one that you have seen me either here or at Oxford. My cousin fancies I am in India still." Then turning to the postillion, he said, "Go on and brush along fast. Sixpence a mile for good going."

Never was such an intimation given to a postillion without the horses suffering for it. I actually once made a Bavarian go seven miles and a half an hour between Ulm and Augsburg by the same process. I record it as among the memorable events of my life, proudly satisfied that no man upon earth ever did the same either before or since. On the present occasion, the postillion, without fear, stuck his spurs into the horse's side, laid the whip over the back of the other with that peculiar kind of gentle application which intimated that if the brown-coated gentleman did not get on as hard as his four legs would carry him, the instrument of propulsion would fall more heavily the next time; and they went at a pace which was a canter up hill, a trot down, and a gallop over the flat. Captain Moreton leaned back in the chaise and murmured, "We've cut them, by Jove!"

"But what is to be the end of all this?" asked the lady, who seemed to be now thoroughly roused: "if that man is to go on forever having his own way I do not see anything that is to be gained. We cannot keep this up much longer, Moreton; and so you thought two days ago. I shall be compelled to come forward and claim the arrears of the annuity by actual want of money. You told me, when we were at the inn there, that you had but ten pounds left, and now you seem to take a different view of the subject. You men are certainly the most vacillating creatures in the world."

"Nay," answered Moreton, bowing his head with an air of persiflage, "ladies, it must be owned, are superior to us in that, as in everything else. Two or three months ago you seemed enchanted with your plan, and declared though it had not answered yet, it would answer in the end. I only thought it would not answer for want of means, otherwise I was as well disposed toward it as you could be. Now, on the contrary, you are eager to abandon it, while I wish to pursue it, for this simple reason: that I have got the means of carrying it on for some time at least, and see the greatest probability of success. You must recollect, my dear Charlotte, that this is not a matter where a few hundreds or a few thousand pounds are at stake, but many thousands a-year."

As usually happens—for nobody ever hears or attends to more, at the utmost, than the twentieth part of what is said to them, the lady's mind fixed upon one particular sentence without listening to anything more, and she repeated, as if contemplating and doubting, "You have got the means! You have the means!"

"Ay, indeed I have," answered Captain Moreton, with a smile; "I have got the means; for, while you were thinking I was doing nothing, I was shrewdly laying out my own plans, by which I have contrived to screw full five hundred pounds out of that terrible miser, Wharton. Was not that somewhat like a coup? With that we can live for some five or six months in Paris—economically, you know, my love—we must not have champagne and oysters every day; but we can do well enough; and before the time is out, the very event we wished to bring about will have happened; otherwise my name is not Moreton. I can see very well how matters are going. He is caught: for the first time in his life really and truly captivated; and, if we but take care to play our game well, he will be married and completely in our power within a few weeks. I know he will never be able to stand that; and there will but be one choice before him, either to buy you off at the highest possible price, or—"

"Buy me!" cried the lady; "if he had the diamond mines of Golconda, he could not buy me! If he could coin every drop of blood in his heart into a gold piece, I would see him mind them all to the very last, and then refuse them all with scorn and contempt. No, no, I will bring him to public shame and trial; I will make him a spectacle, have him condemned as a malefactor, break his proud spirit and his hard heart, and then leave him to his misery, as he has left me. For this I have toiled and longed; for this I have saved and scraped, like the veriest miser that ever worshiped Mammon in his lowest shape; for this I saved every sixpence, and lived in self-inflicted poverty and neglect, till I met you, Moreton, in order to hoard enough to keep me, till this revenge could be accomplished; and often, very often since, I have been tempted to curse you for having, by the extravagance you taught and practiced, squandered away the very means of obtaining all that I have longed and pined for."

"You speak in a very meek and Christian spirit," cried Captain Moreton, with a laugh; "but, nevertheless, I will not quarrel with it, Charlotte; for your revenge would serve my purposes too. If we could but get him to commit himself beyond recall, I am his next heir, you know, my dear; and, therefore, the sooner he goes to heaven or Botany Bay, the better for me—don't you think that we could contrive to get up a very well authenticated report of your death in one of the newspapers, with confirmations of all kinds, so as to leave no doubts in his mind?"

"Moreton, upon my life I believe you are a fool," cried the lady, bitterly; "would he not plead that as his excuse?—no, no, if I could so manage it, and, heaven or the devil send me wit, I care not which, to do it, I would contrive to make him fancy my death certain by small indications, such as none but himself could apply, and which, to the minds of others, would seem but frivolous pretexts if brought forward in his own justification. If you can help me to such a plan, I will thank you; if not, we must trust to fortune."

"Good faith! I see no means to accomplish that," cried Moreton.

"Now then, let us talk no more about it," answered the lady; and sinking back into the chaise, she relapsed into that state of seeming apathy, from which nothing but passion had the power to rouse her.

"By the way," said Captain Moreton, after about a quarter of an hour's consideration, while the chaise rolled rapidly along, "all those things that you had in Paris, clocks and chimney ornaments, and such like things, what has become of them?"

"Oh, they are of little value, Moreton," said the lady; "a thousand francs would buy them all; the worth would not last you ten minutes at roulette."

"No," answered Captain Moreton, taking no notice whatever of the bitterness with which she spoke; "but I was thinking they would be more serviceable at hazard."

"What do you mean?" she asked, abruptly, fixing her eyes upon him.

"I want to know where they are," answered Captain Moreton, in a cool tone.

"Why, you know very well," she answered sharply, "when I left Paris two years ago with you, I told the girl, Jeanette, to take care of them till I came back. I dare say she has pawned or sold them long ago."

"That is the very thing," cried Moreton, rubbing his hands. "We will away to Paris with all speed; you will keep quite close; I will find out Mamselle Jeanette, and give her intimation that she may sell the things to pay her own arrears of wages; for that her poor dear lady will never come back to claim them."

"I see the plan," replied the lady, "but I fear it will not answer, Moreton; I had been living, as you know, in seclusion for a year before, and the very means that I took to make him think me dead, will now frustrate your scheme for that purpose."

"I don't know that, Charlotte," answered her companion. "He has been making inquiries in Paris, I know; you were traced thither distinctly, and whether all clue was lost of your proceedings, neither I nor you can tell. But I'll tell you a story. When I was living at my father's place, he had a particularly fine breed of pheasants, which regularly every year disappeared about the 8th or 9th of October, without the possibility of proving that any one had been in the copses. One day, however, when I was out early in the morning, I saw a fine old cock, with his green and gold neck, walking along straight through a field toward the ground of a neighboring farmer. Every two or three seconds down went the pheasant's head, and on he walked again. I watched him for a few minutes over a hedge, then made my way through, put up the bird, and examined the spot where he had been. There I found a regular pheasant's footpath, and nicely strewed along it a line of barleycorns leading straight on to the farmer's ground, in the first hedge of which I found another portly bird fast by the neck in a springe. Now, my dear Charlotte, we'll strew some barleycorns, and perhaps we may catch your bird in the springe; I mean, we'll throw out such pieces of information as will lead to the certainty that you were in the Rue St. Jaques two years ago; we will get Jeanette to sell the things to pay her own wages, with the best reason to believe you are dead; and if what I have heard is true, all that you have so long aimed at will be accomplished before two months are over."

"I see, I see," answered the lady, and the chaise stopped to change horses.

CHAPTER XXI.

The quiet little town of Tarningham was more quiet than ever about the hour of twelve each day; for, according to good old primeval habits, noon was the period for feeding. Men ate, beasts ate, and birds ate, and we all know that eating is a silent process. It is the greatest mistake in the world for doctors to tell you to talk while you are eating, or else it is the bitterest sarcasm. They must either mean that your digestion should be spoiled, or else that you are in the habit of talking without thinking. But we will make a sort of corollary of it. "Man should not think when he is eating, man should not talk without thinking; ergo, man should not talk at his dinner." Therefore the people of Tarningham were wise; for never was there such a silent town at the hour of twelve o'clock, when they were eating. Doctor Miles could hear his own footfall with the most perfect distinctness, as he walked along the High-street; and a good broad foot it was, with a square-toed shoe and a buckle in it.

But Doctor Miles did not attend to the sound of his footfall; he was, indeed, busily thinking of something else, with his eyes bent down—but not his head—he rarely bent his head—holding it upright and straight, and a little stiff, by the natural effect of mind on body. His meditations were very deep, so much so, that it required an extraordinary apparition to rouse him from his reverie. The sight, however, of a human being in the streets of Tarningham a little after twelve, was quite enough to produce that effect; and at the distance of about two hundred yards from the door of the White Hart, he was startled by beholding the diminutive form and somewhat contorted person, of the poor little potboy, Billy Lamb, coming toward him with an empty jug in his hand. Nobody attended to Billy's meals. He got them how he could, where he could, and when he could. When all the rest were eating, he was sent with a jug of beer here, or a pint of gin there, and came back to feed upon the cold remnants of what the rest had eaten warm, if, indeed, they left him anything; but yet the fat landlord, ostlers, stable-boys, and barmaids, all thought that Billy was very well off. The landlord thought so, because he declared he had taken the boy in from charity; and the ostlers, and the postboys, and the barmaids believed it. O, charity! charity! thou perverted and misused term. Since the first words that were uttered by Adam in his garden, down to the moment when one of the world's great men declared that language was intended to conceal men's thoughts, no word in the whole dictionary has ever been applied to cover so many sins as thou hast. Thou art the robe of vanity every day; tricking it out in subscription lists, almshouses, hospitals; thou art the cloak of pride and haughtiness, the pretext of every petty tyrant who seeks a slave, the excuse of avarice, and greed, and narrow-mindedness—ever, ever coupled with a lie! In what human heart art thou ever found pure and unadulterated? The foul-mouthed slanderer of a neighbor's fame, who gives a sixpence to a beggar or a pound to an infirmary, is a charitable person. The scoffing sneerer at virtue he cannot imitate, who flings away money profusely for the sole gratification of a loose habit, is called charitable. The hard-hearted man who denies others their rights, or he who cheats his followers of their due reward, or he who grinds the faces of his workmen with excessive toil, or he who is harsh and stern in his own household, fierce and censorious to others, a despot with his wife, a tyrant with his children, dies, and, in a pompous will, bequeaths a portion of his ill-gotten wealth to build an asylum, and perpetuate his name, and is praised and honored as a charitable man.

That boy, forced to labor day and night, without consideration, without comfort, without a kind word, fed upon refuse, palleted on straw, yet doing more than the whole household altogether, was taken in from charity! Believe it, reader, if you can. For my part, I don't believe a word of it. I am quite sure that worthy Mr. Groomber wanted somebody particularly, of an active and willing disposition, to carry out the beer, and to attend to all those little matters which Mr. Groomber could not do himself, and which his servants did not choose to do, and that in taking in Billy Lamb for his own convenience, he persuaded himself, and tried to persuade the public too, that he was doing an act of charity. It is an extraordinary thing to consider how often in the great tragic farce of the world we are our own spectators; or, in other words, how continually, when we act a part, we consider ourselves one of the audience, and strive to deceive that individual the very first.

However that might be, there was Billy Lamb, the potboy, just before Doctor Miles, with an empty tankard in his hand; and the good doctor no sooner beheld him, than he stopped, and, in a kindly tone, asked him how the world went with him. Now Doctor Miles was a great man in the neighborhood; he had property of his own of not very great extent, but which rendered the living that he held but an accessory to his principal means of subsistence. He did not live by the altar, but for the altar; and there are no such keen drawers of distinctions as the lower classes. Of this thing all clergymen may be sure, that he who makes a trade of his profession, who exacts the uttermost penny which he has a right to, and something more, who increases burial fees, and makes broad the borders of all his dues, will always be held in contempt. Of the butcher, the baker, and the grocer, the lower orders expect such things. The exaction of a farthing on half-a-pound, more than is really just, they know is a part of the privileges of the knife, the oven, and the scales and weights. But with the ministers of a pure and holy religion, whose grand and fundamental principle is charity and abnegation of self, they expect a higher and a wider sense of benevolence, a more large and disinterested view of the relations of a pastor and flock. Thick must be the veil that covers from the eyes of the humble and the needy that greedy and grasping spirit which too frequently, like the ghoul of Eastern fable, preys among the sepulchres of the dead, and takes advantage of the moment of overwhelming distress and agony of mind, to urge the coarse claims of priestly avarice; claims, but too frequently, untenable in law and always barbarous, even when not illegal—dues which should be swept away forever, which should no longer exist as a constant source of heart-burning and complaint between pastor and people, making the one derive a portion of his living by laying a tax most onerous and hard to be borne, either upon the joys or the sorrows of his parishioners, and the others to look upon their teacher as one who sets at defiance the first principles of the Gospel that he preaches, following "avarice which is idolatry," and forgetting charity, "which covers a multitude of sins."

Luckily, both by position and inclination, Doctor Miles was exempt from all such reproaches. His necessities did not force him into meannesses, and his natural disposition would never have suffered him to fall into them, whatever his circumstances might have been. One heard nothing in his parish of enormous charges for a brick grave, swollen surplice-fees, that would make a cholera, a plague, or a pestilence so rich a harvest, that the minister who would pray in his desk against plague, pestilence, and famine, would be the grossest of hypocrites. He did not look upon his church-yard as the most valuable and productive part of his glebe, to be manured by the corpses of his parishioners, and bear a cent-per-cent. crop in monuments and grave-stones. The consecration of the bishop he did not look upon as fertilizing the land for his own enrichment, but contented himself with the bare amount of the moderate fee awarded by the law, and neither asked nor received a penny more. Many of the neighboring clergy called him a weak and prejudiced man, and exclaimed loudly against him for neglecting the interests, or, as they called them, "the rights of the church." But, somehow, his parishioners loved him, though he was rather an austere man, too, and never spared invective or exhortation in case of error and misconduct. The secret, perhaps, was, that they were convinced of his disinterestedness. He took from no man more than was his due; he required of no man more than he had the warrant of Scripture for requiring. His private fortune gave him the means of charity, and to that object all his private fortune was devoted. Every one in the neighborhood knew that Doctor Miles could have a finer house, could keep a better table, could maintain a smarter equipage; but at the same time, they were aware of two things, first, that his income was not as large as it might have been had he chosen to exact the uttermost farthing; and, secondly, that it was not for the purpose of hoarding his money that he did not spend it upon himself.

Thus Dr. Miles, as well may be conceived, was very much reverenced in the neighborhood; his rebukes were listened to, and sometimes taken to heart; his advice was sought and sometimes followed; his opinions were always respected, if his injunctions were not always obeyed; and his severity of manner was very well understood not to imply any real harshness of heart.

The cap was off Billy Lamb's head in a moment, when he approached Dr. Miles; but he did not venture to speak to him till the doctor, after gazing at him for a moment in a fit of absence, exclaimed, "Ah, William, how goes it with you? and how is your poor mother?"

"Oh, quite well," replied the youth, in his peculiarly sweet, low voice; "mother's better than she was, though she has never been so well since poor Mary's death."

"How should she, how should she?" exclaimed Doctor Miles; "these things, my man, affect young people but little, old people but little; for young people are full of their own life, and with them that consideration supersedes all thoughts connected with death; and old people are so full of the conviction of life's brevity, that the matter of a few years more or less is to them insignificant. It is to the middle-aged that the death of the young is terrible; it clouds the past with regrets, and the future with apprehensions. But I want to speak to your mother, Bill; she must forgive Stephen Gimlet, and try and help him, and be a comfort to him."

"I wish she would," said the boy, looking down; "I am sure Stephen is not so bad as people call him, and never would have taken poor Mary away, if mother had not been so strict."

"I must talk to her," answered Doctor Miles; "but you may tell her, if you see her before I do, that Stephen is a changed man, and Sir John Slingsby has taken him for a gamekeeper. Tell her, will you," he continued, after a moment's thought, "that the cottage on the moor has been burnt down, and the poor little boy, Charley, would have been burnt in it, because there was no mother, nor other relation of any kind to help him, had it not been for a gentleman who is staying up at the Hall coming by at the time and rescuing the boy from the flames."

"Ah, I am sure that was the gentleman that was down here," exclaimed the pot-boy; "Captain Hayward they called him; for he was a kind, good gentleman as ever lived, and gave me enough for mother to put something by against the winter."

"That is no reason why he should be walking on the moor," said Doctor Miles, quickly. "However, I must talk to her, for the boy must not be left alone any more; and we must see what can be done. But now tell me, Bill, what wages do you get?"

"A shilling a week and my victuals," replied the boy, in an unrepining tone; "it is very kind of Mr. Groomber, I am sure; and I do what I can, but that's not much."

"Humph!" said Doctor Miles, with not the most affirmative tone in the world; "well, I'll come by and by, and see your mother; can you go down and tell her that I am coming?"

"Oh, yes, sir," replied the boy; "they give me a quarter of an hour to eat my dinner, so I can go very well; but I must go first to Mr. Slattery's, the doctor; for Mrs. Billiter told me to bid him come up quietly to Mr. Wittingham, as if just for a call; for the old gentleman came home ill last night, and has taken to his bed."

"Mr. Slattery is out," replied Doctor Miles. "I met him on the road; but leave the message, Bill, leave the message, and I will go up and see Mr. Wittingham myself."

Thus saying, he bade the boy adieu, and walked on to the smart white gates of Mr. Wittingham's highly-cultivated place, and, passing through the garden, rang the bell at the door, which was opened to him by a servant in a straight-cut blue coat, black and yellow striped waistcoat, and black plush breeches with drab gaiters.

In answer to Doctor Miles's inquiry, the servant informed him that Mr. Wittingham was in bed, and could see no one; but the worthy clergyman pressed for admission, saying that his business was of importance. A consultation then took place between the man-servant and the housekeeper, and, after some hesitation, Mrs. Billiter went up to her master to inform him of Doctor Miles's visit, with a particular injunction to impress upon the mind of the sick man that the clergyman's business was of moment. She came down the next minute and begged the visitor to walk up, with as low a courtesy as her long stiff stays would permit her to make; and, she leading the way, Doctor Miles followed with a slow and meditative step.

The room door was gently unclosed, and the clergyman, entering, fixed his eyes upon the figure of Mr. Wittingham as he lay in bed, and a sad sight it was. Terrible was the effect that one night of sickness had wrought upon him. The long, thin, bony limbs were plainly visible through the bed-clothes, and so far, Mr. Wittingham well, or Mr. Wittingham ill, showed no difference; but there was the face upon the pillow, and there were to be seen traces enough, more of suffering than sickness. The features had suddenly grown sharp, and the cheeks hollow; the eye was bright and wandering, the brow furrowed, and the hue of the complexion, partly from the light-brown moreen curtain of the bed—the most detestable curtains in the world—partly from a sleepless, anxious, suffering night, had grown yellow, if not cadaverous. Patches of short-cut gray hair, usually concealed by the wig, were now suffered by the night-cap to show themselves upon the temples. The large front teeth, the high nose, and the protuberant chin, were all more prominent than usual; and, certainly, Mr. Wittingham, in cotton night-cap and clean linen sheets, was not the most prepossessing person that ever the eye rested upon.

Doctor Miles, however, advanced quietly to his bedside, and, sitting down in a chair, opened the conversation in a kindly tone.

"I am sorry to find you ill, my good friend," he said; "you seemed well enough last night."

"Ay, ay, that's another thing, doctor," replied the invalid; "but I got a terrible fright after that, and that has given me quite a turn."

"As to the way you will direct that turn," answered the clergyman, "you will need some good advice, Mr. Wittingham."

"Ay, ay," said the magistrate, somewhat impatiently. "Billiter there has been boring me for an hour to send for that fellow Slattery; but I don't think he could do me any good. He is a humbug, as well as the most of those doctors."

"But not more than most," answered Doctor Miles, "which is a great thing in this part of the country. You may go, Mrs. Billiter; I wish to be alone with Mr. Wittingham."

Mrs. Billiter, who had remained upon the best, the oldest, and most invariable excuse, that of putting the room in order, for the purpose of gaining an insight into all that took place, dropped a courtesy, and withdrew unwillingly.

Mr. Wittingham eyed Doctor Miles with a shrewd, inquiring, but timid glance. It was evident that he would have dispensed with the doctor's coming, that he did not half like it, that he wished to know what he could want, why he came, what was his business, what could be his object, and why his manner was so grave and cautious. Heaven knows that Mr. Wittingham was not an imaginative man; that he was not subject to the sports of fancy, and seldom or ever presented to his mind any image of things, past or future, unless it were in a large parchment-covered volume, in which was inscribed in large letters, upon the last page: "Balance in favor of Mr. Wittingham, sixty-nine thousand odd hundred pounds." Nevertheless, on this occasion the worthy gentleman's imagination ran restive; for, as a weedy old horse, when people endeavor to whip it into anything more than its ordinary pace, turns up its heels, and flings them into the face of its driver; so did Mr. Wittingham's fancy at once assert its predominance over reason, by presenting to him for his choice every possible sort of business upon which Doctor Miles might, could, would, should, or ought have come to Tarningham Lodge. He, therefore, sat in his bed with his night-cap on his head, grinning at him, like Yorick's skull, with a ghastly smile. Courtesy has its agonies, as well as other things; and the politeness of Mr. Wittingham was agonizing. Speak he could not, that was out of the question; but, with a grim contortion of countenance, he motioned the worthy doctor to a chair, and the other took it with provoking deliberation, concealing, under an air of imperturbable coolness, a certain degree of embarrassment, and a considerable degree of feeling.

To tell the truth, he much desired that Mr. Wittingham should begin first; but he soon saw that there was no hope of such being the case, and his profession had accustomed him to the initiative. Wherefore, after three preliminary hums, he went on to say, "My dear sir, I thought it better to come down to you to-day, to speak to you on a somewhat painful subject, but one which had better be grappled with at once; and that rather in conversation with me, a minister of peace and good-will toward men, than with others, who, though equally bound by the injunctions of the religion which I unworthily teach and they believe, have what they consider duties apart, which might interfere with an unlimited exercise of Christian charity."

Excellent, Doctor Miles; you are keeping the poor man in a state of torture. Why will you preach, when you are not in the pulpit? But Doctor Miles was not a prosy man by nature; he was short, brief, and terse in his general conversation, and only preached when he was in embarrassment. That such was evidently the case at present greatly increased the evils of Mr. Wittingham's position; and when the doctor was talking of Christian charity, the sick magistrate was mentally sending him to a place where very little charity of any kind is supposed to be practiced—not that we know anything of the matter; for even in the present day, with steamboats, railroads, and all the appliances of human ingenuity to boot, tourists and travelers have not pushed their researches quite as far as the place alluded to; or, at all events, have not favored the world with an account of their discoveries.

After the above proem, Dr. Miles stumbled for a moment or two, and then recovering himself, continued thus:

"The unfortunate affair which took place last night must doubtless give rise to legal inquiries, which will, depend upon it, be pursued with great energy and determination; for Captain Hayward, I find, followed the unhappy young man at once; and, if I judge rightly, he is not one to abandon his object when it is but half attained."

"Oh, that Captain Hayward, that Captain Hayward!" cried Wittingham, angrily, "he is always meddling with other people's affairs."

"Nay, my dear sir," answered Mr. Miles; "this was his affair, and the affair of everybody in the room. The ball passed within an inch of his friend Mr. Beauchamp's head, and might have been intended for him—at least, so Captain Hayward might have supposed, had not your own exclamation at the moment—"

"My exclamation!" cried Mr. Wittingham, with a look of horror, "what did I exclaim?"

Doctor Miles did not answer him directly at first, replying merely, "You said enough, Mr. Wittingham, to show who it was, in your opinion, that had fired the shot."

Mr. Wittingham clasped his hands together in an agony of despair, and sunk with his head upon the pillow, as if he would fain have hid his face in the bed-clothes, but Dr. Miles went on kindly to say,

"Moreover, my dear sir, your exclamation was sufficient to make me feel for you deeply—to feel for you with sincere compassion, and to desire anxiously to serve and assist you."

Now Mr. Wittingham was not accustomed to be compassionated; he did not like the thing, and he did not like the word; he was a vain man and a proud man, and compassion was a humiliation which he did not like to undergo; but still anxiety and trouble were the strongest, and he repeated two or three times in a quick, sharp voice,

"What did I say? What did I say?"

"You said that it was your son," answered the clergyman, "and various corroborative circumstances have transpired, which—"

But by this time Mr. Wittingham was in such a state of agitation that it was evident he would hear nothing further that was said to him at the moment, and, therefore, the good doctor stopped short. The magistrate covered his eyes; he wrung his hands hard together; he gazed forth at the sky; he even wept.

"Then it is all over, all over," he cried, at length, "it is all over," by which he meant that all his dreams of importance, his plans of rural grandeur and justice-of-the-peaceism, his "reverence" on the bench and at the quarter sessions, his elevation as a country gentleman, and his oblivion as a small trader, were all frustrated, gone, lost, smothered, and destroyed by his son's violent conduct, and his own indiscreet babbling in the moment of fear and grief.

"Ah, Doctor Miles," he said, "it is a sad business, a sad business. As you know it all, there is no use of my holding my tongue. Harry did do it; and, indeed, he told me before that he would do it, or something like it; for he came here—here, down into Tarningham, and told me on the very bench, that if I pushed that business about Mrs. Clifford's carriage any further, it should go worse with me. It was a threat, my dear doctor, and I was not to be deterred from doing my duty by a threat, and so I told him, and immediately took up the man they call Wolf on suspicion—for Sir John had been down here, swearing at my door, and what could I do, you know."

Now Doctor Miles had seen a great deal of the world, and, though a good and benevolent man, and one not at all inclined to think the worst of one of his fellow-creatures, yet he could not help seeing that there was a great deal of weakness and eagerness to shuffle any burden from himself in Mr. Wittingham's reply. There are certain sorts of knowledge which force themselves upon our understanding, whether we will or not, and among these is discrimination of human character. People long accustomed to the world, find great difficulty even in believing a practiced liar, however much they may wish to do so on certain points. They see through, in spite of themselves, all the little petty artifices with which self hides it self from self, and still more clearly through the mean policy by which the mean man strives to conceal his meanness from the eyes of his fellow-creatures. Whether it be the pitiful man, in any of the common walks of life, exacting more than his due, and striving to hide his greed under the veil of liberality and disinterestedness, whether it be the candidate on the canvass or on the hustings, escaping from the explanation of his intentions upon the plea of independence and free judgment, or whether it be the minister of the crown evading the fulfillment of obligations, or shrinking from the recognition of support by all the thousand subterfuges in the vast dictionary of political dishonesty, the man learned in the world's ways, however willing to be duped, cannot believe and confide, cannot admire and respect. The case with Mr. Wittingham was a very simple one. Doctor Miles saw and understood the whole process of his mind in a moment; but he was sorry for the man; he felt what agony it must be to have such a son, and he hastened as far as possible to relieve him.

"I think, my dear sir," he said, "that you have made some mistakes in this matter; I do not presume to interfere with any man's domestic arrangements, but I will candidly acknowledge that I have thought, in watching the progress of your son's education, that it was not likely to result in good to his character—nay—hear me out, for I am only making this observation as a sort of excuse, not so much for him, as for the advice I am going to give you, which can only be justified by a belief that the young man is not so depraved by nature as by circumstances."

They were hard words, very hard words, that Doctor Miles uttered, but there was a stern impressiveness in his manner, which overawed Mr. Wittingham, kept down his vanity from revolting against the implied accusation, and prevented him from even writhing openly at the plain terms in which his son's conduct was stigmatized.

"Under these circumstances," continued Doctor Miles, "I think it much better that you send your son out of the country as fast as possible, afford him such means as will enable him to live in respectability, without indulging in vice; warn him seriously of the end to which his present courses will lead him, and give him to understand that if he abandons them, and shows an inclination to become a good and useful member of society, the faults of his youth may be forgotten, and their punishment be remitted. On the latter point, I think I may say that, should he at once quit the country, no further steps against him will be taken. You know very well that Sir John Slingsby, though hot and irascible, is a kind and good-natured man at heart."

"Sir John Slingsby! Sir John Slingsby!" exclaimed Mr. Wittingham, bustling up with an air of relief, as if something had suddenly turned a screw, or opened a safety-valve, and delivered him from the high pressure of Doctor Miles's grave and weighty manner; "Sir John Slingsby, sir, dare do nothing against me or mine; for there is a balance against him. He may talk, and he may bully and crack his jokes. I have submitted to all that a great deal too long, without requiring a settlement of the account; and there's five thousands pounds against him I can tell you, which he will find it a difficult matter to pay, I have a notion—ah, ah, Doctor Miles, I know what I am about. Five thousand pounds are five thousand pounds, Doctor Miles, and I know all the situation of Sir John's affairs, too; so he had better not meddle with me, he had better not enrage me; for he will risk less in letting all this foolish business pass off quietly without inquiry, than producing inquiry into his own affairs in the county. A good jolly gentleman, I don't mean to say he is not; but I can tell you he is tottering on the verge of ruin, and I don't want to force him over unless he drives me: and so he had better not, that's all."

Doctor Miles had gazed at him as he spoke with a keen, subacid look, and in some degree even of amusement, and this calm supercilious look greatly annoyed and embarrassed Mr. Wittingham toward the end of his tirade. It was evident that Doctor Miles was not in the least taken unprepared, that the intimation of Sir John Slingsby's position in worldly affairs neither surprised nor disappointed him in the least; and when Mr. Wittingham at length stopped in some embarrassment, his reply tended still further to puzzle and confound the worthy magistrate, for he merely said,

"Perhaps so, Mr. Wittingham, but I do not think Sir John Slingsby's pecuniary circumstances will at all prevent him from performing his public duties. If he has reason to believe that your son is in the road to amendment, he is very likely to look over his present offenses, as they are in some degree personal to himself and his family. If he imagines that he will go on from one crime to another, depend upon it he will think it only right to cut his career short at once. The only fear is, that if this debt which you speak of ever crosses his mind, it will only serve as a bar to his lenity; for no man is so likely to be seized with a sudden determination to punish with the utmost rigor, if he were to suspect for one moment that his debt to you, whatever might be the amount, might be assigned as the motive by any one for his forbearance. I would not advise you to urge such a plea, Mr. Wittingham; but, depend upon it, if this debt is considered at all, it will be considered to your disadvantage. Beside all this, you must recollect, that other persons were present; therefore Sir John has not the whole matter in his own hands. However, I have given you the best advice in my power: you can take it, if you like; if not, the consequences be upon your own head; and you must not blame any one for anything that may occur in the due course of law."

And rising from the bedside, he was about to depart, when Mr. Wittingham stopped him.

"Stay, stay, my dear sir," said the magistrate, eagerly; "let us discuss this question a little further; I wish no harm to Sir John Slingsby, and I trust he wishes none to me. But are you sure there were other persons who heard the words I spoke? Very unfortunate, very unfortunate, indeed."

Now the truth was, that Mr. Wittingham was in a state of high irritation. The comments which Doctor Miles had made, or rather the hints which he had thrown out in regard to the education of his son, had greatly exasperated him. He never liked it to be even hinted that he was wrong; it was a sort of accusation which he never could bear; and the worthy doctor would have been permitted in patience to proceed with any other of Mr. Wittingham's friends or enemies without the least interruption; but it was natural that he should take fire in regard to his son. Why natural? it may be asked. For this reason, that the education of his son was associated intimately with Mr. Wittingham's own vanity; and the idea of his faults being owing to education, was a direct reflection upon Mr. Wittingham himself.

Doctor Miles, however, regarded none of these things; and though the worthy magistrate desired him to stay, he declared he had no time, saying,

"Further discussion is out of the question. I have given you advice that I know to be kind, that I believe to be good. Take it if you judge so; leave it if you judge otherwise. Pursue what course you think best in regard to Sir John Slingsby; but, at all events, do not attempt to influence him by pecuniary considerations; for be assured that, although he may, by imprudence, have embarrassed his property, he has not arrived at that pitch of degradation which is only brought on step by step from the pressure of narrow circumstances, and which induces men to forget great principles in order to escape from small difficulties. Good morning, Mr. Wittingham;" and without further pause, Doctor Miles quitted the room, and walked down stairs. In the hall he met Mr. Wharton, the attorney, going up, with a somewhat sour and discontented face; but all that passed between the two gentlemen was a cold bow, and the clergyman left the house in possession of the lawyer.

CHAPTER XXII.

It is a very unpleasant position indeed to be above your neck in the water, with another man holding fast by your collar, especially if it be by both hands. It may be a friend who has so got you, it may be an enemy; but the operation comes to pretty nearly the same thing in both cases; and that the result is not at all an agreeable one, I say it boldly and without fear of contradiction; for, though drowning is said to be accompanied by no real pain, and I have heard many half-drowned persons declare that it is rather pleasant than otherwise, yet that is only a part of the process, not the result; then again Sir Peter Laurie can witness, that there are multitudes of persons, who, after having taken one suffocating dip in Mother Thames, repeat the attempt perseveringly, as if they found it very delightful indeed; but still I contend that they have not come to the end of the thing, and, therefore, can give no real opinion.

"To lie in cold obstruction and to rot," to become the prey of the lean abhorred monster, death, to separate from the warm tenement in which our abode on earth has been made, to part with the companionship of all the senses and sensations, the thrills and feelings, which have been our friends, our guides, our monitors, our servants, our officers in the course of mortal existence—this is the result of that tight pressure upon the cravat or coat-collar which we shrink from, when, with our head under the water, we feel the fingers of friend or enemy approaching too near the organs of respiration. If the gentleman grasps our legs, we can kick him off; if he seizes our hands, we can often shake him away; but the deadly pressure upon the chest and neck; the clinging, grasping energy of those small digits on the throat, when we find that half a second more and life is gone, is perhaps as unpleasant a thing as often falls to the lot of mortal man to feel.

Now Ned Hayward, I have endeavored to impress upon the reader's mind, was a brave, bold, determined fellow as ever lived. There was no danger he would not have fronted, no fate he would not have risked for a good and worthy object. He was a good swimmer too; but when, after a headlong plunge into the water, he felt himself undermost in the fall, out of his depth, his feet entangled in a weed, and the fingers and thumbs of Captain Moreton tight upon his throat, he was seized with an irresistible propensity to knock him off by any means, even at the risk of losing his prisoner. The first method that suggested itself was a straightforward blow at his adversary, and that taking effect upon his chest was successful with a man half-drowned himself. His antagonist let go his hold, rose as fast as he could, dashed at the other bank, gained the ground, and was off. Poor Ned Hayward, however, soon found that if he had freed himself from one enemy, he was still in the power of another. It is a terrible thing, that a strong, powerful man, instinct with every energy and quality of high animal life, and, moreover, having an immortal soul, to be kept or parted with, should every now and then be completely at the mercy of a thin, pitiful, pulpy weed, which, to all appearances, might be broken or smashed in a moment. But moments are very important things, and the vis inertiæ a tremendous power. The weed made no attempt to hold the young gentleman, it neither grasped his legs, nor clasped his knees, but it was carried by the current around the ankles of Ned Hayward, and there, somehow or other, it stuck fast, preventing him from moving; in fact, it was like many a great politician (in the world's opinion), who operate many great changes upon their neighbors by mere vis inertiæ, waiting till the tide of circumstances brings them to action, and then holding fast to a particular point till all opposition is drowned.

Such had well-nigh been the case with Ned Hayward; for what little strength he had left was nearly expended in the blow he gave to Captain Moreton; and when he found that his feet were entangled in the weed which would not have snapped a single gut-line with a Mayfly at the end of it, his powers did not suffice to tear himself away. This history, as far as he was concerned, seemed likely to come to a hasty conclusion, when suddenly he found a strong hand grasp his arm just below the shoulder, and give his whole frame a vehement impulse toward the surface of the water. The next instant he saw, heard, breathed, once more; and before he had time to do either of these things above a second, he found his right elbow leaning on the bank, and Mr. Beauchamp, who was not very well aware whether he was dead, alive, or half-drowned, endeavoring to draw him up on the bank. To use the words of the poet, in a very indecent episode of a very chaste and beautiful poem—

"One stupid moment motionless he stood;"

but the next puff of the right element which went into his lungs recalled all his activity, and up he jumped on the bank with a spring which astonished Beauchamp, made Isabella Slingsby draw back, and brought a faint color into Mary Clifford's cheek. The glow was accompanied by a smile, however, which showed that this proof of Ned Hayward's still active powers was not unpleasant to her.

The first thing the young officer did, however, was to shake Mr. Beauchamp warmly by the hand, exclaiming,

"Upon my life you were just in time—it was nearly over with me—I could not have stood it half a minute longer. Everything was turning green, and I know that's a bad sign."

The next thing was to pick up his fishing-rod and tackle, crying, as he raised them from the ground,

"He has frightened away that big old trout; I should have had him in another second; I may have to walk half an hour more before I find such another; I could see him eying the fly all ready for a rise."

"But who was the gentleman?"

"What was the quarrel about?"

"Why did you seize him?" demanded Isabella, Mary, and Beauchamp, all together.

Let the reader remark, that each framed the question differently.

"That is the man who fired the shot into the window last night," replied Ned Hayward, looking curiously at the fly upon his hook; and two of his companions instantly turned their eyes in the direction which Captain Moreton had taken, with a look of alarm, as if they feared he would fire another shot from the bushes among which he had disappeared. Beauchamp, for his part, cast down his eyes and said nothing—not a word! Nay more; he shut his teeth close, and drew his lips over them, as if he were afraid he should say something; and then, after a moment's pause, he turned to Ned Hayward, saying,

"Had you not better give up this fishing, come up to the house and change your clothes?"

"Oh dear, no," cried Ned Hayward, "on no account whatever; I'll catch my fish before twelve o'clock yet; and very likely have the very fellow that our plunge scared away from here. Do you know, Beauchamp, it is sometimes not a bad plan to frighten a cunning old speckled gentleman, like this, if you find he is suspicious and won't bite. I have tried it often, and found it succeed very well. He gets into a fuss, dashes up or down, does not know well where to stop, and then, out of mere irritation, bites at the first thing that is thrown in his way. Come along, and we shall see. He went down, I think, for I had an eye upon him till he darted off."

"But you are very wet, too, Mr. Beauchamp," said Isabella. "If Captain Hayward is too much of an old campaigner to change his clothes, I do not see why you should neglect to do so."

"For the best reason in the world, my dear Miss Slingsby," replied Beauchamp, "because I have no clothes here with which to change these I have on."

"But there are plenty at the house," replied Isabella, eagerly.

"But I am afraid they would not fit," replied Beauchamp, laughing; "I am in no fear, however; for I am as old a campaigner as Captain Hayward."

"Let us move about, at all events," said Mary Clifford; and following Ned Hayward down the stream, they watched his progress as he, intent apparently upon nothing but his sport, went flogging the water, to see what he could obtain. Three or four very large trout, skillfully hooked, artistically played, and successfully landed, soon repaid his labor; but Ned Hayward was not yet satisfied, but, at length, he paused abruptly, and held up his finger to the others as a sign not to approach too near. He was within about twenty yards of a spot where the stream, taking a slight bend, entered into a sort of pass between two low copses, one on either hand, composed of thin and feathery trees, the leaves of which, slightly agitated by the wind, cast a varying and uncertain light and shade upon the water. The river, where he stood, was quite smooth; but ten steps further it fell over two or three small plates of rock, which scattered and disturbed it, as it ran, leaving a bubbling rapid beyond, and then a deep but rippling pool, with two or three sharp whirls in it, just where the shadows of the leaves were dancing on the waters. Ned Hayward deliberately took the fly off the line and put on another, fixing his eye, from time to time, on a particular spot in the pool beyond.

He then threw his line on the side of the rapid next to him, let the fly float down with a tremulous motion, kept it playing up and down on the surface of the foam, with a smile upon his lips, then suffered it to be carried rapidly on into the bubbling pool, as if carried away by the force of the water, and held it for a moment quivering there; the next moment he drew it sharply toward him, but not far. There was an instant rush in the stream, and a sharp snap, which you might almost hear. The slightest possible stroke of the rod was given, and then the wheel ran rapidly off, while the patriarch of the stream dashed away with the hook in his jaws. The instant he paused, he was wound up and drawn gently along, and then he dashed away again, floundered and splashed, and struck the shallow waters with his tail, till, at length, exhausted and half-drowned, he was drawn gradually up to the rocks; and Ned Hayward, wading in, landed him safely on the shore.

"This is the game of life, Miss Clifford," he said, as he put the trout of more than three pounds' weight into the basket. "Rendered cautious and prudent by some sad experiences, we shrink from everything that seems too easy of attainment, then, when we find something that fate's cunning hand plays before our eyes as if to be withdrawn in a moment, we watch it with suspicious but greedy eagerness, till we think a moment more will lose it forever, then dart at it blindly, and feel the hook in our jaws."

Mary Clifford smiled, and then looked grave; and Isabella laughed, exclaiming,

"The moral of fly-fishing! And a good lesson, I suppose, you mean, for all over-cautious mammas—or did you mean it was a part of your own history, Captain Hayward, retrospective and prophetic; or was it a general disquisition upon man?"

"I am afraid man is the trout," said Beauchamp; "and not in one particular pursuit, but all—love, interest, ambition, every one alike. His course and end are generally the same."

"That speech of yours, fair lady, was so like a woman," said Ned Hayward, turning to Miss Slingsby; "if it were not that my hands were wet, I would presume upon knowing you as a child, and give you a good shake. I thought you had been brought up enough with men, to know that they are not always thinking of love and matrimony. You women have but one paramount idea, as to this life's concerns I mean, and you never hear anything without referring it to that. However, after all, perhaps it is natural:

'Man's love is of man's life a thing apart.
'Tis woman's whole existence.'"

"Too sad a truth," replied Mary Clifford, thoughtfully; "perhaps it is of too little importance in man's eyes; of too much in woman's."

"And yet how terribly she sometimes trifles with it," said Beauchamp, in a still gloomier tone.

"Perhaps you think she trifles with everything, Mr. Beauchamp," rejoined Isabella; "but men know so little of women, and see so little of women as they really are, that they judge the many from the few; and we must forgive them; nevertheless, even if it be true that they do trifle with it, it is not the least proof that they do not feel it. All beings are fond of sporting with what is bright and dangerous: the moth round the candle, the child with the penknife, and man with ambition."

"All mankind," said Ned Hayward, "men and women alike, get merrily familiar with that which is frequently presented to their thoughts. Look at the undertaker, or the sexton, how he jests with his fat corpse, and only screws his face into a grim look when he has the world's eye upon him; then jumps upon the horse and canters back, to get drunk and joyous at the next public-house."

"Hush! hush! Captain Hayward," cried Isabella, "I declare your figures of speech are too horrible; we will have no more of such sad conversation; can we not talk of something more pleasant as we go back?"

"I do 't know," said Ned Hayward, "I am in a moralizing mood this morning."

And as Isabella and Mr. Beauchamp walked on a little in advance to pass the narrow path, which only admitted two abreast, he continued in a somewhat lower tone, saying to Mary Clifford,

"I cannot get my spirits up this morning. The dangerous circumstances of my good old friend, Sir John, vex me much. Have you spoken to your cousin about them? She seems wonderfully gay!"

"I have," answered Miss Clifford; "but it would need a heavy weight, Captain Hayward, to sink her light heart. She promised to mention the matter to Mr. Beauchamp, too; but I rather imagine, from what has occurred, that she had not done it."

"Oh, she has done it, depend upon it," replied the young officer; "and that is what makes her so gay. But I must speak with Beauchamp myself, and make the matter sure."

In the mean time, Beauchamp had walked on with Isabella; and there could be little or no doubt, in the minds of any one who came behind them, that he was making love. Not that they heard a word that was said, no, not a single syllable, but there is a peculiar gesture associated with the making of love, by a gentleman at least, which distinguishes it from every other process. Beauchamp, as we have described him, was above the middle height; but Isabella was not below it; and there was not the slightest occasion for him to bend down his head, in order that she might hear him distinctly, unless he had something to say which he did not wish others to hear likewise. He did bend down his head, however, and said what he had to say in a very low tone; and, although he did not stare her rudely in the face, yet from time to time he looked into her eyes, as if he thought them the crystal windows of the heart. Isabella, on her side, did not bend her head; she held it a little on one side, indeed, so as in the least perceptible degree to turn the fine small ear to the words that were poured into it; generally, however, she looked down, with the long fringes veiling the violet of her eyes, though from time to time she raised them at something he said; and when her look met his, they fell again. They had to cross over a little brook, and Beauchamp took her hand to help her over. He drew it through his arm when he had done, and there it rested for the remainder of the walk.

Involuntarily, and almost unconsciously as they marked this, Mary Clifford and Captain Hayward turned to each other with a smile. The impulse with each was to see if the other had remarked it—a very simple impulse—but when their looks met, it made a more compound phrase; and the anagram of the heart might read thus:

"May we not as well make love too?"

It was a sore temptation; but the next instant Ned Hayward's countenance became exceedingly grave, and the warm healthy glow in his cheek grew a shade paler.

If there was a struggle in his breast, it was brought to an end in about five minutes; for, just as they were climbing the side of the hill again, they were met by joyous old Sir John Slingsby, whose whole face and air generally bore with it an emanation of cheerful content, which is usually supposed, but, alas! mistakenly, to be the peculiar portion of the good and wise. Thoughtlessness, temperament, habit, often possess that which is the coveted possession of wisdom and virtue; and often in this world the sunshine of the heart spreads over the pathway of him who neither sees his own misfortunes lying before him, nor thinks of the sorrows of others scattered around.

"Ah, boys and girls, boys and girls!" cried the baronet, laughing, "whither have you wandered so long? I have done a world of business since you have been gone, thank heaven; and, thank heaven, have left a world undone; so I shall never, like Alexander, that maudlin, drunken rattle-pate of antiquity, have to weep for new worlds to conquer. Ned Hayward, Ned Hayward, I have a quarrel with you. Absent from evening drill and morning parade without leave! We will have you tried by a court-martial, boy; but what news have you brought? did you overtake the enemy? or was he too much for you? whither has he retreated? and last, though not least, who, and what is he?"

"On my life, Sir John, I do not know who he is," answered Ned Hayward. "We have had two engagements, in which, I am fain to confess, he has had the advantage, and has retreated in good order both times. I shall catch him yet, however; but at present I have not time to give full information; for—"

"Not time, not time!" cried the baronet; "what the devil have you done with all your time, not to have half an hour to spare to your old colonel?"

"In the first place, my dear sir, I am wet," replied the young officer, "for I have been in the water, and must change my clothes; but I have won my bet, however; I promised to catch the best trout in the river before noon; and there he is: match him if you can."

"Before noon," exclaimed Sir John Slingsby, taking out his watch; "twenty minutes past twelve, by Jove!"

"Ay, but he has been caught twenty minutes," said Ned Hayward, "I will appeal to all persons present."

"Well, granted, granted," exclaimed the baronet, "the bet's won, the bet's won. You shall change your clothes, make yourself look like a gentleman, and then tell the reverend company your story."

"Impossible," answered Ned Hayward, shaking his head; "I have forty things to do."

"Forty things!" cried Sir John; "why, I have finished two hundred and fifty upon a moderate computation within an hour and ten minutes."

"Ah, my dear sir," said the young gentleman, "but I have got to change my clothes, write a letter, speak two words to Beauchamp, talk for a quarter of an hour to Ste Gimlet about his boy's education, pack up some clothes, and be down at Tarningham in time for the coach to London, as well as to induce your butler to give me some luncheon and a glass of the best old sherry in your cellar."

"Pack up some clothes!—coach to London!" cried Sir John Slingsby, in a more serious tone than he had yet used; "the boy is mad; his head is turned! Ned Hayward, Ned Hayward, what the devil do you mean, Ned Hayward?"

"Simply, my dear Sir John, that some business of importance calls me to London immediately," rejoined his young friend; "but I shall be down again to-morrow, or the next day at the furthest; and, in the mean time, I leave you horse and gun, fishing-tackle and appurtenances, which I give you free leave and license to confiscate if I do not keep my word."

"Well, well!" exclaimed the baronet, "go along, change your clothes, and come and get some luncheon. I always thought you a great donkey, Ned, and now I think so more than ever, when I see you quit comfortable quarters for a dull stage-coach. Go along, I say, go along; there's the door, which is always better said on the outside of a house than in the in."

"Thank you, Sir John; but I must just speak a word with Beauchamp first," replied Captain Hayward; and taking his new friend's arm, he drew him a little on one side, while the baronet and the two ladies entered the house.

"I have got a favor to ask you, Beauchamp," said Captain Hayward: "matters have got into a complication between myself and this young Wittingham, which may require a pistol-shot to unravel it. The fellow, who fired through the window last night, certainly rode his horse; I walked straight into his room, thinking I might find the man there. I told him the occasion of my coming; he was insolent; and I informed him civilly what I thought of him: he demanded satisfaction; and I replied, that if there was a gentleman in the county that could be found to act as his friend, I would do him the honor of meeting him. Business, which one of the two ladies will give you a hint of, if they have not done so already, calls me immediately to London. I have written to tell him so, but that I shall be down the day after to-morrow. In the mean time, I shall tell the people at the White Hart, if any one comes from him, to refer them to you. Arrange the affair, therefore, for me, should such be the case, and, remember, the earliest possible time and the quietest possible manner—I'll bring my pistols—but we must break off, here comes Sir John Slingsby again; not a word to him on any account, there's a good fellow; and now let us talk of something else."

CHAPTER XXIII.

If you fix your eyes upon a distant hill in the month of April, in some countries, or May in others, there are a thousand chances to one, unless the goddess of the spring be very much out of humor, that you see first a golden gleam warm as the looks of love, and next a deep blue shadow, calm and grand as the thoughts of high intellect when passion has passed away with youth. Perhaps the case may be reversed; the shadow come first and the gleam succeed, just as you happen to time your look; but at all events, you will require no one to tell you—you will not even need to raise your face to the sky to perceive at once that the cause of this beautiful variation of hues is the alternate sunshine and cloud of the spring heavens.

Over the mind and over the face of man, however, what clouds, what sunshine, what gleams, what shadows will not come, without any eye but an All-seeing one being able to trace the causes of the change. Thrice in one morning was the whole demeanor of Mr. Beauchamp totally altered. He descended to breakfast grave and thoughtful; an hour after he was gayer than he had been for years. By the side of Isabella Slingsby he remained cheerful; but before luncheon was over he had plunged again into a fit of deep and gloomy thought, and as soon as Ned Hayward, having taken some food and wine, started up to mount his horse, which was at the door, Beauchamp rose also, saying, "I want one word with you, Hayward, before you go."

"Directly, directly," answered Ned Hayward. "Good-by, Sir John, good-by, Miss Slingsby."

"Mind—day after to-morrow at the latest, Ned," cried the baronet.

"Upon my honor," replied Hayward. "Farewell, Mrs. Clifford, I trust I shall find you here on my return."

"I fear not, Captain Hayward," replied the lady, "but you have promised, you know, to come over, and—"

"Nay, dear mamma, I think you will be here," said Mary Clifford, "I think for once I shall attempt to coax you."

Mrs. Clifford seemed somewhat surprised at her daughter's eagerness to stay; but Sir John exclaimed joyously, "There's a good girl—there's a capital girl, Mary; you are the best little girl in the world; she'll stay, she'll stay. We'll get up a conspiracy against her. There, be off, Ned. No long leave-takings. "You'll find us all here when you come back, just as you left us: me, as solemn and severe as usual, my sister as gay and jovial, Isabella as pensorous, and Mary as merry and madcap as ever."

Ned Hayward, however, did not fail to bid Miss Clifford adieu before he went, and be it remarked, he did it in a somewhat lower tone than usual, and added a few words more than he had spoken to the rest. Beauchamp accompanied him to the door, and then pausing near the horse, inquired in a low tone, "Are you quite certain the man with whom you had the struggle this morning is the same who fired the shot last night?"

"Perfectly," answered Ned Hayward, "for I saw his face quite well in the sand-pit; and I never forget a face. I wish to heaven you could catch him."

"Have you any idea of his name?" asked Beauchamp.

"None in the world," replied Ned Hayward; "but there are two people here who must know, I think. One is young Wittingham, and the other is Ste Gimlet, otherwise Wolf. I have a strong notion this fellow was one of those attacking the carriage the other night. But that puts me in mind, Beauchamp, that I intended to go up and talk to Gimlet, but I have not time now. I wish you would; and just tell him from me, I will pay his boy's schooling if he will send him to learn something better than making bird-traps. You can perhaps find out at the same time who this fellow is, so it may be worth a walk."

"I will, I will," answered Beauchamp, "but you said the young ladies here had something to tell me. What is it?"

"I thought they had done it," replied Ned Hayward, "that is stupid! But I have not time now, you must ask them; good-by;" and touching his horse lightly with his heel, he was soon on his way to Tarningham.

Beauchamp paused for a moment on the steps in deep meditation, and then turned into the house, saying to himself, "This must be inquired into instantly." He found Sir John Slingsby in the luncheon-room, reading the newspaper, but nobody else, for the ladies had returned to the drawing-room, and two of them, at least, were looking somewhat anxiously for his coming. It very rarely happens that any one who is looked anxiously for ever does come; and of course, in the present instance, Beauchamp took the natural course, and disappointed the two ladies.

"I have a message to deliver from Captain Hayward to your new keeper, Sir John," he said, "and therefore I will walk over to his cottage, and see him. An hour I dare say will accomplish it."

"It depends upon legs, my dear sir," answered the baronet, looking up. "It would cost my two an hour and a half to go and come; so if I might advise, you would take four. You will find plenty of hoofs in the stables, and a groom to show you the way. Thus you will be back the sooner, and the women will have something to talk to; for I must be busy—very busy—devilish busy, indeed. I have not done any business for ten years, the lawyer tells me, so I must work hard to-day. I'll read the papers first, however, if Wharton himself stood at the door; and he is a great deal worse than Satan. I like to hear all the lies that are going about in the world; and as newspapers were certainly invented for the propagation of falsehood, one is sure to find all there. Take a horse, take a horse, Beauchamp. Life is too short to walk three miles and back to speak with a gamekeeper."

"Well, Sir John, I will, with many thanks," answered his guest, and in about a quarter of an hour he was trotting away toward the new cottage of Stephen Gimlet, with a groom to show him the way. That way was a very picturesque one, cutting off an angle of the moor, and then winding through wild lanes rich with all sorts of flowers and shrubs, till at length a small old gray church appeared in view at the side of a little green. The stone, where the thick ivy hid it not, was incrusted in many places with yellow, white, and brown lichens, giving that peculiar rich hue with which nature is so fond of investing old buildings. There was but one other edifice of any kind in the neighborhood, and that was a small cottage of two stories built close against one side of the church. Probably it had originally been the abode of the sexton, and the ivy spreading from the neighboring buttress twined round the chimneys, meeting several lower shoots of the same creeping plant, and enveloped one whole side in a green mantle. The sunshine was streaming from behind the church, between it and the cottage, and that ray made the whole scene look cheerful enough; but yet Beauchamp could not help thinking, "This place, with its solitary house, and lonely church, its little green, and small fields behind, with their close hedge-rows, must look somewhat desolate in dull weather. Still the house seems a comfortable one, and there has been care bestowed upon the garden, with its flowers and herbs. I hope this is Gimlet's cottage; for the very fact of finding such things in preparation may waken in him different tastes from those to which he has been habituated."

"Here's the place, sir," said the groom, riding up and touching his hat, and at the same moment the sound of the horses' feet brought the rosy, curly-headed urchin of the ci-devant poacher trotting to the door.

Beauchamp dismounted and went in; and instantly a loud, yelping bark was heard from the other side of the front room, where a terrier dog was tied to the post of a sort of dresser. By the side of the dog was the figure of the newly-constructed gamekeeper himself, stooping down and arranging sundry boxes and cages on the ground.

Now the learned critic has paused on the words "newly-constructed gamekeeper"—let him not deny it—and has caviled thereat, and declared them incorrect. But I will defend them: they are neither there by, and on account of careless writing or careless printing; but well-considered, just, and appropriate, there they stand on the author's responsibility. I contend he was a newly-constructed gamekeeper, and out of very curious materials was he constructed, too.

As soon as he heard Beauchamp's step, Sir Gimlet raised himself, and recognizing his visitor at once, a well-pleased smile spread over his face, which the gentleman thought gave great promise for the future. It is something, as this world goes, to be glad to see one from whom we have received a benefit. The opposite emotion is more general unless we expect new favors; a fact of which Beauchamp had been made aware by some some sad experience, and as the man's pleased look was instantaneous, without a touch of affectation in it, he augured well for some of the feelings of his heart.

"Well, Gimlet," said the visitor, "I am happy to see that some of your stock has been saved, even if all your furniture has perished."

"Thank you, sir," replied the other, "my furniture was not worth a groat. I made most of it myself; but I lost a good many things I won't be easy to get again. All the dogs that were in the house, but this one, were burned or choked. He broke his cord and got away. All my ferrets, too, went, but three that were in the shed; and the tame badger, poor fellow, I found a bit of his skin this morning. I thank you very much, sir, for what you gave me, and if you wait five minutes you'll see what I've done with it. I think it will give you pleasure, sir; for I've contrived to get quite enough to set the place out comfortably, and have something over in case anything is forgotten."

Beauchamp liked the man's way of expressing his gratitude by showing that he appreciated the feelings in which the benefit was conferred. It was worth a thousand hyperboles.

"I shall stay some little time, Gimlet," he said, "for I have one or two things to talk to you about, if you can spare a minute."

"Certainly, sir," answered the man in a respectful tone, "but I can't ask you to sit down, because you see there is no chair."

"Never mind that," replied Beauchamp, "but what I wished principally to say is this: my friend, Captain Hayward, takes a good deal of interest in you and in your boy; and, as he was going to London to-day, he asked me to see you and tell you, that if you like to let the poor little fellow attend any good school in the neighborhood he will pay the expenses. He wished me to point out to you what an advantage it will be to him to have a good education, and also how much better and more safe it is for him to be at school while you are absent on your duty, than shut up alone in your house."

"Whatever that gentleman wishes, sir, I will do," Gimlet replied; "I never knew me like him before—I wish I had—but, however, I am bound to do what he tells me; and even if I did not see and know that what he says in this matter is good and right, I would do it all the same. But as for paying, sir, I hope he won't ask me to let him do that, for I have now got quite enough and to spare; and although el it a pleasure to be grateful to such a gentle-an, yet he can do good elsewhere with the oney."

"You can settle that with him afterward, imlet," replied Mr. Beauchamp, "for he is oming back in a day or two; but I now want ask you a question, which you must answer r not as you think fit. You were with Captain ayward, it seems, when he came up with the an who fired into the window of the Hall, and ou saw his face, I think?"

Gimlet nodded his head, saying, "I did, r."

"Do you know the man?" asked Beauchamp, xing his eyes upon him.

"Yes, sir," replied the other at once, with the olor coming up into his face, "but before you go on, just let me say a word. That person and I ere in some sort companions together once, a matter we had better have let alone, and I hould not like to 'peach."

"In regard to the attack upon the carriage—to hich I know you allude—I am not about to in-uire," replied Beauchamp, "but I will ask ou only one other question, and I promise you pon my honor, not to use anything you tell e against the person. Was his name More-n?"

"I won't tell you a lie, sir," answered Gimlet. It was, though how you have found it out I an't guess, for he has been away from this part f the country for many a year."

"It matters not," answered Beauchamp, how I found it out; I know he has been absent any a year. Can you tell me how long he has tarned?"

"That I can't say, I'm sure, sir," replied the an; "but I did hear that he and the lady have een lodging at Buxton's inn for a day or two, ut not more. It's a great pity to see how he as gone on, and to sell that fine old place that as been theirs for so many hundred years! I hould think, that if one had anything worth having that had been one's father's, one's grand-father's, and one's great grandfather's, for such a long while, it would keep one straight. It's mostly when a man has got nothing to pride him-self upon that he goes wrong."

"Not always," answered Beauchamp; "un-bridled passion, my good friend, youth, inexpe-rience, sometimes accident, lead a man to com-mit a false step, and that is very difficult to re-trieve in this life."

"Ay, ay, I know that, I know that, sir," answered Gimlet, "but I hope not impossible;" and he looked up in Beauchamp's face with an expression of doubt and inquiry.

"By no means impossible," replied the gen-tleman, "and the man who has the courage and strength of mind to retrieve a false step, gives a better assurance to society for his future con-duct than perhaps a man who has never com-mitted one can do."

Gimlet looked down and meditated for a minute or two, and though he did not distinctly express the subject of his contemplation, his reverie ended with the words, "Well, I will try." The next moment he added, "I don't think, however, that this Captain Moreton will ever make much of it; for he has been going on now a long while in the same way, from a boy to a lad, and from a lad to a man. He broke his father's heart, they say, after having ruined him to pay his debts; but the worst of it all is, he was always trying to make others as bad as himself. He did me no good; for when I was a boy and used to go out and carry his game-bag, he put me up to all manner of things, and that was the beginning of my liking to what people call poaching. Then, too, he had a great hand in ruining this young Harry Wittingham. He taught him to gamble and drink, and a great deal more, when he was a mere child, I may say."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Beauchamp, "then the young man is to be pitied more than blamed."

"I don't know sir, I don't know," answered the gamekeeper; "he's a bad-hearted fellow. He set fire to my cottage, that's clear enough, and he knew the boy was in it too; but this busi-ness of firing in at the window I can't make out at all; I should have thought it had been an accident if he had not afterward taken a shot at Captain Hayward."

"I wish to heaven I could think it was an accident," answered Beauchamp; "but that is out of the question. They say there are thoughts of pulling down the old house, if the place is not sold again very soon. How far is it?"

"Oh, not three quarters of a mile from this," replied the gamekeeper. "Have you never seen it, sir? It's a fine old place."

"Yes, I have seen it in former years," said Beauchamp. "Is it in this parish then?"

"Oh yes, sir, this is the parish church here. They all lie buried in a vault here, and their monuments are in the aisle; would you like to see them? The key is always left in this cot-tage. There they lie, more than twenty of them—the Moretons, I mean—for you know the man's father was not a Moreton; he was a brother of the Lord Viscount Lenham; but, when he married the heiress, he took the name of Moreton, according to her father's will. His tomb is in there, and I think it runs, 'The Hon-orable Henry John St. Leger Moreton.' It is a plain enough tomb for such a fine gentleman as he was; but those of the Moretons are very handsome, with great figures cut in stone as big as life."

"I should like to see them," said Beauchamp, rousing himself from a reverie.

"That's easily done," answered the game-keeper, taking a large key from a nail driven into the wall, and leading the way to a small side-door of the church.

"You tell me he was down here with the lady," said Beauchamp, as the man was open-ing the door. "Do you know if he is mar-ried?"

"That I can't say, sir," answered the man. "He had a lady with him, and a strange-looking lady, too, with all manner of colors in her clothes. I saw her three days ago. She must have been a handsome-looking woman, too, when she was young; but she looks, I don't know how now."

Beauchamp tried to make him explain him-self; but the man could give no better descrip-tion; and walking on into the church, they passed along from monument to monument, pausing to read the different inscriptions, the greater part of which were more intelligible to Beauchamp than his companion, as many were written in Latin. At length they came to a small and very plain tablet of modern erection, which bore the name of the last possessor of the Moreton property; and Beauchamp paused and gazed at it long, with a very sad and gloomy air.

There is always something melancholy in contemplating the final resting-place of the last of a long line. The mind naturally sums up the hopes gone by, the cherished expectations frustrated, the grandeur and the brightness passed away; the picture of many generations in infancy, manhood, decrepitude, with a long train of sports and joys, and pangs and sufferings, rises like a moving pageant to the eye of imagination; and the heart draws its own homily from the fate and history of others. But there seemed something more than this in the young gentleman's breast. His countenance was stern, as well as sad; it expressed a bitter gloom, rather than melancholy; and, folding his arms upon his chest, with a knitted brow, and teeth hard-set together, he gazed upon the tablet in deep silence, till a step in the aisle behind him startled him; and, turning round, he beheld good Doctor Miles slowly pacing up the aisle toward him.

Stephen Gimlet bowed low to the rector, and took a step back; but Beauchamp did not change his place, though he welcomed his reverend friend with a smile.

"I want to speak with you, Stephen," said Doctor Miles, as he approached; and then turning toward Beauchamp, he added, "How are you, my dear sir? There are some fine monuments here."

Beauchamp laid his hand upon the clergyman's arm, and, pointing to the tablet before him, murmured in a low voice, "I have something to say to you about that, my good friend; I will walk back with you; for I have long intended to talk to you on several subjects which had better not be delayed any longer;—I will leave you to speak with this good man here, if you will join me before the cottage."

"Oh, you need not go, you need not go," said Doctor Miles, "I have nothing to say you may not hear. I wanted to tell you, Stephen," he continued, turning to the ci-devant poacher, "that I have been down to-day to Tarningham, and have seen old Mrs. Lamb and her son William."

"He's a dear good boy, sir," said Stephen Gimlet, gazing in the rector's face, "and he was kind to me and used to come up and see his poor sister Mary when nobody else would come near her. That poor little fellow, all crooked and deformed as he is, has more heart and soul in him than the whole town of Tarningham."

"There are more good people in Tarningham and in the world, Stephen, than you know," answered Doctor Miles, with a sharp look; "you have to learn, my good friend, that there are natural consequences attached to every particular line of conduct; and, as you turn a key in a door one way to open it, and another way to shut it; so, if your conduct be good, you open men's hearts toward you; if your conduct be bad, you close them."

Stephen Gimlet rubbed his finger on his temple, and answered in a somewhat bitter, but by no means insolent tone: "It's a very hard lock sir, that of men's hearts; and when once it's shut, the bolt gets mighty rusty—at least, as I've found it."

"Stephen, Stephen!" exclaimed the worthy clergyman, raising his finger with a monitory and reproachful gesture, "can you say so—especially to-day?"

"No, sir—no, sir;" cried Stephen Gimlet, eagerly, "I am wrong; I am very wrong; but just then there came across me the recollection of all the hard usage I have had for twelve long years, and how it had driven me from bad to worse—ay, and killed my poor Mary, too; for her father was very hard; and though he said her marrying me broke his heart, I am sure he broke hers."

"You must not brood upon such things, Gimlet," said Doctor Miles. "It is better, wiser, and more Christian, for every man to think of the share which his own faults have had in shaping his own fate; and if he do so coolly and dispassionately, he will find much less blame to be attributed to others than he is inclined to believe. But do not let us waste time upon such considerations. I went down to talk to Mrs. Lamb about you and your boy; I told her what Sir John had done for you; and the imminent peril of death which the poor child had fallen into, from being left totally alone, when you are absent. The good old woman—and pray remark, Stephen, I don't call people good as the world generally does, without thinking them so—was very much affected, and wept a good deal, and in the end she said she was quite ready to come up and keep house for you, and take care of the child while you are away."

The man seemed troubled; for the offer was one which in many respects was pleasant and convenient to him; but there was a bitter remnant of resentment at the opposition which his unfortunate wife's parents had shown to her marriage with himself, and at the obstinacy with which her father had refused all reconciliation, that struggled against better feelings, and checked any reply upon his lips. Doctor Miles, however, was an experienced reader of the human heart; and when he saw such ulcerations, he generally knew the remedy, and how to apply it. In this instance, he put all evil spirits to flight in a moment by awakening a better one, in whose presence they could not stand.

"The only difficulty with poor Mrs. Lamb seemed to be," he said, after watching the man's countenance during a momentary pause, "that she is so poor. She said that you would have enough to do with your money, and that the little she has, which does not amount to six shillings a week, would not pay her part of your housekeeping."

"Oh, if that's all, doctor," cried Stephen Gimlet, "don't let that stand in the way. If poor Mary's mother shall never want a meal when I can work for it. I'd find her one anyhow, if I had to go without myself. Beside, you know, I am rich now, and I'll take care to keep all straight, so as not to get poor again. That could not be a greater pleasure to me, I can assure you, sir, than to share whatever I've with poor Mary's mother, and that dear oy Bill. Thanks to this kind gentleman, I've ot together a nice little lot of furniture; and, f the old woman will but bring her bed, we hall do very well, I'll warrant; and the boy will be taken care of, and go to the school; and we'll all lead a different sort of life and be quite appy, I dare say—No, not quite happy! I can never be quite happy any more, since my poor girl left me; but she is happy, I am sure; and hat's one comfort."

"The greatest," said Doctor Miles, whose spirit of philanthrophy in a peculiar way was very easily roused, "the greatest Stephen; and s it is by no means impossible, nor, I will say, mprobable, both from the light of natural reaon and many passages of Scripture, that the pirits of the dead are permitted to see the onduct and actions of those they loved on arth, after the long separation has occurred, hink what a satisfaction it will be to your poor rife, if she can behold you acting as a son to er mother—mind, I don't say that such a hing is by any means certain; I only hint that t is not impossible, nor altogether improbable, hat such a power may exist in disembodied pirits."

"I am quite sure it does," said Stephen Gimlet, with calm earnestness; "I have seen her many a time sitting by the side of the water under the willow trees, and watching me when I was putting in my night-lines."

"I think you are mistaken, Stephen," said Doctor Miles, shaking his head; "but at all events, if such a thing be possible, she will now watch you with more satisfaction, when you are supplying her place in affection to her mother."

"I will do my best, sir," said Stephen Gimlet, "if it be only on that account."

"I am sure you will, Stephen," answered the worthy clergyman; "and so the first spare moment you have, you had better go down and talk with Mrs. Lamb. Now, Mr. Beauchamp, I am ready."

CHAPTER XXIV.

"Well, well, sit down and cheer yourself, Goody Lamb," said Stephen Gimlet, after an interval of thirty hours—for I must pass over for the present those other events affecting more important characters in this tale, which filled up the intervening time in the neighborhood of Tarningham—"let bygones be bygones, as they say in the country where you have lived so much. Here you are, in as comfortable a cottage as any in the country. I have plenty, and to spare; and, forgetting all that's past and gone, I will try to be a son to you and a brother to poor Bill."

"Thank you, Stephen, thank you," said the old woman, to whom he spoke—a quiet, resigned-looking person, with fine features, and large dark eyes, undimmed by time, though the hair was as white as snow, the skin exceedingly wrinkled, and the frame, apparently, enfeebled and bowed down with sickness, cares, or years; "I am sure you will do what you can, my poor lad; but still I cannot help feeling a little odd at having to move again at my time of life. I thought, when I and my poor husband, Davie Lamb, came up here to Tarningham, out of Scotland, it was the last time I should have to change. But we can never tell what may happen to us. I fancied, when I went to Scotland with stiff old Miss Moreton, that I was to be settled there for life. There I married Lamb, and thought it less likely than ever that I should change, when, suddenly, he takes it into his head to come up here to the place where I was born and brought up, and never told me why or wherefore."

"Ay, he was a close, hard man," said Stephen Gimlet; "he was not likely to give reasons to any one; he never did to me, but just said two or three words, and flung away."

"He was a kind husband and a kind father," said the widow, "though he said less than most men, I will acknowledge."

"He was not kind to his poor, dear girl," muttered Stephen Gimlet, in a tone which rendered his words scarcely audible; but yet the widow caught, or divined their sense clearly enough; and she answered:

"Well, Stephen, don't let us talk about it. There are some things that you and I cannot well agree upon, and it is better not to speak of them. Poor Davie's temper was soured by a great many things. People did not behave to him as well as they ought; and, although I have a notion they persuaded him to come here, they did not do for him all they promised."

"That's likely," answered the ci-devant poacher; "though I have no occasion to say so, either; for people have done much more for me than they ever promised, and more than I ever expected. See what good Sir John Slingsby has done, after I have been taking his game for this many a year; and Mr. Beauchamp, too—why, it was a twenty-pound note he gave me, just because he heard that my cottage had been burnt down, and all the things in it destroyed—but it was all owing to Captain Hayward, who began it by saving the dear boy's life, that lies sleeping there in t'other room, and spoke well of me—which nobody ever took the trouble to do before—and said I was not so bad as I seemed; and, please God, I'll not give his promises the lie, anyhow."

"God bless him for a good man," said Widow Lamb; "he is one of the few, Stephen, whose heart and soul are in doing good."

"Ay, that he is," answered the gamekeeper; "but I did not know you knew him, goody."

"No, I do not know much of him," answered the old lady, "but I know he has been very kind to my boy Bill; and before he went off for London t'other day, had a long talk to him, which is better, to my thinking, than the money he gave him. But who is this Mr. Beauchamp, you say is such a kind man, too?" I've heard Bill talk of him, and he tells me the same; but I can't well make out about him"

"Why, he is a friend of Captain Hayward's" rejoined the gamekeeper; "he has been staying a long while at the White Hart, and just the same sort of man as the other, though a sadder-looking man, and not so frank and free."

"But what looking man is he?" asked the old woman. "You can tell one what a dog's like, or what a ferret's like, Stephen, well enough; and I should like to hear about him; for I have a curiosity, somehow."

"Why, he is a tall man and a strong man," answered Stephen Gimlet, "with a good deal of darkish hair, not what one would say curling, but yet not straight, either; and large eyes, in which you can see little or no white; very bright and sparkling, too. Then he's somewhat pale and sunburnt; and very plain in his dress, always in dark clothes; but yet, when one looks at him, one would not like to say a saucy thing to him, for there is something, I don't know what, in his way and his look, that, though he is as kind as possible when he speaks, seems to tell everybody, 'I am not an ordinary sort of person.' He never wears any gloves, that I saw; but, for all that, his hands are as clean as if they had been washed the minute before, and the wristbands of his shirts are as white as snow."

Goody Lamb paused, thoughtfully, and rubbed her forehead once or twice, under the gray hair.

"I have seen him, then," she said at length, in a very peculiar tone; "he has passed my little window more than once—and his name is Beauchamp, is it?"

"So they say," answered Stephen Gimlet, in some surprise; "why should it not?"

"Oh! I don't know," answered the widow; and there she ceased.

"Well, you are very droll to-night, goody," said Stephen Gimlet; "but I should like a cup of tea before I go out upon my rounds; so I'll just get some sticks to make the fire burn; for that kettle does nothing but simmer."

Thus saying, he went into the little passage, and out into a small yard, whence he brought a faggot or two. He then laid them on the hot embers, blew up a flame, made the kettle boil; and, all this time, not a word passed between him and Goody Lamb; for both seemed very busy with thoughts of their own. At length, when a teapot and some cups had been produced, and a small packet of tea, wrapped up in a brown paper, the old lady sat down to prepare the beverage for her son-in-law, as the first act of kindly service she rendered him since she had undertaken to keep his house. To say the truth, it was more for herself than for him that the tea was made; for Stephen Gimlet did not like the infusion, and was not accustomed to it; but he knew the good dame's tastes, and was anxious to make her as comfortable as he could.

While she was making the tea after her own peculiar fashion—and almost every one has a mode of his own—Gimlet stood on the other side of the little deal table, and watched her proceedings. At length he said, somewhat suddenly, "Yes, Mr. Beauchamp was up here yesterday, just when Doctor Miles was talking to me, and he asked me a great many questions about——" and here he paused, thinking he might be violating some confidence if he mentioned the subject of his visitor's inquiries. The next instant he concluded his sentence in a different way from that which he first intended, saying—"about a good many things; and then he went into the church with me and looked at all the tombs of the Moretons, and especially that of the last gentleman."

"Ay, well he might," answered Goody Lamb.

"Indeed!" exclaimed Stephen Gimlet, with a slight laugh; "then you seem to know more of him than I do."

Goody Lamb nodded her head; and her son-in-law proceeded, with some warmth: "Then I am sure you know no harm of him."

"No, Stephen, no," she said; "I do not! I saw him as a young lad, and I have not seen him since; but I have not forgotten him; for he came down to my house—what is called the Grieves-house in Scotland—on the morning of a day that turned out the heaviest day of his life; and he was a gay young lad then; and he saw my poor boy, who was then a little fellow of four years old, that all the folks there used to gibe at on account of his misfortunes; but this gentleman took him on his knee and patted his head, and was kind to him, and said he was a clever boy, and gave him a couple of shillings to buy himself a little flute, because the poor fellow was fond of music even then, and used to whistle so sweetly, it was enough to break one's heart to hear such sounds come from such a poor body. The gentleman has never thought of me or mine since then, I'll warrant; but I have thought of him often enough; and I'll ask him a question or two some day, please God."

"The heaviest day in his life," repeated Stephen Gimlet, who had marked every word she uttered with strong attention; "how was that, goody?"

"Ay," answered Widow Lamb, shaking her head, "as they say in that country, it is no good talking of all that; so ask me no more questions, Stephen; but sit down and take your tea, my man, and then go about your work."

Stephen Gimlet sat down, and, with not the greatest pleasure in the world, took a cup of the beverage she had prepared; but still he was very thoughtful; for there was something in Mr. Beauchamp, even in the grave sadness of his ordinary manner, which created a kind of interest in a man of a peculiarly imaginative character; and he would have given a good deal to know all that Widow Lamb could tell, but would not. He did not choose to question her, however; and, after having finished a large slice of brown bread, he rose and unfastened the only dog he had remaining, in order to go out upon his night's round.

Just at that moment, however, some one tried the latch of the cottage, and then knocked for admission; and the dog, springing forward, growled, barked, and snarled furiously.

The gamekeeper chid him back, and then opened the door, when, to his surprise, he saw the figure of young Harry Wittingham before him. The dog sprang forward again, as if he would have torn the visitor to pieces; and, to say the truth, Stephen Gimlet felt a great inclination to let the beast have his way; but, after a moment's thought, he drove it back again, saying, with a bitter laugh,

"The beast knows the danger of letting you in. What do you want with me, sir?"

"I want you to do me a great service, Ste," said Harry Wittingham, with a familiar and friendly air; "and I am sure you will, if——"

"No, I won't," answered Stephen Gimlet, "if it were to save you from hanging, I would not put my foot over that door-step. It is no use talking, Mr. Wittingham; I will have nothing more to do with any of your tricks. I don't wish ever to see you again; I am in a new way of life, and it won't do, I can tell you."

"Oh, I have heard all about that," answered the young man, in a light tone; "and, moreover, that you have taken a silly fancy into your head, that I set fire to your cottage. It is all nonsense, upon my word. Your boy must have done it, playing with the fire that was on the hearth."

Stephen Gimlet's face turned somewhat pale with the effort to keep down the anger that was in his heart; but he replied shortly and quickly, for fear it should burst forth:

"The boy had no fire to play with — you knew well he was locked up in the bedroom, and there he was found, when you burned the place down."

"Well, if I had any hand in it," said young Wittingham, "it must have been a mere accident."

"Ay, when you knew there was a poor helpless child in the house," said Stephen Gimlet, bitterly, "it was a sort of accident which well nigh deserved hanging."

"Nonsense, nonsense, my good fellow," said the young man, "you are angry about nothing; and though you have got a good place, I dare say you are not a man to refuse a couple of guineas when they are offered to you."

"If you offer them," cried Stephen Gimlet, furiously, "I'll throw them in your face—an accident, indeed! to burn my cottage, and nearly my poor child! I suppose it was by accident that you stopped the carriage in the lane! and by accident that you set a man to fire at your own father through the window!"

"Hush, hush, Stephen," cried Widow Lamb, catching hold of his coat and attempting to keep him back, as he took a step toward Harry Wittingham, who turned very pale.

The young man recovered his audacity the next moment, however, and exclaimed:

"Pooh! let him alone, good woman; if he thinks to bully me, he is mistaken."

"Get out of this house," cried Stephen Gimlet, advancing close to him. "Get out of this house, without another word, or I'll break your neck!"

"You are a fool," answered young Wittingham, "and, if you don't mind, I'll send you to Botany Bay."

The words were scarcely out of his mouth, when Stephen Gimlet aimed a straight blow at him with his right hand, which was immediately parried; for the young vagabond was not unskillful in the science of defence; but, the next instant, the gamekeeper's left told with stunning effect in the midst of his face, and he fell prostrate, with his head out of the doorway, and his feet within. Stephen Gimlet looked at him for a moment, then, stooping down, lifted him in his strong arms, pitched him headlong out, and shut the door.

"There!" said Gimlet; "now I'll sit down for a minute and get cool."

CHAPTER XXV.

We will go back, if it pleases the reader; for, fortunately, it happens, that, in a work of this character, one can go back. Oh, how often in human life is it to be wished that we could do the same! What deeds, done amiss, would then be rectified! What mistakes in thought, in conduct, in language, would then be corrected! What evils for the future avoided! What false steps would be turned back! What moral bonds, shackling our whole being, would not then be broken! I do believe, that, if any man would take any hour out of any period of his life, and look at it with a calm, impartial, unprejudiced eye, he would feel a longing to turn back and change something therein; he would wish to say more, than he had said—or less—to say it in a different tone—with a different look—or he would have acted differently—he would have yielded—or resisted—or listened—or refused to listen—he would wish to have exerted himself energetically—or to have remained passive—or to have meditated ere he acted—or considered something he had forgotten—or attended to the small, still voice in his heart, when he had shut his ears. Something, something, he ever would have altered in the past! But, alas! the past is the only reality of life, unchangeable, irretrievable, indestructible; we can neither mold it, nor recall it, nor wipe it out. There it stands forever: the rock of adamant, up whose steep side we can hew no backward path.

We will turn back to where we left Doctor Miles and Beauchamp. Issuing forth from the church, and passing round Stephen Gimlet's cottage, they found the worthy clergyman's little phaeton standing by the two horses which Beauchamp had brought from Tarningham Park. Orders were given for the four-wheeled and four-footed things to follow slowly; and the two gentlemen walked forward on foot, the younger putting his hand lightly through the arm of the elder, as a man does when he wishes to bespeak attention to what he is going to say.

"I have been looking at those monuments with some interest, my dear doctor," said Beauchamp, after they had taken about twenty steps in advance; "and now I am going to make you, in some degree, what, I dare say, as a good Protestant divine, you never expected to become—my father-confessor. There are several things, upon which I much wish to consult you, as I have great need of a good and fair opinion and advice."

"The best that it is in my power to give you shall have, my young friend," answered Doctor Miles; "not that I expect you to take my advice, either; for I never yet, in the course of a long life, knew above two men, who did take advice, when it was given. But that is not always the fault of the giver; and, therefore, mine is ever ready, when it is asked. What is it you have to say?"

"More, I fear, than can be well said in one conversation," answered Beauchamp; "but I had better begin and tell a part, premising that it is under the seal of confession, and therefore—"

"Shall be as much your own secret, as if it had not been given to me," said Doctor Miles; "go on."

"Well, then, for one part of the story," said Beauchamp, with a smile at his old companion's abruptness; "in the first place, my dear doctor, I am, in some sort, an impostor; and our mutual friend, Stanhope, has aided the cheat."

Doctor Miles turned round sharply, and looked in his face for a moment; then nodded his head, as he saw there was no appearance of shame in the expression, and gazed straightforward again, without saying a word.

"To make the matter short, my good friend," continued his companion, "my name is not Beauchamp at all, nor anything the least like it."

"Nom de guerre," said Doctor Miles; "pray, what may the war be about?"

"Of that hereafter," said Beauchamp, for I shall still continue to call him by the name which he repudiated. "You have seen that I have been somewhat anxious to purchase this Moreton Hall property, and am still anxious to do so, though I have received a little bit of news on that subject to-day, which may make me very cautious about the examination of titles, &c. This intelligence is, that the ostensible proprietor is not the real one; your acquaintance, Mr. Wharton, having become virtually possessed of the property, perhaps, by not the fairest means."

"Humph!" said Doctor Miles; but he added nothing further, and Beauchamp went on.

"Poor Mr. St. Leger Moreton," he said, "was by no means a man of business, an easy, kind-hearted, somewhat too sensitive person."

"I know, I know," answered Doctor Miles, "I was well acquainted with him; and if ever man died of a broken heart, which is by no means so unusual an occurrence as people suppose, he did so."

"I believe it," answered Beauchamp; "but, at all events, he was not a man, as you must know, to ascertain, that he was dealt fairly by. His son, I am sorry to say, was willing to do anything for ready money—I say anything, for I do not know that act to which he would not have recourse for any object that he sought to gain."

"You seem to know them all thoroughly," said Doctor Miles, drily; and he then added in a warmer tone, "I will tell you what, my dear sir, this Captain Moreton is one of those men who make us ashamed of human nature. Born to a fine estate, the son of an excellent woman and amiable man, though a weak one, he went on corrupting himself and every one else, from boyhood to youth, and from youth to manhood. He is the only man I have ever known without one principle of any kind, or one redeeming point. There is but one thing to be said in his excuse, namely, that his great aunt, old Miss Moreton, who went to Scotland, and left him a small property there of about a thousand a year, which he dissipated totally in eleven weeks after he got it, spoiled him from his infancy, pampered, indulged, encouraged him in the most frightful manner. Even his vices became virtues in her eyes; so that there is not much marvel that he became a gambler, a débauchée, a duelist, and a scoundrel. People may consider that his courage and his talents were redeeming qualities, but I look upon them as none. They were only energies, which carried him on to deeper wickedness and infamy. He is now, I believe, a common sharper and swindler."

"I have let you go on, doctor," said Beauchamp, "because you have not said one word that is not just; but yet I must tell you, that this gentleman is my first cousin, and, unfortunately, heir to my estates and name."

Doctor Miles halted suddenly, and looked at his companion with some surprise.

"This takes me unprepared," he said; "I never heard of his having more than one cousin, namely, the present Lord Lenham; and he, I understood, was traveling in India for pleasure—a curious place to go for pleasure—but all men have their whims."

"It was not exactly a whim that led me thither, my dear doctor," said Beauchamp; "from the time I was twenty-one years of age up to the present hour, I have been a wanderer over the face of the earth, expiating in bitterness of heart one early error. I have not time now, and, I may say also, I have not spirits at the present moment to enter into the long detail of my past history. Let it suffice for the present to say, that a species of persecution, very difficult to avoid or bear, made me for many years a stranger to my native country. I visited every part of Europe and America, and then thought I would travel in the East, visiting scenes full of interest both from their novelty, in some respects, and from the vast antiquity to which their history and many of their monuments go back. As I found that all my movements were watched for the purpose of subjecting me to annoyance, I thought my residence in India a favorable opportunity for dropping my title and assuming another name, and have ever since gone by that of Beauchamp. During these wanderings my income has far exceeded my expenditure; a large sum of money has accumulated, and, on my return to England, I was advised to invest it in land. My attention was first directed to this estate, which I am desirous of purchasing, by finding a letter at my agents from my cousin Captain Moreton, expressing great penitence for all that has passed, professing a desire to retrieve his errors, lamenting the loss of the family property, and asking for a loan of five thousand pounds."

"I hope you did not give it him," cried Doctor Miles. "His penitence is all feigned; his reformation false; the money would go at the gambling-table in a week. I am not uncharitable in saying so, for I have had the opportunity of ascertaining, within this month, that the man is the same as ever."

"So I found on making inquiries," rejoined Beauchamp, "and consequently I refused decidedly. This refusal brought a most insolent and abusive letter, of which I took no notice; but having received intimation that the man is married, I made up my mind to the following course; to purchase this property, and if he have any children, to make it the condition of my giving him pecuniary assistance, that he shall give up one of them to be educated entirely by myself. Having insured that all shall be done to make that child a worthy member of society, I would settle the Moreton estate upon it, and thus, at all events, leave one of my name in a situation to do honor to it."

"A kind plan, and a good one," said Doctor Miles; "but yet people will call it a whimsical one, and wonder that you do not marry yourself, and transmit your property and name to children of your own."

A bright and cheerful smile came upon Beauchamp's face.

"Hitherto, my dear doctor," he said "that has been impossible. The obstacles, however, are now removed, at least I believe so; and, perhaps, some day I may follow the course you suggest, but that will make no difference in regard to my intention. If I have children of my own, they will have more than enough for happiness, and having conceived a scheme of this kind, I never like to abandon it. I will therefore purchase this property, if it can be ascertained that Mr. Wharton's title is perfectly clear; but perhaps you, as the clergyman of two parishes here, can obtain proofs for me, that all the collateral heirs to the estate, under the entail made by Sir Charles Moreton, are extinct beyond all doubt. Under those circumstances, the sale by my uncle and his son would be valid."

"Wharton would not have bought it without he was sure," said Doctor Miles.

"The sum actually paid was very small," replied Beauchamp, in a peculiar tone, "all the rest went to cover a debt, real or pretended, of Mr. Wharton's own. But here we are at the gates of the park, and so I must bring our conference to an end. To-morrow or the next day I will tell you more of my personal history, for there are other subjects on which I must consult you. Do you know who this is, riding up so fast?"

"A fool," said Doctor Miles; and almost as he spoke, a young, fresh-colored man, dressed in a green coat and leather breeches, and mounted on a splendid horse, with a servant behind him, cantered up, and sprang to the ground.

"I don't know—ah—whether I have the honor of speaking to Mr. Beauchamp—ah," he said, in a self-sufficient tone.

Beauchamp bowed his head, saying, "The same, sir."

"Then, sir—ah—my name is Granty—ah—and you see—ah—I have been referred to you—ah—as the friend of a certain Captain Hayward—ah—in reference to a little affair—ah—between him and my friend Harry Wittingham—ah—whom he threatened to horsewhip—ah."

"If he threatened," answered Beauchamp, in a calm tone, "he is a very likely man to fulfill his words—but I think, sir, we had better speak upon this subject alone, as Captain Hayward has put me in possession of his views. This is my friend, Doctor Miles, a clergyman."

"Oh, yes, I know Doctor Miles—ah," said Mr. Granty, "a very good fellow, aren't you, Miles—ah?"

"No, sir, I am not," answered Doctor Miles; "but now, Mr. Beauchamp, I will leave you, as you seem to have some pleasant conversation before you;" and, shaking Mr. Beauchamp by the hand without any further apparent notice of what he had heard, Doctor Miles walked to the side of his carriage and got in, honoring Mr. Granty with the sort of cold, stiff bow that a poker might be supposed to make if it were taught to dance a minuet. But Doctor Miles had noticed all that had passed, and did not forget it.

And now, dear reader, we will put our horses into a quicker pace, leap over all the further conversation between Mr. Beauchamp and Mr. Granty, and also an intervening space of two days, merely premising that, during that period, from a great number of knots on the tangled string of events, neither Mary Clifford nor Isabella Slingsby had any opportunity of speaking to Mr. Beauchamp for more than two minutes in private. Those two minutes were employed by Miss Clifford, to whose lot they fell, in telling him, with a hesitating and varying color, that she very much wished for a short conversation with him. Beauchamp was surprised, but he answered with courtesy and kindness, and wished her to proceed at once. Sir John Slingsby was upon them the next moment, however, and the matter was deferred.

Thus went the two days I have mentioned, but on the morning of the third, just about half-past five, when everybody but skylarks are supposed to be asleep, Mr. Beauchamp and our friend Ned Hayward entered the small meadow just under the trees by the palings of Tarningham Park, on the side next to Tarningham, near the spot where the river issued forth into the fields on its onward progress. They were followed by a man, carrying a mahogany case, bound with brass, and a gentleman in a black coat, with a surgical air about him; for strange human nature seldom goes out to make a hole in another piece of human nature, without taking precautions for mending it as soon as made.

Beauchamp took out his watch and satisfied himself that they were to their time, spoke a few words to the surgeon, unlocked the mahogany box, looked at some of the things it contained, and then walked up and down the field with Ned Hayward for a quarter of an hour.

"This is too bad, Hayward," he said, at length; "I think we might very well now retire."

"No, no," said Hayward, "give him law enough; one can never tell what may stop a man. He shall have another quarter of an hour. Then, if he does not come, he shall have the horsewhipping."

Ten minutes more passed, and then two other gentlemen entered the field, with a follower, coming up at a quick pace, and with heated brows.

"Beg pardon, gentlemen—ah," said Mr. Granty, advancing; "but we have had the devil's own work—ah—to get the tools—ah. My friend Wittingham was knocked down by a fellow—ah—that he was sending for cash, so that I had to furnish—ah—"

"Never mind all this," said Beauchamp, "you are now here, though you have kept my friend waiting. We had better proceed to business at once, as I have had a hint that, from a slight indiscretion on your part, sir, in mentioning this matter before a clergyman, inquiries have been made which may produce inconvenient results."

Mr. Granty was somewhat nettled; but neither Beauchamp nor Hayward attended to any of his "ahs;" the ground was measured, the pistols loaded, the two gentlemen placed on their ground, and then came the unpleasant "one—two—three." Both fired instantly, and the next moment Harry Wittingham reeled and dropped. Beauchamp thought he saw Ned

Hayward waver slightly, more as if the pistol had recoiled violently in his hand than anything else; but, as soon as his antagonist fell, the young officer ran up to him, stooped and raised his head.

The surgeon came up directly and opened the wounded man's coat and waistcoat, as he lay with his face as pale as ashes. At the same moment, however, there was a cry of "Hie, hie," and turning round, Beauchamp saw the poor little pot-boy, Billy Lamb, scampering across the field as hard as he could go.

"Run, run," cried the boy; "there are the magistrates and the constables all coming up—run over by the stile there; I brought the chaise to the end of the lane."

"I can't go," said Ned Hayward, "till I hear what is to come of this."

"You had better go," said the surgeon, looking up; "it does not seem to me to be dangerous, but you may get into prison if you stay. No, it has shattered the rib, but passed round. He will do well, I think. Run, run; I can see the people coming."

Beauchamp took Ned Hayward's arm and drew him away. In two minutes they had reached the chaise and were rolling on; but then Ned Hayward leaned back somewhat languidly, and said,

"I wish, Beauchamp, you would just tie your handkerchief tight round my shoulder here, for it is bleeding more than I thought, and I feel sickish."

"Good Heavens! are you hurt?" exclaimed Beauchamp, and opening his waistcoat, he saw that the whole right side of his shirt was steeped in blood.

CHAPTER XXVI.

I DO believe, from my very heart and soul, that there is not the slightest possible good in attempting to write a book regularly. I say, with prime ministers and maid-servants, with philosophers and fools, "I've tried it, and surely I ought to know." It may be objected, that the result entirely depends upon the way in which a thing is tried, and that a very simple experiment would fail, or might fail, in the hands of a fool or a maid-servant, which would succeed in those of a prime minister or a philosopher. Nevertheless, it is true that critics make rules which life will not conform to. Art says one thing, nature another; and, in such a case, a fig for art! Art may teach us how to embellish nature, or show us what to portray.

"Do not be continually changing the scene," says the critic; "do not run from character to character; introduce no personage who does not tend to bring about some result;" but in the course of human events the scene is always shifting; the characters which pass before our eyes, cross and return at every instant, and innumerable personages flit before us like shadows over a glass, leaving no trace of their having been. Others, indeed, appear for an instant, not only on the limited stage of domestic life, but often on the great scene of the world, act their appointed part, produce some particular effect, and then, like those strange visitants of our system, the comets, rush back into the depths from which they emerged but for a hour.

All this has been written to prove that it is perfectly right and judicious that I should introduce my beloved reader into the study of Mr. Wharton, or, rather, Abraham Wharton, Esq., solicitor, and attorney-at-law. Mr. Wharton was a small, spare, narrow man, of a tolerably gentlemanlike figure; and, to look at his back, one of those prepossessions which lead us all by the nose, made one believe that his face must be a thin, sharp, foxlike face, probably with a dark black beard, closely shaved, making the muzzle look blue.

On getting round in front, however, the surprise of the new acquaintance was great to see a red and blotchy countenance, with sharp black eyes, and very little beard at all. There was generally a secret simper upon his lips intended to be courteous; but that simper, like an exchequer bill, was very easily convertible, and a poor client, an inferior solicitor on the opposite side, or an unready debtor, soon found that it would be changed into heavy frowns or sarcastic grins.

Mr. Wharton was very proper and accurate in his dress. His coat was always black—even when he went out to hunt, which was not a rare occurrence, he never sported the red jacket. In riding, he would occasionally indulge in leather, elsewhere than from the knee downward; but the habiliment of the lower man was, upon all ordinary occasions, a pair of dark gray pantaloons. He was now so habited in his study, as he called the room behind that where seven clerks were seated, for the business he was engaged in was one in the ordinary course, though of extraordinary interest to Mr. Wharton. It was, in short, the consummation of plucking a poor bird which had been entrapped long before. Now it was not intended to leave him a feather, and yet Mr. Wharton was inclined to do the thing as decorously as possible. By decorously I do not mean tenderly—such an unnecessary delicacy never entered into Mr. Wharton's head. The decorum that he thought of was merely the seeming in the world's eyes, as a great deal of other decorum is, both male and female. He was about to be as hard, as relentless, as iron-hearted as a cannon-ball, but all with infinite professions of kindness and good feeling, and sorrow for the painful necessity, &c. &c. &c.; for Mr. Wharton followed Dr. Kitchener's barbarous recipe for devouring oysters, and "tickled his little favorites before he ate them."

The lawyer was standing at a table, with some papers before him—not too many—for he was not like those bankrupt attorneys of the capital, who fill their rooms with brown tin cases, marked in large white letters "House of Lords," be preferred as little show of business as possible. His object now-a-days was not to get practice, but to make money. Practice enough he had, too much for the common weal.

A clerk—a sort of private secretary, indeed—was sitting at the other end of the table, and the two had discussed one or two less important affairs, affecting a few hundred pounds, when Mr. Wharton at length observed, "I think to-morrow is the last day with Sir John Slingsby, Mr. Pilkington, is it not?"

He knew quite well that it was; but it would seem he wished to hear his clerk's opinion upon the subject.

"Yes, sir," answered Mr. Pilkington, "I don't see a chance for him."

"Nor I either," answered Mr. Wharton; "I am afraid he is quite run out, poor man. The six months' notice of foreclosure was all right, and the interest now amounts to a large sum."

"A very large sum, indeed, sir, with the costs," answered Mr. Pilkington; "you don't think, sir, he'll attempt to revise the costs or haggle about the interest."

"He can't, Mr. Pilkington," replied Mr. Wharton, dryly, "the costs are all secured by bond and accounts passed, and it was a client of mine who advanced him the money at seven and a half to pay the interest every six months on my mortgage. I had nothing to do with the transaction."

Mr. Pilkington smiled, and Mr. Wharton proceeded.

"Why you know quite well, Pilkington, that it was Dyer who advanced the money, and his bankruptcy brought the bonds into my hands."

"I thought there was only one bond, sir," answered Mr. Pilkington. "You told me to have a fresh bond every six months for the running interest and the arrears, and the interest upon former advances, to guard against loss."

Mr. Wharton now smiled and nodded his head, saying, for he was vain of his shrewdness, and vanity is a weak passion, "True, true, Pilkington; but last half-year I saw that things were coming to a close, and therefore thought it better to have two bonds. It looks more regular, though the other is the most convenient mode."

"And, beside, it secures the interest on the last half-year's interest," said Pilkington; but to this observation Mr. Wharton made no reply, turning to another part of the same subject.

"Just bid Raymond to step down to Mr. Wittingham's," said the lawyer, "and tell him, with my compliments, I should be glad to speak with him for a minute. I must give him a hint of what is going on."

"Why, sir," said Mr. Pilkington, hesitating, "you know he has a bond, too, out on the same day, and he'll be sure to go before you, having also a bill of sale."

"I know, I know," answered Mr. Wharton; "but I should like him to be the first, Pilkington."

"Will there be enough to cover all?" asked the clerk, doubtfully.

"Ample," answered his great man; "beside, the whole sum coming thundering down at once will insure that no one will be fool enough to help. I have heard, indeed, something about a friend who would advance money to pay Wittingham's bond. Let him!—all the better, that cannot supersede my debt. Wittingham will get his money, and Sir John won't easily find much more on any security he has to offer. Beside, when some one begins, it gives the very best reason for others going on, and Wittingham won't be slow, depend upon it. Tell Mr. Raymond to fetch him."

The clerk retired, not venturing to urge any more objections; but when he returned again, Mr. Wharton himself continued the conversation thus:

"Wittingham is a curious person to deal with; one does not always know what can be his objects."

Mr. Wharton had always an object himself, and, therefore, he fancied that no man could act without one. He never took the impulse of passion, or the misdirection of folly, or the pigheadedness of obstinacy, into account. However, with Mr. Wittingham he was in some degree right, as to his generally having an object; but he was in some degree wrong also; for all the other causes of human wrong-going, passion, folly, and pigheadedness, had their share in the modes, methods, and contrivances by which the worthy magistrate sought his ends.

"Now, what can be the meaning," continued Mr. Wharton, "of his opposing so strongly all steps against this Mr. Beauchamp and that Captain Hayward, who were engaged in the duel with his son?"

"They say he had quarreled with Harry Wittingham, and disinherited him," replied the clerk; "and old Mrs. Billiter, the housekeeper, is quite furious about it. She declares that it is all old Wittingham's fault; that if it had not been for him, nothing of the kind would have happened; and that he murdered the young man. I do not know what it all means; but they say she will nurse Harry Wittingham through it after all."

Mr. Wharton mused for a minute or two, and then said,

"You do not mean he is out of danger?"

"Oh dear, no, sir," answered Mr. Pilkington, who perceived a slightly dissatisfied twang in his superior's question; "Mr. Slattery, the surgeon, said he might sink at any time for the next ten days."

"Humph, said Mr. Wharton, "that is all right. It will keep the others out of the way for some time to come; and a very good thing, too, for Mr. Beauchamp himself. He it is who is treating for the Moreton Hall estate; there is a little hitch in the business, which will be soon removed; but he seems to me just the sort of man who would take Sir John Slingsby's mortgage as an investment, as soon as the other. At all events, he might create difficulties in a business which had better be settled as soon as possible for all parties, and might burn his own fingers, poor man, into the bargain. You had the bills posted up, Pilkington?"

"Oh, yes, sir," replied the clerk, "for twenty miles round, offering a reward. There is no fear, sir. They are safe enough—most likely in France by this time."

Mr. Wharton seemed satisfied; and, after a few minutes, worthy Mr. Wittingham entered the office, and was thence ushered into the study; but, alas! it was no longer the Mr. Wittingham of former days. The somewhat fresh complexion; the stiff, consequential carriage; the vulgar swagger, were all gone; and Mr. Wittingham looked a very sick old gentleman, indeed; weak in the knees, bent in the back, and sallow in the face. The wig was ill-adjusted, the Melton coat a world too wide; you could have put a finger between the knee-bands of the breeches and the stockings; and the top-boots slipped down almost to the ancles. It was marvelous how one who had been so tall and thin before could have become, to the eye, so much taller and thinner. The great Prince of Parma wrote dispatches, reviewed troops, and conducted a negotiation within one hour before a long and lingering malady terminated in death. He knew he was dying, and yet went through all his ordinary business, as if he had only to dress and go out to a party instead of into his grave. This was a wonderful instance of the persistence of character under bodily infirmity, or rather of its triumph over corporeal decay. But that of Mr. Wittingham was more remarkable. The external Wittingham was wofully changed: his oldest friend would not have known him; but the internal Wittingham was still the same; there was not a tittle of difference. He was not in the least softened, he was not in the least brightened; his was one of those granite natures, hard to cut and impossible to polish. Although he had very little of the diamond in him, yet, as the diamond can only be shaped by the powder of the diamond, nothing but Wittingham could touch Wittingham. His own selfishness was the only means by which he was accessible.

"Ah, Mr. Wharton," he said, "you sent for me; what is in the wind now? Not about these two young men any more, I trust. That account is closed. I will have nothing to do with it. Henry Wittingham called out this Captain Hayward; Captain Hayward was fool enough to go out with Henry Wittingham. They each had a shot, and the balance struck was a pistol-ball against Henry Wittingham. Perhaps, if all the items had been reckoned, the account might have been heavier; but I am not going to open the books again, I should not find anything to the credit of my son, depend upon it."

"Oh, no, my good friend," said Mr. Wharton, in the most amiable tone possible; "I knew the subject was disagreeable to you, and therefore never returned to the business again. The other magistrates did what they thought their duty required, in offering a reward, &c.; but as you had a delicacy in meddling where your son was concerned, the matter was not pressed upon you."

"Delicacy! fiddlesticks' ends!" retorted Mr. Wittingham. "I never had a delicacy in my life! I did not choose! That is the proper word. But if it was not about this, why did you send for me?"

"Why, my dear sir," said Mr. Wharton, "I thought it due in honor to give you a hint—as I know you are a large creditor of Sir John Slingsby—that matters are not going altogether well there."

"I have known that these six years," answered the magistrate; "honor, indeed! You have a great deal to do with honor, and delicacy, and all that; but I am a man of business, and look to things as matters of business. Speak more plainly, Wharton! what is there going worse than usual at the Park! Does he want to borrow more money?"

"He did a fortnight ago, and could not get it," replied Mr. Wharton, drily; for the most impudent rogue in the world does not like to feel himself thoroughly understood. "But the short and the long of the matter is this, my good sir: Sir John can go on no longer. Six months' notice of foreclosure is out to-morrow; other steps must be taken immediately; large arrears of interest are due; two or three bonds with judgment are hanging over our poor friend; and you had better look after yourself."

"Well, well, there is time enough yet," said Mr. Wittingham, in a much less business-like tone than Mr. Wharton expected; "the preliminaries of the law are somewhat lengthy, Mr. Wharton! fi-fas and ca-sas take some time; and I will think of the matter."

"As you please, my good friend," answered Wharton; "only just let me hint, that all the preliminaries have been already gone through. An execution will be put in early to-morrow; there are a good many creditors, and there may be a sort of scramble, as the school-boys have it, where the quickest runner gets the biggest nut. I thought it but kind and fair to tell you, as a neighbor and a friend, especially as your debt is no trifle, I think."

"An execution early to-morrow!" exclaimed Mr. Wittingham; "won't the estate pay all?"

"About two thirds, I imagine," said Wharton, telling, as was his wont, a great lie with the coolest face possible.

"And what will Sir John do?" said the magistrate, "and poor Miss Slingsby?"

"I am afraid we must touch Sir John's person," replied the lawyer, with a sneer; "and as to poor Miss Slingsby, I see nothing for it, but that she should go out as a governess. But do not let us talk nonsense, Wittingham. You are a man of sense and of business. I have given you a caution, and you will act upon it. That is all I have to do with the matter."

To Mr. Wharton's surprise, however, he did not find Mr. Wittingham so ready to act in the way he hinted as had been anticipated. The old gentleman hesitated, and doubted, and seemed so uneasy that the solicitor began to fear he had mistaken his character totally, to apprehend that, after all, he might be a kind-hearted, benevolent old gentleman. The reader, however, who has duly remarked the conversation between the magistrate on his sick-bed and worthy Dr. Miles, may, perhaps, perceive other causes for Mr. Wittingham's hesitation. He had found that Sir John Slingsby possessed a secret which might hang his son. Now, although I do not mean at all to say that Mr. Wittingham wished his son to die, in any way, or that he would not have been somewhat sorry for his death, by any means, yet he would have much preferred that the means were not those of strangulation. To have his son hanged, would be to have his own consideration hanged. In short, he did not at all wish to be the father of a man who had been hanged; and consequently he was somewhat afraid of driving Sir John Slingsby into a corner. But each man, as Pope well knew, has some ruling passion, which is strong even in death. Sir John Slingsby owed Mr. Wittingham five thousand pounds; and Mr. Wittingham could not forget that fact. As he thought of it, it increased, swelled out, grew heavy, like a nightmare. To lose five thousand pounds at one blow! What was any other consideration to that! What was the whole Newgate-calendar, arranged as a genealogical tree and appended to his name either as ancestry or posterity? Nothing, nothing! Dust in the balance! A feather in an air-pump! Mr. Wittingham grew exceedingly civil to his kind friend, Mr. Wharton; he compassionated poor Sir John Slingsby very much; he was sorry for Miss Slingsby; but he did not in the least see why, when other people were about to help themselves, he should not have his just right. He chatted over the matter with Mr. Wharton, and obtained an opinion from him, without a fee, as to the best mode of proceeding—and Mr. Wharton's opinions on such points were very sound; but in this case particularly careful. Then Mr. Wittingham went home, sent for his worthy solicitor, Mr. Bacon, whom he had employed for many years, as cheaper and safer than Mr. Wharton, and gave him instructions, which set the poor little attorney's hair on end.

Mr. Bacon knew Mr. Wittingham, however; he had been accustomed to manage him at petty sessions; and he was well aware that it was necessary to set Mr. Wittingham in opposition to Mr. Wittingham, before he could hope that any one's opinion would be listened to. When those two respectable persons had a dispute together, there was some chance of a third being attended to who stepped in as an umpire.

But, in the present case, Mr. Bacon was mistaken. He did not say one word of the pity, and the shame, and the disgrace of taking Sir John Slingsby quite by surprise; but he started various legal difficulties; and, indeed, some formidable obstacles to the very summary proceedings which Mr. Wittingham contemplated. But that gentleman was as a gun loaded with excellent powder and well-crammed down shot, by Mr. Wharton; and the priming was dry and fresh. Mr. Bacon's difficulties were swept away in a moment; his obstacles leaped over; and the solicitor was astonished at the amount of technical knowledge which his client had obtained in a few hours.

There was nothing to be done but obey. Mr. Wittingham was too good a card to throw out; Sir John Slingsby was evidently ruined beyond redemption; and with a sorrowful heart—for Mr. Bacon was, at bottom, a kind and well-disposed man—he took his way to his office with his eyes roaming from one side of the street to the other, as if he were looking for some means of escaping from a disagreeable task. As they thus roamed, they fell upon Billy Lamb, the little deformed pot-boy. The lawyer eyed him for a minute or so as he walked along, compared him in imagination with one of his own clerks—a tall, handsome-looking fellow, with a simpering face—thought that Billy would do best, though he was much more like a wet capon than a human being; and, beckoning the boy into his office, retired with him into an inner room, where Mr. Bacon proceeded so cautiously and diffidently, that, had not Billy Lamb's wits been as sharp as his face, he would have been puzzled to know what the solicitor wanted him to do.

CHAPTER XXVII.

It was a dark, cold, cheerless night, though the season was summer, and the preceding week had been very warm—one of those nights when a cold cutting north-east wind has suddenly broken through the sweet dream of bright days, and checked the blood in the trees and plants, withering them with the presage of winter. From noon till eventide that wind had blown; and although it had died away toward night, it had left the sky dark and the air chilly. Not a star was to be seen in the expanse above; and, though the moon was up, yet the light she gave only served to show that heavy clouds were floating over the heavens, the rounded edges of the vapors becoming every now and then of a dim white, without the face of the bright orb ever being visible for a moment. A dull, damp moist hung about the ground; and there was a faint smell, not altogether unpleasant, but sickly and oppressive, rose up, resembling that which is given forth by some kinds of water-plants, and burdened the cold air.

In the little church-yard, at the back of Stephen Gimlet's cottage, there was a light burning, though ten o'clock had struck some quarter of an hour before; and an elderly man, dressed, notwithstanding the chilliness of the night, merely in a waistcoat with striped sleeves, might have been seen by that light, which was nested in a horse-lantern, and perched upon a fresh-turned heap of earth. His head and shoulders were above the ground, and part of his rounded back, with ever and anon the rise and fall of a heavy pickaxe, appeared among the nettles and long hemlocks which overrun the church-yard. His legs and feet were buried in a pit which he was digging; and busily the sexton labored away to hollow out the grave, muttering to himself, from time to time, and sometimes even singing, at his gloomy work. He was an old man, but he had no one to help him, and in truth he needed it not, for he was hale and hearty, and he put such a good-will to his task, that it went on rapidly. The digging of a grave was to him a sort of festival. He held brotherhood with the worm, and gladly prepared the board for his kindred's banquet.

The grave-digger had gone on for some time when, about the hour I have mentioned, some one paused at the side of the low mossy wall, about a hundred yards from the cottage of the new gamekeeper, and looked over toward the lantern. Whoever the visitor was, he seemed either to hesitate or to consider, for he remained with his arms leaning on the coping for full five minutes before he opened the little wooden-gate close by, and, walking in, went up to the side of the grave. The sexton heard him well enough; but I never saw a sexton who was not a humorist, and he took not the least notice, working away as before.

"Why, what are you about, old gentleman?" said a man's voice, at length.

"Don't you see!" rejoined the sexton, looking up. "Practicing the oldest trade in the world but one—digging to be sure—aye, and grave-digging, too, which is a very ancient profession likewise, though when first it began men lived so long, the sextons must have been but poor craftsmen for want of practice."

"And whose grave is it you are digging!" asked the visitor. "I have been here some days and have not heard of any deaths."

"One would think you were a doctor," answered the sexton, "for you seem to fancy that you must have a hand in every death in the parish—but you want to know whose grave it is—well, I can't tell you, for I don't know myself."

"But who ordered you to dig it, then?" demanded the stranger.

"No one," said the sexton; "it will fit somebody, I warrant, and I shall get paid for it; and why should not I keep a ready-made grave as a town-cobbler keeps ready-made shoes? I am digging it out of my own fancy. There will be death somewhere before the week is out, I am sure; for I dreamed last night that I saw a wedding come to this church, and the bride and the bridegroom stepped on each of the grave-hillocks as they walked—so there will be a death, that's certain, and, may be, two."

"And so you are digging the grave on speculation, old fellow?" exclaimed the other, "but I dare say you have a shrewd guess of whom it is for. There is some poor fellow ill in the neighborhood—or some woman in a bad way, ha?"

"It may be for the young man lying wounded up at Buxton's inn," answered the sexton. "They say he is better; but I should not wonder if it served his turn, after all. But I don't know, there is never any telling who may go next. I've seen funny things in my day. Those who thought they had a long lease find it was a short one; those who were wishing for other people's deaths, that they might get their money, die first themselves."

The sexton paused, and the stranger did not make any answer, looking gloomily down into the pit, as if he did not much like the last reflections that rose up from the bottom of the grave.

"Aye, funny things enough I have seen," continued the sexton, after giving a stroke or two with the pickaxe; "but the funniest of all is, to see how folks take on at first for those who are gone, and how soon they get over it. Lord, what a lot of tears I have seen shed on this little bit of ground! and how soon they were dried up, like a shower in the sunshine. I recollect now there was a young lady sent down here for change of air by the London doctors, after they had poisoned her with their stuff, I dare say. A pretty creature she was as ever I set eyes on, and did not seem ill, only a bit of a cough. Her mother came with her, and then her lover, who was to be married to her when she got well. But at six months' end she died—there she lies, close on your left—and he lover, wasn't he terrible downcast? and he said to me when we had put her comfortably in the ground, 'I shan't be long after her, sexton; keep me that place beside her—there's a guinea for you.' He did not come back, however, for five years, and then I saw him one day go along the road in a chaise-and-four, with a fine lady by his side, as gay as a lark."

"Well, you would not have the man go on whimpering all his life?" said the other. "How old are you, sexton?"

"Sixty and eight last January," answered the other, "and I have dug these graves forty years come St. John."

"Have you many old men in the parish?" asked the stranger.

"The oldest is eighty-two," replied the sexton, "and she is a woman."

"Six from eighty-two," said the stranger, in a contemplative tone, "that leaves seventy-six. That will do very well."

"Will it?" said the sexton. "Well, you know best; but I should like to see a bit more of your face;" and as he spoke the old man suddenly raised his lantern toward the stranger, and then burst out into a laugh. "Ay, I thought I knew the voice!" he said; "and so you've come back again, captain? Well now, this is droll enough! That bone you've got your foot upon belongs to your old wet-nurse, Sally Loames, if I know this ground; and she had as great a hand in damaging you as any one of the rest. She was a bad one! But what has brought you down, now that all the money's gone, and the property too?"

"Why, I'll tell you," answered Captain Moreton—"I'll tell you, my good old Grindley. I want to see into the vaults where the coffins are, and just to have a look at the register. Can't you help me? You used always to have the keys."

"No, no, captain," rejoined the sexton, shaking his head—"no tricks! no tricks! I'm not going to put my head into a noose for nothing."

"Nobody wants you to put your head in a noose, Grindley," answered the other: "all I want is just to take a look at the coffins for a minute, and another at the register; for I have had a hint that I have been terribly cheated, and that people have put my great-grandfather's death six years too early, which makes all the difference to me; for if my mother was born while he was living, she could not break the entail, do you see?"

"Well, then," said the sexton, "you can come to-morrow, captain; and I'll tell the doctor any hour you like."

"That won't do, Grindley," replied Moreton; "the parson is with the enemy; and, beside, I must not let anybody know that I have seen the register and the coffins till I have everything prepared to upset their roguery. You would not have me lose my own, would you, old boy? Then as to your doing it for nothing, if you will swear not to tell that I have seen the things at all till I am ready and give you leave, you shall have a ten-pound note."

It is a strange and terrible thing, that the value of that which has no value except as it affects us in this world and this life, increases enormously in our eyes as we are leaving it. The sexton had always been more or less a covetous man, as Captain Moreton well knew; but the passion had increased upon him with years, and the bait of the ten-pound note was not to be resisted. He took up the lantern, he got out of the grave, and looked carefully round. It was late at night—all was quiet—nothing seemed stirring; and approaching close to Moreton's side, he said, in a whisper,

"No one knew that you were coming here, eh, captain?"

"Nobody in the world," replied the other "I called at your house an hour ago, and the girl told me you were down here; but I said I would call on you again to-morrow."

"And you only want to look at the coffins and the book?" continued the sexton.

"Nothing else in the world," said Moreton, in an easy tone; "perhaps I may take a memorandum in my pocket-book, that's all."

"Well, then, give us the note, and come along," replied the sexton; "there can be no harm in that."

Moreton slipped something into his hand, and they moved toward a little door in the side of the church, opposite to that on which stood the cottage of Stephen Gimlet. Here the sexton drew a large bunch of keys out of his pocket and opened the door, holding up the lantern to let his companion see the way in.

Moreton whistled a bit of an opera air; but the old man put his hand on his arm, saying, in a low tone, "Hush! hush! what's the use of such noise?" and leading the way to the opposite corner, he chose one of the smallest of the keys on his bunch, and stooped down, kneeling on one knee, by the side of a large stone in the pavement, marked with a cross and a star, and having a keyhole in it covered with a brass plate made to play in the stone. The old man put in the key and turned it; but when he attempted to lift the slab, it resisted.

"There, you must get it up for yourself," he said, rising, "I can't; take hold of the key, and with your young arm you'll soon get it up, I dare say."

Moreton did as the other directed, and raised the slab without difficulty. When he had done, he quietly put the keys in his pocket, saying, "Give me the lantern!"

But Mr. Grindley did not like the keys being in Captain Moreton's pocket, and though he did not think it worth while to make a piece of work about it, yet he kept the lantern and went down first. A damp close smell met them on the flight of narrow stone steps, which the old lords of the manor had built down in their place of long repose; and the air was so dark, that it seemed as if the blackness of all the many long nights which had passed since the vault was last opened had accumulated and thickened there.

For some moments the faint light of the lantern had no effect upon the solid gloom; but, as soon as it began to melt, the old man walked on, saying, "This way, captain. I think it used to stand hereabout, upon the trestles to the right. That is your father's to the left, and then there's your mother's; and next there's your little sister, who died when she was a baby, all lying snug together. The Moretons, that is, the old Moretons, are over here. Here is your grandfather—a jolly old dog; I recollect him well, with his large stomach and his purple face—and then his lady; I did not know her; and then two or three youngsters. You see, young and old, they all come here one time or another. This should be your great grandfather," and he held up the lantern to the top of one of the coffins. "No," he said, after a brief examination, "that is the colonel, who was killed in '45. Why they put him here I don't know, for he died long before your great grandfather. But here the old gentleman is. He lived to a great age, I know."

"Let me see," said Captain Moreton; and, approaching the side of the coffin, he made the old man hold the lantern close to the plate upon the top. The greater part of the light was shed upon the coffin lid, though some rays stole upward and cast a sickly glare upon the two faces that hung over the last resting-place of the old baronet. Captain Moreton put his hand in his pocket, at the same time pointing with the other to a brass plate, gilt, which bore a short inscription upon it, somewhat obscure from dust and verdigris.

"There! it is quite plain," he said, "1766!"

The old sexton had been fumbling for a pair of spectacles, and now he mounted them on his nose and looked closer, saying, "No, captain, 1760."

"Nonsense!" said the other, sharply; "it is the dust covers the tail of the six. I'll show you in a minute;" and as quick as light he drew the other hand from his pocket, armed with a sharp steel instrument of a very peculiar shape. It was like a stamp for cutting pastry, only much smaller, with a sharp edge formed like a broken sickle. Before the old man could see what he was about to do, he pressed his hand, and the instrument it contained, tight upon the plate, gave it a slight turn, and withdrew it.

"Lord 'a mercy! what have you done?" exclaimed the sexton.

"Nothing, but taken off the dust," answered Moreton, with a laugh; "look at it now. Is it not 66 plain enough?"

"Ay, that it is," said Grindley. "But this won't do, captain, this won't do."

"By —— it shall do," replied the other, fiercely; "and if you say one word, you will not only lose the money, but get hanged into the bargain; for the moment I hear you've 'peached I'll make a full confession, and say you put me up to the trick. So now, my old boy, you are in for it, and had better go through with it like a man. If we both hold our tongues nothing can happen. We slip out together, and no one knows a syllable; but, if we are fools, and chatter, and don't help each other, we shall both get into an infernal scrape. You will suffer most, however, I'll take care of that. Then, on the contrary, if I get back what they have cheated me and my father out of, you shall have £100 for your pains."

At first the sexton was inclined to exclaim and protest; but Captain Moreton went on so long that he had time to reflect—and, being a man of quick perceptions, to make up his mind. At first, too, he looked angrily in his companion's face, through his spectacles, holding up the lantern to see him well; but gradually he dropped the light and his eyes together to the coffin-lid, examined it thoughtfully, and in the end said, in a low, quiet, significant voice, "I think, captain, the tail of that six looks somewhat bright and sharp, considering how old it is."

The compact was signed and sealed by those words; and Moreton replied, "I have thought of all that, old gentleman. It shall be as green as the rest by to-morrow morning."

Thus saying, he took out a small vial of a white liquid, dropped a few drops on the plate, and rubbed them into the deep mark he had made. Then, turning gayly to his companion, he exclaimed, "Now for the register."

Grindley made no reply; and they walked up into the church again, put down the slab of stone, locked it, and advanced toward the vestry. There, however, the old man paused at the door, saying, in a low shaking voice, "I can't, captain! I can't! It is forgery, nothing else. I'll stay here; you go and do what you like; you've the keys."

"Where are the books kept?" asked the other, speaking low.

"In the great chest," said the sexton; "it must be the second book from the top."

"Can I find pen and ink?" inquired Moreton.

"On the table, on the table," answered Grindley. "Matthew Lomax had a child christened two days ago. But it won't never look like the old ink."

"Never you fear," said the other worthy, "I am provided;" and taking the lantern, he opened the vestry-door and went in.

Captain Moreton set down the lantern on a little table covered with green cloth, and proceeded about his work quietly and deliberately. He was no new offender, though this was a new offence. He had none of the young timidity of incipient crime about him. He had done a great many unpleasant things on great inducements; pigeoned confiding friends; made friendships for the sake of pigeoning; robbed Begums, as was the custom in those days; shot two or three intimate acquaintances who did not like being wronged, and was, moreover, a man of a hardy constitution, so that his nerves were strong and unshaken. He tried two or three keys before he found the one which fitted the lock of the chest. He took out two volumes of registers, and examined the contents, soon found the passage he was looking for, and then searched for the pen and ink, which, after all, were not upon the table. Then he tried the pen upon his thumb-nail, and took out his little bottle again, for it would seem that within that vent was some fluid which had a double operation, namely, that of corroding brass and rendering ink palid. The register was laid open before him, a stool drawn to the table, his hand pressed tight upon the important page, and the pen between his fingers and thumb to keep all steady in the process of converting 1760 into 1766, when an unfortunate fact struck him, namely, that there were a great many insertions between the two periods. He paused to consider how this was to be overcome, when suddenly he heard an exclamation from without, and the sound of running steps in the church, as if some one was scampering away in great haste. He had forgotten—it was the only thing he had forgotten—to turn his face to the door, and he was in the act of attempting to remedy this piece of neglect, by twisting his head over his shoulder, when he received a blow upon the cheek which knocked him off his stool, and stretched him on the pavement of the vestry. He started up instantly; but before he could see anything or anybody, the lantern was knocked over, and the door of the vestry shut and bolted, leaving him a prisoner in the dark.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Tarningham Park was exceedingly quiet; for Sir John Slingsby was out at dinner some five miles off, and his merry activity being removed, every living thing seemed to think itself entitled to take some repose. Mrs. Clifford, who had been far from well for several days, and had not quitted her room during the whole morning, had gone to bed; Mary and Isabella were conversing quietly—perhaps sadly—in the drawing-room, the butler snored in the pantry, the ladies' maids and footmen were enjoying a temporary calm in their several spheres, and cook, scullions, and housemaids were all taxing their energies to do nothing, with the most meritorious perseverance. Even the hare hopped more deliberately upon the lawns, and the cock-pheasants strutted with more tranquil grandeur. Every one seemed to know that Sir John Slingsby was absent, and that there was no need to laugh, or talk, or dance, or sing, or eat, or drink, more than was agreeable. The very air seemed to participate in the general feeling, for, whereas it had been somewhat boisterous and keen during the day, it sunk into a calm, heavy, chilly sleep toward night, and the leaves rested motionless upon the trees, as if weary of battling with the wind.

"We will have a fire, Mary," said Isabella; "though it be summer in the calendar, it is winter in the field, and I do not see why we should regulate our comfort by the almanac. Papa will not be home till twelve, and though he will be warm enough, I dare say, that will do nothing for us."

As she spoke she rose to ring the bell; but at the same moment another bell rang, being that of the chief entrance, and both Miss Slingsby and her cousin looked aghast at the idea of a visitor. Some time elapsed before their apprehensions were either confirmed or removed; for there was a good deal of talking at the glass door; but at first the servant did not choose to come in with any explanation. At length, however, a footman appeared in very white stockings and laced kneebands, saying, with a grin, "If you please, ma'am, there is little Billy Lamb at the door wishes to see you. He asked for Sir John first. I told him he couldn't, for you were engaged; but he said he was sure you would, and teased me just to tell you he was here."

"Billy Lamb!" said Isabella. "Who is that? Oh, I remember: is not that the poor boy at the White Hart?"

"Yes, ma'am," replied the footman, "the little humpback that you gave half-a-crown to one day, when he was whistling so beautiful."

"Oh, I will see him, of course," said Isabella, much to the footman's amazement, who could not see the "of course;" "I will come out and speak with him."

"Have him brought in here, Bella," said Mary; "I know the poor boy well, and his mother, too. The poor daughter is dead; she married badly, I believe, and died two or three years ago."

"Bring him in," said Miss Slingsby to the servant, and the man retired to fulfill her commands. As Billy Lamb entered the room, the two fair girls, both so beautiful, yet so unlike each other, advanced toward the door to meet him, and stood before the poor deformed boy leaning slightly toward each other, with their arms linked together. The boy remained near the entrance, and the footman held the door open behind him till Miss Slingsby nodded her head as an intimation that his presence was not required.

"Well, William," said Isabella, as the man departed, "how are you, and what is it you want?"

"And your poor mother, William," said Mary Clifford, "I have not seen her a long while; how is she?"

"She is much better, thank you, ma'am," replied the boy. "She is reconciled with Stephen now, and has gone to be with him up in the cottage, and take care of his little boy, my poor sister's orphan, and so she is much better." Then turning to Isabella, he went on; "I am quite well, thank you, miss; but, somehow, my heart is very down just now, for I came up to tell Sir John something very terrible and very bad."

"Is it magistrate's business, William? or can I give you any help?" asked Isabella.

"Oh dear no, Miss Slingsby," replied the boy; "it is not about myself at all, but about Sir John;" and he looked up in her face with his clear, bright, intelligent eyes, as if beseeching her to understand him without forcing him to further explanations.

But Isabella did not understand him at all; and she inquired, "What do you mean, my good lad? I am sure my father will be glad to do anything he can for you; and I do not think that you would yourself do anything very terrible and very bad, such as you speak of."

"Hush, Isabella," said her cousin, whose heart was a more apprehensive one than her cousin's, and who had some glimmering of dangers or sorrows hidden under the boy's obscure words: "Let him explain himself. Tell us, William, exactly what you mean. If wrong has been done you, we will try to make it right; but you spoke of my uncle: has anything happened to Sir John?"

"No, Miss Mary," replied Billy Lamb; "but I fear evil may happen to him if something is not done to stop it."

"But of what kind?" asked Isabella, anxiously: "tell us all about it. What is it you fear? Where did you get your information?"

"From Mr. Bacon," answered the boy, simply, "the little lawyer at Tarningham, ma'am. He's not a bad man, nor an unkind man either, like Mr. Wharton; and, though he did not just bid me come up and tell Sir John, yet he said he very much wished he knew what was going to happen. Then he said he could not write about it, for it was no business of his, as he was but acting for others, and he did not like to send a message, because—"

"But what is it?" exclaimed Mary Clifford and Isabella together. "In pity's name, my good boy, do not keep us in suspense."

"Why, ma'am, he said," continued the boy, in a sad tone, and casting down his eyes, "that to-morrow there would be an execution put in here—that means that they will seize everything. I know that, for they did so six months after my father died. Then he said that very likely Sir John would be arrested, unless he could pay five thousand pounds down at once."

Isabella sunk down in a chair overwhelmed, exclaiming, "Good Heaven!"

"This is what Captain Hayward told us of!" said Mary Clifford, putting her hand to her brow, and speaking rather to herself than to her cousin. "How unfortunate that he should be absent now. This duel, depend upon it, has prevented him from taking the means he proposed for averting this blow. I feel sure he could and would have done so as he promised."

"Oh, whatever Ned Hayward promised he was able to perform," answered Isabella; "nothing but some unfortunate circumstance, such as this duel, has prevented him. He is as true and open as the day, Mary. What would I not give for but five minutes' conversation with him now."

"Would you? Would you?" said the musical voice of the poor boy. "I think, if you want them, you can have them very soon."

"Oh, you dear good boy!" cried Isabella, starting up, "send him here directly, if you know where he is. Tell him that my father's safety depends entirely upon him: tell him we are ruined if he does not come."

"I do not think I can send him," said the boy, in a disappointed tone. "I don't think he can come; but if you like to go and see him, I will venture to take you where he is; for I am sure you would not do him a great injury, and say anything of where he is hid."

"Go to him?" exclaimed Isabella; "why, it is growing quite dark, my good William. How can I go? But this is folly and weakness," she exclaimed the next moment, "when my father's liberty and character are at stake, shall I hesitate to go anywhere? I will go, William. Where is it? Is it far?"

"Stay, dear Isabella," said her cousin, "if needful, I will go with you. This is a case which I think may justify what would be otherwise improper. But let me ask one or two questions. You say Mr. Bacon told you this, William. If he wished my uncle to know the facts, why did he not send one of his clerks?"

"Why, he said, Miss Mary, that he had no right," answered the boy; "he seemed in a great flurry, and as if he did not well know what to do; but he asked if I had seen Sir John in town; for he generally comes to the White Hart, you know; and told me to let him know if I chanced to meet with him in town, because he wanted to speak with him exceedingly. And then he went on that he did not know that he ought to tell him either; for he had got an execution to take to-morrow, here, and to have a writ against him the first thing to-morrow, and a great deal more that I forget. But he said he was very sorry, and would almost give one of his hands not to have it to do. At last he said I was not to tell anybody in the town what he had said, but that I might tell Sir John if I saw him, so I came away here, miss, as soon as I could."

"But where is Captain Hayward to be found, then?" asked Miss Clifford. "You must tell us that before we can make up our minds, William."

"I may as well tell you as take you," replied the boy, "but I must go on before to say you are coming. He is at Ste Gimlet's, with him and my mother, and has been there ever since he shot Mr. Wittingham."

"Oh, I shall not mind going there," cried Isabella, "it will not call for observation from the servants; but if he had been at an inn, it would have been terrible."

Mary Clifford smiled; for she was one of those who valued proprieties nearly at their right worth, if not quite. She never violated them rashly; for no pleasure, or amusement, or mere personal gratification, would she transgress rules which society had framed, even though she might think them wrong or foolish; but with a great object, a good purpose, and a clear heart, she was ready to set them at naught. "I will go very willingly with you, dear Bella," she said. "Captain Hayward went to London, I know, for the express purpose of providing the means of averting this calamity; but, from some words which he let drop, I fancy he believed that it was not likely to fall upon us so soon. There is no way that I see of aiding your father but by seeing and consulting with this old friend. You said all this would happen early to-morrow, William?" she continued, turning again to the boy.

"As soon as it was light, Miss Mary," replied poor Billy Lamb.

"Oh, Heaven, I will order the carriage directly," said Isabella; "run on, there's a good lad, and tell Captain Hayward I am coming. You can tell him why, and all about it."

The boy retired, and sped away by the shortest paths toward his brother-in-law's cottage. In the mean while the carriage was ordered; but Sir John had got the chariot with him; the barouche had not been out for some time, and the coachman thought fit to dust it. Three quarters of an hour passed ere the lamps were lighted and all was ready, and then a footman, with gold-laced hat in hand, stood by the side of the vehicle, to hand the ladies in and accompany them. Isabella, however, told him that he would not be wanted, and gave the order to drive to Stephen Gimlet's cottage.

"Ay!" said the footman, as he turned into the house again, "Billy Lamb's mother is there. Now they'll do the young ladies out of a guinea or two, I'll warrant. What fools women are, to be sure!"

While he thus moralized, the carriage rolled slowly on in the dark night, drawn by two tall pursy horses, and driven by a coachman of the same qualities, neither of whom at all approved of being unexpectedly taken out at that hour of the night; for dinner parties were rare in the neighborhood of Tarningham Park, balls were rarer still, and Sir John Slingsby was much fonder of seeing what he called a set of jolly fellows at his own house, than of going out to find them, so that none of his horses were at all accustomed to trot by candle-light. Nearly half an hour more elapsed before the carriage entered the quiet lane unaccustomed to the sound of any wheels but those of a wagon, or a taxed-cart, and at length the reins were drawn in at the door of the cottage. The house looked unpromising, not a light was to be seen, for, strange to say, window-shutters had been put up to every casement of Stephen Gimlet's dwelling, though one would not have supposed him a man addicted to such luxuries. The coachman felt his dignity hurt at having to descend from the box and open the carriage-door: the respectability of the whole family seemed to suffer in his eyes; but, nevertheless, he did it, and as he did so the horses moved on two or three yards, of which Isabella was glad, for she reflected that if the coachman saw into the cottage, he might see the inmates also. Ere she went in, she told him to drive back to the stile some two hundred yards down the lane, and if the boy Billy Lamb came over—it was his way from Tarningham Park—to keep him with the carriage. Then, with two hearts which it must be confessed fluttered sadly, Isabella and Mary knocked at the cottage-door, and, scarcely waiting for reply, opened it in haste, and went in. Mary's heart fluttered at the thought of seeing Ned Hayward, as well as at the feeling of taking a somewhat unusual step; but Isabella's flutter was solely on the latter account till the door was open, and then it became worse than ever on another score.

The first object she saw straight before her was Mr. Beauchamp, who was standing in the midst of the little parlor of the cottage, talking to the poor boy, Billy Lamb, while Mrs. Lamb and Stephen Gimlet were placed near the wide cottage hearth.

The moment that Miss Slingsby's face appeared, Beauchamp turned from the boy, saying,

"Here are the ladies themselves. Now go home, my good boy; and if your master is angry at your absence, tell him I will explain all to him. My dear Miss Slingsby, I am delighted to see you and your fair cousin. The boy says you wish to speak with Captain Hayward. He is in the room above. I will tell him immediately;" and, after shaking hands with both of the ladies, he turned away and went up stairs.

Mary whispered eagerly with Isabella; and Stephen Gimlet touched his mother-in-law's arm, as he saw that there was evidently a good deal of agitation in their fair visitors' manner, saying,

"Come, goody, it won't give you cold, I dare say, to walk out for a bit with me. They'll want to talk together," he added, in a low voice, "and if it's cold we'll go into the little vestry of the church."

The old woman looked toward the back-room, where the child was sleeping; but Stephen answered her ere she spoke, whispering,

"No, no, we should hear it all there."

Goody Lamb put her shawl over her head, while he took down the key of the church; and Mary's eye catching their movements, she said,

"Only for a few minutes, Mrs. Lamb. I should like to speak with you when we have said a few words to Captain Hayward."

Mrs. Lamb dropped a courtesy, and went out with her son-in-law; and the next moment, a slow step was heard coming down the stairs.

"Good Heaven, you are ill, Captain Hayward," cried Isabella, as her father's friend presented himself, followed by Beauchamp. Mary Clifford said nothing, but she felt more.

"Oh, I shall soon be well again, my dear Miss Slingsby," answered Ned Hayward; "the ball is out, and I am recovering quite fast—only a little weak."

"Hayward tells me I shall not be one too many," said Beauchamp; "but if I am, Miss Slingsby, send me away, remembering, however, that you may command me in any other way as well as that."

What a difference there is between enterprise and execution! How the difficulties grow upon us at every step of the mountain path, and how faint the heart feels at the early obstacles which we had altogether overlooked. Isabella Slingsby had thought it would be the easiest thing in the world to enter upon the state of her father's affairs with Ned Hayward. He was so old a friend; he had known her father since he was himself sixteen years of age; he had himself given the first warning, had opened the way. It had seemed to her, indeed, that there would not be the slightest difficulty, that there could not be any obstacle; but now, when she had to speak of all, her heart sank, her courage failed her; and she strove to turn the conversation to any other subject—only for a moment, till she recovered thought and breath.

"Oh, no! Do not go, Mr. Beauchamp," she said. "But how ill Captain Hayward looks. We had no idea he had been wounded. They said that Mr. Wittingham was the only sufferer."

"I can assure you, it is nothing," replied Ned Hayward; "but you must sit down, my dear young lady;" and, with his left arm, he put a seat for Miss Slingsby, while Beauchamp did the same good office for Mary Clifford. "I am sure that you have something important to say, and I guess what it is," the young officer continued. "Miss Clifford, you told your cousin a very painful communication I made to you ten or twelve days ago. Is it not so? and she has come to speak upon that subject?"

"I did, Captain Hayward," answered Mary Clifford; "I told her all you had said—and your generous and noble offer to assist Sir John in the most pressing emergency. Her own knowledge confirmed, in a great degree, the fact of great danger; but we feared that this unfortunate duel might have interfered with your plans, and knew not where to find you, or communicate with you."

"I did not forget what I had undertaken," answered Ned Hayward; "but like a thoughtless fool, as I am, I forgot I might be wounded, Miss Clifford, or that I might be forced to run for it. Well may the good people call me thoughtless Ned Hayward; for I remembered that I might be killed, and provided against it; but I did not recollect anything else, and ordered the money to be remitted to the bank here at Tarningham. The ball went into my shoulder, however, and I have been unable to write ever since; otherwise I would have sent the check long ago, to be used whenever it was needed. I hope to be able to write as well as ever in a few days; so put your mind quite at ease upon that score. As for the mortgage, which is, I suppose, in train for immediate foreclosure, we must think what can be done some other way; for I am a poor man, as you know, and have not the means of lending the amount;" and, as he spoke, he turned his eyes toward Beauchamp.

Ned Hayward calculated that there would be plenty of time to make all his arrangements; but such fancies were dissipated in a moment by Isabella's reply:—

"Did not the boy tell you," she asked, "that everything you feared, is to take place to-morrow? He came up to warn us. That good little man, Bacon, the attorney, sent him."

"No, Isabella," said Mary Clifford, "he did not exactly send him; but he told him the facts, evidently that they might reach my uncle's ears; and the boy came up to tell us. I was sure, Captain Hayward," she added, with a glowing cheek, "that you would do what you could to aid, and that, if you could not aid, you would advise us how to act. We therefore came on here, without hesitation; for no time is to be lost, and Sir John is unfortunately out at dinner."

"Very luckily, rather," said Ned Hayward. "No time, indeed, is to be lost, if such be the state of things. I must write the check at once, some way or another. There is a pen and ink in my little room; I will go and get it."

"But can you write?" asked Mary, anxiously; "can you, without injury to yourself?"

"Nay, stay, Hayward, stay," said Beauchamp; "you mentioned the subject of the mortgage to me the other day. What is the amount, can you tell?"

"About fifty thousand pounds, and the devil himself knows how much interest," answered Ned Hayward; "for I do not think Sir John has any idea."

"Nay, then, I fear you must write the check," said Beauchamp, gravely; "for I must not diminish the amount in the bank; but I will get the pen and ink. We are a sort of prisoners here, Miss Slingsby, and dare not show ourselves till Mr. Wittingham's state is better ascertained, or we should long ago have endeavored to put your mind at rest upon these subjects. However, we hear the young man is better, and therefore I trust we shall not be obliged to play at hide and seek much longer."

Thus saying, he went up the stairs again, but was several minutes ere he returned, during which time, though occasionally falling into fits of grave thought, Ned Hayward laughed and talked gayly; from time to time stealing a quiet look at the fair face of Mary Clifford as she leaned her arm upon the table, and gazed somewhat sadly at the embers of the gamekeeper's fire.

At length Mr. Beauchamp made his appearance once more, and sitting down to the table with a check-book before him, Ned Hayward, with a laugh, took the pen in his hand, saying,

"I must dash it off in haste, or it will be pronounced a forgery. So here is for it," and, with a rapid stroke or two, he filled up the check for the sum of twelve thousand pounds, and signed his name. His cheek turned pale as he wrote, and Mary Clifford saw it; but that was the only sign of pain that he suffered to appear. Then, throwing down the pen, he took the paper with his left hand and gave it to Miss Slingsby.

"There," he said, "I have had you on my knee twelve years ago, and called you dear little Bella; but I never thought you would give me so much pleasure as you do now."

"Well, Ned Hayward," exclaimed Isabella, with her eyes running over, "you are certainly the best and noblest creature in the world."

Mary Clifford's lips murmured something very like "He is."

Beauchamp loooked on with an expression of grave pleasure; but scarcely was the check signed and given, when the door of the cottage opened suddenly, and Stephen Gimlet took a step over the threshold, saying,

"I have caught him, gentlemen, I have caught him like a rat in a trap."

"Whom have you caught?" asked Beauchamp, turning quickly toward him.

"Why, the fellow who fired the shot in at the window," answered Stephen Gimlet.

"That is glorious!" exclaimed Ned Hayward. "Where is he? What have you done with him?"

"I should not have meddled with him, perhaps," said the gamekeeper, "if I had not found him meddling with the registers in the church, which I know he has no right to do. I and Goody Lamb went out for a bit into the church-yard, and, as she found the wind cold, we opened the little door at this side of the church, and went in; I had not been in a minute, when I heard some one talking plain enough, but I could not see anybody for the life of me. I told Goody Lamb to stand behind the pillar by the pulpit, while I went to see; but before I could take a step, up out of the Moreton vault came two men with a lantern. One of them was this fellow; and the other was the old sexton; and they walked straight across toward the vestry; but, just a little way from the door, the old sexton stopped and said, 'I can't, captain; it is nothing better than forgery;' or something like that; and the other fellow took the lantern and went into the vestry. So I said to Goody Lamb, in a whisper: Those rascals are up to no good;' and she answered: 'One of them never was, all his life.' So, then I said: 'You get forward and scare the old sexton; I'll be close behind you.' The old woman did it in a minute, walking on without any noise, till she was right between him and the light, coming out of the vestry door. However, he had heard us whisper, I fancy; for he was staring about him, as if he was looking for a ghost; and, as soon as he saw something stand there, off he set, as if the devil were behind him; and I jumped into the vestry, where the other fellow was sitting, with one of the great books open before him, and a pen in his hand. I did not give him much time to think, but knocked him over, upset the lantern, and locked the door. So there he is in a cage, just like one of my ferrets."

"That's capital," cried Ned Hayward; but Beauchamp looked very grave, and, turning to Gimlet, he said,

"We'll consider what is to be done with him by and by. You can bring your good mother-in-law back now, Stephen; for our business is nearly over, and then you can see these two ladies safe to the carriage. Miss Slingsby," he continued, as soon as the gamekeeper was gone, "I wish to speak two words with you regarding this little note," and he held one up before her. "I took advantage of the pen and ink before I brought it down, and so kept you waiting, I'm afraid; but it was not without a purpose."

Isabella hesitated for a moment; but Beauchamp added, laughing,

"Nay, surely, you will trust yourself with me as far as the door."

"Oh, yes," replied Isabella, with a gay toss of her head; "I am doing all kinds of odd things to-night, and see no reason for stopping in mid course."

Thus saying, she walked toward the door, with Beauchamp following; and they went out into the little garden, where Beauchamp put the note in her hand, saying,

"This is addressed to Dr. Miles, my dear young lady. We are not very well aware of what has taken place regarding this mortgage, which Hayward has mentioned to me; but I fear there is some foul play going on. Should any sudden inconvenience arise regarding it, or the interest upon it, send that note instantly to Dr. Miles, and, at the time, take means to let me know."

"But how, my kind friend," asked Isabella, "how can I let you know, without discovering your place of concealment to others? You are, doubtless, aware that there are placards all over the place offering a reward for the apprehension of yourself and Captain Hayward."

"We must not mind that," answered Beauchamp; "but, at all events, it may be as well to send a note to me, inclosed to good old Widow Lamb; and I must take my measures afterward, as I find best. In the mean time, Dr. Miles will insure that your father is put to no inconvenience; for it so luckily happens that I have a large sum unemployed at the present moment, which could not be better applied than by saving you from distress and annoyance."

"Oh, Mr. Beauchamp," cried Isabella, greatly moved, "what right have I to so much kindness and generosity?"

"Every right, that a fine and noble heart can give," answered Beauchamp; "and, oh, let me add, every right that can be bestowed by the most sincere affection that ever woman inspired in man; but I will not agitate you more to-night. This is not a moment when I can press such a topic upon you. There is only one thing you must promise, that you will suffer no consideration whatever to prevent you from availing yourself of the means of freeing your father from his difficulties—no, not even the rash words I have just spoken."

Isabella was silent for a moment; but then she replied, in a low voice,

"Those words would have quite the contrary effect. They would give me confidence and hope;" and she put her hand in his.

Beauchamp raised it to his lips warmly, fully understanding all that her reply implied.

The devil is in a country apothecary. There is an awkward fatality about them which always brings them on the ground at the wrong moment.

"Good night, good night, Mr. Beauchamp," said Mr. Slattery of Tarningham, slowly walking his horse down the sandy lane. "I thought I would just step in to see Captain Hayward, and tell you that Harry Wittingham is much better to-night;" and Mr. Slattery was dismounting from his horse, not in the slightest degree with the intention of seeing whose hand Mr. Beauchamp had been kissing, but merely in the exercise of his professional avocations. As misfortune would have it, Beauchamp had left the cottage door open behind him, so that the surgeon had a fair view of the act by which that gentleman had sealed his tacit contract with Isabella, by the light which streamed forth from within But that which was unfortunate on one side was fortunate on another; for no sooner was the first monosyllable out of Mr. Slattery's mouth than Isabella darted in and closed the door, so that the surgeon, though he thought the figure strangely like Sir John's daughter, could not swear to the fact.

Beauchamp at the same time hastened to prevent his obtaining any more precise knowledge, saying, "Thank you for your information, Mr. Slattery. Hayward is better, and cannot see you to-night, being particularly engaged at present. Good night;" and he also retired into the house and shut the door.

"Ho, ho!" said Mr. Slattery, "so they do not choose me to see! Well, let them take the consequences. When people trust me, I can be as silent as the grave; but if they show a want of confidence, I know how to match them. Did I whisper one word to any one of where the two gentlemen were? No, not a word! and now they think to blind me. Well, well, we shall see."

And Mr. Slattery did see; for while this soliloquy had been going on, he had been going on too, and when it came to a conclusion, he came upon the lamps of the large comfortable barouche of Sir John Slingsby.

"Good evening, Jenkins," said Mr. Slattery to the tall, fat coachman. "Is Sir John in this part, that you are out so late?"

"No, sir," replied Jenkins, "he's got the charitt over at Meadowfield. I brought over my young lady to see Widow Lamb, at Gimlet's, the new keeper's."

"Ho, ho," said Mr. Slattery again, but he had not time to make reflections; for at the very moment, he heard a pair of human feet running hard, and the next instant a figure shot across the glare of the carriage-lamps. Mr. Slattery had a quick eye, and he instantly called after the runner, "Hie! hie! captain, I want to speak with you."

But the person whom he addressed ran on; and as Mr. Slattery did not choose to be so evaded, he struck his plated spurs into his horse's side, and overtook him at the distance of a quarter of a mile; for once past the stile where the carriage stood, there was no possible means of getting out of the high-banked lane.

"Hie, captain! Captain Moreton!" cried Mr. Slattery, as he came near; and Moreton, not at all liking to have his name shouted all over the country, slackened his pace.

"What the devil do you want, Slattery?" he asked; "do you not see I'm in a hurry?"

"There's my little account, you know, captain," said Mr. Slattery, "four years' standing, and you'd really oblige me very much if—"

"Devil fly away with your account," said the worthy captain, "do you think I'm going to pay for all the physic you drugged the maid-servants with at the Hall?"

"Have you heard the news, captain?" exclaimed Mr. Slattery, coming abruptly to the real point, as he perceived the other was going to run again.

"No; what news?" asked Moreton, pausing.

"Why that Miss Slingsby is going to be married immediately to Mr. Beauchamp, who has been staying down here so long," answered Mr. Slattery; and then added, "as soon as young Wittingham's out of all danger, they say."

"Is she, by ——!" exclaimed the captain. "Well, doctor, I shall take the short cut through that gate—good night; and do not say to any one you saw me here. I know you can be trusted with a secret."

"To be sure!" said Mr. Slattery; and while Captain Moreton vaulted over the gate, the surgeon pursued his way toward Tarningham.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Sir John Slingsby returned to Tarningham Park at about the hour of "dark midnight;" but he found both daughter and niece still up to receive him. That Sir John Slingsby had imbibed a portion of wine more abundant than most men could carry discreetly was evident from the increased depth of the rose in his complexion, and from a certain watery luster in his eyes; but it must not thence be inferred that the baronet was even in the least degree drunk. How many he had left drunk behind him matters not to this history; but he himself, though gay as usual, was perfectly sober, quite gentlemanly and at his ease; for he had not even arrived at that pitch where a consciousness of wine makes one careful of not showing its effects.

"Well, young ladies," he said, seating himself in his arm-chair for a moment, and sticking his thumb into his white waistcoat, "you have passed a dull night, I dare say, with the old gentleman out, and the two young gentlemen Lord knows where. Well, how are we to wear away to-morrow?"

"I shall wear away the morning, my dear uncle," said Mary Clifford, who had held long councils with her cousin, "in going to Tarningham; and I will ask you to lend me the carriage for an hour at eight o'clock."

"Certainly, dear Mary," said the baronet; "but Tarningham? what takes your pretty little self to Tarningham?"

"Why, the truth is, I want some money," answered Miss Clifford, "I think the bank opens at half-past eight."

"Money in the bank!" cried Sir John Slingsby. "Was there ever such a girl? She has money in the bank! Well, take the carriage, Mary, when you like, and be back to breakfast at half-past nine, otherwise you shall have cold tea, and not a bit of pasty. Now to bed, to bed; for if people have to go to Tarningham early in the morning, they must go to bed at night."

The breakfast table was laid as usual, by nine o'clock in the morning; but before that hour Isabella Slingsby had been down, and had wandered about in the drawing-room and in the library with a nervous sort of unsettledness in her manner, which struck even the servants who happened to pass. She looked out of almost every window in the house which was accessible to her; she gazed down every road that wound through the park; she scanned every moving figure that was within the range of sight; and she felt every moment a terror of what the next would bring, which she had never experienced in life before. She wished that Mary had not left her, that they had sent some one for the money; and she conjured up difficulties and distresses, obstacles that she would not know how to meet, questions of law and form of which she was unaware, to trouble herself and agitate her mind still more. At length, with a bold resolution, she rang the bell, and ordered the servant who appeared to go down to Doctor Miles's, with her compliments, and say she would be glad to see him. The moment after, her father entered the room as gay, as bustling, as jovial as ever; his face resplendent with small red veins; his eyes sparkling like the wine of the night before; his ample stomach rolling unrepressed under an easy waistcoat; and his stout legs and neat foot carrying him about with the light step of one-and twenty. To have looked at him one would have thought that there was not such a thing as care or sorrow in the whole world, much less in his own house.

"Ah, Bella!" he cried, kissing her, "how have you slept, my love? Where's Mary?—not come back? How's your aunt?—pining, pining, eh? See what comes of a melancholy constitution—too much bile and twenty years' trial of a puritanical husband! Well, what's o'clock?—five-and-twenty minutes after nine—come along, we'll have breakfast. Mary shall have a fresh cup of tea when she comes;" and in went Sir John Slingsby to the breakfast-room, ringing the bell as if he would have pulled it down the moment he got it.

"Breakfast," he exclaimed, when the butler appeared. "Has not the post-bag come?"

"No, Sir John," replied the man.

"Very late," said the baronet; and, marching to the window, he looked out upon the sunshiny park, with his hands behind him, for want of better occupation.

To poor Isabella Slingsby, her father's lively unconsciousness was terrible, and it was with trembling hands that she made the tea and poured out the coffee, giving a sharp look round every time the door opened, as if in expectation of some grim bailiff's face appearing. Such, indeed, would have been the case, had it not been that good Mr. Bacon had contrived to delay what he could not prevent; and at length, much to the joy and satisfaction of Isabella, the grating sound of carriage-wheels was heard from the park. That sound was still distant and indistinct, however, when the butler came in with a very peculiar and significant expression of countenance, saying, "Please, Sir John, there's a man wants to speak with you."

"Well, he must wait," said Sir John Slingsby. "Tell him I am at breakfast. Has not the post-bag come yet?"

"Please, Sir John, the man says he must speak with you directly."

"Tell him to go to the devil," said Sir John Slingsby, "and speak with him;" but the words were scarcely out of his mouth, when the door opened behind the butler, and not one man, but two, appeared.

Isabella's face had been very pale from the first announcement made by the servant; but Sir John had remained perfectly unconscious till he saw those two strange faces. They were anything but pleasant faces in the abstract; for, though well washed and shaved, there was a ruffianly dirt of expression which no soap could get rid of. There are certain professions which stamp themselves upon the outer man in indellible lines. The bailiff—the man who makes his bread or his fortune by inflicting the most poignant misery the law knows upon his fellow-creatures—the step in society still lower than the hangman—is never to be mistaken; and Sir John Slingsby recognized at once the errand of his intrusive visitors in their aspect. His face became very pale, the red veins turned blue, and he sat at the table without uttering a word. He well knew that these men's appearance, though bad enough in itself, was but the commencement of evil; that the long-delayed hour was come; that the thin worn line which upheld his whole fortunes had snapped, and that he was now to fall into the gulf of ruin which had so long yawned beneath him. Arrested and carried from his house, every creditor would pour in with his claims, every debt be swelled by law expenses, till naught would be left for him and for his child but a prison and a life of labor.

His careless heart sank with the weight suddenly cast upon it; and his brain was overpowered with the multitude of thoughts it had resisted too long.

But Isabella stepped in like an angel of comfort; her heart rose as his fell. The moment of terror passed away, and as the foremost of the two men laid his hand lightly upon Sir John's shoulder, she whispered in his ear, "Do not alarm yourself, my dear father. Mary has gone to Tarningham for the money. We heard of all this last night, and are quite prepared She will be here in a moment—I hear the carriage coming up now."

"At whose suit, and for what amount?" demanded Sir John Slingsby, turning to the bailiff. He could say no more, for some moments were required to collect his thoughts.

"At Mr. Wittingham's, Sir John," replied the man, "for five thousand three hundred and forty-two pounds seven and fourpence."

"Then you may tell Mr. Wittingham for me," said Sir John Slingsby, "that he is a d—d shabby, sneaking scoundrel, to do such a thing as this without giving me some notice."

"Come, come, Sir John," rejoined the bailiff, "you know it is no use talking—you must come along, you know."

"You are somewhat too quick, sir," said Isabella, interposing; "if you mean to say the debt must be paid, that is very well. It shall be paid."

"Ay, miss; but it must be paid immediately, or Sir John must march," answered the man, screwing his eye at his follower; "gammon is gammon, you know."

"I do not understand what you mean," said Isabella, haughtily, "pray, papa, do not touch him (for Sir John had risen with fury in his countenance). The debt shall be paid immediately, as you say."

"And you shall be ducked in the horsepond for your insolence," added the baronet, continuing to the butler, "call in all the men."

"Nay, nay—do not, my dear father!" cried Isabella. "Five thousand three hundred and forty pounds, you said?" she continued, addressing the bailiff. "I will bring the money this moment."

"Forty-two, seven, and four," said the man, sullenly; "but there may be detainers, and as the caption is made, I fancy I cannot—"

"Oh, I'll soon settle that," said Sir John Slingsby. "You see, my good fellow, there are several windows to this room as well as doors —I do not resist the law—wouldn't resist the law for the world! but as soon as the money is paid, you go out of either windows or doors as you please; but speedily in either case. Get the money, Bella—call the men here," he added, speaking sharply to the butler, "I see we shall want them."

Isabella hastened out of the room; for the carriage had just drawn up, and as she entered the vestibule, she saw Mary stepping lightly out of it with a calm smile. "Have you got it?" cried Isabella, in eager haste; "they are here already."

"Indeed!" said Mary, sadly, "I am sorry for that; but there was some difficulty; for at the bank, as the sum was so large, they wanted proof of Captain Hayward's signature, which they did not well know. I could not tell what to do, and therefore went to Mr. Bacon's, who soon settled the matter."

"Why, the writ was taken out by him," cried Isabella.

"Yes, I know," answered her cousin, "but he told me how sorry he was to be forced by Mr. Wittingham to do it; and explained that it would be much better to pay the money at once in Tarningham, when he would give me a receipt in full, and an order, or something, to these men, so as stop anything unpleasant at once; for he thought I should get back before they arrived. He said there would be a great object gained in paying the money at once, so that the receipt might be dated before what he called the caption."

"And did you do it?" asked Isabella, eagerly; "did you do it, dearest Mary?"

"Yes," answered her cousin, half alarmed; "I really believe he is a very honest little man, and he seemed truly distressed at Mr. Wittingham's conduct. He gave me the receipt, and the order too, and took great pains to date them half-past eight, though it was nearly nine. I hope I have not done wrong, Isabella?"

"Oh dear, no. I dare say it is all quite right;" cried Isabella, joyfully. "Give them to me, Mary, and let me run back; for I am afraid of what my father calls 'an affair of posts,' between him and these bailiffs. I left him marvelously pugnacious."

Mary Clifford put into her hand the two papers which she had received in Tarningham; and at the same time drew forth a small bundle of bank-notes, saying, "There is the rest of the twelve thousand pounds—for Heaven's sake, take care of it, Isabella."

Her cousin gazed at the little packet with a gay smile, and then, tossing her head with the joy of a light heart relieved from a heavy load, she ran back into the breakfast-room, while Mary went up stairs to lay aside her shawl and bonnet.

At the door of the room where she had left her father, Isabella resumed a calm and composed air; and entering with a stately step, found five or six men-servants arranged across the end of the chamber, while the two bailiffs stood, looking somewhat crest-fallen and apprehensive, near Sir John, who, for his part, sat beating a tune on the breakfast-table with his fingers, and endeavoring to appear unconcerned. A sharp anxious glance at his daughter's face, however, told that all fear was not at an end; but her confident look reassured him, and he exclaimed, "Well, Bella, have you brought the money?"

"Yes," replied Miss Slingsby; and, approaching the table, she laid down the roll of bank-notes, spread them out, and began to count. "One thousand, two thousand, three, four, five, six thousand!" she said aloud, much to the astonishment and admiration of the servants.

"That is more than enough, madam," said the bailiff, approaching with humble air and smooth tone.

"I know it is," replied Isabella. "Be so good as to keep your hands away, sir; for you are not going to have one penny of that sum. I was only counting to see that the stamp was right. That paper, I think, will be quite enough for you; and that, my dear father, is the receipt for the whole sum and cost to Mr. Wittingham."

"Well, ma'am, well, I've nothing to say," exclaimed the bailiff; "it is all in order. Howsomever, I have only done my duty; and am very glad the matter is so settled."

"Done your duty, you vagabond," cried Sir John Slingsby, "only done your duty, when you ventured to use the word gammon to my daughter—but it does not matter, it does not matter! Get out of my sight as fast as possible, and tell that fellow Wittingham to keep far off me; for, as sure as I am alive, I will horsewhip him the first time I see him. Take care of them, my men, and see them safe off the grounds."

The words certainly did not seem to imply any very formidable menace; but as such the bailiff and his follower seemed to understand them, and made speed toward the door, while the men-servants answered, "That we will, Sir John;" but made way for the two unwelcome visitors to effect their exit easily. Isabella remonstrated earnestly with her father; but the jovial baronet only exclaimed, "Pooh! nonsense, Bella; no harm can happen, I must see what goes on; for, with a fair start and a good run, it would be capital fun. Come into the library—come into the library: we shall have the best view there; and after that we will breakfast."

Isabella Slingsby, however, remained alone in the breakfast-room, gazing down upon the notes spread out on the table. The eagerness, the excitement of the moment was gone. The anxious fear for her father's liberty was over. Something smote her heart—even the little display of the money before the eyes of the servants and the bailiffs she was sorry for. Considerations presented themselves which she had never thought of before; and when her cousin Mary entered the room a few minutes after, Isabella cast her arm round her neck, and bending her head upon her shoulder, said, with a blush on her cheek and tears in her eyes, "Poor Ned Hayward, Mary, I have thought too little of him, and he is not rich, I know."

"Do not be afraid, Isabella," said Mary, in a low tone.

"But I am afraid, Mary," rejoined Isabella. "I know my father is terribly embarrassed —I fear he will never be able to repay this sum."

"Then I will," said Mary Clifford.

CHAPTER XXX.

We must go back to Stephen Gimlet's cottage and the preceding night. Beauchamp and Captain Hayward stood together by the table, when their two fair visitors had left them, waiting for the return of the gamekeeper, and they both remained silent for several minutes. There are times when great things just accomplished, of whatever kind or character, seem to oppress the spirit and keep it down, as it were, under a heavy weight. Nor is it altogether uninteresting to inquire what is the cause of this oppression—the remote, often unseen, even indistinct cause. It is not sorrow—it is not regret; for the weight of thought seems cast upon us as often by a joyful as a sorrowful event; and I speak not at all of the effect of misfortune, but simply of that which is produced upon the mind by a great deed done—great, at least, to the person who has performed it. I am inclined to think, that the sort of load which I speak of may be traced to the consciousness of all the vast multitude of consequences of which every act is the source. Not the slightest thing we do that does not send a thrill vibrating along the endless chains of cause and effect to the utmost limit of time through the whole grand machine of future existence. Man dies; but not one of his acts ever dies—each perpetuated and prolonged forever by interminable results, affecting some beings in every age to come. Ay, even the slightest; but that which is to follow only becomes a question with man when the deed is to his own cognizance important as affecting himself and those around him. The eye of God sees all; but it is merely when the consequences are visible to our own limited ken that we feel the strange involution of our destiny with that of others; and, when what we have just done is in its immediate results likely to affect us and those we love profoundly, that we pause to consider all the wide extent of the future which that act implies; then we feel as if we had plunged headlong into an ocean of endless waves, and the weight of the waters oppresses the heart and spirit. We ask, what next? and then, what will follow? and, in the game of chess that we are playing against Fate, look for the next move of our great adversary, and all the consequences of that which we have ourselves just made.

Both Beauchamp and Hayward had done an important thing that night. The latter had stripped himself, for a friend's benefit, of the treasured resource of after-life. Never rich, he had left himself but a scanty pittance, which was not likely to be increased by any means but his own personal exertions. From that moment he felt that his course of life must be changed—that his views, his feelings, his habits, must undergo a severe scrutiny, and be subjected to a hard discipline; that the careless ease, the light-hearted indifference to the morrow was as at an end; that the small cares he had never yet known, the looking to shillings and to pence, and all the sordid minutiæ of difficult economy were to be his companions for life, as inseparable from his footsteps as his shadow. Honest poverty may be a very fine thing in contemplation; but let its admirers understand that it is a difficult thing in practice; for honesty and poverty are like Adam and the devil in the garden, ill-suited tenants of one house, the latter of whom is always laying out snares to reduce his companion to his own level. If such be the case where the circumstances of birth have made the evils of poverty habitual, and given its temptations no factitious advantages, how much more is it so when a knowledge of, a taste for, and a long education in ease and comfort, have both engendered a habit of expense, and rendered the restraints of poverty privations. It is then that honesty has to struggle with a host of foes, and too often a murder and suicide are committed, honesty killing itself after an attempt to get rid of its comrade.

But Ned Hayward was a very honest man, and his first thought was how to bear his poverty rightly. He gave not one thought to the money he had just given away—for so he believed it to be—he would have performed the same act over and over again a dozen times, if he had had the means and the motives to do so, and would each time have done it willingly; but that did not prevent his feeling the painful situation in which he had left himself; and he contemplated, with deep thought and stern resolution, all that was to issue from the deed he had done.

With Beauchamp the feelings might be different; but the sources from which they sprang were the same. He, too, had taken a step which was to influence the whole of his future life. He had said words to Isabella Slingsby, of which he felt all the import at the moment they were spoken—which he spoke purposely, that there might be no doubt or hesitation on her mind in regard to his sensations or purposes, and yet which, as soon as they were uttered filled him with a vague feeling of apprehension. Yet Beauchamp was a resolute man in character, and had performed acts of persisting resolution, which few men would have had the determination to carry through. He loved Isabella too dearly; and, had the whole world been subject to his choice, would have selected her. He was anxious, likewise, to call her his own; for he was not without the fire of passion, and was very different from those idle triflers, in whom love is a vanity lighted up by the cold ignis fatuus of a volatile and fugitive desire. But his previous history furnished materials for doubt and alarm; and when he paused to contemplate all the innumerable consequences of the few words he had spoken, there was a mist over one part of that sea of many waves, and he asked himself, with awe, "What is beneath!" The thought, however, that he was loved in return was consolation and courage; and though, for his part, Ned Hayward did not venture to indulge in any such sweet dream, yet the image of Mary Clifford, like that of the Virgin in the old legend, shed a light which dispelled the darkness along one bright path, through the obscure future, for him also.

The contemplations of both gentlemen, however, were speedily broken through by the return of Ste Gimlet, who, turning to Mr. Beauchamp, inquired,

"Please, sir, what shall we do with the man locked up in the vestry!"

"Oh, have him out," cried Ned Hayward, "and hand him over to a constable."

Beauchamp did not reply so quickly; but at length he said,

"There may be difficulty, Hayward, in finding a constable at this time of night; and not only difficulty, but also danger to ourselves, if we take any part in the business. Is the place where the man is confined secure?" he continued, addressing the gamekeeper.

"Pretty well, sir, I think," answered Gimlet; "there are bars to the windows, and the door is locked tight enough. Then we can lock the church door too."

"I locked it, Stephen," said Mrs. Lamb; "there hangs the key."

"Then let him stay there the night," rejoined Beauchamp. "I will not interfere to screen him; and Gimlet can get a constable early to-morrow morning, without our taking any part in the affair."

This proposal was agreed to by Ned Hayward, though the expression which his friend used, in regard to screening the offender, struck him as somewhat strange. It is wonderful, however, how often in life we do what is vulgarly termed, reckon without our host. The two gentlemen retired to rest in the rooms above, which had been prepared and furnished for them in haste, since the duel with young Wittingham; and Stephen Gimlet and Widow Lamb also sought repose. Early the next morning, however, the gamekeeper rose to seek a constable; but first he thought it expedient to look at the temporary prison in which he had confined Captain Moreton. The doors, both of church and vestry, were still closed and locked; but passing round, toward his own cottage again, by a little grass-grown path, that ran under the church walls Ste Gimlet was surprised and confounded to perceive that three of the bars covering the window of the vestry had been forced out of the old mortar in which they had been socketed; and jumping up on a tombstone to look in, he soon saw that the bird, as he expected, had taken wing from its cage.

Stephen Gimlet, notwithstanding this discovery, did not return to his cottage at once, to communicate the intelligence to those within. He paused and thought; but, to say truth, it was not of the event which he had just ascertained that he meditated. That was done and over: the man was gone, and might never be caught again; but the words which Beauchamp had spoken the night before had made a deeper impression upon his mind than they had upon Ned Hayward's, and naturally, for the young officer had never remarked or heard anything before, which could lead his fancy to perceive any connection between his friend and Captain Moreton. Stephen Gimlet, on the contrary, had observed much that excited his imagination, and it was one of a very active character. He remembered the interest which Beauchamp had displayed in the monuments of the Moreton family; he remembered all the inquiries he had made regarding their former property; and he did not forget either his mother-in-law's ancient connection with one of the members of that house, or the somewhat mysterious expressions she had used in regard to Beauchamp himself. It was a tangled skein, difficult to unravel, but yet he resolved to unravel it; not exactly from curiosity, though curiosity might have some share therein, but rather because, in his wild frenzy, he dreamed that the knowledge which Goody Lamb possessed of his guest's previous history might afford him some means of serving a man he looked upon as his benefactor. He was peculiarly susceptible of kindness or unkindness, of gratitude or its reverse, resentment, and he thought that it would be a happy day for him if he could ever return to Mr. Beauchamp, even in a small degree, the kindness he had received. He pondered upon these things for full five minutes, and then returned to his cottage, where he found the old lady in the inner room, making the little boy repeat a short prayer at his bedside, after having washed and dressed him. It was a sweet and wholesome sight to the father. He contrasted it with former days, and he felt the balmy influence of honest peace pour over his heart. One of the first rewards of a return to virtue from any of man's many deviations, is an appreciation of its excellence. He stood and gazed, and listened, well satisfied, while the words of holy prayer rose up from the sweet tongue of his own child; and if the boy had prayed for his father's confirmation in his return to right, the petition could not have been more fully granted.

When it was done, Ste Gimlet kissed the child and sent him out to play in the little garden. Then, shaking hands with Widow Lamb, he said,

"I wanted to ask you a question or two, goody. Do you know who the man is that rushed into the vestry last night?"

"To be sure I do," answered the widow; "do you think, Stephen, I could forget one I have seen in such times and known in such acts as that man? No, no; I shall remember him to my dying day."

"Well, then," replied her son-in-law, "I want you to tell me, goody, what there is between him and Mr. Beauchamp; for the man has got out and is off, and I have great doubts that he is Mr. Beauchamp's friend."

"I had better hold my tongue, Stephen," said the old woman; "I had better hold my tongue, at least till I see and understand more. One thing at least I may say, and say truly, that the bitterest enemy ever Mr. Beauchamp had was that Captain Moreton."

"Do you think, Widow Lamb," asked the gamekeeper, in a low, stern tone, "that he has any cause to wish Mr. Beauchamp dead?"

The old woman started, and gazed at him, demanding,

"What makes you ask that?"

"I'll tell you, widow," replied the man. "Have you not heard of a shot fired into Sir John Slingsby's dining-room? Well, that shot went within a few inches of Mr. Beauchamp's head, and that is the man who fired it."

The old woman sank down on the stool by the bedside, and clasped her hands together, exclaiming,

"Is it come to that! Ay, I thought it would, sooner or later. He could not stop—no, no, he could not stop!"

She paused for a moment, and rocked herself backward and forward upon the seat, with a pained and bewildered look.

"I see how it is, goody," said Gimlet; "and now I'll tell you. That fellow shan't get off. I'll never give it up till I've caught him. I'll track him, like a hare, to his form, and he shall be punished. Mr. Beauchamp has been kind to me—one of the first that ever were; and I'll not forget kindness, though I'll try to forget unkindness."

"Take care what you are about, Stephen," answered his mother-in-law, "or you may do harm instead of good. Watch him, if you will, to prevent mischief; and above all, let me know everything that you see and hear. I will talk with Mr. Beauchamp, as you call him, this very day. I wonder if the woman is living!"

"There was one woman with him, at all events," answered Stephen Gimlet, "when he was down here last."

"Ah! what was she like?" inquired Widow Lamb, eagerly; "what was she like?"

"I only saw her for a minute," replied the gamekeeper, "but she seemed a fine, handsome lady as one could wish to see—somewhat reddish in the face; but with fine, dark eyes, and mighty gayly dressed. She was tall, too, for a woman."

"Yes, her eyes were dark enough," said Widow Lamb, "and she was always fond of fine clothes—that was her ruin; but red in the face!—that is strange; she had the finest and the fairest skin I ever saw."

"Well, the redness might come from drink," said Ste Gimlet, "for she seemed to me half drunk then. He called her Charlotte, I recollect."

"Ay, that's her name," exclaimed the widow; "and so they have come together again! It is for no good, I will answer; for two bolder or worse spirits never met to plot mischief."

"You had better tell me all about it, goody," said Stephen Gimlet; "do something to that fellow I will, and it's bad to work in the dark."

"Not till I have spoken to the gentleman up stairs," said the old woman. "Watch the man, Stephen: find out where he is, what he is doing, all about him, and about her too; but do not meddle with him yet. Hark! they are coming down. You go away, and I will talk with him this very day."

"I must tell them he has got out before I go," answered the gamekeeper, going into the other room, and bolting the outer door, to guard against intrusion while the two lodgers were below.

No one, however, appeared but Beauchamp, whose first words were,

"I wish, Stephen, you would send some one down to Tarningham, to tell Mr. Slattery to come up. Captain Hayward is not so well this morning, and says he has not slept all night."

"I will go myself, sir," said Gimlet; "but I just wanted to tell you that Captain Moreton has got out during the night. He has wrenched out three of the bars of the window, and is off."

Beauchamp mused.

"Well, it does not much matter," he said, at length; "but you had better inform Doctor Miles of what you saw in the church, and let him take whatever steps he may think necessary to insure that no fraud has been committed. I can have nothing to do with the affair. Bring up Mr. Slattery as soon as you can, for I am somewhat anxious about Captain Hayward's state this morning."

Gimlet did not reply. He uttered no expression of sorrow or of sympathy; but yet he felt as much grieved and alarmed as if Ned Hayward had been his brother; and his countenance showed it, though his words did not.

As soon as he was gone, Mr. Beauchamp was turning to go up stairs again; but Widow Lamb at the moment came out of the inner room, and stopped him, saying,

"I wish to speak a word or two to you, sir."

"Well, my good lady," answered Beauchamp, with a smile, "can I do anything to serve you?"

"No, sir," replied the old woman, "it is not that. But I see you do not recollect me—and, indeed, how should you! It is a long time since we first met."

Beauchamp gazed at her for a moment in silence, and then said,

"I think I do remember having seen you somewhere before I met you here. Your face struck me as familiar to my recollection when first I saw you; but I cannot remember where I saw it long ago. Were you ever in India!"

"Oh! no, my lord, it was not there," answered Widow Lamb; "when first I saw you, you were quite a young gentleman; the Honorable Charles St. Leger, they called you; and you had come down with Captain Moreton, your cousin, to shoot on the grounds of his great-aunt, Miss Moreton."

Beauchamp's face turned somewhat pale, and his fine broad brow contracted; but he did not speak, and the old woman continued,

"Do you not recollect, my lord, Davie Lamb the grave, as they called him, and your coming down with a gay party to the grave's house, one day? It was the eleventh of August, twelve years ago this summer; and the lady was with you, Miss Charlotte Hay, as they called her—"

"Hush! hush!" cried Beauchamp, almost fiercely; "do not mention her name in my hearing. You do not know—you do not know, good woman—"

"Oh yes, my lord, I do," answered Widow Lamb; "I know more than you think—more than you know, perhaps, yourself. I can tell you many things about her."

"Tell me nothing," said Beauchamp, sternly, "you can say nothing of her conduct, infamous and bad, that I do not know or do not guess. I wish never to hear her name again;" and he turned once more toward the stairs.

"Well, I beg your pardon, my lord," said Widow Lamb, with a disappointed look, "I did not mean to vex you; but if ever you should wish to hear more, I can tell you better than any one; for there is nobody now living knows so much as I do, and I think—"

The conclusion of her sentence was wanting, for some one opened the cottage door, which had not been bolted since Stephen Gimlet has gone out. The next moment, the head of Mr Slattery appeared, and entering with an insinuating smile, the worthy surgeon saluted Beauchamp reverentially, saying,

"I met my good friend Wolf, Mr. Beauchamp, and was sorry to hear that Captain Hayward is not so well. But I have got good news for him, and you too. No more need of playing at bo-peep. I found Mr. Wittingham so much better this morning, that I have ventured publicly to pronounce him out of danger."

"Thank God for that!" said Beauchamp; "but we had better go up and see Hayward, who seems to me somewhat feverish."

"I am afraid there is a bit of the wadding, or the coat, or something still in the wound," said Mr. Slattery, following up stairs, "but there is no cause for alarm. It may produce inconvenience and some inflammation; but nature, my dear sir, by the very same process which produces pain and irritation to the patient, often expels any extraneous substance, which, if it remained, might cause more serious results."

Mr. Slattery remained at least an hour and a half; and to say the truth, during that time he put our good friend Ned Hayward to some torture; but in the end, he succeeded in extracting from the wound which that gentleman had received, a portion of his waistcoat, which had been carried in by the ball in its passage. Some hemorrhage followed, which was stopped with difficulty; but at length the good surgeon took his leave, and descended with Beauchamp to the lower room.

Widow Lamb, however, met them at the foot of the stairs, saying, in a low tone,

"There is a servant on horseback, from the Park, sir, just now before the door. He has got a note, which he will give to no one but you; and I did not know what to do."

"There is no necessity for any further concealment," said Beauchamp, advancing to the door; "you have got a note for me," he continued, speaking to the servant, who touched his hat, and delivered a small billet.

Beauchamp tore it open, and read, while good Mr. Slattery paused beside him, in the hope of hearing some news; for, as we have shown, he was not without a laudable portion of curiosity.

"I must go over directly," said Beauchamp, for that note placed before his eyes a very unpleasant state of affairs at Tarningham Park—a mortgage foreclosed, an execution placed in the house, and Sir John Slingsby himself arrested on a heavy bond debt, for long arrears of interest, and interest upon interest, and lawyers' costs. Isabella wrote in a tone of despair; and yet there was a something shining through all her gloomy words—a trust, a confidence in him to whom those words were written, which were very pleasing to him.

"Can I drive you over in my gig, Mr. Beauchamp?" said Mr. Slattery.

"No, I thank you," replied the other; "I dare say, my good fellow, you will not object to let me mount your horse?" he continued, addressing the servant, "I must get over to the Park as speedily as possible."

Under ordinary circumstances, perhaps, the man might have objected; but the events which had just happened at his master's house, were, by the time he set out, known from the housekeeper's room to the pigsty and had excited among the servants too strong a feeling of dismay and distress, for him to hesitate when there was a chance of affording aid, or even consolation, to Sir John Slingsby and his daughter. He instantly acceded, then, and lengthened the stirrups. Beauchamp only stayed to get his hat and speak a few words to Ned Hayward, then sprang into the saddle, and the next moment was going straight across the country toward Tarningham Park.

CHAPTER XXXI.

All was dismay and confusion in the house of Sir John Slingsby, when, after having galloped straight across the park, without heeding bridle-paths or carriage-roads, Beauchamp drew his rein at the door. No servant came to take the horse, for all were busy within, though busy with what, would have been difficult to say. The only thing they had to be busy with was their own consternation; for there was no packing up for departure, no inventories, no arrangements in progress; and yet not an attendant appeared, except through the double glass doors, where a knot was to be seen assembled in the inner vestibule, who never turned a look toward the terrace before the house. One excuse, perhaps, might be that there were so many people arriving that a new comer could attract no attention. It seemed as if a general call had been made upon Tarningham, to attend and witness the disgrace and discomfort of the family. A number of tradesmen were gathered before the doors, conversing together in low tones, and with gloomy faces; and there was a post-chaise, beside a gig, a saddle-horse, and a tax-cart or two. Beauchamp thought the spectacle somewhat odd; for it seemed to him, notwithstanding all he knew of the gossiping propensities of small places, that the news of Sir John Slingsby's misfortunes must have spread with marvelous rapidity. But he knew not Mr. Wharton, nor could conceive the policy which should induce a man, who had chosen his moment for consummating a long prepared scheme for stripping another of all his worldly wealth, to complicate his difficulties by every means, so as to render the bonds he had cast around him indissoluble.

"Here, take my horse," he said, addressing the sullen-looking postillion who stood behind the chaise; and when the man obeyed, civilly enough, Beauchamp approached a hale-looking man, like a grazier, and inquired, "What is all this?"

"Why, sir," replied the man, who had often seen his interrogator in Tarningham, "Mr. Wharton's clerk told me that there was an execution going to be put in, so I came up to see if I could get my bill. But the lawyer was beforehand with us; and the matter is not so much, only forty pound or so, and I did not think it worth while, when I found how matters are going, to trouble the hearty old gentleman, who has spent a deal o' money with us all in his day."

"You seem a very respectable man," said Beauchamp, calmly, but still somewhat moved, "and you shall not lose by your conduct. You, sir," and he turned to another, "I think you are the stationer at Tarningham—is yours the same errand, and on the same information?"

"Yes, sir," answered the person he addressed, "one of Mr. Wharton's young men came down and told me; but I think, with my neighbor Groves, that we should behave handsome."

"I see the whole matter," said Beauchamp, speaking rather to himself than those around. "You can wait a little, gentlemen. I think Sir John can pay you all without inconvenience, though he is a careless man, and his affairs may not be quite in order."

"They say Mr. Wharton has arrested him, sir," said a little man, with a thin, small voice.

"I will go in and see," replied Beauchamp, with a smile. "If any of you could contrive to go or send down to Tarningham, and say to Mr. Bacon, the attorney, that Lord Lenham would be glad to see him here immediately, you would oblige me. Tell him to lose not a moment."

"I'll go, in a jiffy," cried the stout man, jumping into a tax-cart. "Who did you say, my lord?"

"Lord Lenham," answered Beauchamp; "he will know who you mean;" and turning round, he walked into the house.

The servants grouped themselves differently at his appearance, and bowed low, the butler venturing to say,

"I am glad you have come, sir."

"Where is your master!" asked Beauchamp.

"In the library, sir," replied the man, "with a number of them. It is a sad time, sir, 'specially for my poor young lady."

The man walked on before, and opened the library door; Beauchamp followed quickly; and certainly the sight which that room presented was a painful one. Mrs. Clifford sat near one of the windows, the picture of despair; Isabella was seated near the table, with her eyes buried in her hands, and the rich curls of her beautiful hair falling over her face. Mary was bending down to speak to her; grief in her lovely face, but yet as calm and composed as usual. Old Sir John was a little in advance, with two bailiffs standing near—not the same who had been there earlier in the morning—and his valet behind him, helping him to put on his great coat, while Mr. Wharton stood at the other side of the large library-table, with a smile upon his lip, a frown upon his brow, a sparkling black eye, and a double degree of red in one of the cheeks, though the other looked somewhat pale. Two or three men, whose business there and ordinary functions were not apparent at the moment, made up the rest of the company.

Sir John Slingsby had one arm in the sleeve of his great coat, and was thrusting angrily and ineffectually at the garment, to get the other in also, speaking all the time in a furious tone, with his face turned to Mr. Wharton.

"I tell you, Wharton, you are a d—d scoundrel," he said, "an ungentlemanlike blackguard. You have swindled me out of thousands, and you know it; and now, without giving me a hint, you come upon me in this way."

"You are angry, Sir John, you are angry," said Mr. Wharton, in a sweet tone. "It is as unpleasant to me as to you, I can assure you; but when I heard that Mr. Wittingham had issued process, I was compelled, however unwillingly, to take care of myself and my clients. You know I told you a month ago it could not go on any longer; so you cannot say you had not notice."

The old baronet was about to pour upon him a new volley of objurgations, thrusting manfully at the sleeve of his coat all the time, when suddenly his eye rested upon Beauchamp, and he stopped, turning a little pale, for the presence of that gentleman at such a moment both surprised and pained him. Mary whispered a word to her cousin, however, and Isabella, starting up with the tears in her eyes, and a glow upon her cheeks, held out her hand to him exclaiming, "Oh, thank you, thank you! Dr. Miles was not to be found," she added, in a whisper, "or I would not have sent."

Beauchamp smiled and shook his head half reproachfully, and Sir John, recovering himself, took his hand, saying, "Ah, Beauchamp, you have come at an awkward time. Can't ask you to dinner to-day, my dear sir, for the house is in the hands of the myrmidons of the law, and I must away, they tell me. It's a bad job, I am afraid."

"Nevertheless, I intend to dine with you here, Sir John," answered Beauchamp, laughing and shaking the baronet's hand warmly, "so you had better take off your great coat."

"I beg your pardon, sir," said Mr. Wharton, taking a step forward, "but I am afraid Sir John Slingsby cannot remain with you at present. Business has been too long delayed already by the folly of the officer who thought fit—"

"To act like a man of some consideration and feeling, I suppose, sir," said Beauchamp, eying him from head to foot with a calm, cold, withering look. "You are Mr. Wharton, the attorney, I imagine, of whom I have heard so much in regard to several transactions soon to be inquired into."

"My name is Wharton, sir; yes, my name is Wharton," answered the solicitor in a sharp, fierce tone, "and I insist that you do not interrupt the operation of the law."

"The operation of the law I shall not interrupt," replied Beauchamp, "but the operations of the lawyer I certainly shall."

"He's a nabob," said Sir John Slingsby to his niece in a low, laughing voice, "yes, you are quite right, Beauchamp, this is Mr. Wharton, the attorney, calling himself esquire, and a greater scoundrel does not live between the four seas. He has cheated me through thick and thin, and now wants, by coming upon me all in a moment, to get possession of my property, as he has done with others before now."

"If such are his intentions he will find himself mistaken," answered Beauchamp. "But now, Sir John, take off your coat again, and we will to business. I think the ladies may as well leave us, however. Be satisfied, my dear madam," he continued, speaking to Mrs. Clifford, who had risen and come a little forward, "be satisfied, Miss Slingsby—all this matter will be easily arranged, and Sir John and I will join you in the drawing-room in an hour."

While Beauchamp had been speaking these few words, Mr. Wharton had been conversing with rapid utterance, but in a low voice, with one of the men present, who seemed to be the superior sheriff's officer; and as soon as the gentleman ceased, he exclaimed, "Well, sir, as you think the whole matter can be so easily arranged, I shall leave you to arrange it."

"Excuse me, Mr. Wharton," said Beauchamp, coolly, "you will be good enough to stay. We shall want you for certain receipts, and, perhaps," he added, with a smile, "for some good legal advice till my own solicitor comes, whom I expect in about half an hour."

"My receipts can be soon given," said Mr. Wharton, a good deal staggered and alarmed by Mr. Beauchamp's calm tone, and his allusion to his solicitor; "but I can tell you that if you think that is all you will have to do, you are mistaken. The house is filled with creditors."

"Gathered together by Mr. Wharton, the attorney, for the purpose of overwhelming a gentleman whom he sought to ruin," answered Beauchamp. "I am aware of all that, sir. Your proceedings have been watched, and I am informed of almost every step you have taken for the last month. I dare say, however, we shall find means of satisfying all who have any just claims."

Isabella had lingered at the door after her aunt and cousin had passed out, and now hastily turning back, she placed a little packet she had held tight in her hand, in that of Beauchamp, saying, in a low voice, "Here is more than six thousand pounds, left from what kind, good, Ned Hayward gave last night. The other debts are not large, but this man's claim is frightful."

She spoke in a tone of alarm; but Beauchamp hastened to relieve her, replying, "Never fear, never fear! The claim must be investigated, but all that is just shall be paid. Leave us, and make your mind easy, my dear Miss Slingsby."

"I really cannot waste my time here," said Mr. Wharton, as the young lady left the room: "I have important business to attend to, and the magistrates to meet at eleven, Mr. What's-your-name."

"My name, sir, is Charles Beauchamp St. Leger, Viscount Lænham," answered Beauchamp, "and I am afraid the magistrates must dispense with your company to-day, Mr. Wharton. You cannot carry this business through, sir, in the same manner that you did that of my poor uncle, Mr. St. Leger Moreton. So now make up your mind at once, sir, to remain here till the whole of this unpleasant business which you have stirred up against Sir John Slingsby be brought to a conclusion, for depend upon it I will not let you go till such is the case."

Mr. Wharton's face had turned paler and paler, till the carbuncles, of which it did not possess a few, remained alone in their glory; but he was an irritable and fiery man up to a certain point, and he replied in a bold tone, "Oh ho, my lord! Do you think because you happen to be a peer who has been skulking about the country under an alias, that you can come down and browbeat us country gentlemen at your pleasure!"

"I never attempt to browbeat a gentleman at all," replied Beauchamp, laying a particular emphasis on the last word, which called up a very unpleasant grin upon the faces of two or three of the men present, "nor do I browbeat you, Mr. Wharton; but I simply insist upon your staying till the business which brought you here is concluded. You have no right to put Sir John Slingsby in an unpleasant position, and then leave him there when your presence is wanted to relieve him from it."

"He has a ducking in the horse-pond, too, to go through," cried Sir John Slingsby, "such as we gave the other bailiff he sent up this morning. He must wait, he must wait for all the honors," and turning round with a laugh, the worthy baronet whispered a word or two to his valet, who remained in the room.

"I will take care, Sir John," said the man, and was moving toward the door; but Beauchamp interposed, saying,

"No, no, we must have no violence. Only order the servants not to let this man pass out till I have done with him; and now to business. Sir John, if you will take the end of the table, I will sit here. Mr. Wharton will place himself there, and the matter will soon be arranged. Ring that bell, sir."

The bailiff to whom he spoke obeyed in an instant; Sir John Slingsby took a chair at the head of the table, and Mr. Wharton seeing no help for it, seated himself where Beauchamp had pointed, turning his face to the window with an indifferent air, as if the business about to take place was no concern of his.

"Now, sir, what is it you want here?" asked Beauchamp, addressing one of the officers.

"I hold a writ against Sir John Slingsby for twenty-two thousand three hundred pounds," said the man, "at the suit of Joseph Wharton, Esq."

"Well, sir, stand back," said Beauchamp, "we will deal with you presently. And you, sir?" he continued, speaking to another stout, broad-set, black-faced man.

This proved to be an officer put in execution upon a second bond for a sum of seven thousand pounds at the suit of the same person. He also was directed to stand back, Beauchamp saying, "Upon these actions we will give bail, as they must be tried. You, sir, there at the end of the table, what do you want?"

"Why, please you, my lord, it's only my bill for a hundred and seventeen pounds, or thereabout, for repairs to the stables and offices. If it had not been Mr. Wharton told me I should not get my money if I did not apply at once, I should never have thought of troubling Sir John."

Beauchamp's eye fixed sternly upon the attorney, who exclaimed with a quivering lip, "Did you not consult me, sir? Was I not bound to give you a just opinion?"

"I never said a word to nobody," replied the man, "till I met you in the street, and you told me Mr. Wittingham was going to arrest Sir John."

"Really, my lord, this is trifling," said Mr. Wharton. "I ask, is Sir John Slingsby ready to discharge his heavy debt to me? If he is, let him do it, and I go. If not, he must, I fear, go to prison."

"He is quite ready, sir, to discharge every just debt this instant," replied Beauchamp, "but we doubt that yours is just, sir, and therefore we will deal first with those that are certainly honest. Sir John," he continued, pointing to a servant who had come in, "will you order Dr. Miles to be sent for. Now, my good man, you shall have a check for your money," and taking out his check-book, he wrote an order for the amount, taking the builder's name and statement from his own lips.

Another man was then called forward, and the same course pursued, Beauchamp proceeding quietly, although he saw Mr. Wharton rise and enter into eager consultation with the bailiffs.

He was not allowed to go on long without interruption, for after what seemed some urgent remonstrances on the part of Mr. Wharton, and a good deal of resistance on the part of the sheriff's officer, the latter stepped forward, saying, "I really, my lord, cannot wait any longer, and I do not see any good of it; for Sir John being in my custody, and not knowing what detainers may be lodged against him, a bail-bond cannot be drawn till we see."

The man spoke civilly, and with an evident respect for rank, and Beauchamp answered calmly, "Your observation is a very just one, my good friend. I have only to answer, however, that I am ready to give bail to any amount which you may think necessary to secure the sheriff, in which Dr. Miles will join me, I am sure, as soon as he arrives."

"It is a heavy sum, sir," said the bailiff, doubtfully.

"True," answered Beauchamp, "and moreover you do not know, except from my own word, who I am, nor that I am in a position to give an available bond. It is for that very reason that I wish you to delay till my solicitor and Dr. Miles arrive, when I assure you, upon my word of honor, that you shall have every satisfaction. The sum required would be more than met by money of mine in the Tarningham bank, as you will see by that receipt, if I thought fit to pay the debt claimed by Mr. Wharton at once, which I do not. The bond on which the writ has been taken out is, you tell me, for twenty-two thousand three hundred pounds. Here you see are sixty-five thousand pounds paid on my account into the Tarningham bank."

"But there is another bond for seven thousand five hundred pounds on which execution has issued," said Mr. Wharton.

"Exactly so," said Beauchamp, whose thoughts were very rapid, "and the way I intend to deal with that matter is as follows: We will pay the amount of that bond under protest as a matter of account, reserving this other claim for twenty-three thousand pounds to try the questions that may arise, such as consideration, usury, etc."

Mr. Wharton bit his lip. He saw that he had made one mistake. He feared that he might have made more; for knowing that Sir John Slingsby had little acquaintance with law, and an invincible objection to lawyers, excepting when he wanted to borrow money, he had gone on with somewhat rash confidence in his own powers of overreaching. However, he put a bold face upon the matter, saying, "That won't do, sir, that won't do, my lord. You seem to have a smattering of the law, but you will find that all accounts have been examined and passed. No court in Christendom will open that question again."

"We will see," replied Beauchamp, quietly.

"Then there is the mortgage," said Mr. Wharton.

"That will be dealt with as we shall be advised," rejoined the young nobleman; "the matter of the mortgage has nothing to do with the business before us; and, moreover, Mr. Wharton, I will beg you not to interfere here till you are called upon. Though a lawyer, you are exactly in the same position as any other creditor, and in taking out this writ, you have given all power into other hands. If I satisfy the sheriff that he has sufficient security according to law, for the appearance of Sir John Slingsby, that is all that is necessary; and I will tell you, sir, that sooner than see a course, which is certainly unhandsome, and which I suspect to be villainous, successful against my friend, even so far as to remove him from his own house for an hour, I would pay the amount of all claims upon him to the sheriff under protest. I have the means of doing so at command this moment, and, therefore, be very sure that your arts will avail you nothing, sir—I understand you," he added, sternly, "the property upon which you have advanced a pitiful sum of fifty thousand pounds, and by accumulating interest upon interest, and costs upon costs, have raised the debt to nearly eighty thousand, is worth, at least, two hundred. The bait was tempting, sir; but beware, that in snapping at it too eagerly, you have not got the hook in your jaws. There is such a thing, sir, as striking fraudulent attorneys off the roll, and at all events be sure, that however pleasant it might be to possess this estate, you will never have it."

"I do not want it, sir," cried Mr. Wharton, half-mad with rage and vexation, "I would not have it if you would give it to me."

Beauchamp laughed, and Sir John Slingsby shouted; while all the other persons in the room, not excepting bailiffs, tittered, without disguise, to the lawyer's sad discomfort.

"Ah, here comes Miles," exclaimed Sir John, "and Mr. Under-sheriff, too, by Jove. That is lucky; the matter will soon be settled now. How are you, doctor—how are you, Mr. Sheriff! You are the very man we wanted."

"I am very sorry for all this business, Sir John," said a tall, gentlemanlike person, whom he had addressed; "but having business at Tarningham, and hearing of the unfortunate occurrence by the way, I thought it better to come up myself, as I felt sure the action could be bailed."

"And so it can," cried Sir John Slingsby; "here stands bail ready in the person of my friend, Lord Lenham; but the pitiful little snivelling rogue, Wharton, objects."

"Ah, good-day, Wharton," said the sheriff, drily, "why do you object?"

"No, I do not object," replied the attorney; "the men here, Bulstrode and the rest, thought there might be detainers, and the process having—"

"No, no!" cried the officer, "we thought nothing about it, till you told us to refuse the bail till we had searched the office. I've a shrewd guess, Mr. Wharton, that you have got up all the creditors here who could lodge detainers, and his lordship offers to pay all honest debts at once, and to put in bail against yours."

"What do you mean by that?" exclaimed Wharton, furiously; but the sheriff interfered, and at the same time Doctor Miles and Beauchamp, who had been speaking together, turned round, and the clergyman introduced his young friend to the officer of the county by the title of Viscount Lenham.

"This matter, I think, can be settled with you, sir, in a few words," said Beauchamp. "I do not choose to see my friend, Sir John Slingsby, wronged. It so happens, that intending to buy an estate in this neighborhood, I have had a considerable sum lately paid into the Tarningham bank. I am ready to give a bail-bond for any sum you may think necessary to your own security, that Sir John appears to the action of Mr. Wharton, or any one else; or to pay into your hands any sum claimed under protest. I think, in these circumstances, there can be no need of removing Sir John from his own house."

"Not in the least," said the sheriff, "bail will be quite sufficient, and can be given here quite as well as ten miles hence."

"But, my dear sir," exclaimed Mr. Wharton, "there may be detainers for aught you know, and to a large amount."

"I will take my chance of that, Wharton," replied the under-sheriff, "there were none when I came away; for I had occasion to examine the books. It is not usual to lodge detainers till caption has been actually effected, I think, my good friend."

"I think your proceeding very rash and irregular, sir," replied the lawyer, nettled, "and I should certainly object, if—"

"Pooh, pooh!" cried the sheriff, "I am the best judge of my own affairs; and you are meddling with what does not concern you, Mr. Wharton. If I take a sufficient bail for Sir John's appearance to your action, that is all you have to do with, and perhaps more; so let us have no more of this; for I will not be meddled with in the discharge of my duties. You tried this once before, sir, and did not find it succeed."

"Well, sir, take your own way, take your own way!" cried Mr. Wharton, in a sharp tone; "the sum is large; if the bail be not good, you are responsible. A gentleman who goes about the country under one false name may very well take another. I do not mean to say it is so; but this gentleman who calls himself Lord Lenham now, and called himself Mr. Beauchamp a few days ago, may be the greatest swindler in England for aught any of us know."

"Swindlers do not usually have large sums at the banker's," said Dr. Miles, drily; "that is to say, Mr. Wharton, not those swindlers whom the law is willing to take hold of, though I have known many rich men who swindled a good deal within the law, especially in your profession. But to set all that at rest, I will join in the bond, if necessary, and I possess means, I trust, sufficient to insure Mr. Undersheriff against all risk. There comes Bacon, trotting up on his little fat horse. Bacon is a very excellent man, considering the temptations of profession and example."

"Well, as my opinion is of no value, my presence can be of no use," said Mr. Wharton; "and I shall therefore go. Good morning, gentlemen—Sir John Slingsby, good morning."

The baronet took a step forward, looking at the lawyer somewhat ominously, while the good stout calf of his leg might be seen to tremble a little, as if agitated by the simultaneous action of antagonist muscles; but then he stopped, saying aloud,

"No, I won't kick him—no, I won't kick anybody any more."

"A very prudent resolution, Sir John," said Dr. Miles, "pray adhere to it; and if you include the horsewhip in your renunciations, you will do well."

Mr. Wharton was suffered to retreat unkicked; the matter of the bail-bond was easily arranged; all the rest of the business passed quietly; the bailiffs and their satellites were withdrawn from the house; the creditors who remained, paid; and the under-sheriff took his leave. Somewhat more time had been expended, indeed, than Beauchamp had expected that the affair would occupy, ere he, Sir John Slingsby, and Doctor Miles were once more left alone in the library; but then the baronet seized his friend's hand, with an unwonted dew in his eyes, saying,

"How can I ever thank you for your noble conduct? I cannot show my gratitude; but you must be secured. You shall have a mortgage for the whole sum: the estate can well bear it, I am sure, notwithstanding all that fellow Wharton says."

"I am quite convinced it can, Sir John," answered Beauchamp, "and I will accept your offer, because, for reasons of my own, I am exceedingly anxious that you should be under no possible obligation to me; and now let us join the ladies, for they will think we are never coming."

Dr. Miles smiled; for though he had never played at the games of love and matrimony, he had been a looker-on all his life, and understood them well. Sir John Slingsby was totally unconscious, and led the way to the drawing-room, marveling a little, perhaps—for he was not a vain man—at the fact of his having so completely won Beauchamp's regard, and created such an interest in his bosom, but never attributing to his daughter any share therein. With parents it is ever the story of the philosopher and his cat; and though they can solve very difficult problems regarding things at a distance, yet they do not always readily see that a kitten can go through the same hole in a door which its mother can pass.

"Here, Isabella," cried the old gentleman, as they entered the room where the three ladies were seated, watching the door as if their fate hung upon its hinges, "shake this gentleman by the hand, as the best friend your father ever had."

"I do thank him, from my heart," said Isabella, giving Beauchamp her hand, with tears in her eyes; "but yet, my dear father," she added, frankly, "Mr. Beauchamp would think me ungenerous if I did not tell you that you have another friend, who has acted in as kind and noble a manner as himself. I mean Captain—no, I will call him by his old name—Ned Hayward; for to him we owed the means of discharging the debt to that man Wittingham."

"The obligation is infinitely greater to him than to me, my dear Miss Slingsby," said Beauchamp; "for I know that Hayward's income is not very large, while, in my case, there is really no obligation at all. This money was lying idle, and it might just as well be invested in one way as another."

"But every one is not so ready to invest money in a friend's relief," said Sir John, "and I shall never forget it. Hang me, my dear girl, if I can tell what he found out in me to like or respect; I never could discover anything of the kind myself."

Isabella colored to the eyes, but answered at once,

"Mr. Beauchamp consulted only his own noble heart."

"Mr. Beauchamp!" cried Sir John Slingsby, with one of his merry laughs; "Mr. Beauchamp had nothing to do with it, Bella. I am not in the least indebted to Mr. Beauchamp."

Isabella, Mrs. Clifford, and Mary, were all alarmed; for they might well fear that the events of that morning had somewhat affected Sir John Slingsby's brain. But he soon relieved them.

"No, Isabella," he continued, "it is to this gentleman I am indebted—let me introduce him to you. Isabella, Lord Lenham! Lord Lenham, my daughter."

Isabella cast her eyes to the ground, and a shade of deep, and, it seemed to Beauchamp, anxious thought, came over her face; but the next moment she looked up, all bright and sparkling again, and exclaimed,

"So, Lord Lenham has thought fit to come upon us in masquerade! That was hardly fair, my lord."

"Some day when Miss Slingsby will let me tell a long story she shall hear the reasons why," answered Beauchamp, "and may then judge whether it was fair or not. If she decides the cause in my favor, she may tell the pleadings to the whole party; if she thinks I have greatly erred, she shall forgive the offender, and conceal his crime under the seal of confession."

Again Isabella blushed deeply; and Sir John Slingsby made the matter worse by exclaiming, "Ho, ho! it is to be a private conference, is it? We are all to be kept in the dark, as, indeed, I have been lately; for all I know is that I have been placed in a very unpleasant and unexpected situation this morning, and as suddenly relieved from it by the affection of two dear girls, and the generosity of our noble friend I have not thanked you yet, my dear Mary; but pray let me hear how all this has been brought about, that I may do so discreetly."

"In the mean time," said Beauchamp, "I who know the whole, will walk back again to my poor friend Hayward, and tell him how all things have gone."

"You promised to dine, you promised to dine!" cried Sir John Slingsby, "no breach of promise, or I will have my action against you."

"I will keep mine to the letter," replied Beauchamp, "and be back in a couple of hours."

"And bring Ned Hayward with you," said the baronet.

Beauchamp explained that such a thing was impossible, saying that his friend had become somewhat worse in health since the preceding night, but without giving any cause for alarm His eyes turned toward Mary Clifford as he spoke, with a momentary glance, which sufficed, by the paleness that spread over her face, to confirm suspicions which he had entertained since the night before. He was too much a gentleman in heart to keep his eyes there more than that one moment, for he felt that it would not only be a rudeness, but an unkindness.

"I will walk with you, my good lord," said Doctor Miles, "I long to see Captain Hayward He has particularly interested me."

"And you will walk back with Lord Lenham to dinner, doctor," said Sir John, as gaily as ever; "we will have one jolly evening after all this fracas, at all events."

"I will come to dinner," replied Dr. Miles, "expressly to keep it from being too jolly, you incorrigible old gentleman."

But Sir John only laughed, and the peer and the priest walked away together.

CHAPTER XXXII.

"You said just now, doctor," observed Beauchamp, as they strolled through the park, "that Ned Hayward particularly interested you. I am glad of it, for he did so with me from the first, without my well knowing why; and we are always glad to find a prepossession which savors, perhaps, a little of weakness, kept in countenance by others for whom we have a respect."

"You mistake altogether, young gentleman," replied the doctor, with the dry spirit upon him. "In my case it is no prepossession; neither did he interest me from the first. I generally can give a reason for what I feel. I am no being of impulses. Indeed," he continued, more discursively, "I was anything but prepossessed in Captain Hayward's favor. I knew he had been brought up in the army, under the judicious auspices of Sir John Slingsby. That dear girl, Isabella, told me that, from what she could remember of him, he was a gay, lively, rattling fellow. Sir John called him the best fellow that ever lived, and I know tolerably well what that means. The reason, then, why he interested me very soon was because he disappointed me. For half an hour after I first saw him, I thought he was just what I expected—a man constitutionally lively, gay from want of thought, good-humored from want of feeling; having some talents, but no judgment; acting right occasionally by impulse, but not by principle."

"You did him great injustice," said Beauchamp, warmly.

"I know I did," replied the clergyman, "but not long. A thousand little traits showed me that, under the shining and rippling surface of the lake, there were deep, still waters. The singular delicacy and judgment with which he treated that business of the scandalous attack upon Mrs. Clifford's carriage; the kindly skill with which he led Sir John away from the subject, when he found that it distressed poor Mary; his conduct toward the poacher and his boy; his moderation and his gentleness in some cases, and his vigor and resolution in others, soon set all preconceived opinions to rights. He has one fault, however, which is both a very great and a very common one—he conceals his good qualities from the eyes of others. This is a great wrong to society. If all good and honest men would but show themselves as they really are, they would stare vice out of countenance; and if even those who are not altogether what we wish would show the good that is in them, and conceal the bad, they would put vice and folly out of fashion; for I do believe that there are far more good men, and even a greater amount of good qualities among those who are partly bad, than the world knows anything about. So you see I am not a misanthrope."

"I never suspected you of being so, my dear doctor," said Beauchamp; "if I had, I should not have attempted to create an interest for myself in you."

"Ay! then, you had an interested motive in coming up every other day to my little rectory, just at the time that Isabella Slingsby visited her poor and her schools!" cried Dr. Miles, laughing; "but I understand it—I understand it all, my noble lord—there is not such a thing as a purely disinterested man upon earth: the difference is simply the sort of interest men seek to serve—some are filthy interests, such as avarice, ambition, ostentation, even gluttony—how I have seen men fawn upon the givers of good dinners! Then there are maudlin interests, such as love and its et ceteras; and then, again, there are the generous interests; but I am afraid I must class those you sought to serve in such friendly visitations among the maudlin ones—is it not so?"

"Not exactly," answered Beauchamp; "for if you remember, my good friend, you will find that I came up to your house at the same hour, and as often, before I saw Miss Slingsby there, as afterward. Moreover, during the whole time I did so come before I was introduced to her father, I never had a thought of offering her my hand, how much soever I might admire and esteem her."

Dr. Miles turned round, and looked at his companion steadily, for a moment or two.

"I do not know what to make of you," he said at length.

"I will tell you," replied Beauchamp, with a sad smile, "for I do not believe any one could divine the causes which have led me to act a somewhat unusual, if not eccentric part, without knowing events which took place many years ago. I told you once that I wished to make you my father confessor. I had not time then to finish all I had to say; but my intention has been still the same, and it is now necessary, for Miss Slingsby's sake, that I should execute it: we shall have time in going over, and I will make my story short. You are probably aware that I was an only son, my father having never married after my mother's death, my mother having survived my birth only a few hours. My father was a man of very keen sensibilities, proud of his name, his station, and his family—proud of their having been all honorable, and not one spot of reproach having ever rested on his lineage. He was too partially fond of me, too, as the only pledge of love left him by one for whom he sorrowed with a grief that unnerved his mind, and impaired his corporeal health. I was brought up at home, under a careful tutor, for my father had great objections, partly just, partly I believe, unjust, toward schools. At home I was a good deal spoiled, and had too frequently my own way, till I was sent to college, where I first learned something of the world; but, alas! not much, and I have had harder lessons since. The first of these was the most severe. My cousin, Captain Moreton, was ten years older than myself; but he had not yet shown his character fully. My father and myself knew nothing of it; for though he paid us an annual visit for a week or two, the greater part of his time was spent either here or in Scotland, where he had a grand-aunt who doted upon him. One year, when I was just twenty, while he was on a shooting-party at our house, in October, he asked me to go down with him in the following summer, to shoot grouse at old Miss Moreton's. I acceded readily; and my father as willingly gave his consent. We set out on the twenty-fifth of July, and I was received with all sorts of Scotch hospitality at Miss Moreton's house. There were many persons there at dinner, and among the rest a Miss Charlotte Hay—"

"Why do you stop?" asked Dr. Miles.

"A Miss Charlotte Hay," continued Beauchamp, with an evident effort, "a very beautiful person, and highly accomplished. She was some four or five years older than myself, I believe, affecting a romantic style of thought, feeling, and language. She was beautiful, I have said; but hers was not the style of beauty I admired, and at first I took but little notice of her. She sang well, however, and before the first evening was over, we had talked a good deal—the more, perhaps, as I found that most of the ladies present, though of no very high station, nor particularly refined manners, did not seem to love her conversation. It appeared to me that she was superior to them; and when I found that, though of good family, her fortune was extremely limited, and that she had resided with old Miss Moreton for some time, as something between a friend and a companion, I fancied I understood the coldness I observed on the part of more wealthy people. Many days passed over, during which she certainly endeavored to attract and captivate me. I was in general somewhat on my guard; but I was then young, inexperienced, vain, romantic; and though I never dreamed of making her my wife, yet I trifled away many an hour by her side, feeling passion growing upon me—mark, I say passion, not love; for there was much that prevented me from respecting her enough to love her—a display of her person, a carelessness of proprieties, an occasional gleam of perverted principle, that no art could hide. Once or twice, too, I caught a smile passing between her and my cousin Moreton, which I did not like, and whenever that occurred it recalled me to myself; but, with weak facility, I fell back again till the day of my departure approached. Two or three days before—on the eleventh of August, which was my twenty-first birth-day—Miss Moreton declared she would have a party of her neighbors to celebrate the event. None of the higher and more respectable gentry were invited, or, if they were, they did not come. There were a good many deep-drinking lairds, and some of their wives and daughters, somewhat stiff in their graver, and hoydenish in their merrier, moments. It is one of those days that the heart longs for years to blot out forever. I gave way to the high spirits which were then habitual to me. I drank deep—deeper than I had ever before done. I suffered my brain to be troubled—I know not that there were not unfair means used to effect it—but at all events, I was not myself. I recollect personally little that passed; but I have since heard that I was called upon to choose a wife for the afternoon. I was told it was the custom of the country, on such occasions, so to do in sport; and that I fixed, at once, upon this artful girl—in the presence of many witnesses, I called her wife, and she called me husband. The evening passed over; I drank more wine at supper, and the next morning I found myself married—for the infamous fraud they called a marriage. In horror and dismay, I burst away from the wretched woman who had lent herself to such a base transaction. I sent off my servant at once for horses to my carriage—I cast Moreton from me, who attempted to stop and reason with me, as he called it, representing that what had taken place was a full and sufficient marriage, according to the code of Scotland, for that public consent was all that was required by their law."

"Or by the law of God either," replied Dr. Miles, "but it must be free and intelligent consent."

"I traveled night and day," continued Beauchamp, rapidly, "till I had reached my father's house and thrown myself at his feet. I told him all—I extenuated, concealed nothing; and I shall never forget either his kindness or his distress of mind. Instant steps were taken to ascertain the exact position in which I stood; and the result was fatal to my hopes of happiness and peace: for not only did he find that I was entangled past recall, but that the character of the woman herself was such as might be expected from her having been a party to so disgraceful a scheme. She had been blighted by scandal before she took up her residence in the house where I found her. Miss Moreton, in her dotage, yielded herself blindly to my cousin's guidance; and there was more than a suspicion that he had made his aunt's protection a veil to screen his own paramour."

"What did you do? what did you do?" asked Dr. Miles, with more eagerness than he usually displayed; "it was a hard case, indeed."

"I went abroad immediately," replied Beauchamp, "for my father exacted from me a solemn promise never to live with or to see, if it could be avoided, the woman who had thus become my wife. He used strong and bitter, but just terms in speaking of her. 'He could not survive the thought,' he said, 'that the children of a prostitute should succeed to the title of a family without stain.' My promise was given willingly, for I will confess that hate, and indignation, and disgust rendered her very idea odious to me. My father remained in England for some months, promising to make such arrangements regarding money—the base object of the whole conspiracy—that I should never be troubled any more. He added tenderly and sadly, though gravely and firmly, that farther he could do nothing; for that I must bear the consequences of one great error in a solitary and companionless life. In consideration of a promise on the woman's part never to molest me, nor to take my name, he settled upon her the sum of a thousand a-year per annum. During my father's life I heard no more of her; but when he himself joined me in Italy, I could see but too plainly how grief and bitter disappointment had undermined a constitution already shaken. He did not long survive, and all that I have myself undergone has been little compared with the thought that the consequences of my own folly served to shorten the days of my kind, good parent."

"But what became of the woman?" demanded Dr. Miles. "You surely have had tidings of her since."

"Within a month after my father's death," replied Beauchamp, "I received from her one of the most artful letters that woman ever wrote, claiming to be received as my wife. But I will not trouble you with the details. Threats succeeded to blandishments, and I treated these with contempt, as I had the others with coldness. Then commenced a new system of persecution; she followed me, attempted to fix herself upon me. Once she arrived at an inn in the Tyrol as I was getting into my carriage, and declared before the people round that she was my abandoned wife. I answered not a word, but ordered the door to be closed, and the postillions to drive on. Then came applications for an increased annuity; but I would not yield one step, knowing that it would but lead to others, and in the end, to free myself from everyday annoyance, I took the name of Beauchamp, hurried on to the East, directed my agent to conceal my address from every one, and for several years wandered far and wide. At length the tidings reached me that the annuity, which had at first been punctually demanded, had not been applied for. A report, too, reached my lawyer's ears that she had died in Paris. Still I would not return to claim my rank, lest there should be some deep scheme at work, and I continued in India and Syria for two years longer. The annuity remained unclaimed. I knew that she had expensive habits and no means, and I ventured back. I passed a few months in London without resuming my own name; but the noise and bustle of the great city wearied me, and I came hither. Inquiries in the mean time had been made, somewhat languidly, perhaps, to ascertain the fate of this unhappy woman; but here I saw Isabella Slingsby, and those inquiries have been since pursued rapidly and strictly. Every answer tended to one result, and four days ago I received a letter from my solicitor, informing me that there can be no doubt of her demise. I will show it to you hereafter; but therein he says that her effects in Paris had been publicly sold, as those of a person deceased, to pay the claims of her maid, who had brought forward sufficient proofs to satisfy the police that her mistress had died in Italy. The girl herself could not be found by my agents; but the lawyers consider this fact, coupled with the total cessation of claims for the annuity, as proving the death of Charlotte Hay, and removing all doubt that this bitter bond is canceled forever."

"That is clear, that is clear," said Dr. Miles, who at this moment was pausing with his companion at a stile, "and now; I suppose it is hand and heart for Isabella Slingsby."

"Assuredly," said Beauchamp, "but she must be informed of all this; and it is not a tale for me to tell."

"Will you have the kindness, sir," said a voice from the other side of the hedge, as Beauchamp put his foot upon the first step of the stile, "to keep on that side and go out by the gate at the corner."

"Oh, is that you in the ditch, Stephen?" said Beauchamp. "Very well, my good man; one way is as good as the other."

"I am watching something here, sir," said the gamekeeper in a low voice, "and if you come over, you'll disturb the thing."

Beauchamp nodded, and went on in the way he directed; and Doctor Miles, who had been meditating, replied to what he had said just before the interruption of the gamekeeper.

"But who else can do it! Sir John is unfit. Me, you would have? Humph! It is not a pleasant story for even an old gentleman to tell to a young lady."

"Yet she must know it," answered Beauchamp; "I will—I can have no concealment from her."

"Assuredly, there you are right," replied Doctor Miles, "and I am sure the dear girl will value your sincerity properly."

"She can but say that I committed a great error," answered Beauchamp; "and for that error I have been punished by long years of bitterness."

"Well, well, I will do my best," answered the rector; "but make your proposal first, and refer her to me for the story of your life. I will deal in generals—I will not go into details. That you can do hereafter, if you like."

Thus conversing they walked on, and soon after reached the cottage of Stephen Gimlet, where they found Ned Hayward beginning to feel relief from the operation which the surgeon had performed in the morning. Beauchamp returned to him the sum which he had received from Miss Slingsby in the morning, saying, that he had found no necessity for using it, and Doctor Miles sat down by him, and talked with cheerful kindness for about a quarter of an hour. Was it tact and a clear perception of people's hearts that led the worthy clergyman to select Mary Clifford for one of the subjects of his discourse, and to enlarge upon her high qualities? At all events he succeeded in raising Captain Hayward's spirits ere he set out again upon his way homeward.

When he descended he found Gimlet, the gamekeeper, seated with Widow Lamb; and the man, as he opened the door, apologized for having stopped the rector and Mr. Beauchamp at the stile, but did not state in what he had been so busily engaged. As soon, however, as Doctor Miles was gone, Ste Gimlet resumed his conversation with Mrs. Lamb, and it was a low-toned and eager one. From time to time the old lady bowed her head, saying, "Yes;" but she added nothing to the monosyllable for some time. At length, however, in answer to something that her son-in-law said, she exclaimed,

"No, Stephen, do not speak with him about it. I tried it this morning, and it had a terrible effect upon him. It seemed to change him altogether, and made him, so kind and gentle as he is, quite fierce and sharp. Speak with his friend, Captain Hayward; for neither you nor I can know what all this may mean. But above all, watch well, for it is clear they are about no good, and tell me always what you hear and see, for I cannot help thinking that I know more of these matters than the young lord does himself—a bitter bond, did he call it? Well, it may be a bond for the annuity you heard him talk of; but then why does she not claim it? There must be some object, Stephen."

The good old lady's consideration of the subject was prevented at that moment from proceeding further by the entrance of her son, Billy Lamb, who came up and kissed her affectionately. The lad was somewhat pale, and there was an air of fatigue in his small, pinched, but intelligent countenance, which made his mother hold him to her heart with a feeling of painful anxiety. Oh, how the affections of a parent twine themselves round a suffering child! Every care, every labor, every painful apprehension that he causes us, seems but a new bond to bind our love the more strongly to him. The attachment that is dewed with tears and hardened with the cold air of sorrow and fear is ever the more hardy plant.

"Sit down, Bill," said Stephen Gimlet, kindly, "you look tired, my lad. I will get you a draught of beer."

"I cannot wait, Ste," answered the pot-boy, "for I must be back as quick as I can; but I can look in to see mother for a minute every day now. The gentleman who has got the little lone cottage on the edge of Chandleigh Heath gives me half-a-crown a week to bring up his letters and newspapers, and I take the time when all the folks are at dinner in our house."

"And get no dinner yourself, poor Bill," said Stephen Simlet; "cut him a slice of the cold bacon, mother, and a hunch of bread. He can eat it as he goes. I'll run and draw him a draught of beer. It won't keep you a minute, Bill, and it will help you on, too."

He waited for no reply, but ran with a jug in his hand to the outhouse where his beer-barrel stood. When he came back the boy drank eagerly, kissed the old lady again, and then set out with the bread and bacon in his hand; but Stephen Gimlet walked out with him, and after they had taken a few steps, he asked,

"Who is it, Bill, has got the cottage?"

"I don't know," answered the lad. "A tall, strong man he is, with large whiskers all the way under his chin, a little grayish. He met me last night when I took up a parcel from Mr. —— to Burton's inn, and asked if I came that way every day. I said I did not, but could come if he wanted anything."

"But you must know his name if you get his letters, Bill?" said Gimlet.

"No, I do not, but I soon can," answered the deformed youth. "He took me into the cottage, and made the lady give him some paper and a pen and ink, and wrote a note to the postmaster, and gave me a half-crown, and said I should have the same every week. The postmaster wrapped up the letters and things in a bit of paper, and I did not think to look at it; but I can soon find out if you want to know."

"No," answered Stephen Gimlet, drily, "I know already. Well, Bill, good-bye, I must go about my work," and so they parted.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

I BEG Captain Moreton's pardon; I left him running across a field in not the brightest possible night that ever shone. I should, at least, have taken him safely home before now, wherever that home might be, which would be indeed difficult to say; for the home of Captain Moreton was what people who pore over long lines of figures call a variable quantity. However, there was once, at least there is reported to have been once—for I do not take upon myself to answer for the fact—a certain young person called Galanthis. She was a maid-of-all-work in a very reputable Greek family, and was called as a witness in the famous crim. con. case of Amphitryon versus Jupiter. She proved herself very skilful in puzzling an examining counsel, and there is an old nonsensical story of her having been changed into a weasel to commemorate the various turnings and windings of her prevarications. Nevertheless, not this convenient Abigail, nor any of her pliant race, ever took more turnings and windings than did Captain Moreton on the night after his escape from his prison in the vestry. Every step of the country round he knew well, and up one narrow lane, through this small field, along that wood-path, by another short cut, he went, sometimes walking and sometimes running, till at length he came to a common of no very great extent, lying half-way, or nearly so, between the town of Tarningham and the house called Burton's Inn. The common was called Chandleigh Heath; and on the side next to the inn was the village of Chandleigh, while between the heath and Tarningham lay about two miles of well cultivated but not very populous fields and meadows. At an angle of the common a retired hosier of Chandleigh had built himself a cottage—a cottage suited to himself and his state—consisting of six rooms, all of minute size, and he had, moreover, planted himself a garden, in which roses strove with apple-trees and cherries. The hosier—as retired hosiers will very often do—died one day, and left the cottage to his nephew, a minor. The guardians strove to let the cottage furnished, but for upward of a year they strove in vain; its extremely retired situation was against it, till one day it was suddenly tenanted, and right glad were they to get a guinea a week, and ask no questions. It was to this retired cottage, then, of the retired hosier, that Captain Moreton's steps were ultimately bent, and as it had windows down to the ground on the garden side, he chose that side, and went in at the window, where, I forgot to remark, there were lights shining.

At a table in the room, with a foot upon a footstool, and a pillow behind her back, sat a lady whom we have before described; and certainly, to look at her face, handsome as it was, no one would have fancied there was a fierce and fiery spirit beneath, so weak and, I may venture to call it, lack-a-daisical was the expression.

"Heaven, Moreton, how you startled me!" cried the lady: "where have you been such a long time? You know I want society at night. It is only at night I am half-alive."

"Well," said Captain Moreton, with a laugh, "I have been half-dead and half-buried; for I have been down into a vault, and shut up in a vestry as a close prisoner. I only got out by wrenching off the bars. Nobody could see my face, however, so that is lucky; for they can but say I was looking at a register by candle-light, and the old sexton will not peach for his own sake."

"Still at those rash tricks, Moreton," said the lady; "it will end in your getting hanged, depend upon it. I have been writing a poem called 'The Rash Man' and I was just hanging him when you came in and startled me."

"My rash tricks, as you call them, got you a thousand a-year once," answered Moreton, sharply, "so, in pity, leave your stupid poetry, Charlotte, and listen to what I have to say."

"Stupid poetry!" exclaimed the lady, angrily "There was a time when you did not call it so; and as for the thousand a-year, it was more to save yourself than to serve me that you fancied that scheme. You know that I hated the pedantic boy, as virtuous as a young kid, and as pious as his grandmother's prayer-book. Nothing would have induced me to marry him if you had not represented—"

"Well, never mind all that," answered Moreton, interrupting her. "We have something else to think of now, Charlotte. I don't know that it would not be better for me to be off, after all."

"Well, I am ready to go whenever you like," replied the lady. "I am sure it is not very pleasant to stay in this place, seeing nobody and hearing nothing; without opera, or concert, or coffee-house, or any thing. I shall be very glad to go."

"Ay, ay, but that is a different matter," said Captain Moreton, considerately. "I said it would be perhaps better for me to be off; but I am quite sure it will be better for you to stay."

The lady looked at him for a moment or two with the eyes of a tiger. If she had had a striped or spotted skin upon her back one would have expected her to spring at his throat the next minute; but she had acquired a habit of commanding her passions to a certain point, beyond which, they indeed became totally ungovernable, but which was not yet attained; and she contented herself with giving Captain Moreton one of those coups de patte with which she sometimes treated him. "So, Moreton," she said, "you think that you can go away and leave me to take care of myself, as you did some time ago; but you are mistaken, my good friend. I have become wiser now, and I certainly shall not suffer you."

"How will you stop me?" asked her companion, turning sharply upon her.

"As to stopping you," she replied, with a sneer, "I do not know that I can. You are a strong man and I am a weak woman, and in a tussle you will get the better; but I could bring you back, Moreton, you know, if I did not stop you."

"How!" demanded he again, looking fiercely at her.

"By a magistrate's warrant, and half-a-dozen constables," answered the lady. "You do not think I have had so much experience of your amiable ways for nothing, or that I have not taken care to have proofs of a good many little things that would make you very scarce in any, country but one of outlaws and pirates."

"Do you mean to say that you will destroy me, woman!" exclaimed Captain Moreton.

"Not exactly destroy you," replied his fair companion, "though you would make a fine criminal under the beam. I have not seen an execution for I do not know how long, and it is a fine sight, after all—better than all the tragedies that ever were written. It is no fun seeing men kill each other in jest: one knows that they come to life again as soon as the curtain falls; but once hanging over the drop, or lying on the guillotine, there's no coming to life any more. I should like to see you hanging, Moreton, when you are hanged. You would hang very well, I dare say."

She spoke in the quietest, most sugary tone possible, with a slight smile upon her lip, and amused herself while she did so in sketching with the pen and ink a man under a beam with a noose round his neck. Captain Moreton gazed at her meanwhile, with his teeth hard shut, and not the most placable countenance in the world, as she brought vividly up before his imagination all those things which crime is too much accustomed and too willing to forget.

"And you, Charlotte, you would do this!" he exclaimed, at length: "but it is all nonsense; and how you ever can talk of such things I cannot imagine, when I merely spoke of going myself and leaving you for a short time, for your own good."

"For my own good! Oh, yes; I have heard all that before, more than twelve years ago," replied the lady. "I yielded to your notions of my own good, then, and much good has come of it, to me, at least. So do not talk of ever separating your fate from mine again, Moreton; for were you to attempt it, I would do as I have said, depend upon it."

"It was your own good I thought about," replied Captain Moreton, bitterly, "and that you will soon see when you hear the whole. Do you not think if Lenham were to find out that you are living here with me there would soon be suits in the ecclesiastical courts for divorce and all the rest?"

"Oh, you know, we talked about all that before," replied the lady, "and took our precautions. You are here as my earliest friend, assisting me to regain my rights, nothing more. All that was settled long ago, and I see no reason for beginning it all over again."

"But there is a reason," answered Captain Moreton, "as you would have heard before now if you would have let me speak; but you are so diabolically hasty and violent. I brought you the best news you could have, if you would but listen."

"Indeed!" said the lady, looking up from the pleasant sketch she was finishing with an expression of greater interest, "what may that be?"

"Why, simply, that Lenham has proposed to Miss Slingsby," replied Captain Moreton, "and they are to be married directly—as soon as that fellow, Wittingham, is out of all danger."

Her eyes flashed at the intelligence, and her lip curled with a triumphant smile as she inquired, "Where did you hear it? Who told you? Are you sure?"

"Quite," answered Moreton, "I had it from old Slattery, the apothecary, who knows the secrets of all the houses round. He told it to me as a thing quite certain."

"Then I have him! Then I have him!" exclaimed his companion, joyfully; "Oh, I will make him drink the very dregs of a bitterer cup than ever he has held to my lips."

"But you must be very careful," said Captain Moreton, "not the slightest indiscretion — not the slightest hint, remember, or all is lost."

"I will be careful," she replied, "but yet all cannot be lost even if he were to discover that I am alive. He has made the proposal to one woman when he is already married to another That would be disgrace enough to blast and wither him like a leaf in the winter. I know him well enough for that. For the first time he has given me the power of torturing him, and I will work that engine till his cold heart cracks, let him do what he will."

"Well, this was the reason I thought it would be better for me to be off for a short time," said Captain Moreton, "though you must remain here."

"I don't see that," cried the lady, "I won't have it."

Her companion had fallen into a fit of thought, however, as soon as he had uttered the last words, and he did not seem to attend to her. His thoughts, indeed, were busy with a former part of their conversation. He felt that he was, as she said, in her power, and he saw very well how sweetly and delicately she was inclined to use power when she did possess it. He therefore asked himself if it might not be as well to put some check upon her violence before it hurried her into anything that could not be repaired; for although Captain Moreton was fond of a little vengeance himself, yet he loved security better, and thought it would be poor consolation for being hanged that he had spoiled all her fine schemes. He was still debating this point in his own mind, when finding that he did not answer, she said,

"Do you hear! I say I will not have it, and you had better not talk of it any more, for if I take it into my head that you are trying to get off and leave me here, I will take very good care that your first walk shall be into jail."

"In which case," said Captain Moreton, coldly, "I would, by one word, break the bond between you and Lenham, and send you to prison too. You think that I am totally in your power, madam; but let me tell you that you are in mine also. Our confidence, it is true, has not been mutual, but our secrets are so."

"What do you mean?" exclaimed the lady, turning deadly pale.

"I will tell you," replied her companion. "What I mean may be soon hinted, so that you can understand. When I first became acquainted with you, my fair friend, you were twenty years of age. There were events which happened when you were eighteen that you have always thought comfortably hidden in your own bosom and that of one other. Let me now tell you that they have never been concealed from me. You understand me, I see by your face, so no more of this. I shall not go, because you do not wish it, and I proposed it only for your good; but now let us have some brandy-and-water, for the night is wonderfully cold for the season."

The lady made no reply, but sat looking down at the table with her cheek still white, and Moreton got up and rang the bell. A woman-servant appeared, received his orders, and went away, and then turning to his companion, he pulled her cheek familiarly, saying,

"Come, Charlotte, let us have no more of all this; we had better get on well together. Have any of the servants been into the room to-night since I left you?"

The lady looked up with a sort of bewildered and absent air, saying,

"No, I think not — let me see. No, no. I have been sitting writing and sleeping. I fell asleep for an hour, and then I wrote till you came back. No one has been in, I am very sure."

"While you were asleep they might," said Moreton, thoughtfully.

"No, no," she answered, "I should have heard them instantly; I wake in a moment, you know, with the least sound. Nobody has been in the room I will swear."

"Then you can swear, too, that I never left it," answered Moreton, laughing; "I mean that I have been here or hereabout all night, in case it should be needed."

The lady did not seem at all shocked at the proposal, for she had no great opinion of the sanctity of oaths, and when the servant returned with all that Captain Moreton had demanded, he asked her sharply,

"Where were you, Kitty, when I rang about an hour ago?"

"Lord, sir," replied the woman, "I have only run across to ask why they had not sent my beer."

"Well, I wish you would take some other time for going on such errands," pettishly replied Captain Moreton, and there the subject dropped.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Beauchamp took care to be back at Tarningham Park a full hour and a half before dinner-time; but schemes and purposes of making love or a declaration at a certain place and time are never successful. Continually they are put off, and very often they are forced on by circumstances, and although there is no event of life perhaps in which the happy moment is more important, it is seldom met with or chosen. Such was the case in the present instance: Sir John Slingsby played third on one occasion, Mrs. Clifford on another, and when Mary, dear considerate girl, after breaking in for a moment, made a very reasonable excuse to retire, the dressing-bell rang as she closed the door, and Beauchamp, knowing that he could not detain Miss Slingsby more than five minutes, would not attempt to crowd all he had to say into so short a space. He was resolved to say something, however, and as Isabella was about to leave him he stopped her, asking if she knew that her father had invited him to pass the night there.

"Oh, of course," answered his fair companion in a gay tone, "you do not think he would let you go to pass the hours of darkness among the Goths and Vandals of Tarningham. He would be afraid of your life being attempted You do not think of going?"

"I have accepted his invitation," answered her lover, "because I have several things to talk over with Sir John, and on one subject also with you, dear lady. Will you give me some time in the course of to-morrow—a few minutes—nay, perhaps, an hour alone?"

Isabella colored and looked away; but she was thankful for a reprieve from immediate agitation, and she replied in a low tone, "Certainly—but I must go and dress, or my maid will be impatient."

But Beauchamp still detained her for a moment, "You are an early riser, I think," he said; "will you take a walk before breakfast, down toward the stream? Nay, Isabella, why should you hesitate? Remember, I have a history to give."

"I hope not a sad one," answered Isabella gaily, "for I think I should be easily moved to tears just now, and I must not return with my eyes red—nay, Beauchamp, let me go or I shall cry now."

He released the hand he had taken instantly, and Miss Slingsby took a step away, but looked round, and returning at once, gave it back again, saying, more gravely, "What is the use of my long history?—and yet it had better be too. I will take a walk with you when you like, for I must speak with you too—but not now: there's no time. So farewell for the present," and she left him.

The dinner passed more quietly than Sir John Slingsby's dinners usually did. The baronet's spirits, which had risen immensely after the first pressure was taken off, fell again during the course of the day; and for the first time in his life, perhaps, he was grave and thoughtful throughout the evening. Isabella had her store of meditations, and so had Mary Clifford. The mother of the latter was calm and sedate as usual, and Doctor Miles, dry and sententious; so that Beauchamp, happy in what he had done, and happy in the confidence of love, was now the gayest of the party. Thus the evening passed away, though not sadly, anything but very merrily; and the whole party retired early to rest.

The next morning early, Beauchamp rose and went down to the drawing-room; but there was nobody there. One of the housemaids just passed out as he entered, and he waited for about a quarter of an hour with some impatience, gazing forth from the windows over the dewy slopes of the park, and thinking in his heart that Isabella was somewhat long. Now, to say the truth, she was longer than she might have been, for Isabella had been up and dressed some time; but there was a sort of hesitation, a timidity, a weak feeling of alarm, perhaps, which she had never known before. She shrank from the idea of going down to meet him, knowing that he was waiting for her. It would seem like a secret arrangement between them, she thought, and she took fright at the very idea. Then again, on the other hand, she fancied he might imagine she was treating him ill not to go, after the sort of promise she had made; then he had been so kind, so generous, so noble, that she could not treat him ill, nay, not even by the appearance of a caprice. That settled the matter; and, after about a quarter of an hour's debating with herself, down she went. Her heart beat terribly; but Isabella was a girl, who, with all her gayety and apparent lightness, had great command over herself; and that command in her short life had been often tried. She paused then for a moment or two at the door of the drawing-room, struggled with and overcame her agitation, and then went in with a face cleared, a light step, and a cheerful air. Her hand was in Beauchamp's in a moment, and after a few of the ordinary words of a first morning meeting, he asked, "Will you take a walk, dear Isabella, or shall we remain here?"

"Do you not see my bonnet on my head and shawl over my arm?" she said in a gay tone; "who would stay in the house on such a bright morning as this when they have a free hour before them?"

"Come, then," he answered; and in two minutes more they were walking away together toward the wooded hill through which they had passed with Mary Clifford and Hayward about three weeks before.

It is strange how silent people are when they have much to say to each other. For the first quarter of a mile neither Beauchamp nor Isabella said a word; but at length, when the boughs began to wave over their heads, he laid his hand gently upon hers, and said,

"I think there can be no misunderstanding, Isabella, as to the words I spoke the night before last. Nor must you think me possessed of a very eager vanity if I have construed your reply as favorable to myself. I know you too well not to feel assured that you would not have so answered me had you been inclined to decide against my hopes. But yet, Isabella, I will not and do not consider you as plighted to me by the words then spoken, till—"

"That is just what I was going to say," replied Isabella, much to Beauchamp's consternation.

"I wished much to speak with you for the very purpose of assuring you that I do not consider you in the least bound by what you then said."

She spoke with a great effort for calmness, but there was an anxious trembling of the voice which betrayed her agitation, and in the end she paused for breath.

"Hear me, hear me," she said, as she saw Beauchamp about to reply; "since that night everything has changed. I then thought my father embarrassed, but I did not know him to be ruined. I looked upon you as Mr. Beauchamp; I now find you of a rank superior to our own, one who may well look to rank and fortune in his bride. You, too, were ignorant of the sad state of my poor father's affairs. It is but fair, then, it is but right that I should set you entirely free from any implied engagement made in a moment of generous thoughtlessness; and I do so entirely, nor will ever for a moment think you do aught amiss if you consider better, more wisely, I will say, of this matter; and let all feelings between us subside into kind friendship on your part, and gratitude and esteem upon mine."

"You set me free!" said Beauchamp, repeating her words with a smile, "how can you! My dear Isabella, this is treacherous of you; and to talk of setting me free even while you are binding me heart and spirit to you more strongly than ever! Not one more word upon that subject, my beloved girl. You must not teach me that you think I am so sordid, so pitiful a being to let a consideration of mere fortune, where I have more than plenty, weigh with me for one moment—I am yours, Isabella, if you will take me—yours forever, loving you deeply, truly, ay, and understanding you fully, too, which so many do not: but it is I who must set you free, dear girl; and I will not ask, I will not receive any promise till you have heard the story of my past life."

"But you must have it," said Isabella, raising her dewey eyes with a smile, "these things must ever be mutual, my lord. I am yours or you are not mine. But Beauchamp, we are coquetting with each other; you tell me you love; I, like all foolish girls, believe. Surely there is no need of any other story but that. Do you suppose, Beauchamp, that after all I have seen of you, after all you have done, I can imagine for one moment, that there is anything in the past which could make me change my opinion or withhold my hand? No, no, a woman's confidence, when it is given, is unbounded—at least, mine is so in you, and I need not hear any tale of past days before I bind myself to you by that tie, which, to every right mind, must seem as strong as a vow."

"Thanks, dearest girl, thanks!" answered her lover, "but yet you must hear the story; not from my lips, perhaps, for it will be better communicated to you by another; and I have commissioned good Doctor Miles to tell you all, for I would not have it said or though thereafter, by your father or by any one, that I have had even the slightest concealment from you."

"Not to me, not to me!" said Isabella, eagerly, and then added, laughing, "I will not listen to the good doctor; if there is anything that must be said, let it be told to my father."

Beauchamp smiled, and shook his head. "You will think me sadly obstinate and exacting," he said, "but yet you must grant me as a favor, Isabella, that which I ask. Listen to our worthy friend, the rector. His tale will not be very long; for many sad things may be told in a few words, and an account of events which have imbittered my whole existence till within the few last days can be given in five minutes. I will tell Sir John myself, but the reason why I so earnestly wish you to hear all, too, is, that no man can ever judge rightly of the finer feelings of a woman's heart. We cannot tell how things which affect us in one way, may affect her; and as there can be no perfect love without perfect confidence, you must share all that is in my bosom, in the past as well as in the future."

"Well," said Isabella, smiling, "as to obey is to be one of my vows, Beauchamp, I may as well begin my task at once. I will listen to the good doctor, though I confess it is unwillingly; but still, whatever he says, it will make no difference."

Beauchamp replied not to what she said; but the conversation took another and a sweeter turn, and as the words they spoke were certainly not intended to be repeated to the world, I will not repeat them. Time flies swiftly when Love's pinions are added to his own, and Isabella colored when, passing the windows of the breakfast-room on their return, she saw the whole party assembled and Mary occupying her usual post. While Beauchamp entered and took the first fire of the enemy, she ran up to her room to lay aside her walking-dress; but Sir John was merciless, and the moment she came in assailed her with an exclamation of "Ha, ha, young lady. Early walks and morning rambles, making all your friends believe you have eloped. I hope you have had a pleasant walk, Isabella, with this noble lord. Pray, were you talking politics?"

"Profound!" answered his daughter, with a gay air, though she could not keep the blood from mounting into her cheek.

"And what conclusion did you come to on the state of affairs in general?" continued Sir John, looking from Isabella to Beauchamp. "Is there to be peace or war?"

"First a truce," answered Beauchamp, "and then a lasting peace, the terms of which are to be settled by plenipotentiaries hereafter."

"Oh!" said Sir John Slingsby, now for the first time comprehending how far matters had proceeded between his daughter and his guest; and giving up the jest, he remained in thought for some time.

When breakfast was over and the party had risen, Beauchamp at once took his host's arm, saying, in a low tone, "Before any other business, I must crave a few moments' conversation, Sir John."

"Certainly, certainly," said Sir John Slingsby aloud; and while Mary Clifford put her arm through Isabella's, with a heart full of kindly wishes and hopes for her cousin, the baronet led his friend into the library, and their conference commenced. As might be expected, Beauchamp met no coldness on the part of Sir John Slingsby; but after a hearty shake of the hand, an eulogium well deserved upon his daughter, and an expression of his entire satisfaction and consent, the baronet's ear was claimed for the tale of Beauchamp's previous life. It did not produce the effect he expected; for although he had some acquaintance with Sir John's character and habits, he certainly did not anticipate the bursts of laughter with which the old gentleman listened to events which had rendered him miserable. But there are two sides to everything, and Sir John had all his life taken the risible point of view of all subjects. He laughed, then heartily declared it an exceedingly good joke, but no marriage at all; and it was only when he found that counsel learned in the law had pronounced it to be valid, that he began to look at the matter more seriously. As soon, however, as he heard the intelligence which Beauchamp had lately received from Paris, he started up from his chair, exclaiming, "Well, then she is dead, and that's an end of it. So now I congratulate you, my dear lord, and say that the sooner the marriage is over the better. I shall tell Isabella so, and she has no affectations, thank God. But come, let us go to her. I must kiss her and give her my blessing."

The whole conversation had occupied nearly an hour, and when Sir John Slingsby and Beauchamp entered the drawing-room, they found it only tenanted by Isabella and good Doctor Miles. Her face was uncommonly serious, one might say sad, and the worthy clergyman was not gay.

"What is it, doctor?" cried Sir John Slingsby, "you look as grave as ten judges. Whose cat is dead?"

"James Thomson's," said Dr. Miles, drily, "and thereupon, I wish to speak with you, Sir John, for I suppose you will attend the funeral."

"You are a funny fellow, Doctor Miles," replied the baronet; "I'll talk to you in a minute: but I must first give my daughter a kiss—the first she has had this morning, for she played truant, and is going to do so again." So saying, he pressed his lips upon Isabella's cheek, and whispered a few words that made her color vary, and then, linking his arm in that of Dr. Miles, led him from the room, leaving his daughter and her lover alone together.

Isabella's face looked sadder and graver than Beauchamp had ever seen it; and to say the truth, his heart began to beat somewhat uneasily, especially as for a moment or two she did not speak, but remained with her eyes bent down. "Isabella," he said at length, "Isabella, you look very sad."

"How can I be otherwise, Beauchamp," asked the fair girl, holding out her hand to him, "when I have just heard a narrative of events which have imbittered all your life! I grieve for you very truly, indeed, and sympathize with you as much as a woman can do, with one placed in circumstances in which she could never find herself. But indeed, Beauchamp, it shall be the pleasant task of my whole life to make you forget these past sorrows."

His hand clasped more warmly upon hers as she spoke, and in the end he sat down by her on the sofa; his arm glided round her waist, and his lips were pressed upon hers. She had not the slightest touch of Miss Biron about her, and though she blushed a little, she was not horrified or shocked in the least.

"Then you do not blame me?" he said, "and notwithstanding all this, you are mine, dearest girl?"

"Why should I blame you?" said Isabella, with a smile, "you were not the person in fault—except, perhaps, in having drunk too much wine once in your life; and I suppose that is what all young men do, and old men too, very often; but the punishment has certainly far exceeded the offence; and as to being yours, Beauchamp, you know that I am—or at least will be when you wish it."

Beauchamp took her at her word, and that evening there were grand consultations upon many things. Sir John Slingsby was a hasty man, and he liked everything done hastily. Love or murder, strife or matrimony, he would have it over in a hurry. Isabella, Mrs. Clifford, Mary, were all overruled, and as Beauchamp submitted to his fate as determined by Sir John without a murmur, the marriage was appointed for that day fortnight.

CHAPTER XXXV.

How quietly one sits down to tell events in a tale like this, which made a vast sensation at the time they happened. One reason, I believe, why half the romances and almost all the histories in the world are so exceedingly dull, is, that the people who write them do not believe that the things they record actually happened — no, not even in their histories. They have a faint idea that it may have been so—some notion that such matters did very likely take place; but not that firm conviction, that deep and life-like impression of the transactions which they relate, that gives vivid identity to the narrative. There is always a doubt about history, which hangs round and fetters the mind of the writer, and is even increased by the accuracy of his research. There is some link in the evidence wanting, same apparent partiality in the contemporary chronicler, some prejudice on the part of the near teller of the tale, which casts a suspicion over all. We cannot cross-examine men who died a thousand years ago, and we sit down and ask with Pilate, "What is truth!" The romance-writer has a great advantage. He has truth within himself. All the witnesses are there in his own bosom. Experience supplies the facts which observation has collected, and imagination arrays and adorns them. In fact, I believe that, philosophically speaking, a romance is much truer than a history. If it be not, it will produce but little effect upon the mind of the reader. The author, however, must not sit down to write it coolly, as a mere matter of composition. He must believe it, he must feel it, he must think of nothing but telling the truth—ay, reader, the truth of the creatures of his own imagination. It must be all truth to him, and he must give that truth to the world. As they act, think, speak, in his own mind, so must they act, think, and speak to the public; and according to his own powers of imagining the truth, regarding certain characters, so will he tell a truthful tale or a mere cold fiction.

All the events which had taken place in Tarningham Park caused less bustle, though, perhaps, more profound sensations among the inmates of Sir John Slingsby's house than they did in the town and neighborhood. How Mrs. Atterbury of the Golden Star—it was a hosier's shop—did marvel at all that had occurred! and how Miss Henrietta Julia Tomlinson, the dressmaker, did first shudder at the thought of Sir John Slingsby's total ruin, and then rejoice with a glow of joy at the idea of Miss Slingsby's marriage to a peer of the realm. Then, again, there was a little blear-eyed woman with white cheeks, slightly marked with the small-pox, and a sharp nose of red, who went about the town with an alarm-bell in her mouth, spreading all manner of stories regarding Sir John Slingsby and the whole of the family at Tarningham Park. Miss Slingsby was actually sold, she said, and the money given had gone to clear the baronet of a part of his incumbrances; but she hinted that there was a heavy load behind, and declared decidedly that she should not like to have money out upon such security. This lady proved an invaluable ally to Mr. Wharton; for that gentleman did not stomach his disappointment comfortably. He looked upon himself as very much ill treated, inasmuch as he had not been permitted to fleece Sir John Slingsby down to the skin. He made his own tale good, however, quietly, assured everybody that notwithstanding his own heavy claim, and the great likelihood that there had existed of his losing many thousands of pounds, he should never have thought of proceeding against his poor friend if he had not heard that Mr. Wittingham had determined to arrest him for that heavy debt. A person calling himself Lord Lenham, he said, had come to Sir John's assistance, indeed, but he much feared that no assistance would avail; and perhaps Miss Slingsby, though she was such a cunning manœuverer, might find herself mistaken, for there was something suspicious, very suspicious, about some parts of the affair. He did not wish to say anything unpleasant, but there was something suspicious, very suspicious, and people might mark his words if they liked.

People did mark his words; and all set to work to inquire what the suspicious circumstances were: so that, what between inquiries and answers, and hints, and inuendoes, and suspicions, and surmises, and gossiping suggestions, and doubtful anecdotes, and pure lies, the little town of Tarningham was kept in a state of most exceeding chatter and bustle for several days and all day long, except at the feeding time, when the streets returned to their silent tranquillity, and not a soul was to be seen but poor little deformed Billy Lamb, first carrying out his tray of foaming tankards, and then plodding up the hill with a packet of letters and newspapers. As it is a fine day, and those large heavy floating clouds give frequently a pleasant shade, I do not see why we should not follow him up to Chandleigh Heath. How quick the little fellow's long, disproportioned legs carry his small round turkey-shaped body. But Billy Lamb must be going to visit his mother after he has fulfilled his errand, or he would not walk so fast this warm noontide. It is a round of six miles, yet he will do it in an hour and a quarter. On my life he is already on the heath. One can hardly keep up with him; and now he is at the cottage garden-gate. What strange things poetical ideas are! and how unlike reality! The poetical idea of a cottage, for instance, is rarely very like truth. We take it and cover it with roses and surround it with flowering shrubs. That may be all very well, for there are such cottages; but then we strip it of all coarse attributes of life: we take away the evils of poverty, and vulgarity, and vice, and leave it nothing but content, and natural refinement, and calm innocence. It is neither the scene of struggles against fortune, cold, fireless, cheerless, often foodless, with want, smoke, and a dozen of children, nor the prim, false rosewood, bad piano-forted abode of retired slopsellerism, nor the snug-embowered, back-lane residence of the kept mistress. There is no misery and repining there, no bad English and gin-and-water, no quiet cabriolets and small tigers, black eyes, ringlets, fluttery, finery, and falsehood. It is all love and roses—quarter of an acre of Paradise with a small house upon it. Such is the poetical idea of a cottage.

Such, however, was by no means the sort of cottage, the garden-gate of which was now approached by Billy Lamb. It had been built by a coarse, vulgar man, was inhabited by an arrant scoundrel; and there the arrant scoundrel was, walking in his small domain with the lady whom we have more than once mentioned. He looked sharply round when he heard the garden-gate squeak; but was perfectly composed at the sight of the little pot-boy. The letters and papers he took, and looked at the covers, and then, with an indifferent air, asked,

"Well, my lad, what news is stirring in your little town?"

"Not much, sir," said Billy Lamb; "only about the marriage of the lord and Miss Slingsby."

The lady's eyes flashed unpleasantly, and her companion inquired,

"Well, what about that?"

"Nothing, sir, but that it is to be on Monday week, they say," replied Billy Lamb; "and all the people are as busy as possible about it, some talking, and others working hard to get all ready; for Miss Isabella will have everything she can made in Tarningham."

"D—— badly made they will be," answered the gentleman; "and what is the lord about?"

"Oh, nothing that I know of, sir," rejoined the pot-boy, "only all his people and things are coming down, carriages and horses, and that. The yard is quite full of them."

"And so it is to be on Monday week, is it?" rejoined Captain Moreton; "well, the sooner the better."

"Yes, yes," cried the lady, "and he may have guests at his marriage that he does not expect."

She spoke with an ungovernable burst of feeling, before her male companion could stop her; and the boy suddenly raised his clear, intelligent eyes to her countenance, discovering there legible traces of all the furious passions that were at work in her bosom.

"Oh, yes," cried Moreton, endeavoring to give another turn to her indiscreet words, and pressing her arm tight as a hint to hold her tongue; "doubtless the whole town and neighborhood will be there to see."

"Oh, dear, yes, sir," answered Billy Lamb; "though they say they wish it to be quite private. Good morning, sir," and he walked away with a careless air, closing the garden-gate behind him.

"Ha, ha, ha!" exclaimed the worthy captain, laughing aloud; "this is capital, Charlotte. You see our trout has bit at the fly."

"And I have got the hook in his jaws," said the lady, bitterly.

"Yes," rejoined Captain Moreton; "and it is now high time that we should consider how we may play our fish to the best advantage. First of all, of course, the marriage must take place, or he will slip off your hook, my fair lady: but after that comes the game: and I think it would be much better to make no great noise even afterward, but to give him proof positive of your existence; and, by working upon his apprehensions, and laying him under contribution, we may drain him dry as hay."

"I will have revenge," cried the lady, fiercely; "I care for naught else, but I will have revenge; I will make him a public scoff and a scorn; I will torture him in a court of justice; I will break his proud heart under the world's contempt—try not to stop me, Moreton, for I will have revenge. You think of nothing but money; but vengeance will be sweeter to me than all the gold of earth."

"There are different sorts of revenge," answered Moreton, quietly; "and, depend upon it, that which I propose is much more terrible. Once he is married, and quietly informed that you are still living, think what pleasant tortures he would undergo, year after year, as long as you pleased. You would stand behind him like an unseen, but not unfelt fate, shadowing his whole existence with a dark cloud. Every hour he would live in terror of discovery, and shame, and punishment. He would never see a stranger, or receive a letter, without the hasty fear rising up in his heart. He would picture to himself the breaking up of all his domestic joys; he would see 'bastard' written on the face of every child; and his heart would wither and shrivel up, I tell you, like a fallen leaf in the autumn. Sleep would be banished from his bed; appetite from his table; cheerfulness from his hearth; peace from his whole life. Even the sweet cup of love itself would turn to poison on his lips; and our vengeance would be permanent, perpetual, undecaying. This is the sort of revenge for me!"

"It does not suit me!" cried the lady; "it does not suit me; I will have it at once; I will see him crushed and withering; I will feast my eyes upon his misery. No, no; such slow, silent vengeance for the cold-blooded and the calm. I tell you, you shall not stop me," she continued, fiercely, seeing that he listened to her with a degree of chilling tranquillity, which she did not love. "You may take what course you will, but I will take mine."

"Excellent!" said Captain Moreton, sneeringly; "excellent, my gentle Charlotte; but let me just hint, that we must act together. You can do nothing without me; I can stop it all at a word. Pray, recollect a little hint I gave you the other night; and now that the moment is come for drawing the greatest advantages from that which we have been so long laboring to attain, do not drive me to spoil all your plans, by attempting to spoil mine."

"Ha!" said the lady; "ha!" but she proceeded no further; and, sinking into herself, walked up and down musingly for several minutes, at the end of which time she began to hum snatches of an Italian song. Captain Moreton, who knew well her variable humors, thought that the mood was changed; but he was mistaken. He had planted that, of which he was to reap the fruit ere long.

In the mean time, the boy Billy Lamb, having closed, as we have said, the garden-gate, lingered for a moment, and then took his way across the common in the direction of Stephen Gimlet's house, which was at the distance of about a mile and a half. He went at a quick pace, but two or three times he stopped, and thought deeply. He was an observing boy, and saw and heard more than people imagined. He was a boy of very strong feelings also, and he had conceived an affection for Beauchamp, which made anything that touched that gentleman a matter of deep interest to him. Thus, the first time he stopped he repeated to himself the incautious words the lady had uttered, syllable for syllable. "He may have guests at his marriage he does not expect," said the boy, meditating. "She looked mighty fierce too. I wonder what she meant? No good, I'm sure, by the way her eyes went."

He then walked on again about half a mile farther; and this time it was a narrow lane he halted in. "You see, our trout has bit at the fly!" repeated Billy Lamb, evidently showing that he had heard a part, at least, of what had passed after he left the garden; "that trout he talked of must be Mr. Beauchamp — that's to say, the lord. I can't make it out. I'll tell Stephen: he seems to know a good deal about them all; or that good, kind Captain Hayward. He's a great friend of this lord's, and will let him know; for they mean him harm, or I am mistaken."

When he reached Stephen Gimlet's cottage, however, and opened the door, he found the outer room only tenanted by the little boy, who was standing upon a stool, looking over the pages of a large old Bible, illustrated with some grotesque engravings, in which Adam and Eve, very naked, indeed; the serpent, with a human head in large curls, very much like that of a Chancery barrister; the same personage, in the conventional form of a satyr, together with a number of angels; and Noah's ark with all its beasts, figured conspicuously.

In turning his head sharply round to see who it was that came in, the child let fall the leaves that were in his hand upon those opposite; and instantly out flew an old time-stained scrap of paper, which made a gyration in the air before it reached the floor. The boy instantly darted after it, and picked it up before Billy Lamb could see what it was. The pot-boy would then have taken it out of his hand; but the other would not give it up, saying, with a screaming tone,

"No, no, no! it is granny's;" and the same moment the voice of Widow Lamb was heard from the inner room, demanding,

"Who have you got with you there, child?"

"It is I, mother," answered the deformed boy. "Is Stephen in? I want to speak with him."

"No, my poor William," answered the old lady, coming forth, and embracing her son; "he has been out a long while."

"Then, is Captain Hayward up stairs?" asked the youth.

"He is out too," answered the widow. "He was out yesterday for the first time, and to-day we have had a grand party here, all the ladies in the carriage, and Mr. Beauchamp walking. Mrs. Clifford came so kindly to ask after me. And so they persuaded Captain Hayward to go out with them. That is to say, Captain Hayward and Miss Mary, and Miss Slingsby with my Lord Lenham. They've gone all up to the Hall; Mrs. Clifford in the carriage, and the rest on foot; and I should not wonder, Bill, if Captain Hayward did not come back here again!"

"That is unfortunate!" exclaimed Billy Lamb; "I wanted so much to speak with him, or Stephen."

"Why, what is the matter, my dear boy?" said his mother; "if you will tell me what it is, I will let Stephen know when he comes back."

"Why, the matter is this," answered the deformed boy. "Stephen was asking me a great deal the other day about the gentleman who has got the cottage on Chandleigh Heath, and what his name is. Now, I have found out his name, and it is Captain Moreton."

"Have naught to do with him, Bill!" cried the widow; "have naught to do with him! He is a base villain, and has ruined all who have had any connection with him."

"Why, I have naught to do with him, mother," answered Billy Lamb, "but carrying him up his letters and newspapers; but I heard something there to-day that I thought Stephen might like to know; for I am sure he and the lady with him are plotting things to hurt this lord, who was so kind to poor Ste."

"Ha! what did you hear?" asked the old lady; "that concerns me more than Stephen, for I know more about that lady."

"She does not seem a very sweet one," answered the boy; "for when I told the captain about Lord Lenham going to be married to Sir John's daughter, she looked as if she had a great inclination to scratch somebody's eyes out."

"Going to be married to Sir John's daughter!" exclaimed Widow Lamb. "Bill, are you sure that's true?"

"Quite sure. Haven't you heard of it?" said the boy. "All the people in Tarningham know it quite well; and a quantity of things are ordered."

Widow Lamb mused gravely for several minutes; and then, shaking her head, said in a low voice, as if to herself:

"I begin to understand. Well, what more did you hear, Billy?"

"Why, after a little talk," said the boy, "when they heard that the marriage was to be on Monday-week, the lady cried out, 'He will have guests at his wedding that he does not expect!' and her eyes looked just like two live coals. She did not say much more; for the captain tried to stop her; but, as soon as I had got through the garden-gate, I heard him laugh quite heartily, and say out loud, 'This is capital, Charlotte; you see our trout has bit at the fly.'"

"And so, they have been angling for him, have they?" said Widow Lamb; "what more, my boy?"

"Why, I did not like to stop and listen, mother," said the poor deformed boy; "but I thought it could not be all right; and, therefore, I made up my mind that I would tell Stephen, or Captain Hayward, or somebody; for that Mr. Beauchamp, who has turned out a lord, was always very kind to me when he was at the inn, and gave me many a shilling; and I should not like them to do him any harm, if I can stop it; and I could see they were wonderfully bitter against him, by the way of that lady and her husband."

"He is not her husband," said Widow Lamb, with a scoff; "but that matters not, Bill; you are a good boy, and have done quite right; and, perhaps, it may save much mischief; so that will be a comfort to you, my son. I'll tell Stephen all about it, when he comes back; and we'll talk the thing over together this very night, and see what can be done. It is strange, very strange, Billy, how things turn out in this world. Great people do not always know, when they do a kind action to poor people, and humble people like ourselves, that they may be helping those who will have the best means of helping them again. Now, from what you have told me, Bill, I may have the means of helping this good lord from getting himself into a terrible scrape. I am sure he does not know all, my boy; I am sure a great number of things have been concealed from him; and your telling me may set it all to rights."

"Well, that's pleasant," answered the deformed boy. "It makes one very lightsome, mother, to feel that one has been able to do anything to serve so good a gentleman; and so I shall go home quite gay."

"That you may, Bill," replied his mother; "but bring me up news of anything you may hear; for you can't tell what may be of consequence, and what may not."

The boy promised to obey, and went away whistling one of the peculiar melodies, of which he was so fond; in which, though the air was gay, there was ever an occasional tone of sadness, perhaps proceeding from a profound, though concealed, impression of melancholy regarding his corporeal infirmities.

It was late in the evening before Stephen Gimlet returned; but then Widow Lamb entered into instant consultation with him upon what she had heard; and their conference lasted far on into the night.

The next morning early the gamekeeper got his breakfast, and then putting on his hat, said,

"Now, I'll go, Goody Lamb. I shall be very awkward about it, I dare say, but I don't mind; for he will find out in the end, that it is for his own good I talk to him about such disagreeable things. So, here goes."

"You had better wait awhile, Stephen," said the widow; "most likely he is not up yet; for it is not seven o'clock."

"It will be well nigh eight before I am there," answered Stephen Gimlet, "and I can wait at the house till he is ready."

Thus saying, he walked away, and trudged on over the fields till he came into Tarningham Park, by the road which leads over the hill just above the house. He did not follow the carriage-drive, however, but took the shorter path through the chestnut-trees, and in about ten minutes after entering the gates, saw the house. There was a traveling-carriage standing before the hall-door, which was at the distance of a quarter of a mile, and hardly had Stephen Gimlet's eyes rested on it for an instant, when a servant got up behind, and the post-boy laid his whip lightly over his horses. The carriage rolled on, and the gamekeeper followed it with his eyes with a feeling of misgiving; but he pursued his way to the house notwithstanding, and entering by the offices, asked the first servant he met, if he could speak for a moment with Lord Lenham.

"That you can't, Ste," answered the man, "for he has just gone off to London. He will not be down for a week either, they say; and then comes the wedding, my lad, so that you have a poor chance of talking with him till the honeymoon is over."

Stephen Gimlet looked down perplexed; and then, after a moment's thought, he said, "Ay, there is to be a wedding, is there? I heard something about it. He is a kind good gentleman as ever lived, and I hope he may be very happy."

"I dare say he will now," said the footman, "for our young lady is fit to be the wife of a king, that she is. But as one marriage made him very unhappy for a long time, it is but fit that another should cure it."

"Then do you mean to say he has been married before?" asked the gamekeeper.

"Ay, that he has," replied the servant, "none of our people, not even Sir John's gentleman, nor any one, knew a word about it till I found it out. I'll tell you how it was, Ste. The day before yesterday morning the butler says to me, 'I wish, Harrison, you'd just clear away the breakfast things, for I've got the gout in my hand'—he has always got the gout, you know, by drinking so much ale, beside wine. Well, when I went into the breakfast-room after they were all gone, I saw that the door into the library was a little ajar; but I took no notice, and Dr. Miles and Sir John went on talking there and did not hear me at all in t'other room. I could not tell all they said; but I made out that my Lord Lenham had been married a long time ago, but that the lady had turned out a bad un, and that they had lived apart for many years, till the other day my lord heard from Paris she was dead, and then he proposed to Miss Isabella. Dr. Miles said something about not hurrying the marriage, but the jolly old barrownight said that was all stuff, that he would have a wedding before a fortnight was over, and he'd broach two pipes of port, and fuddle half the county."

"And when is it to be then?" asked Stephen Gimlet; but the man's reply only confirmed what he had heard before, and with by no means a well satisfied countenance, the gamekeeper took his way across the park again, murmuring to himself as soon as he got out into the open air, "Goody Lamb was right! They've cheated him into believing she is dead. That is clear. There is some devilish foul work going on; and how to manage, I don't know. At all events I'll go back and talk to the old woman, for she has a mighty clear head of her own."

As he walked on he saw our friend Ned Hayward strolling slowly along at a distance, and he felt a strong inclination to go up and tell him all he had been going to tell Beauchamp: but then he reflected that he had no right to divulge what he knew of the latter gentleman's secrets to another who might not be fully in his confidence. Beside, Ned Hayward was not alone. There was a flutter of a lady's garments beside him, and he seemed in earnest conversation with his fair companion. They were not indeed walking arm-in-arm together, but they were very close to one another, and as Stephen Gimlet paused, considering, he saw the lady's head frequently raised for a moment as if to look in her companion's face, and then bent down again as if gazing on the ground.

The gamekeeper judged from these indications that they were particularly engaged, and would not like to be disturbed, and taking that with other motives for not going near them, he walked back to his own cottage, where he found Widow Lamb with her large Bible open before her.

Gimlet's story was soon told, and his mother-in-law seemed as puzzled as he did for a time. He then suggested for her consideration whether it might not be as well to convey the intelligence they possessed to Captain Hayward or Sir John Slingsby; but Widow Lamb exclaimed, at once,

"No, Stephen, no! we might make mischief with the intention of doing good. We must wait. He will come back before the marriage-day, and you must see him then. I will go up with you and talk with him myself; for I have much to say that I will only say to himself."

"But suppose we should not be able to see him!" said Stephen Gimlet, "or if anything should prevent his coming till the very day."

"Then I suppose we must speak to some one else," replied his step-mother, "but do not be afraid, Stephen. Leave it all to me."

Stephen Gimlet was afraid, however; for he was one of those unfortunate eager people, who, when they take the interests of another to heart, are never satisfied till they see those interests perfectly secure. He had all his life, too, been accustomed to manage everything for himself, to rely upon no one, to trust to his own mind, and his own exertions for the accomplishment of everything he desired. It is an unlucky habit, which makes people very uneasy when once they contract it, and trebles both their anxieties and their labors; for there is not above one third, in ordinary circumstances, of anything that a man requires to do which can be done by his own hands, in the complicated state of society in which we live; but still Stephen Gimlet had that habit, and like an old coachman, he was not easy when the reins were in the hands of another.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

And what were Ned Hayward and Mary Clifford talking about? Wait one minute, and you shall hear all about it; but first let me pause to make only one remark. I have observed, during some acquaintance with life, and a good deal of examination into all its curious little by-ways and narrow alleys, that the conversation which takes place between two people left alone to talk together, without any witnesses but green fields and bowery trees, is never, or at least very seldom, that which any one, even well acquainted with them, would have anticipated from a previous knowledge of their characters. It was an extremely right, just, and proper view of the case, that was taken, when people (I do not know who) decided that three form a congregation. We all know it: we all feel it instinctively. Three is a congregation; and when we speak before a congregation, we speak to a congregation.

But Mary Clifford and Ned Hayward were alone together; and now a word or two upon the frame of mind in which they met. Ned Hayward, since first we introduced him to our readers, had taken a great part in many things where Mary Clifford was concerned. He had first made her acquaintance in rescuing her gallantly from the brutal and shameless attempt to carry her off, by a man whom she detested. He had told her kindly and frankly of her uncle's embarrassed and dangerous situation. He had, without the slightest ostentation, offered the means of relieving him from the most pressing of his difficulties, and had gone up to London to accomplish what he offered, with a mixture of delicacy of feeling, and gay open-hearted readiness, which doubled the value of all he did. He had come down again, fought a duel with the man who had insulted her, received a severe wound, suffered, and put himself to great inconvenience; and then had been found prepared at the moment of need, to redeem his given word in her uncle's behalf, without hesitation or reluctance, though evidently at a great sacrifice.

Nevertheless, all these things might have gone no further than the mind, even with a calm, gentle, feeling creature like herself. Gratitude she could not have avoided entertaining under such circumstances, respect, very high esteem; but she might have felt nothing more had that been all. There was a great deal more, however. Ned Hayward had disappointed all Mary Clifford's preconceived ideas of his character; and had gone on growing upon her regard every hour. She had found him thoughtful, where she had believed him to be heedless; feeling, where she had expected him to be selfish; full of deep emotions, where she had fancied him light; well informed and of cultivated tastes, instead of superficial and careless; and being imperatively called upon to do him justice in her own heart, she went on, and did perhaps something more. But still this was not all; he had first excited wonder, curiosity and pleasure, then admiration and esteem, then interest and sympathy. Tie all these up in a parcel, with gratitude for great services rendered, and a great number of musings regarding him in silence and in solitude, and what will be the result? Day by day after the duel she had thought of him—perhaps, I might have said night after night. Then, when she had seen him again, and knew him to be ill and suffering, she had thought of him with deeper feelings still, and even oftener than before; and when at length he came over with reviving health, and took up his abode in the same house with herself, she returned to her old manner of thinking of him, with a number of new sensations blending in her meditations; and she fancied that she was studying his character all the while. What was it that she compared it to? She thought it was like a deep, beautiful valley, so full of sunshine, that no eye, but one very near, could see the fair things that it contained. I do not know what all this was, reader, but I think it looked very like falling in love.

Nevertheless, though these things might cause Mary Clifford to love Edward Hayward, the reader may suppose that they afforded no reason why he should love her—but that is a mistake. Love is like a cast and a mold, where there is an impression upon both, different, yet representing the same object. Love at first sight—love which springs merely from the eye, is a thing apart; but love, which proceeds from acts and words and looks, is generally, though not always, conscientious. The very deeds which, performed toward another, beget it in that other, beget it also in ourselves. A woman is cherished and protected. She loves the being who does cherish and protect her, because he does; and he loves her because he cherishes and protects. Ned Hayward had thought Mary exquisitely beautiful from the first; but that would not have been enough—he was not a doll fancier! But her conversation pleased him, her gentle sweetness charmed him, her situation and all that it produced between them interested him, and .... But he had thoroughly made up his mind not to fall in love; and that was all that was wanting to make the thing complete. There was only one difficulty or objection. Mary Clifford had, what was called in those days, a large fortune. The dean, her father, had been a wealthy and a prudent man; and he had left her about two thousand a-year, her mother's jointure not included. Now Ned Hayward had, as the reader knows, very little from the beginning; that little was now still less; and he had determined to hate all heiresses. Hate Mary Clifford! Pooh, pooh, Ned Hayward!

However, a certain undefinable sensation of being very far gone in love—the perception of feelings he had never experienced before, had made him very sad and uneasy for the last five or six days. He would have run away if he could; for he thought there was only safety in flight. But he could not go. He was not well enough to take a long journey; and he had promised Beauchamp to stay for his marriage. But marriage is an infectious disease; and even in its incipient stages, it is catching. Ned Hayward thought a great deal of marriage during those five or six days, of what a lucky man Beauchamp was, and of how happy he would be if he had only a tithe of his wealth—with Mary Clifford. But Ned Hayward was not a man to find himself in a difficult and dangerous situation without facing it boldly. He felt, that he had suffered himself to be entangled in a very tough sort of the tender passion, and he resolved to break through the net, and, in fact, quit Tarningham-house as soon as possible. But a few days remained to be passed ere that appointed for Beauchamp's marriage; and he fancied he could very well get through that short period without any further danger or detriment. "He would see as little of Mary Clifford as possible," he thought; "he would employ himself in reading, in walking, in riding out with Sir John, as soon as he was strong enough;" and thus, as usual with all men, he proposed to do a thousand things, that he never did at all; and consoled himself with resolutions that could not be executed.

On the day of Beauchamp's departure for London, Ned Hayward rose early, breakfasted with his friend, saw him off, and then, according to the plan he had proposed, walked out into the fine sunny morning air, intending to spend the greater part of the summer day in some of the cool and more retired parts of the park.

It was, at least, two hours before the usual time of breakfast; he had not an idea that any of the family was up; and thus pursuing one of the gravel walks away from the house, he went in among the chestnut-trees, and strolled on, fancying himself perfectly alone in the woods, when suddenly, in taking a turn, the path showed him the fair face and graceful form of Mary Clifford advancing toward him at the distance of about fifty or sixty paces. To avoid her, of course, was quite out of the question; but Ned Hayward resolved, that he would only speak to her for a moment, and then go on. But, heaven knows now it happened; in about two minutes he might be seen turning round with her; and their walk continued for nearly an hour and a half.

"Well, Miss Clifford," he said, with as gay a look as he could command, "Beauchamp is gone. Have you been taking a long walk?"

"No, not very far," answered Mary, "I saw some strange people crossing the park; and ever since that adventure which first made us acquainted with each other, I have become very cowardly. I therefore turned back; otherwise I should have much enjoyed a ramble, for I have a slight headache."

What could Ned Hayward do under such circumstances? He could not avoid offering to escort and protect Miss Clifford—he could not even hesitate to propose it. Mary did not refuse; but her "yes" was timidly spoken; and, instead of turning back with Ned Hayward through the wild wood walks, she made him turn back with her, and led him to the more open parts of the park, where the house was generally in sight.

A momentary silence had fallen over both before they issued forth from under the chestnut-trees; and each felt some awkwardness in breaking that silence: the surest possible sign of there being very strong feelings busy at the heart; but Mary felt that the longer the silence continued, the more awkward would it become, and the more clearly would it prove that she was thoughtful and embarrassed; and therefore she spoke at random, saying,

"What a beautiful day it is for Lord Lenham's journey. I envy him the first twenty miles of his drive."

"I envy him in all things," answered Ned Hayward; "his life may, and, indeed, seems likely to be made up of beautiful days; and I am very sure that mine is not."

"Nay, Captain Hayward," said Mary, raising her eyes gently to his face, and shaking her head with a smile, "you are in low spirits and unwell, otherwise you would never take so bright a view of your friend's fate, and so dark a one of your own. Many a fair and beautiful day may be, and ought to be, in reserve for you. Indeed, they must be; for your own heart lays up, by the acts it prompts, a store of sunshine and brightness for the days to come."

"May it not rather lay up, by the feelings it experiences, a store of bitterness and sorrow, of clouds and darkness?" asked Ned Hayward, in a tone so different from that he commonly used, that Mary started, gazed for a moment at him, and then, letting her eyes fall again as they met his, first colored slightly, and then turned pale. By the marks of emotion which she displayed, Ned Hayward was led to believe, that he had spoken too plainly of what he had never intended to touch upon at all; and he hastened to repair the error.

"What I mean is simply this, my dear Miss Clifford," he said: "a man who enjoys himself very much—as I do—feels pain in the same proportion, or perhaps more keenly. Every source of pleasure is an inlet to pain, and as we go on continually in this world, losing something dear to us, day by day, I am occasionally inclined to envy those cold phlegmatic gentlemen, who, with a tolerable store of pleasures, have few pains but corporeal ones. I never pretend to be a very sentimental person, or to have very fine feelings, or anything of that sort, but now, as an instance of what I was speaking of, I cannot think of quitting this beautiful spot, and all the friends who have shown me so much kindness, as I must do on Monday next, without a sort of sinking at the heart, which is very unpleasant."

"You do not mean to say you are going on Monday!" exclaimed Miss Clifford, pausing suddenly, with the color varying in her cheek.

Ned Hayward was surprised and pleased; for there was no attempt to conceal that his staying or going was a matter of interest to her. He answered, however, gravely, and even sadly,

"I fear I must."

"But you have forgotten your promised visit to us at Hinton," said Mary, reproachfully, and deadly pale; "you promised to come, you know; I have counted upon that visit as affording an opportunity of settling how and where, when I come of age, which will now be in a few months, the money you so generously lent me, can be repaid.—Indeed," she added, earnestly, "you must come there for a few days, even if you do not stay here."

There was a tenderness, a tremulous softness in her tone, a slight yet sufficiently marked agitation in her manner, which made Ned Hayward's heart beat.

"Can I be beloved?" he asked himself. "Can she return the feelings she has inspired? I will soon know!—My dear Miss Clifford," he replied, "I fear that visit would prove more dangerous to me than this has been: and, therefore, however unwilling—however great would have been the delight, I must decline it."

Mary Clifford looked down without uttering a word; but her cheek remained pale, her lip quivered as if she would fain have given voice to some reply; and though her arm was not in his, he could feel that she trembled. Ned Hayward's heart beat too; but there was, as we have often seen before, a frankness, a straightforward simplicity in his habitual course of action, which overleaped many a difficulty that would have baffled other men.

"Let me explain," he said; but Mary made a slight motion with her hand, saying,

"Oh, no, no!" in a faint tone, and then she repeated the word "dangerous!"

"Yes," he said, "more dangerous, dear Miss Clifford! Can you not conceive how and why? In a word, then, I cannot and must not stay with you longer. I must, by as speedy a return as possible to other occupations, make an effort to forget that I have ever seen one, whom I fear I have already known too long for the peace of my whole life."

He paused for a moment with a sigh, raised his head high the next instant, and then added, "I have but one favor to ask you, which is this—not to let what I have just said make any difference in your demeanor toward me during the short period of my stay. I had no intention of troubling your ear with such things at all; but your own question brought forth what I would willingly have concealed—perhaps in this I have been wrong; but believe me, I am very well aware that difference of fortune has placed a barrier between us which cannot be overleaped. This is the only favor, then, dear lady—do not alter toward me—let me see you ever the same as I have yet beheld you; and when I go away forever, let me carry with me the remembrance of Mary Clifford as a picture of all that deserves love and admiration upon earth. Do not, do not change, notwithstanding my rash confession."

Mary Clifford looked up in his face, and a varying light played in her eyes, as if, at one moment, it was about to break forth sportively, and at another would have drowned itself out in tears.

"I must change, Hayward!" she said at length, with a bright smile upon her lip, "indeed you ask too much. How can you expect that I should live in the same house with you, and know that you love me, without showing in some degree what is passing in my own breast!"

"Mary! Mary!" he exclaimed, laying his hand upon her arm, and gazing in her face, "you would not—oh, I am sure you would not trifle with me—"

"Not for the world," she answered. "Edward, I am incapable of trifling with any man; but with you, to whom I owe so much, it would be base indeed!"

"But the great disparity of fortune," said her lover, with the shade again upon his brow. "Oh Mary, how can it ever be? You, I have heard, are wealthy—they call you 'the heiress'—and I know myself to be poor. Are you aware—surely I told you, that all I had saved out of the wreck of my father's fortune, only amounted at first to—"

"Will you pain me?—Do you wish to grieve me?" asked Mary Clifford; "if not, do not mention such matters as in any way likely to affect my feelings or conduct; and yet I do not wish you to consider me as a romantic girl, for I am not. I have always thought that a competence must be possessed to render the lives of any two people happy; but surely it matters not on whose side that competence comes. We shall have enough, Edward, for happiness; and though I know it would have been more pleasure to yourself if the greater part of our little fortune had been brought by you, yet I am very glad that I have it, as you have not."

"But your mother—your guardian, Mary?" said Ned Hayward, still in a doubtful tone.

Mary laughed, but with a slight touch of vexation in the tone; and she exclaimed,

"I do believe he will not have me, even when I have almost offered myself to him!"

But Ned Hayward would not lie under that imputation, and he cast his arms round his fair companion, assuring her that if she had the wealth of the world, the only portion he would value would be herself.

Mary freed herself gently from his embrace; and suffering him to draw her arm through his, walked on with him till the breakfast-hour was fully come.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

It is strange how we all go grinding the fate of each other in this world, high and low, rich and poor, the cottage tenant and the lord of the mansion all jostling each other, and without knowing it, each making his fellow take a step this way or that, which very much influences the onward path. All was cheerfulness and gaiety at Tarningham Park. Mary Clifford had assured Ned Hayward that her mother's consent would not only be given, but given cheerfully; that her guardians, whose period of rule was so nearly at an end, would raise no objection, and that all who loved her would be glad to see her the promised bride of one so well worthy of esteem. Nor was her promise unaccomplished; for good Mrs. Clifford was delighted. Ned Hayward had ever been a great favorite of hers ever since he had come to her rescue in Tarningham-lane. The guardians were quite quiescent, replying to the letter of announcement, that whatever Miss Clifford judged for her own happiness and received her mother's consent, would insure their approbation. Sir John was in an ecstasy, and Isabella, in the midst of her own happiness, felt happier still at that of her cousin. Daily letters were received from Beauchamp, all breathing joy and hope, and though lawyers were troublesome and men of business dilatory, yet not one word was said, not one thought seemed to be entertained of any real danger or difficulty.

All then was cheerfulness and gaiety at Tarningham Park, and not one of its inmates had the slightest idea of the anxiety and alarm which were felt for them in a cottage not far off. Every morning and every evening long consultations were held between Widow Lamb and her son-in-law regarding the fate of Mr. Beauchamp, and just in proportion to their ignorance of the habits of the world were the difficulties that presented themselves to their imaginations. Stephen Gimlet was anxious to act in some direction. Mr. Beauchamp, as he still frequently called him, being absent, he thought it would be better to say all that they had to say, to Sir John Slingsby, or at all events to Captain Hayward; but on the contrary, his mother-in-law, with longer experience, a disposition naturally timid and cautious, and upon the whole better judgment, insisted that it might be wrong or dangerous to do so.

"You cannot tell, Stephen," she said, "what this good young lord has told them and what he has not. We cannot even be sure how this woman stands with him. He may have divorced her for aught we know. I am sure her conduct has always been bad enough; and if such should be the case, we might make the poor young lady unhappy when there is no need. Nobody even can guess at all the mischief that might happen. No, no, you watch closely for the young lord's coming back, and as soon as ever he is here, you and I will go up and speak to him. He must be back in time for that, and I dare say he will come on Saturday night; so there will be plenty or time."

It was one of Stephen Gimlet's maxims, and a very good one too, that there is never plenty of time; but he carried the matter somewhat too far, for he thought one could never do too much. Now that is a very great mistake; for in love, politics, and ambition, as in the roasting of a leg of mutton, you can remedy the mens, but you cannot remedy the pis. However, to make up for not doing what his mother-in-law would not let him do—and in regard to Beauchamp she had the whip-hand of him, for she did not let him into her secrets—he busied himself every spare moment that he had in watching the proceedings of Captain Moreton and the fair lady he had with him. His long familiarity with beasts and birds, greatly affected his views of all things, and he got to look upon these objects of his contemplation as two wild animals. He internally named one the fox and the other the kite, and with the same sort of shrewd speculation in regard to their manners, habits, and designs, as he employed upon brutes, he watched, and calculated, and divined with wonderful accuracy. One thing, however, he forgot, which was, that a human fox has a few more faculties than the mere brute; and that, although the four-legged fellow with the brush might require great caution in any examination of his habits and proceedings, Captain Moreton might require still more. Now that worthy gentleman very soon found out that there was an observant eye upon him, and he moreover discovered whose eye that was. There could not have been a more unpleasant sensation to Captain Moreton than to feel himself watched, especially by Stephen Gimlet; for he knew him to be keen, shrewd, active, decided, persevering, one not easily baffled, and by no means to be frightened; one, who must be met, combated, overcome in anything he undertook, or else suffered to have his own way. Captain Moreton was puzzled how to act. To enter into open war with Stephen was likely to be a very dangerous affair; for the proceedings of the worthy captain, as the reader may suppose, did not court public examination; and yet to suffer any man to become thoroughly acquainted with all his in-comings and out-goings, was very disagreeable, and might be perilous. To gain time, indeed, was the great thing; for Moreton's intention was, as soon as he had fairly seen his cousin married to Isabella Slingsby, to take his departure for another land, and to leave the consequences of the situation in which he had placed Lord Lenham, to operate, as he thoroughly believed they would operate, in destroying health, vigor, and life. His only object in remaining at all was so to guide the proceedings of his fair companion, and to restrain her fiery and unreasoning passions, as to prevent her overthrowing his whole scheme by her intemperate haste. But how to gain the necessary time was the question. He first changed his haunts and his hours, went out on the other side of the heath; but Stephen Gimlet was there; took his walk in the early morning, instead of late in the evening; but the figure of Stephen Gimlet was seen in the gray twilight, whether it was day-dawn or sunset; and Captain Moreton became seriously uneasy.

Nothing, however as yet appeared to have resulted from all this watching, till on Saturday morning, somewhat to Captain Moreton's surprise, the door of the room, where he was sitting alone, was opened, and in walked his friend and acquaintance, Harry Wittingham. The young man was exceedingly pale; but still he appeared to move freely and without pain or difficulty; and a look of real pleasure came up in Captain Moreton's face, which completely deceived Mr. Wittingham, junior, as to the sensations of his friend toward him. He fancied, as Captain Moreton shook him warmly by the hand, and declared he was delighted to see him well again, that the other was really glad at his recovery. Now Harry Wittingham might have been wounded, sick, dying, dead, buried, turned into earth again, without Captain Moreton's caring one straw about him, simply as Harry Wittingham per se; but as one who might be serviceable in his schemes, who might help him out of a difficulty, and, by taking part in a load of danger, might help Captain Moreton to bear the rest, he was an object of great interest to the captain, who congratulated him again and again upon his recovered health, made him sit down, inquired particularly into all he had suffered, and did and said all those sorts of things which were most likely to make a man thus convalescent believe that a friendly heart had been greatly pained by all he had undergone.

Harry Wittingham was soon seated in an armchair, and making himself quite at home. Contrary to the advice of all doctors, he indulged in a glass of brandy-and-water at the early hour of half-past ten, and declared he was a great deal better for it, that old fool Slattery having kept him without wine, spirits, or porter, for the last five weeks.

"Ay, that might be necessary some time ago," said Moreton, "till your wound was healed, but it is all stuff now. It must have been a bad wound that you have got, Harry; and I am devilish sorry I could not be down myself, for I think then you would have got no wound at all. However, you gave him as good as you got, and that was some consolation. No gentleman should ever be without his revenge, whether it be with cards, or pistols, or what not; he should always give something for what he gets, and if he does that, he has every reason to be satisfied."

"I have not got quite enough yet," said Harry Wittingham, with a significant nod of his head; "and some people shall find that by and by."

"Ay, that's right, quite," answered Captain Moreton; "but I say, Hal, how is the old cock, your father? I heard yesterday he was breaking sadly—got the jaundice, or some devil of a thing like that—as yellow as one of the guineas he keeps locked up from you—time for him to take a journey, I should think."

For a minute or two Harry Wittingham made no reply, but then he set his teeth hard and said,

"I should not wonder if the hard-hearted old flint were to leave it all away from me."

Captain Moreton gave a long, low whistle, exclaiming, "Upon my life you must stop that. Hang me, if I would not pretend to be penitent, and play a good boy for a month or two."

"It is no use in the world," answered Harry Wittingham; "you might as well try to turn the Thames at Gravesend as to put him out of his course when once he has taken a thing into his head. He must do what he likes; he can't take it all, that's one comfort; but I say, Moreton, what the devil is that fellow Wolf hanging about here for? You had better not have anything to do with him, I can tell you. He is as great a scamp as ever lived, and I'll punish him some day or another. I should have come in yesterday, but I saw him sitting down there upon the mound upon the heath, looking straight here, and so I went away."

"Did you see him again to-day?" asked Captain Moreton, with very uneasy feelings.

"Oh, yes," answered Wittingham, "there he was, prowling about with his gun under his arm; but I doubled upon him this time, and went down the lanes, and in by the back way."

"I will make him pay for this," said Moreton, setting his teeth. "He has been spying here for a long time, and if it was not that I don't wish any fuss till the day after to-morrow is over, I would break every bone in his skin."

"It would be a good thing if you did," answered Harry Wittingham; "I'll tell you how he served me;" and he forthwith related all the circumstances of his somewhat unpleasant adventure with Stephen Gimlet when he visited the gamekeeper's cottage.

The moment he had done, Captain Moreton tapped him on the arm with a meaning smile, saying,

"I'll tell you what, Harry, though you are not very strong yet, still, if you are up to giving me ever so little help, we'll punish that fellow before to-morrow's over. If you can come here to-night and take a bed, we'll get up early and dodge him as he has been dodging us. He is always out and about before anybody else, so that there will be no one to help him, let him halloo as loud as he will. He is continually off Sir John's grounds with his gun and dog, so that we have every right to think he is poaching, as he used to do."

"Well, but what will you do with him?" said Harry Wittingham; "he is devilish strong, remember."

"Yes, but so am I," answered Captain Moreton; "and I will take him unawares, so that he cannot use his gun. Once down, I will keep him there, while you tie his arms, and then we will bundle him over here, and lock him up for a day or two."

"Give him a precious good hiding," said young Wittingham, "for he well deserves it; but I don't see any use of keeping him. If we punish him well on the spot, that's enough."

"There's nothing that you or I can do," answered Captain Moreton, "that will punish him half so much as keeping him here till noon on Monday, for now I'll let you into one thing, Harry: I am looking out for my revenge upon some other friends of ours, and I have a notion this fellow is set to watch everything I do, with promise of devilish good pay, if he stops me from carrying out my plan. It will all be over before twelve o'clock on Monday; and if we can keep him shut up here till then, he will lose his bribe, and I shall have vengeance. You can give him a good licking, too, if you like, and nobody can say anything about it if we catch him off Sir John's grounds."

"I don't care whether they say anything about it or not," answered Harry Wittingham; "they may all go to the devil for that matter, and I'll lend a hand with all my heart. But remember, I'm devilish weak and no match for him now; for this wound has taken every bit of strength out of me."

"Oh, you'll soon get that up again," answered Captain Moreton; "but I'll manage all the rough work. But how do you get on about money if the old fellow gives you none?"

"I should be devilish bad off indeed," replied the young man, "if our old housekeeper did not help me; but she has taken her money out of the bank, and is selling some things for me; so I must not forget to let her know that I am here if I come to-night."

"Oh, I'll take care of that," answered Captain Moreton. "There's a boy brings up my letters and things, a quiet, cunning little hump-backed devil, who whistles just like a flageolet, and says very little to anybody. I'll tell him to go and tell old mother what's-her-name slyly, that you are here if she wants you."

The whole scheme seemed palatable to Harry Wittingham, and he entered into the details with great zest and spirit, proposing several improvements upon Captain Moreton's plan, some of which suited that gentleman quite well. Another glass of brandy-and-water was added, and Harry Wittingham declared that it was better than all the doctor's stuff he had swallowed since he was wounded, for that he was already much better than when he came, and felt himself quite strong again. After an hour's rambling conversation upon all sorts of things, not very gentlemanly either in tone or matter, the two worthy confederates parted.

As the visitor took his way back to Buxton's Inn, he looked boldly round for Stephen Gimlet with a pleasant consciousness of coming vengeance; but the gamekeeper was not to be seen, and meditating the pleasant pastime laid out for the following day, Mr. Wittingham reached the inn, and ordered a very good dinner as a preparation. He felt a little feverish, it is true, but nevertheless he drank the bottle of stiff port which was placed on the table when dinner was served; and elated with wine, set out as soon as it was dark, to take part once more in one of those schemes of evil which suited too well his rash and reckless disposition, little knowing that all the time he was the mere tool of another.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

"Well, doctor; well, doctor, what is the matter?" asked Sir John Slingsby, at the door of his own house, toward two o'clock on that Saturday afternoon; "you look warm, doctor, and not half as dry as usual. I declare, you have made that fat pony of yours perspire like an alderman at the Easter ball. What has put you into the saddle! Has the chaise broken down?"

"No, Sir John," answered Doctor Miles; "but the horse was sooner saddled than harnessed, and I wanted to see you in haste—where are you going now? for you are about to mount, I perceive."

"I am going down to set the fools at Tarningham to rights," answered Sir John Slingsby. "I hear that that bilious old crow, Wittingham, and deaf old Mr. Stumpforth, of Stumpington, have been sitting for these two or three hours at the justice-room, getting up all sorts of vexatious cases with Wharton to torment the poor people of the parish, and to put them in a devout frame of mind for their Sunday's duties; so I am going down to put my finger in the pie and spoil the dish for them. Come along, doctor, and help, for you are a magistrate too, and a man who does not like to see his fellow-creatures maltreated. You can tell me what you want as we jog along."

"We shall be going exactly in the right direction," said Doctor Miles, "for my business with you referred to your magisterial capacity, Sir John."

The worthy, who had his foot in the stirrup, raised himself into the saddle with wonderful agility, considering his size and his age; and, accompanied by Doctor Miles, was soon on his way toward Tarningham, listening with all his ears to the communication which the rector had to make.

"You must know, my good friend," said the doctor, "that some short time ago your gamekeeper, Stephen Gimlet, found in the little vicarage church at Moreton some one busily engaged, as it appeared, in the laudable task of altering the registers in the vestry. He locked him safely in, but the culprit got out in the night; and Gimlet communicated the fact to me. I would have spoken to you about it, but circumstances occurred at that time which might have rendered it unpleasant for you to deal with that business."

"I understand," said Sir John Slingsby, nodding his head significantly; "but who was the man?"

"Why, Gimlet asserts that it was no other than that worst of all bad fellows, Captain Moreton," replied Doctor Miles. "I examined the register, and found that an alteration had certainly been committed; for the date of one of the insertions was advanced several years before those that followed, by skillfully changing a naught into a six. Under the circumstances, I thought it best to consult with Wittingham, and I proposed that a warrant should be issued against Captain Moreton; but the worthy gentleman thought fit both to examine and cross-examine Gimlet in the first instance; asked him nine times over if he would swear that it was Captain Moreton; and, when he found that he had not seen the man's face, his back being turned to the door of the vestry when Gimlet went in, he pooh-poohed the whole matter, and refused to issue the warrant. I did not choose to do so myself, the event having occurred in a parish of my own, and with one of my registers, but this morning on visiting old Grimdley, the sexton, who is very ill, he made a full confession of his part in the affair: Moreton had bribed him, it seems, to open for him the family vault and the door of the vestry. In the one the worthy captain altered the date of his great grandfather's coffin from 1760 to 1766 by an instrument he seemed to have had made on purpose; and in the vestry performed the same operation with plain pen and ink."

"A pretty scoundrel," said Sir John Slingsby; "but I know what he wants. He wants to prove that his mother could not break the entail, which would be the case if the old man had lived an hour after she was born."

"Precisely so," said Doctor Miles; "but I did not choose to deal with Mr. Wittingham any more upon the subject, at least without your assistance; and therefore, before I either signed a warrant myself, or spoke with the people of Tarningham about it, I thought it better to come up to the park and consult with you."

"As the wisest man in the county," said Sir John Slingsby, laughing. "My dear doctor, I will get a certificate from you and qualify for the university of Gotham—but I will tell you what we will do: we will send the groom here for Stephen Gimlet, and his evidence, with the deposition of old Grindley, will soon put the whole matter right. Here, Tom, ride over like the devil to Ste Gimlet's cottage; tell him to come down as fast as his legs will carry him to the justice-room at Tarningham. We'll soon bring these gentlemen to the end of their law, and Wharton to boot—an ill conditioned brute, a cross between a fox and a turnspit—do you recollect his mother, doctor? Her legs were just like the balustrades of a bridge, turned the wrong side upmost, only they bowed out on each side, which gave to them a sort of ogee."

Thus rattling on, Sir John Slingsby rode forward till they reached the entrance of the little justice-room, which was conveniently situated immediately to Mr. Wharton's offices.

The appearance of Sir John Slingsby and Dr. Miles did not seem at all palatable to the two other magistrates and their clerk, if one might judge by the superlative courtesy of their reception. A chair was placed immediately for the reverend gentleman, Mr. Stumpforth vacated his seat for Sir John as president of the magistrates, and Mr. Wharton, with malevolent sweetness, expressed his delight at seeing Sir John among them again.

"You did all you could to prevent it," said Sir John, taking the chair, "but it would not do, Wharton. Now, gentlemen, what are you about? we will not interrupt business."

"There are a good many cases down," said Mr. Wharton; "some of them excise-cases, some of them under the poor-law, some of them—"

"Well, let us get through them, let us get through them," cried Sir John, interrupting him, "for we have business, too, which must be done."

"We must take things in their order," said Mr. Wittingham, drily.

"Oh, yes, according to the ledger," cried Sir John Slingsby, laughing; "everything in the regular way of trade, Wittingham, eh? Who's this? James Jackson, the publican," he continued, looking at the paper; "well, Wittingham, how does the debtor and creditor account stand with him?"

Mr. Wittingham winced, but replied nothing; and the case was regularly taken up. Some nine or ten others followed; and certainly everything was done by the two magistrates who had been found sitting, and their exceedingly excellent clerk, to tire out Sir John Slingsby and Dr. Miles, by protracting the investigation as long as possible. The poor persons, however, who had been compelled by the power of paper or parchment to appear in the awful presence of justice, had reason to thank their stars, and did so most devoutly, that the number of magistrates was increased to four. A number of cases were dismissed as frivolous; very lenient penalties were inflicted in other instances; and, if the real truth were told, the person who suffered the severest punishment under the proceedings of that day was no other than Mr. Wittingham, upon whom Sir John Slingsby continued to pour for two long hours all the stores of sarcasm which had accumulated in his bosom during the last fortnight. At length the magistrates' paper was over, and worthy Mr. Wittingham showed an inclination to depart; but Sir John Slingsby stopped him, exclaiming,

"Stay a bit, Wittingham, stay a bit, my good sir. The case with which we have now to deal you have already nibbled at; so you must have your share of it."

"I am ill, Sir John," said Mr. Wittingham, "I am not fit."

"Not fit I have long known you to be," rejoined Sir John, and then added in a murmur, "for anything but a tall stool at the back end of a slopseller's shop; but as to being ill, Wittingham; you don't pretend to be ill? Why, your complexion is as ruddy as if you had washed your face with guineas out of your strong-box. However, it is this business of Captain Moreton and his falsification of the register at Moreton church that we have to deal with."

"I have already disposed of that," said Mr. Wittingham, sharply, "and I am not disposed to go into it again."

But it was now Mr. Wharton's turn to attack Mr. Wittingham.

"You have disposed of it, sir," he exclaimed, with all the blood in his body rushing up into his face; "the falsification of the registers of Moreton church! why, I never heard of this!"

"There was no reason that you should," answered Mr. Wittingham, tartly; "you are not a magistrate, I think, Mr. Wharton; and beside, you might, in some degree, be considered as a party interested. Beside, you were absent, and so I sent for Bacon, and dealt with the matter myself."

"Friday's bacon and deviled the attorney," said Sir John Slingsby, with a roar; "you see he is such an active creature, Wharton, he must be doing, whether right or wrong. I declare he cuts out so much matter for the bench in reversing all his sage decrees, that the rest of the magistrates can scarcely manage it."

"I did not come here to be insulted, Sir John Slingsby," said Mr. Wittingham, the jaundiced yellow of his face gradually becoming of an olive green, "I did not come here to be insulted, and will not stay for such a purpose; I expect to be treated like a gentleman, sir."

"Wonderful are the expectations of man," exclaimed the baronet: "just as much might a chimney-sweeper expect to be treated like an archbishop, because he wears black—but let us to business, let us to business; if we go on complimenting each other in this way we shall not get through the affair to-night, especially with your lucid assistance, Wittingham; for if there be a man in England who can so stir a puddle that the sharpest eyes shall not be able to see a lost half-crown at the bottom, you are the man."

Up started the worthy magistrate, exclaiming, in a weak voice and bewildered air,

"I will not stay, that man will drive me mad."

"Impossible," shouted Sir John Slingsby, as Mr. Wittingham staggered toward the door; and he then added in a lower tone, "fools never go mad, they tell me;" but Doctor Miles, who saw that old Wittingham was really ill, rose from his seat, and crossing the room, spoke a word or two to the retreating magistrate, which he was not allowed to finish, for old Wittingham pushed him rudely aside and darted out of the room.

Before I proceed to give any account of the further inquiries of the three magistrates who remained, I shall beg leave to follow Mr. Wittingham to his own house. About two hundred yards' distance from the justice-room he stopped, and leaned for a minute or two against a post, and again paused at his own gate as if hardly able to proceed. He reached his own dwelling, however, and after several attempts, with a shaking hand, succeeded in thrusting his private key into the lock, and opening the door. The hall was vacant; the whole house still; there was neither wife nor child to receive and welcome him; no kindred affection, no friendly greeting to soothe and cheer the sick old man, whose pursuits, whose hopes, whose tendencies through life had been totally apart from the kindly sympathies of our nature. But there are times, steel the heart how we may, when a yearning for those very kindly sympathies will come over us; when the strong frame broken, the eager energies quelled, the fierce passions dead and still within us, the strong desires either disappointed or sated, leave us alone in our weakness, to feel with bitter regret that there are better things and more enduring than those which we have pursued; and when the great moral lessons, taught by decay, are heard and listened to for the first time, when perhaps it is too late to practice them. That lonely house, that silent hall, the absence of every trace of warm life and pleasant social companionship, the dull, dead stillness that pervaded everything, had their effect upon Mr. Wittingham, and a sad effect it was. All was so quiet and so still; all was so solemn and so voiceless, he felt as if he were entering his tomb. The very sunshine, the bright sunshine that, streaming through the fanlight over the door, fell in long rays upon the marble floor, had something melancholy in it, and he thought, "It will soon shine so upon my grave." What was to him then the satisfaction of the greedy love of gold, that creeping ivy of the heart, that slowly growing, day by day, chokes every softer and gentler offspring of that on which it rests? What was to him the gratification of that vanity, which was all that the acquisition of wealth had satisfied? Nothing, all nothing. He stood there friendless, childless, companionless, alone; sick at heart, disappointed in all those expectations he had formed, having reaped bitterness from the very success of his labors, and finding no medicine either for the heart or the body in the gold he had accumulated or the station he had gained.

He paused there for a moment, while a deep and bitter anguish of the regret of a whole life took possession of him, and then staggering on into the trim, well arranged, cold, and orderly library, he sunk into one of the arm-chairs by the side of the fireless hearth and rang the bell sharply. For two or three minutes no one appeared, and then he rang again, saying to himself,

"There never were such bad servants as mine; ay, ay, it wants a mistress of a house," and he rang again furiously.

In about a minute after the door opened, and Mrs. Billiter appeared, and Mr. Wittingham inquired, angrily, why nobody came at his summons. The housekeeper replied, "That she thought the footman had come, but finding the bell ring again, she had hastened up herself."

Mr. Wittingham's rage was then turned upon the footman, and after denouncing him in very vehement terms, and condemning him to expulsion from his household, his anger either worked itself off, or his strength became exhausted, and he sat for a moment or two in silence, till Mrs. Billiter quietly began to move toward the door.

"Stay, Billiter," he cried; "what are you going for? I tell you I am ill, woman, very ill."

"I was going to send for Mr. Slattery," said Billiter, in a cold tone; "I saw you were ill, sir."

"Send for the devil!" exclaimed Mr. Wittingham; "that fellow Slattery is no good at all Here have I been taking his soap-pills and his cordial-boluses for these three weeks, and am no better, but rather worse. I will go to bed, Billiter—get me a cup of hot coffee—I feel very ill indeed."

"You had better see some one," said Mrs. Billiter, "for you don't look right at all, and it would take some hours to get another doctor."

"Well, well, send for the man, if it must be so," said Mr. Wittingham, "but he does nothing but cram one with potions and pills just to make up a long bill. Here, help me up stairs, I will go to bed; and bring me a cup of strong coffee—I declare I can scarcely stand."

As soon as Mr. Wittingham was safely deposited in his room, Mrs. Billiter descended to the kitchen, and sent the housemaid at once for Mr. Slattery, taking care to spend as much time as possible on the preparation of the coffee, not judging it by any means a good beverage for her master, in which she was, probably right. The surgeon, however, was so long ere he appeared, that she was obliged to carry up the coffee to Mr. Wittingham, whom she found retching violently, and complaining of violent pains. He nevertheless drank the coffee to the last drop, in the more haste as Mrs. Billiter expressed an opinion it would do him harm; after having accomplished which he sank back upon his pillow exhausted, and closed his eyes. The color of his skin was now of a shade of deep green, approaching to black under his eyes, and the housekeeper, as she stood by his bedside and gazed at him, thought to herself that it would not last long. It must not be pretended that she was in any degree greatly affected at the prospect of her master's speedy demise, though she had lived in his service a very many years, for he was not one to conciliate affection in any one; and her meditations were more of how she could best serve the graceless lad, whose disposition she had assisted to ruin, than of his father's probable fate.

While she thus paused and reflected, the quick creaky step of Mr. Slattery was on the stairs, and the moment after he entered the room, rubbing gently together a pair of hands, the fingers of which were fat and somewhat red, though very soft and shapeless, presenting the appearance of four long sausages and a short one. He had always a cheerful air, Mr. Slattery, for he fancied it comforted his patients, kept up their spirits, and prevented them from other advice. Thus he would stand and smile upon a dying man, as if he had a real and sincere pleasure in his friend's exit from a world of woe; and very few people could discover from the worthy gentleman's countenance whether a relation was advancing quietly toward recovery or the tomb. Thus with a jaunty step he approached Mr. Wittingham's bedside, sat down, and, as the sick man opened his eyes, laughed benignantly, saying,

"Why, my dear sir, what is all this? You must have been agitating yourself," and at the same time he put his fingers on the pulse.

"Agitated myself!" cried Mr. Wittingham, "it is that old bankrupt brute, Sir John Slingsby, has nearly driven me mad, and I believe these servants will finish it. Why the devil do you leave my wig there, Billiter? Put it upon the block; don't you see Mr. Slattery is sitting upon it?"

"Well, I declare," cried the surgeon, "I thought I felt as if I were sitting upon a cat, or something of that kind. But, my dear sir, you must really keep yourself quiet, or you will bring yourself into a feverish state. The pulse is hard and quick now, and your skin is very hot and dry. We must make a little addition to the soap-pill, and I will send you directly a stomachic cordial-draught, combined with a little narcotic, to produce comfortable sleep."

He still kept his fingers on the pulse, gazing into the sick man's eyes, till Mr. Wittingham could have boxed his ears, and at length he said,

"The draught must be repeated every two hours if you do not sleep, so that you had better have somebody sit up with you to give it you."

"I will have no such thing," said Mr. Wittingham; "I can't bear to have people pottering about in my room all night; I can take the draughts very well myself if they are put down by me."

"But they must be shaken before taken," said Mr. Slattery.

"Well, then, I can shake them," said Mr. Wittingham; and the worthy surgeon, finding his patient obstinate, gave up the point. He proceeded to ask a variety of questions, however, to which he received nothing but gruff and grumbling replies, the worthy gentleman principally insisting upon receiving something which would relieve the great pain he felt in his side. Thereupon Mr. Slattery undertook to explain to him all the various causes which might produce that pain; but the confused crowd of gall-bladders and gall-stones, and indurated livers, and kidneys, and ducts, and glands, conveyed very little tangible information to the mind of his hearer, and only served to puzzle, alarm, and irritate him. At length, however, the surgeon promised and vowed that he would send him all manner of remedies for his evils, and spoke in such a confident tone of his being better on the next day, or the day after, that he left him more composed. The housekeeper followed Mr. Slattery out of the room, but did not think fit to make any observation till they reached the foot of the stairs, when she touched Mr. Slattery gently on the arm and beckoned him into the dining-room. "He seems in a bad way, sir," said the housekeeper.

"A case of jaundice, Mrs. Billiter," replied the surgeon, raising his eyebrows, "which is never very pleasant."

"But I want to know if there is any danger, Mr. Slattery," continued Mrs. Billiter, "it is very necessary that people should be aware."

"Why, there is always danger in every disease," answered the surgeon, who abominated a straightforward answer to such questions; but then, bethinking himself, and seeing that it might be better to be a little more explicit, he added, "jaundice, even the green, or black jaundice, as it is sometimes called, which your master has, is not in itself by any means a dangerous disease; but there are accidents, which occur in the progress of an illness, that may produce very fatal results, sometimes in a moment. This is by no means uncommon in jaundice. You see the cause of that yellow, or green tint of the skin and eyes is this, either in consequence of biliary calculi, or the construction of the ducts leading from the gall-bladder, or pressure upon the gall-bladder itself, the bile is prevented from flowing, as it naturally does, into the intestinal canal."

"Lord a mercy," cried Mrs. Billiter, "what do I know of all such stuff! I never heard of people having canals in their inside before, or ducks either, except when they had eat them roasted; and that I'll swear my master hasn't for the last two months. Gall he has, sure enough, and bitterness too, as the Scripture says."

"Wait a moment, wait a moment, and you will see it all clearly directly," said the worthy surgeon. "As I have said, the bile, being thus prevented from flowing in its natural course, is absorbed into the vascular system; and, as long as it is deposited merely on the mucous membrane, showing itself, as we see, in the discoloration of the cuticle, no harm ensues; but the disposition of the smallest drop of bile on the membranes of the brain acts as the most virulent poison on the whole nervous system, and sudden death frequently follows, sometimes in five minutes, sometimes in an hour or two. Now this is the reason why I wished you to sit up with him to-night; but, as he won't hear of it, it can't be helped: and one thing is certain, that even if you were there, you could do no good, should such a thing occur; for I know no remedial means any more than for the bite of a rattlesnake."

"I wish he would see his son," said Mrs. Billiter, "but you told him he would be better to-morrow or the next day, and so there is no hope of it; for, unless he is frightened out of his wits, he would fly into a fury at the very name of the thing."

"Well, wait till to-morrow, wait till to-morrow," said Mr. Slattery, "and if I see that it won't hurt him, I will frighten him a bit. I don't see that there is any danger just at present, if he keeps himself perfectly quiet; and he must not be irritated on any account. However, if I were you, I would be ready to go to him directly, if he rings his bell; and in the mean time I'll send him the composing draught."

Notwithstanding Mr. Slattery's composing draughts, Mr. Wittingham passed a wretched night. He was feverish, heated, full of dark and horrible fancies, hearing the blood going in his head like a mill, and thinking of everything that was miserable within the whole range of a not very extensive imagination. He bore it obstinately, however, for some hours, taking the potions by his bedside within even less than the prescribed intervals, but finding no relief. At length he began to wonder, if people would hear him when he rang. He found himself growing weaker and more weak; and he suffered exceeding pain, till darkness, and the torture of his own thoughts, became intolerable; and stretching out his hand, he rang the bell about three o'clock in the morning. The old housekeeper, who had remained dressed close at hand, was in his room in a moment; and Mr. Wittingham felt as much pleased and grateful, as it was in his nature to feel. She did her best to soothe and comfort him; and just as the light was coming in, the sedative medicines, which he had taken, began to produce some effect; and he fell into a heavy sleep. Nevertheless, when Mr. Slattery visited him, he found no great improvement; but a warm bath produced some relief. The worthy surgeon began to fancy, however, from all the symptoms that he saw, that he was likely to lose a patient of some importance; and he judged that it might be as well to establish a claim upon that patient's successor. He therefore determined to take the advocacy of Harry Wittingham's cause upon himself; and, in order to prepare the way for what he had to say in the evening he gave the worthy gentleman under his hands a significant hint, that he was in a good deal of danger.

Mr. Wittingham heard the announcement in silence, closed his eyes, compressed his lips, and seemed more terribly affected than the worthy surgeon had at all expected. He therefore judged it best to throw in a little consolation before he proceeded further, and he continued, in a soothing and cajoling tone:

"I know you to be a man of strong mind, my dear sir, and not likely to be depressed at the thought of a little peril. Therefore, if I had thought the case hopeless, I should have told you so at once. It is not so, however, at all; and I only wished to warn you, that there was some danger, in order to show you the necessity of keeping yourself quite quiet and taking great care."

Mr. Wittingham answered not a word; and, after a very unpleasant pause, the surgeon took his leave, promising to come again in the evening.

When he did return, Mr. Slattery found his patient wonderfully composed, as he thought. Nevertheless, there was an awkward something about the pulse, a sort of heavy, suppressed jar, which did not make him augur very favorably of his prospects. As he sat by the bedside with his fingers upon the wrist, and his eyes half-shut, as if considering all the slightest indications which might be afforded by that small agitated current that beat and quivered beneath his touch, what was Mr. Slattery reflecting upon? Not Mr. Wittingham's state, except as far as it was to influence his conduct in a non-medical capacity. He said to himself—or thought, which is the same thing, "This old gentleman will go. He has not stamina to struggle with such a disease. As I can do little for the Wittingham present, I may as well do what I can for the Wittingham to come. If I show myself his friend, he may show himself mine; and though perhaps the discussion may make life's feeble tide ebb a little faster, it is not much matter whether it be low water half-an-hour sooner or later."

Mrs. Billiter, however, did not happen to be in the room at the moment, and Mr. Slattery resolved to have a witness to his benevolent proceedings. He therefore asked numerous questions, and discussed various important points affecting the sick man's health, till the good housekeeper appeared. He then gradually led the conversation round to young Harry Wittingham, remarking that he had had a long drive since the morning, and speaking of Buxton's Inn, as one of the places at which he had called.

"By the way, I did not see your son, my dear sir," he added: "he was out. Indeed, he may be considered as quite well now, and only requires care of himself, kind attention from others, and a mind quiet and at ease."

Mr. Wittingham said not a word, and Mr. Slattery mistook his silence entirely. "I now think, my dear sir," he continued, "that it would be a great comfort to you if you would have him home. Under present circumstances it would be advisable, I think, I do indeed."

Then the storm burst, then the smothered rage broke forth, with fearful violence. I will not repeat all Mr. Wittingham said, for a great deal was unfit for repetition. He cursed, he swore, he gave Mr. Slattery over to perdition, he declared that he would never let his son darken his doors again, that he had cast him off, disinherited him, trusted he might come to beg his bread. He told the surgeon to get out of his house and never to let him see him again; he vowed that he was glad he was dying, for then that scoundrel, his son, would soon find out what it was to offend a father, and would understand that he could not make his peace whenever he pleased by sending any pitiful little pimping apothecary to try and frighten him into forgiveness. In vain Mr. Slattery strove to speak, in vain he endeavored to excuse himself, in vain he took a tone of authority, and told his patient he would kill himself, if he gave way to such frantic rage. Again and again Mr. Wittingham, sitting bolt upright in bed, with a face black and green with wrath and jaundice, told him to get out of the house, to quit the room, to close the books and strike a balance; and at length the surgeon was fairly driven forth, remonstrating and protesting, unheard amid the storm of his patient's words.

Mrs. Billiter did not think fit to follow him, for she knew her master well, and that his ever ready suspicions would be excited by the least sign of collusion. Beside, she was not altogether well pleased that Mr. Slattery had thought fit to take the business out of her hands without consulting her, and made, as she termed it, a fine kettle full of fish of the whole affair. Thus she acted perfectly honest when Mr. Wittingham turned upon her as soon as the surgeon was gone, exclaiming,

"What do you think of all this, woman? What do you think of his impertinence?"

And she replied, "I think him a meddling little fool, sir."

"Ah, that he is, Billiter, that he is!" answered Mr. Wittingham, "and I believe he has tried to frighten me, just to serve his own purposes. But he shall find himself mistaken, that he shall. He has done me harm enough, though—putting me in such a passion. My head aches as if it would split;" and Mr. Wittingham pressed his hand upon his forehead, and sunk back upon his pillow.

By this time night was falling fast; and Mrs. Billiter retired to obtain lights; when she returned, Mr. Wittingham seemed dozing, exhausted, as she thought, by the fit of passion, to which he had given way. Sitting down, therefore, at a distance, she took up a book and began to read. It was one of those strange, mystical compositions, the product of a fanatical spirit, carried away into wild and daring theories regarding things wisely hidden from the eyes of man, in which, sometimes, by one of the strange contrarieties of human nature, the most selfish, material, and unintellectual persons take great delight. It was called the "Invisible World Displayed;" and it had been lately bought by Mr. Wittingham, since he had fallen into the melancholy and desponding state, which usually accompanies the disease he labored under. For more than an hour Mrs. Billiter went on reading of ghosts, and spirits, and phantoms, and devils, till her hair began to stand erect under a thick cushion-cap. But still there was a sort of fascination about the book which carried her on. She heard her master breathing hard close by; and more than once she said to herself, "He's getting a good sleep now, at all events." At length she began to think the sleep lasted somewhat long; and, laying down the book, she went and looked in between the curtains. He had not moved at all, and was snoring aloud; so, as the clock had struck eleven, she thought she might as well send the other servants to bed, resolving to sit up in his room and sleep in the great chair. About a quarter of an hour was occupied in this proceeding, and in getting some refreshment; and, when she returned, opening the door gently, she heard the same sonorous breathing; and, seating herself again, she took up the book once more, thinking, "I dare say he will wake soon; so I had better not go to sleep, ere I have given him the other draught." Wonderful were the tales that she there read, of people possessed of miraculous warnings, and of voices heard, and of apparitions seen, in the dead hour of night. Tarningham clock struck twelve, while she was still poring over the pages; but, though she was a good deal excited by what she read, fatigue and watching would have their effect; and her eyes became somewhat heavy. To cast off this drowsiness, she rose and quietly put the room in order; then sat down again, and had her hand once more upon the book, when suddenly the heavy breathing stopped for a minute. "He is going to wake now," said Mrs. Billiter to herself; but scarcely had the thought passed through her mind, when she heard a sudden sort of rattling and snorting noise from the bed; and jumping up in alarm, she ran forward, and drew back the curtain. The light fell straight upon the face of the sick man; and a horrible sight it presented. The features were all in motion; the eyes rolling in the head; the teeth gnashing together; foam issuing from the mouth; and the whole limbs agitated, so that the bed-clothes were drawn into a knot around him. Mr. Wittingham, in short, was in strong convulsions; Mrs. Billiter was, naturally, greatly alarmed; and her first impulse was to run to the door to call for help; but suddenly a new view of the case seemed to strike her. "No, I won't," she said; and, going back, she got some hartshorn, and applied it to Mr. Wittingham's nostrils, sprinkled some water on his face, wetted his temples, and did everything she could think of to put an end to the fit. It continued violently for several minutes, however; and she thought, "Perhaps he ought to be bled; I ought to send for Slattery, I do believe:" but at that moment the spasm seemed relaxed; the contorted limbs fell languid; a calm expression spread over the features; the eyelids fell heavily, rose, and fell again; and though the fingers continued to grasp the bed-clothes, it was with no violence. "He is getting better," said the housekeeper to herself. The next moment the motions of the hands ceased; a sharp shudder passed over the whole frame; the chest heaved and fell; then came a deep sigh; and the eyes opened; the jaws dropped; all became motionless; there was not a sound. Mrs. Billiter listened. Not the rustle of the slightest breath could be heard. She held the candle close to his eyes; the eyelids quivered not; the pupil did not contract. A cold, damp dew stood upon the sunken temples; and all was still—but it was the silence of death. She set down the candle on the chair, and gazed at him for two or three minutes, almost as motionless as the dead body before her; then, suddenly starting, she said in a low tone: "There is no time to be lost; I must think of the poor boy; for he was a hard-hearted old man, and there is no knowing what he may have done." She pressed her hand upon her forehead tight for a minute or two, in deep thought; then putting the candle on the table at a distance from the bed-curtains, she went out, ran up stairs, and called up the footman, waiting at his door till he came out.

"Master is very ill, John," said Mrs. Billiter; "I don't think he will get through the night, so you must run up—"

"And bring down Mr. Slattery," said the footman, interrupting her.

"No," answered the housekeeper, "Slattery said he could do no good; and master and he had a sad quarrel, but you must go and call Mr. Harry. Tell him to come down directly, and not to lose a minute."

"I had better take the horse," said the man, "for Buxton's Inn is a good bit of a way."

"He is not at Buxton's Inn," answered Mrs. Billiter, "but at Morris's little cottage on Chandleigh-heath. You can take the horse if you like, but be quick about it, for Heaven's sake. It is a clear, moonlight night, and you can gallop all the way."

"That I will," said the man, and ran down stairs.

Without calling any one else, Mrs. Billiter returned to the chamber of death, looked into the bed for a moment or two, and saw that all was still. She knew he was dead right well, but yet it seemed strange to her that he had not moved. There was something awful in it, and she sat down upon a chair and wept. She had not loved him; she had not esteemed, or respected him; she had known him to be harsh, cruel, and unkind, but yet there was something in seeing the life of the old man go out solitary, untended by kindred hands, without a friend, without a relation near, with bitterness in his spirit and enmity between him and his only child, that moved the secret sources of deep emotion in the woman's heart, and opened the fountain of tears.

While she yet wept, she heard the horse's feet pass by toward Chandleigh-heath, and then for about an hour all was silent. Buried in deep sleep, the inhabitants of the little town knew not, cared not, thought not of all that was passing in the dwelling of their rich neighbor. At length a distant sound was heard of hoofs beating fast the hard road; it came nearer and nearer; and starting up, Mrs. Billiter ran down stairs with a light in her hand and opened the hall-door. The next moment she heard the garden-gate opened, and a figure came forward leading a horse.

Casting the rein over the beast's neck and giving it a cut with the whip to send it toward the stables, Harry Wittingham sprang forward, ran up the steps, and entered the house. His face was not pale, but flushed, and his eyes fiery.

"Ah, Master Harry," said Mrs. Billiter, as soon as she saw him, "he is gone."

"Gone!" exclaimed Harry Wittingham, "do you mean he is dead?"

"Yes," answered the old woman; "but come up, sir, come up, there is much to be thought of."

Without a word the young man stood beside, while she closed and locked the door, and then followed her up stairs to his dead father's room. She suffered him to gaze into the bed for a minute or two, with haggard eyes and heavy brow, but then she touched his arm, saying,

"Master Harry, Master Harry, you had better think of other things just now; he was very hard upon you, and, I can't help thinking, tried to do you wrong. Four or five days ago he wrote a great deal one afternoon, and then told me afterward 'he had remembered me in his will.' You had better see what that will is—he kept all the papers he cared most about in that table-drawer—the key hangs upon his watch-chain."

With shaking hands Harry Wittingham took up the watch, approached the table and opened the drawer with the key. There were several papers within and different note-books, but one document lay at the top with a few words written on the outside, and the young man instantly took it up, opened, and began to read it. Mrs. Billiter gazed at him, standing at a distance, with a look of anxiety and apprehension. When he had read about a dozen lines his face assumed a look of terrible distress; he dropped the paper from his hand, and sinking into a chair, exclaimed,

"Good God, he thought I shot at him!"

"But you didn't? you didn't, Master Harry?"

"I? I never thought of it!" exclaimed Harry Wittingham.

Mrs. Billiter ran forward, picked up the paper, and put it in his hand again.

"There's a large fire in the kitchen to keep water hot," she said in a whisper; "all the maids are in bed, and the man has not come back yet, but he won't be long—be quick, Master Harry, be quick."

The young man paused, gazed thoughtfully at the paper for a moment or two, then took up the light and hurried out of the room.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

We must go back to an early hour of that same Sunday morning, and to the cottage of Stephen Gimlet, near the little church. Both Stephen himself and his mother-in-law had risen betimes; and the boy was still sleeping in his bed. The old lady spent three quarters of an hour in writing an epistle, with her spectacles on her nose, while her son-in-law ate his breakfast; and when the act of composition was over, she folded up in the letter an old piece of paper, partly printed, partly written, the very same, in fact, which had flown out of her family Bible one morning, when poor Billy Lamb, coming in, had found the book in the hands of Stephen Gimlet's little boy. She then added thereto an old, somewhat crumpled, and well worn letter, first reading over the address attentively, got a light and a small piece of red sealing-wax, sealed the letter, and stamped it with the end of her thimble.

"There, Stephen," she said, giving the letter to her son-in-law, "he is back now, that's certain; take that up to him, and tell him, that if he wants to hear any more about it, I can give him information of the whole. I know all the names, and I believe the minister is alive still. I would not go out of the house, if I were you, till I saw him; and, if by any chance he should not be come down yet, I would hang about and catch him when he arrives; for it is only just right he should know how the whole matter stands, before he goes any further."

"I won't miss him this time, goody," said Ste Gimlet; "so you and the boy get your dinner, if I should not come back in time. I am very uneasy at its not having been done before; for we poor people cannot tell what may become of such things with great folks, and after all you tell me, I am very sure that blackguard fellow, Moreton, is not hanging about here for any good."

Thus saying, Stephen Gimlet put the letter carefully up, and went away, as usual, with his gun in his hand, and his dog following. It was not yet more than half-past five o'clock; and, recollecting that the servants of Sir John Slingby were not very matutinal in their habits, the gamekeeper thought he might as well go upon one of his rounds, which led him near to Chandleigh-heath, and see if he could get any inkling of Captain Moreton's proceedings. He walked slowly along up the lane from his own house, crossed the high-road from Tarningham to London, and then, taking a path across the fields, soon came to another lane, which led him to a sandy way, having a high hedge with elm-trees on the left, and Chandleigh-heath on the right. It was sunk down some way beneath the rest of the country, so as to give no prospect over the common; but a couple of hundred yards further on, a footpath went up over the bank and divided it into two, something after the fashion of a bird's merrythought, one branch leading to an old tumulus, topped with firs, and the other, which was much shorter, running down to the cottage inhabited by Captain Moreton. About twenty yards before he reached this turning, the dog, which followed at Stephen Gimlet's heels, began to growl in a somewhat angry manner; and the gamekeeper turned round to look in what direction the beast's eyes were bent. Before he could ascertain, however, a man suddenly sprang over the hedge, and casting himself upon him, seized the barrel of his gun with both hands. A fierce struggle ensued; for Stephen Gimlet at once perceived who his adversary was; and the gamekeeper, though taken unawares, was decidedly getting the better, when he suddenly found his arms seized from behind, and a cord passed quickly round them. The next instant the cord was drawn tight in spite of all his efforts; but at the same moment he had the satisfaction of hearing the voice of Harry Wittingham exclaim: "D—— the dog—he has bit me to the bone;" and, as his legs were free, he made so strenuous an application of his thick-nailed shoes to the shins of Captain Moreton, that the respectable gentleman let go his hold; and, darting away, Stephen Gimlet ran forward, as fast as he could, in the hope of meeting some one who would render him assistance. I have said, that his assailants sprang upon him from behind; and consequently, the only paths open for the fugitive were those which led toward the cottage or to the tumulus on the heath. In the latter direction he was not likely to find any one to help him; but down the lane, which passed close by the cottage, were a number of poor men's houses, the inhabitants of which usually went to work about that hour. It is a pity that Stephen Gimlet did not recollect that it was Sunday; but so it was: and the good laborers were taking an additional nap to refresh them after the toils of the week. No one knows how much one limb aids another, even in the peculiar functions of the latter, till some deprivation has taken place. Now, at the first consideration, we should say that a man did not run with his arms, but yet the arms help a man very much in running; and Stephen Gimlet soon found to his cost, that he could not run as he was accustomed to do, without them. He was much swifter of foot than either of those who followed; but yet, by the time that he had got three hundred yards down the lane, they had recovered their hold of him and thrown him down. In fact, it was a great convenience to them, that he had run; for every step that he had taken was in the direction which they had intended to carry him; and when they overtook him, he was not thirty yards from the garden gate of the cottage. He was easily dragged along for that distance, brought into the house and put into a room, which had been constructed by the retired hosier for what he called the butler's pantry, though it is by no means to be understood that he ever had, or expected to have such a thing as a butler, or anything the least like it. Nevertheless, as the room was destined to contain a certain amount of silver spoons, tea-pots, and other little pieces of the precious metal, strong bars had been put up to the windows; and the butler's pantry now formed a very convenient little cage for the bird, which the two gentlemen had caught out upon the common.

Before they shut the door upon him, Mr. Henry Wittingham made some proposal to Captain Moreton in a low voice, to which the other replied:

"No, no; he'll make an outcry and wake the women; and then we shall have it all over the place. You can lick him well before we let him out, if you like. Let us attend to the main business first, and, having got him in, keep him in; nobody knowing anything about it. Good morning, Master Wolf; you shall have some bread-and-water, if you like, but nothing else for the next four-and-twenty hours."

Stephen Gimlet answered not; and it is to be remarked, that—whether because he thought that shouting would be of no use, or that he chose to imitate the beast, whose name he had acquired, in its taciturn habits under adversity—not a word had he uttered from the beginning of the fray until the end. He suffered the door to be shut upon him in silence: and, while he remained revolving what was to be done, or whether anything could be done, his two captors retired to the little drawing-room, where they sat down and laughed for a moment at the success of their scheme. Their first merriment, however, soon gave way to some uneasy sensations. Captain Moreton rubbed his shins, which had suffered considerably from the contact with Stephen Gimlet's shoes. Harry Wittingham unceremoniously pulled off his boot, and found his whole stocking stained with blood, and the marks of four large fangs very apparent in the heel and tendon.

"Come along with me," said Captain Moreton, when he saw his companion's state; "we'll get a little salt-and-water; you shall wash your heel with it, and I will wash my shins, for that d—— fellow has kicked all the skin off—salt-and-water is the best thing in the world."

While they go to perform the part of surgeons upon themselves, I will, with the reader's leave, return to speak of one of the actors in the scene of Stephen Gimlet's capture, who has not had as much notice as he deserves. The dog, who had followed him from his own cottage, after having paid due attention to the heel of Mr. Wittingham, and received a severe kick for his pains, gave chase to the pursuers of his master down the lane, tore Captain Moreton's coat with a spring and a snap; but then suddenly, as if he saw that his own unassisted efforts could do little, and judged that it might be right to seek assistance, darted off at a right angle across the common, with his head hanging down, his tongue out, and some angry foam dropping from his mouth. He ran straight through a farmyard on the opposite side of the heath, bit at a woman who was going to milk the cows, but only tore her apron, wounded the farmer's dog with a sharp snap, went clear over the wall and straight on toward Tarningham, biting at every living thing that came in his way, but never stopping to ascertain whether he had inflicted much or little evil. This misanthropical spirit soon called the attention of the people, and excited their indignation. They gave the poor dog a bad name; and, though no one could be found to undertake the exact task of hanging him, they followed with pitchforks, sticks, shovels, stones, and a very miscellaneous assortment of other weapons, such as pokers, tongs, etc.: and, driving him into the court-yard of the mayor's house at Tarningham, succeeded in killing him without his doing any further mischief.

Such is the tragic history of Stephen Gimlet's poor dog; but of none of the particulars were Captain Moreton and Harry Wittingham made acquainted at the time; for both these gentlemen thought fit to keep themselves strictly to the house during the whole morning. Of much and many things did they talk; they comforted the outward man with salt-and-water; they comforted the inner man with toast, coffee, eggs, and broiled ham. The broiled ham left them thirsty; and at twelve o'clock they tried to assuage such unpleasant sensations by a glass of cold brandy-and-water; and finding that not succeed according to their expectation, they tried another glass, hot. After that, Harry Wittingham declared he felt tired and sleepy with getting up so early, and retired to lie down for a time; but he continued sleeping in a broken sort of confused slumber for between three and four hours, when he was roused by hearing some very high tones, and apparently words, proceeding from the neighboring room. Without difficulty he recognized the voices of Captain Moreton and his fair companion, who had seemed to be in no very good-humor when she supped with him the night before; but he could not distinguish the subject of dispute on the present occasion; and, looking at his watch, he found that it was past four o'clock. Knowing that the dinner-hour at the cottage was five, he washed his face and hands, arranged his hair, as best he might, and went down to the drawing-room, still hearing the strife of tongues raging in the adjoining room.

It was some quarter of an hour before Captain Moreton joined him; and he was then informed by his worthy friend, that dinner would be half an hour later that day, as the maid had been sent to Buxton's Inn, for the purpose of ordering a chaise to be at the door at nightfall.

This announcement startled Harry Wittingham a good deal.

"But where the devil are you going to, Moreton?" he inquired; "you are not going to leave me alone with this fellow, are you?"

"Only for a short time, Mr. Wittingham," answered Captain Moreton, in his easy nonchalant way, "not long enough for him to eat you, or for you to eat him. You know what obstinate devils these women are, and I have got to do with the most pig-headed of the whole race. The fact is, Wittingham, we have got in our hands, if we do but use it properly, the means of having full revenge upon one or two good friends of ours; among the rest, that fellow, who, as you ought to remember, was second to Captain Hayward in his duel with you—Mr. Beauchamp, he calls himself."

"Why, I hear he has turned out a Lord Lenham, and is going to marry old Sir John's pretty daughter."

"Exactly so," answered Captain Moreton, drily; "but if he doesn't mind, his wedding tour will be a different one to what he expects; however, I have the greatest difficulty in preventing my fair friend Charlotte from spoiling the whole business; for she is in one of her violent fits, and then she gets as mad as a March hare. She and I must act together; but I must not appear in the business; for you see there are two or three little things that the people might bring against me. I have resolved, therefore, to get over to Winterton, till to-morrow's work is blown over; for she will be present to witness the marriage, do what I can to stop her. As the mischief would have it, however, I threatened to blow the whole matter up, if she would not submit to management; and so she will not let me out of her sight, threatening at the same time to cut my throat, or some pretty little thing of that kind, by way of making herself a pleasant companion. However, she must go with me, that's clear, and come over in a chaise to-morrow to the wedding. If she does not spoil all, and this man here can be kept in, we have got them completely in our power."

"Why, what in fortune's name can he have to do with Lord Lenham's marriage?" asked Harry Wittingham.

"I don't know exactly," answered Captain Moreton, musing gravely, "but I have a good many suspicions about him, which it won't do to mention just yet. All I ask, is, to have him kept in here till after the marriage is over; and you will have nothing further to do with it, than to keep the key of the room, and prevent any of the girls from going in. By so doing, you will punish him ten times more than if you licked him for an hour. I know you are not given to be afraid of anything; but, if people should make a fuss about it, it is very easy to say you did it to punish him for knocking you down the way he did."

Harry Wittingham smiled; and the moment after, Captain Moreton continued: "Here she comes, by Jove; I'll get out of the way for the present, and cram some meat down that fellow's throat without untying him. You'll stay, Wittingham, won't you? I shall be back to-morrow night."

"Why, I must stay, I suppose," said Harry Wittingham; "for good old Dame Bilbie thinks I shall be here till to-morrow night; and I expect her to send up some money, if she can get it."

Captain Moreton did not wait for anything further than this assent, but disappeared by the right-hand door; and the moment after, the fair lady, whom I have so often mentioned, entered by the other. Her face was somewhat redder than usual; but that was the only sign of agitating passions that could be discovered in her demeanor. Her step was calm, stealthy, and catlike; her eyes looked cold and flat, with a meaningless sort of glassy stare about them, as if purposely covered by a semi-opaque film to veil what was passing beneath. She looked slowly round the room, without taking any notice of Mr. Wittingham, though she had not seen him that day; and, walking round to the mock-rosewood sofa, she sat down in silence, and took some papers out of the drawer of the table. Harry Wittingham wished her good morning, and addressed to her some commonplace observation, to which she replied with a forced smile, and then busied herself with her papers again. When Captain Moreton reëntered the room about a quarter of an hour afterward, a sudden fierce gleam came into her eyes and passed away again; but she uttered not a word; and, dinner being announced soon after, she took Mr. Wittingham's arm and walked into the small dining-room. When the meal was over, and she left the gentlemen to their wine, she passed by Captain Moreton's chair, and bending down her head, she said in a low voice, but loud enough for Mr. Wittingham to hear:

"Remember, Moreton!—remember! You know me!"

Captain Moreton only laughed, though the words were said with a threatening manner; and, as soon as she was gone, he plied Harry Wittingham with wine, which was followed by brandy-and-water; and in the pleasant occupation, thus provided, the two worthy compeers continued to exercise themselves, till the sky grew gray, and the roll of a chaise was heard before the garden.

"There, Wittingham," cried Captain Moreton, starting up, "there's the key of the little cellar—small enough, but there's sufficient in it to lay you dead-drunk for a fortnight. There's the key of the cage, too; keep the bird safe till ten or eleven o'clock to-morrow. I will try to keep my gray mare in hand; and, if we can manage both, you will hear some news to-morrow night, that will make you laugh heartily. Farewell, my good fellow," and going to the door, he shouted aloud, "Where's the portmanteau?"

"I put it in the shay, sir," said the girl; and, turning once more to Harry Wittingham, Captain Moreton told him that he should see him before ten the following night, and went to seek his fair companion.

In a few minutes more they were gone; but the gentleman they left behind did not see any reason why he should not finish the bottle of wine on the table, "just to take the taste of the brandy out of his mouth." After that he fell asleep in an arm-chair; and so sound was his slumber, that the maid came in twice and looked at him; but seeing that there was no probability of his waking for some hours, she put a fresh pair of candles on the table, and went to bed.

Harry Wittingham slept and dreamed. He thought he had committed some horrible act, that the hue and cry was raised, the whole county in pursuit, and that he could hear the galloping of horses coming close after him. He struggled to spur his own beast forward, but its legs would not move; and, looking down with horror and consternation, he found it was a rocking-horse with little bells at its ears and its tail. Suddenly a constable seemed to grasp him by the shoulder; and, starting up in agony, he found the servant-girl shaking him.

"Please, sir," she said, "Mrs. Billiter has sent up the man to say, that your father is dying, and you must go down directly."

Without a moment's thought or consideration, Harry Wittingham ran out, snatched up his hat in the passage, and, telling the man to follow on foot, mounted the horse and rode away to Tarningham.

CHAPTER XL.

The sun shone bright in Stephen Gimlet's cottage for a couple of hours after dawn, till about an hour before evening's close. For the first three or four hours the same sunshine seemed to pervade the interior of the house that glowed without. Widow Lamb seemed contented with what she had done; her meek face wore as warm a smile as ever now shone upon it; and she busied herself during the morning in all the little household arrangements, and in teaching the boy his letters. The boy himself played about merrily, while she was occupied with the inanimate things of the place, and then came and said his letters, infamously ill, indeed, but still somewhat better than usual. When the sun got round to his southernmost point, Widow Lamb, not at all surprised at her son-in-law's absence, as its probability had been announced beforehand, gave the boy his dinner, and took a very moderate portion of food herself; but when the day had three or four hours declined from its prime, she wondered that Stephen had not come back, and, at the end of an hour, grew somewhat uneasy. She consoled herself, however, by supposing, that Lord Lenham had not yet returned from London, and that Stephen was waiting for his arrival; but another hour passed, and another, and at length her son, Billy Lamb, made his appearance, inquiring somewhat anxiously for his brother-in-law.

Mrs. Lamb simply told him that Stephen was out, adding that he had been away all day.

"It is droll I haven't seen him," said the boy, "but I dare say he is vexed about his dog."

"Why, what has happened to the dog?" asked Widow Lamb. "He took it with him this morning early."

"Ay, but the people of Tarningham killed it for a mad dog," said Billy Lamb. "I dare say the poor beast was not mad at all. I saw it afterward and knew it directly; but I have seen nothing of Stephen."

"He is up at Sir John's," said Widow Lamb, "and I dare say is waiting till the young lord comes down from London."

"No, that can't be, mother," replied her son, "for the gentleman came down yesterday evening; one of our post-boys drove him."

"That's very odd," said Widow Lamb; "I wonder Stephen has not come back, then. I hope nothing's the matter."

"Oh, dear, no," replied the deformed lad; "you know Ste was always fond of wandering about, and would, at times, be out for a couple of days together; but I wanted to tell him that I have found out nothing about that Captain Moreton, except that he is going away from the cottage somewhere to-night. I did not see him myself, when I took up the letters to him to-day; but the servant-girl told me that she had been sent up to Buxton's Inn to order a chaise, and that it was to be down there just at night fall."

"Ay, ill birds fly at night," said Widow Lamb; "but I wish Stephen would come home, for he has been now gone well nigh twelve hours."

"Oh, he is safe enough, mother," reiterated her son, "it is not like if it were night-time, or winter either—but I must get back; for there will be all the supper beer to carry out;" and, after saying a few more words, he departed.

Hour after hour, however, went by; and Stephen Gimlet did not appear, till the good old lady's apprehensions increased every minute. She put the boy to bed, and sat up and watched; but eight, nine, ten o'clock came, and no one approached the cottage-door. A terribly anxious night was that which followed; and, though about midnight Widow Lamb went to bed, sleep did not visit her eyes for some hours. She lay and revolved all that could have happened. She was anxious for her son-in-law; anxious for the result of his mission to Beauchamp; and she had resolved to set off early on the morrow morning for Tarningham-park, taking the boy with her. At about half-past three, however, weariness overpowered the old woman, and she slept. Her frame was not very strong; and, exhausted with both watching and anxiety, the slumber that fell upon her was profound and long. The first thing that awoke her was the little boy pulling her by the arm and saying, "Granny, granny, you are a sluggard now, as you called me the other day. I am very hungry, I want my breakfast."

Widow Lamb started up, and looking at her old round watch in its tortoise-shell case, she saw that it was half-past seven o'clock. Vexed and angry with herself, she hurried on her clothes, and proceeded to give the boy some food, urging him to hasten his meal, as she was going to take him a walk. The temptation was strong, and at about a quarter-past eight, they were out of the cottage and on their way to Tarningham-park. She heard village bells ringing merrily, as on a day of festival; but Widow Lamb's heart was sad. The whole country was smiling in the morning light; but, though to a fine mind the beauties of nature never lose their charm, yet to the old there is, at all times, a melancholy mingled with the pleasure they produce; and, to the spirit cast down with apprehension or affliction, the very loveliness becomes a load. The boy lingered, and would fain have played by the way; but his grandmother hurried him forward as fast as his little legs would carry him; and they reached the mansion of Sir John Slingsby at a few minutes before nine. There were carriages already at the door. Servants were seen bustling about; but all were too busy to take notice of the old widow and the little boy, till, going into the court-yard, she addressed herself to one of the helpers in the stable, whom she had seen and known, and told him her apprehensions about her son-in-law.

The man kindly undertook to make inquiries, and let her know the result; and, leaving her there for some minutes, he came back shortly after with the butler, who told her that Stephen Gimlet had certainly not been there the day before. "I can't stop to talk with you, goody," he said, in an important tone; "for, you see, Miss Slingsby is just going to set out, to be married to Lord Lenham; but, as soon as they come back from church, I will tell Sir John, and, depend upon it, he will have Stephen sought for."

"If I could speak with Lord Lenham for one minute," said Widow Lamb; but the man interrupted her, laughing. "You must go down to Tarningham, then, goody," he said, "for his lordship slept there last night; or else, you can go down to the church of Little Tarningham, where, I dare say, he is waiting by this time; or, what is better than all, wait here till they come back, and I'll give Ste Gimlet's little boy a bit of bride-cake."

As he spoke, he hurried back again into the house; and Widow Lamb paused and thought, with the tears in her eyes; but at length she said, aloud, "I will go down to the church;" and, taking the little boy by the hand, who did not at all like the idea of losing the bride-cake, she hurried out of the gates of the court, and pursued one of the small footpaths leading toward Little Tarningham. She was within fifty yards from the park paling, when Sir John Slingsby's carriages drove past at a quick rate; and Widow Lamb, though little able from much exertion, hurried her pace till the boy was forced to run, to keep up with her. The church, as the reader knows, was at the distance of somewhat less than half-a-mile; and, when Widow Lamb reached it, there stood before the gates of the little church-yard two or three handsome carriages and one post-chaise. Passing quickly along the path through the cemetery, the old woman approached the door, which was ajar, and heard the full, sonorous voice of Dr. Miles reading the marriage service. She pushed open the door gently, and went in. There were a great number of people in the church, collected from Tarningham and the neighborhood—some in the little gallery, where they could see best; some in pews in the body of the church, and one or two in the aisle. The latter, however, did not prevent the old lady from seeing straight up to the altar, around which were congregated the bridal party, with Beauchamp and Captain Hayward on the one side, and Sir John Slingsby with his family on the other. Just as Widow Lamb entered, Dr. Miles, standing before the altar, was saying aloud, "I pronounce that they be man and wife together."

It was evident the ceremony was nearly over—the marriage, in fact, completed. The benediction was then given, and the psalm said; and, after all those parts of the service which are usually read, Beauchamp drew the arm of Isabella through his own and led her down the aisle, toward the little vestry which stood on the right-hand side of the church. The people in the pews rose up to look over; but, to the surprise of many, one of the pew-doors opened before the newly married couple had taken two steps, and a lady issued forth, and, turning her face toward the altar, stood right in the way of the advancing party. Her eye fixed straight upon Lord Lenham, flashing and fierce; her lip curled with a smile of contemptuous triumph, while her brow appeared knit with a heavy frown. At the same moment, a voice, which some persons near recognized as that of Mr Wharton, the attorney, exclaimed from the pew which the lady had just left, "Now she has spoiled it all."

But what was the effect of this apparition upon those in whose presence it so suddenly appeared! Beauchamp staggered and turned deadly pale, and Isabella recoiled in alarm from that menacing look and flashing eye, saying, in a low tone, "Good Heaven, who is this!"

"Who am I, girl!" said the lady, aloud; "I will tell you who I am, and let him deny it if he can. I am this man's lawful wife, whom you have just married—look at his face: pale, dastard conscience is upon it. He is well aware of the truth that I speak, and the crime that he has committed."

But Beauchamp instantly recovered himself; and, while a dead silence prevailed in the whole church, he put Isabella's hand into her father's, advanced a step toward the person before him, and fixing his eyes firmly upon her, he said,

"Charlotte Hay, you have laid once more a dark and horrible scheme to injure me. By cunning artifices and long concealment you have taught me to believe you were dead for some years, and have waited for this moment for your revenge—you know it—you dare not deny it; but you may yet find yourself deceived. In one point you are already deceived; for, doubtless, judging from your own heart, you imagine I have concealed previous events from this lady and her family. Such is not the case; and now you force upon me that which I have always avoided, the trial whether there ever was any marriage at all between myself and you."

"Avoided it, because you knew it could not be questioned," answered the lady, scornfully. "Your father and yourself took lawyers' opinion enough, and the reply of every one was that the marriage was perfectly good and valid."

"Not worth a straw," said a voice behind her; and, turning round with the look of a demon, the eyes of Charlotte Hay lighted on Widow Lamb, who had walked quietly up the aisle at the commencement of this scene. For a moment or two she gazed at her, as if striving to recall her face, and then gave a short scream, muttering afterward to herself,

"I know who has done this—I know who has done this!"

"What is this, my good woman?" cried Mr. Wharton, stepping out of the pew, and putting himself at the side of Charlotte Hay.

Sir John Slingsby was darting forward toward him, with wrath in his countenance; but Doctor Miles held him by the arm, and Widow Lamb replied, boldly,

"What I said, Mr. Wharton, was, that this lady's pretended marriage with Lord Lenham, then Mr. St. Leger, was no marriage at all."

"But why? were you present? what can you know about it? are you one of the judges of the ecclesiastical court?" asked Mr. Wharton, with amazing volubility.

"I am no judge, and was not present, though I was in the house," answered Widow Lamb; "but it was no marriage at all, and I can prove it: so you need not be terrified, dear young lady, for you are his lawful wife at this very moment."

Charlotte Hay turned toward Isabella with a look of withering scorn, and exclaimed,

"You may be his concubine, girl, if you like; but you can never be his wife as long as I live."

"I say she is his wife," cried Widow Lamb, indignantly, "just as much as you are the wife of Archibald Graham, the minister of Blackford, my husband David Lamb's first cousin. You thought all trace of that marriage was removed; you knew not that there are people living who witnessed the marriage; you knew not that I have your marriage lines now in my possession, and a letter from your real husband, written long after Captain Moreton took you away from him, and after your pretended marriage with this gentleman."

"Produce them, produce them," cried Mr. Wharton; "let us see what these wonderful documents are. Such papers often turn out mere moonshine in a court of law."

"At all events, sir, this church is not a court of law," said Dr. Miles, advancing; "such matters must not be argued here; and I must remark, that, if this lady had any just cause to oppose this marriage, she was bound to state it when called upon in the solemn manner which the ritual prescribes. How the fact of her not having done so may affect the legal questions implicated is not for me to say; but I must declare that her not having tendered her opposition at the proper moment was highly wrong, and does not give a favorable impression to her case."

The lady turned her fierce eyes upon the rector, and then glared over the rest of the party, but seemed without a reply; for she made none. Mr. Wharton came to her assistance—with a falsehood, however.

"The lady was too much overpowered, sir, to speak," he said, "and I was not formally authorized by her to do so. But as to this old woman, I demand that the documents she mentions be produced; for I have every reason to believe that this is a mere pretext—in fact, a case of fraud, originating in conspiracy; and I shall not scruple to give the good lady into custody, if I can find a constable, unless she instantly produces the documents." He looked full at Widow Lamb while he spoke, and then added, "Have you got them? can you produce them?"

"I have not got them here," answered the old woman, in a faltering tone, somewhat alarmed at the threat of a man who had ruined her husband; "but they are safe enough, I am sure, and they shall be produced whenever there is a trial."

"Oh, oh!" cried Mr. Wharton; "what time to manufacture them! But I will take care of you, my good lady. I will see for a constable directly, and—"

"Nonsense, you rogue!" cried Sir John Slingsby; "you know very well that such a thing is out of the question. You can manufacture no charge upon such a ground, whatever others may manufacture."

"Rogue, Sir John!" cried Mr. Wharton, furiously; "that man is the rogue who does not pay his just debts, and you know whether the name applies best to me or to you."

"To you, lawyer Wharton," said Stephen Gimlet, coming up the aisle; "there, hold your tongue, for I heard you talk with Captain Moton this morning, and how you settled all your differences upon his promising you, what you called a post obit bond, to pay you five thousand pounds upon the death of Lord Harcourt Lenham. There, Goody Lamb, there is the letter you gave me yesterday; I'll tell you how it all happened that I could not deliver it, by-and-by."

"Here are the papers, here are the papers!" cried the widow, tearing open the letter; "here are the marriage lines, as the people call them in Scotland, between Charlotte Hay and Archibald Graham; and here is poor Archy's letter to my husband, written long after."

"You had better get into the chaise and go," whispered Mr. Wharton to the lady, who now stood pale and trembling beside him; and then raising his voice, as if to cover her retreat, he continued, "take notice, Sir John Slingsby, and all persons here present, that I charge the noble lord there with the crime of bigamy, in having intermarried with Isabella Slingsby, his wife, Charlotte Hay, being still living; and that I at once pronounce these things, in the old woman's hands, merely forgeries got up between her and Viscount Lenham, while he was staying at the cottage of her son-in-law, Stephen Gimlet, alias Wolf. You will act as you like, Sir John, but it is only a friendly part to say, that if you have any regard for your daughter, you will separate her at once from one who is not and can not be her husband."

Thus saying, he walked with a well assured air to the door of the church, neither turning to the right nor to the left; but the moment he turned away, Ned Hayward quitted the side of Mary Clifford, and, with a quick step, followed the lawyer. He let him pass through the church-yard, and open the gate; but then, going up to one of the post-boys standing by Beauchamp's carriage, the young officer said,

"Lend me your whip one moment."

The man at once put it in his hand, and the next instant it was laid over Mr. Wharton's shoulders some five or six times with rapid and vigorous reiteration.

"I think the price is five pounds," said Ned Hayward, nodding his head to the smarting and astounded attorney; "it is cheap, Mr. Wharton, and perhaps I may require a little more at the same price. Good morning," and he reëntered the church, while the servants and post-boys gave a grand shout, and Mr. Wharton sneaked away, vowing vengeance for a future day.

CHAPTER XLI.

"Come into the vestry," said Dr. Miles, in a low tone, to Beauchamp: "you have many things, my lord, to consider; and we have here the eyes of a multitude upon us, the ears of a multitude around us."

"You had better go back to the Park," said Sir John Slingsby, who had overheard the good old rector's words: "there we can talk the matter over at leisure."

"The register must first be signed," said Dr. Miles, gravely; "for, whatever be the result, the ceremony has been fully performed—come, my lord. The circumstances are, undoubtedly, very painful; but it seems to me they might have been much worse."

With slow steps and sad hearts the whole party followed; Isabella, pale as death, looking down upon the ground, and Beauchamp, with his lip quivering and his brow contracted, but his step firm and regular, as if the very intensity of his feelings had, after the first moment, restored him all his energies. As they passed through the vestry-door Isabella raised her eyes for an instant to his, and saw the deep dejection which was written on his countenance. She touched his arm gently to call his attention, and said, as he bent down his head,

"Do not be so sad; you have nothing to reproach yourself with."

"That is some consolation, dear girl," replied Beauchamp, in a low voice; "but still I must be sad. How can it be otherwise, when I have to part with you for a time, even at the very moment I call you my own?"

Isabella did not reply; but her cheek varied, first glowing warmly, then becoming deadly pale again.

"Where is Ned Hayward?" exclaimed Sir John Slingsby, looking round—"where the devil have you been, Ned?" he continued, seeing his young friend coming in at the vestry-door.

"I have been horsewhipping Wharton," answered Ned Hayward, in an indifferent tone; "but now, Lenham, what are you going to do in this business?"

"To go to London directly," answered Beauchamp, "and bring this matter to an issue at once."

"Pooh, the woman is not married to you at all!" cried Sir John Slingsby—"the whole thing is a farce; still I think you are right."

"I am quite sure you are," said Ned Hayward, "and I will go with you, if you will let me, Lenham. But first we must talk with good Widow Lamb, examine these papers of hers accurately, ascertain exactly all the circumstances, and be prepared with every sort of evidence and information. Cheer up, cheer up, my dear lord. Honor and straightforward dealing always set these things right at last. Shall I call in the old woman? she is standing out there by the vestry-door."

"By all means," said Dr. Miles; "it may be as well to make all these inquiries here, and determine at once what is to be done. The crowd of gaping idlers from Tarningham will disperse in the mean time. Sit down here, Isabella, and be firm, my child; God does not desert those who trust and serve him."

While he was speaking, Ned Hayward had beckoned Widow Lamb and Stephen Gimlet into the vestry; and Dr. Miles, taking the papers from the old woman's hands, examined them carefully.

"The very appearance of these documents," he said at length, "puts the idea of forgery, or, at least, recent forgery, quite out of the question. No art could give all the marks of age which they present. But we can have another and a better assurance, I believe, than the mere look of the papers—"

"But what are they, what are they, doctor?" asked Sir John Slingsby; "I have not yet heard the exact import of either."

Isabella moved nearer to the clergyman while he explained, and all other eyes were fixed eagerly upon him.

"This first and most important document," he said, "purports to be what is called in Scotland the marriage lines of Archibald Graham, student in divinity, and Charlotte Hay, the daughter of Thomas Hay, of Greenbank, deceased, within the precincts of Holyrood—which means, I suppose, that he died in debt. The paper—I have seen such before—is tantamount to a marriage certificate in England. The marriage appears to have been celebrated in one of the parishes of Edinburgh, and I have lately had cause to know that very accurate registers are kept in that city, so that the authenticity of the document can be ascertained beyond all doubt."

"But the date, the date?" cried Beauchamp.

"The date is the 4th February, 18—," said Dr. Miles, "just thirteen years ago last February."

"Nearly two years before the execution of their villainous scheme against me," said the young nobleman; "so far, at least, all is satisfactory; but what is the other paper?"

"Hardly less important," replied Dr. Miles, whose eye had been running over the contents while he conversed, "but it will require some explanation. I would read it aloud, but some of the terms are more plain and straightforward than ladies' ears are accustomed to hear. It is signed Archibald Graham, however, dated five years ago, and addressed to David Lamb, who died in Tarningham some two years back. He speaks of his wife Charlotte, and tells his cousin that he hears she is still living in adultery with Captain Moreton. He says that as her seducer's property is somewhere in this neighborhood she is most likely not far distant, and begs David Lamb to seek her out, and beseech her, upon Christian principles, to quit her abandoned course of life. The good man—and he seems a really good man—says further, that although he can never receive or see her again, he is ready to share his small stipend with her in order that she may not be driven by poverty to a continuance in vice; but he seems to have been ignorant of her pretended marriage with Lord Lenham—at least, he makes no allusion to it."

"That was because he never knew it, sir," said Widow Lamb; "I beg pardon for speaking, but the way it all happened was this. Old Mr. Hay had spent all he had, and had taken to Holyrood to avoid his creditors. Archy Graham, who was then studying divinity in Edinburgh, had been born not far from Greenbank, and finding out Mr. Hay, was very kind to him and his daughter. Though he was not very rich himself—for he was only the son of a farmer well to do—he often gave the old laird and the young lady a dinner when they could have got one nowhere else, and when Mr. Hay was taken ill and dying, he was with him every day comforting him. He paid the doctors, and found them food and everything. When the old man died the young lady was left without any means of support. At first she thought of teaching, for she had learned all kinds of things in other times, but people were not very fond of her, for she had always been too gay for the Scotch folks, and there was something flighty in her way that was not liked. It was need, not love or gratitude either, I believe, that made her marry poor Archy Graham. Soon after he got the parish of Blackford, and went there to have the manse ready, leaving his wife in Edinburgh. He was only gone six weeks, but he never saw her again, for when he came back to take her to her new home, he found that she had been receiving the visits of a very gay gentleman for some time, and had, in the end, gone away with him in a phaeton about a week before he arrived. Eight or nine months after that a gay young lady came to stay on a visit at old Miss Moreton's, with whom my poor husband David Lamb was greeve, or what you call steward in England. I had gone down with her as her maid, and had married the steward about eight years before, for my poor girl Mary was then about seven years old. We saw this Miss Hay, as she called herself, very often, but never thought she was the runaway wife of my husband's cousin. Indeed, we knew little of the story till long after. Captain Moreton was generally at his aunt's house, though he often went away to England, and we all said he was going to marry the pretty young lady, if they were not married already, as some thought. But then he brought over his own cousin Mr. St. Leger with him, and soon after we heard of the marriage by consent when Mr. St. Leger had drank too much, and about his going away in haste to England, and we all said that it was a great shame, though we did not know it was as bad as it was. About four months after, old Miss Moreton died, and one day the captain came down in great haste to my husband and told him a long story about his being on the point of selling the property; but that he would take good care, he said, that David Lamb should not be out of employment, for his father, the Honorable Mr. Moreton, would take him as steward if he would go up to Tarningham directly. My husband said it would be better for him to stay on the ground till Miss Moreton's estate was sold, but the captain seemed in a great hurry to get us off, for he said that his father was very anxious to have a Scotch bailiff as they farmed so well, and he promised all kinds of things, so that what with one persuasion or another we were away in a week to Edinburgh, to take ship there for England. There we met with Archy Graham, who afterward came to visit us, and he and my husband had a long talk about his unfortunate marriage, all of which I heard afterward; but David Lamb was a man of very few words, and he did not mention to his cousin anything about our having seen his wife at old Miss Moreton's, though it seems the minister was even then going down there to try and separate her from Captain Moreton, for he had found by that time who it was that took her away, and it was because he had written several letters to the gentleman, and threatened to come himself directly, that the captain was in such a hurry to get us away to England."

"I do not understand why your husband did not tell the whole truth," said Dr. Miles, gravely, "it might have saved great mischief, Mrs. Lamb."

"I know that, sir," replied the widow, "but there are great differences in the way men think of such things. I asked my husband afterward why he did not mention all about the marriage with Mr. St. Leger, but he said"

wanted to hear more about it before he opened his mouth to any one; that he was not sure they had set up this law marriage as a real marriage at all; and that it might be only a sort of joke, so that if he spoke he might do more mischief than was already done. I knew him to be a very prudent, thoughtful man, very sparing, too, of his words, and it was not for me to blame or oppose him."

"Very true, Mrs. Lamb, very true," said Dr. Miles.

"Well, your reverence," continued the widow, "he did try to hear more of the business as soon as he had time to think of anything but himself and his own affairs; for poor man, when he came here he found that old Mr. Moreton had no occasion for a bailiff at all; and knew nothing at all about him. We were going back to Scotland, again, after having spent a mint of money in coming up to London and then down here; but my husband fell ill of rheumatic fever, and for six months was confined nearly to his bed. All—or almost all that we had saved was gone, and we had to try for a livelihood here as we best could. We did better than might have been expected for some time, and David made many inquiries in regard to his cousin's wife and her second marriage with Mr. St. Leger; but he only heard that the young gentleman was traveling, and that they had certainly never lived together. Then came the letter from Archy Graham; and my husband, whose health was failing, consulted me about it, and I said, that at all events, it was pity Mr. St. Leger or Lord Lenham, as he was by that time, should not know all the truth, for no one could tell how needful it might be for him to prove that he was never really married to Charlotte Hay, and David wrote back to his cousin, asking him to send him up proofs of his marriage with the lady. So that brought up the marriage lines, and I have kept them and the first letter ever since my husband's death."

"And is Archibald Graham still living?" asked Beauchamp, who had been listening with painful attention.

"He was living not two years ago," answered Widow Lamb; "for he wrote to me at the time of my husband's death, and sent me up ten pounds to help me. Poor David had not neglected what he thought of doing, when he asked for the proofs; but we could hear nothing of you, my lord. You had been very kind to my poor boy, and I always put my husband in mind of the business, so that he wrote to you once, I know, saying that he had important information for you if you could come to Tarningham."

"I recollect," said Lord Lenham, "such a letter followed me into Italy; but I did not recollect the name, and thought it but a trick of that unhappy woman."

"Well, my lord, the case seems very clear," said Doctor Miles; "but your immediate conduct in this business may require some consideration. Perhaps we had better all go up to the Park and talk the matter over with Sir John at leisure."

"No, my dear sir," answered Beauchamp in a firm tone, "my conduct is already decided. If you please, we will just walk to your house for a few minutes, I dare say all the people are gone by this time. Come, Isabella, there will be peace for us yet, dear one;" and he gave his arm to his bride, who drew down her veil to hide the tears that were in her eyes.

All the party moved forward but Sir John Slingsby, who lingered for a moment, and laid his hand kindly upon the widow's arm. "You are a good woman, Mrs. Lamb," said the old baronet, "a very good woman; and I am much obliged to you. Go up to the Park, Mrs. Lamb, and take the little boy with you. I'll come up and talk to you by-and-by; but mind you tell the housekeeper to take good care of the little man, and give him a hunch of bride-cake. I don't think there will be much eaten in the house by any one else. You go up too, Ste, and wait till I come."

When Sir John followed to the rectory, which was somewhat slowly, he found the rest of the party in the rector's drawing-room. Now the house was built upon a plan not uncommon, and very convenient for studious bachelors like Dr. Miles. The drawing-room on the right side of the entrance-hall opened by folding-doors into a library, which formed a right angle with it running along the back front of the house—for houses have contradictions as well as human beings, and I may add many a man has a back front to his character as well as many a house. The library occupied one half of that side, the dining-room the other half; the offices all the left of the entrance-hall, and the hall and the stair-case the center.

Beauchamp, at the moment of the baronet's entrance, was speaking to Dr. Miles and Ned Hayward in the bay window, Isabella was seated at some distance with her hand in her aunt's, and Mary Clifford was leaning tenderly over her. But the position of all parties was soon changed.

"The sooner the better, then," said Dr. Miles, in answer to something Beauchamp had said; and turning away, the young nobleman approached Isabella, and took her hand, saying, "Speak with me one moment, love."

Isabella rose, and her husband led her into the library, and thence to the dining-room, leaving the doors open behind him. "Dearest Isabella," he said, "forgive me for all the terrible pain I have caused you—but you know it was that I was deceived, and that for the world I would not have inflicted such distress upon you intentionally."

"Oh, I know it, I know it," said the poor girl, her tears flowing fast.

"But out of evil springs good, dear Isabella," continued Beauchamp: "by this day's misery and anxiety, I trust we have purchased peace and happiness for the future. Yet for me, my beloved, remains one more painful effort. Till the decision of the law is pronounced upon all the circumstances of this case, I must leave you, dear girl. No happiness that your society can give me must induce me to place you in a doubtful position. I must leave you, then, my dear Isabella, my bride, my wife, even here almost at the steps of the altar; but I go to remove every obstacle to our permanent reunion, and I trust in a very few weeks to clasp you to my heart again, mine beyond all doubt—mine forever. I knew not, dear girl—I hardly knew till now how dearly, how passionately I loved you, but I find from the difficulty of parting with you, from the agony of this moment, what it is to love with the whole heart. That very love, however, requires me to go. Therefore, for a short, a very short time, farewell, my love;" and he threw his arms around her, and pressed one kiss upon her lips.

"Oh, do not go, do not go yet," said Isabella, clinging to him. "Oh, I was so happy this morning, Henry, I felt quite oppressed with it. I am sure there is a dizziness of the heart as well as of the brain—but now I shall go home and weep all day."

"Nay, do not do that, dear girl," said Beauchamp, "for our parting is but for a short time, beloved. Every one judges that I am right in going. Do not let me think my Isabella thinks otherwise, do not render more bitter what is bitter enough already, by a knowledge that you are suffering more than is needful. Cheer thee, my Isabella, cheer thee, and do not give way to grief and apprehension, when our fate is lightened of half of its weight, by the certainty, the positive certainty, that there is no serious barrier between us."

"I will try," said Isabella, "I will try; and I believe you are right, but still this is all very sad," and the tears poured down her face afresh.

When Beauchamp came forth, however, Isabella came with him, and was calmer; but she would not trust herself to speak till he was gone. The parting was then soon over. Ned Hayward called up the carriage, gave some directions regarding his own baggage to Sir John Slingsby's servants, and bade farewell to Mary Clifford and the rest. Beauchamp once more pressed Isabella's hand in his, and hurrying out sprang into the carriage, Ned Hayward followed, and one of the post-boys, approaching the side after a servant had shut the door, touched his hat and asked, "Will you go by Winterton or Buxton's Inn, my lord?"

"By Winterton," answered Beauchamp, mechanically, and in another minute the carriage was rolling on.

For about twenty minutes Sir John Slingsby remained talking with Dr. Miles, and then the party which had set out from Tarningham Park, so happy and so gay, not two hours before, returned sad and desolate. Even the old baronet's good spirits failed him, but his good-humor did not; and while Isabella retired with Mary to her own room, he called Widow Lamb and Stephen Gimlet into his library, after having assured himself that the little boy was taken good care of by the housekeeper; he repeated his sage commendation of the old woman's conduct, saying, "You are a good woman, Widow Lamb, a very good woman, and you have rendered very excellent service to us all this day. Now I am not so rich as I could wish to be just now; but I can tell you what I can do, and what I will do, Widow Lamb. Stephen has here, his cottage as keeper. It is a part of his wages at present; but I might die, you know, or the property might be sold, Widow Lamb, and then those who came in might turn you out. Now I'll give you a lease of the cottage and the little garden, and the small field at the side—they call it the six-acres field, though there are but five acres and two roods, and the lease shall run for your two lives. You may put in the little man's life, too, if you like; and the rent shall be a crown a-year, Widow Lamb. I'll have it done directly. I'll write to Bacon to draw the lease this minute," and down sat Sir John Slingsby to his library table.

"I beg your pardon, sir," said Stephen Gimlet, approaching with a respectful bow, "but I think it would be better not to give the lease, just yet, though both I and Goody Lamb are very much obliged; but you recollect what that bad fellow, attorney Wharton, said about the papers being forged, and if you were to give us anything just now, he would declare we were bribed; for he is a great rascal, sir, as I heard this morning."

"You are right, you are quite right, Stephen," replied Sir John Slingsby; "and Wharton is a great rascal. I am glad that Ned Hayward horsewhipped him; I dare say he did it well, for he is a capital fellow, Ned Hayward, and always liked horsewhipping a scoundrel from a boy. But what is it you overheard this morning, Stephen? I hope you were not eaves-dropping, Ste. That is not right, you know."

"Not I, Sir John," answered the gamekeeper, "but I could not help hearing. I'll tell you how it all was in a minute. Yesterday morning I was coming over here with the papers which Goody Lamb gave me for Lord Lenham; but I took a bit of a stroll first, and just when I was close upon Chandleigh-heath, Captain Moreton jumped out of a hedge upon me in front, and young Harry Wittingham pinioned my arms behind, and before I could do anything for myself, they had a rope tight round my elbows, and got me away to the lone cottage, where they shut me up in a room with bars to the windows, and kept me there all day and all last night. I did not sleep much, and I did not eat much, though the captain crammed some bread into my mouth, and gave me a pail of water, out of which I was obliged to drink like a horse; but they never untied my arms. However, I heard a good deal of going about, and a carriage-wheels, and some time after—it must have been twelve or one o'clock at night—there was a great ringing at the bell, and people talking, and I heard young Wittingham's voice, and then some one galloped away on horseback. But nobody came to let me out, and I sat and looked at the day dawning, wondering when all this would come to an end. I looked long enough, however, before I saw a living soul, though, about six, I heard people moving in the house. About an hour after I saw poor Billy Lamb out of the window, creeping about in the garden as if he was on the lookout for something, and I put my foot to one of the panes of glass, and started it in a minute. That was signal enough for the good lad, and he ran up and put his face to the window, whispering to me to make no noise, for Captain Moreton had just come in in a gig, and had met Mr. Wharton at the door, and they were both in the drawing-room together. I was not going to stay there, however, like a rat in a trap, a minute longer than needful; so as soon as I found that Bill had his knife in his pocket, I made him put his arm through the broken pane, and cut the cords round my elbows. I then got his knife to open the door, but the one I came in by was bolted as well as locked, so I couldn't get out that way. But there was another door at the side, and I forced the lock back there soon enough. That let me into the dining-room, which had two doors too. Through one of them I could hear people talking loud, and the other was locked. I could not manage to open it, and though I had a great longing to go in and give Captain Moreton a good hiding, yet as they were two to one, and I was half-starved, I thought it might not turn out well, and stayed quiet where I was. Then I heard them talking, and Wharton said he could hang the captain; and I thought it very likely. But the captain said to do that would put nothing in Wharton's pocket, and he had better take his post obit, as he called it, for £5000, which would give him a chance of something, and come over with him to Winterton, and keep the lady quiet if she would go to the church. There was a good deal of dirty haggling about it, but I made out that the woman whom he called Charlotte was going to be at the wedding, and that she had a great spite at his lordship, and I guessed all about the rest from what Goody Lamb had told me. So as soon as they had gone off in the gig together, which was not more than two or three minutes after, I walked out through the drawing-room, half-scared the servant-girl into fits, and came away to little Tarningham church, sending Billy Lamb up to my cottage. That is the whole story, sir."

The old baronet commended his keeper highly and vaticinated that attorney Wharton would be hanged some day, in which, however, he was mistaken, for that gentleman lived and prospered; and his tombstone assures the passer-by that he died universally regretted and respected!

The day passed heavily at Tarningham Park, and Isabella remained all the morning in her own room. It was a very bitter cup that she had to drink; for to apprehension and disappointment was added another painful sensation. To her it was inexpressibly distressing to be made the talk of the common public. She had felt that the very announcement of her marriage in the public newspapers, the gazing crowd in the church, the spectacle and the publicity, in fact, which attend such events, were anything but pleasant. But now to be the topic of conversation, the object of tales and rumors, to be pitied, commiserated, perhaps triumphed over—be even slandered, added deeply to all she suffered both on Beauchamp's account and her own. However, she made a great effort to conquer at least the natural expression of her feelings. She knew that her father, her aunt, her cousin, all felt deeply for her, and she was resolved to cause them as little pain as possible by the sight of her own. She washed away all traces of tears, she calmed her look, she strove not to think of her mortification, and at the dinner-hour she went down with a tranquil air. Her room was on the side of the house opposite to the terrace, and the principal entrance, but she had to pass the latter in her way to the drawing-room. As she did so, she saw a carriage and post-horses at the door, and as she approached the drawing-room, she heard a voice loved and well known. She darted forward and entered the room. Beauchamp and Captain Hayward were both there, as well as her father and Mary Clifford. The very effort to conquer her own feelings had exhausted her strength, and joy did what sorrow had not been able to do. Ere she had taken two steps forward, she wavered, and, ere Beauchamp could reach her, had fallen fainting to the ground.

CHAPTER XLII.

With bitter disappointment at his heart; with the dark shadow which had hung so long over his existence, turning all the rosy hopes of life to the leaden gray of the grave, now returned after a brief period of brighter expectations; with the cup of joy snatched from his hand at the very moment he was raising it to his lips, Beauchamp leaned back in his carriage, and gave himself up for a few minutes to deep and sorrowful meditation. He remembered well when first the feeling of love was springing up in his heart toward Isabella Slingsby; that upon mature consideration of his fate he had determined to crush it in the bud, to batter down the fountain of sweet waters, which he feared some malific power would turn to poison, and never attempt to link the fate of that dear girl to his sorrowful one, even by the gentle tie of mutual affection; and now he almost regretted that he had not kept his resolution. It is true, circumstances had changed; it is true, there were good hopes that the evil star of his destiny seemed likely to sink, and a brighter one to rise; but yet a mind long accustomed to disappointment and sorrow, can with difficulty be brought to listen to the voice of hope without having the warning tongue of fear at the same time. All seemed to promise well for the removal of that heavy weight which had oppressed his heart, kept down his energies, crushed love and joy, and left him naught in life but solitude, and disappointment, and despair. But still his experience of the past taught him to expect so little from the future, that he dared not indulge in one vision of relief, and although he had used the words of hope to Isabella, he could not apply the balm to his own wound.

Ned Hayward sat beside him quietly, and let him think for about ten minutes; and he did so for two reasons. In the first place, he knew that it was very vain to offer consolation so soon after a bitter mortification had been received; and, in the next place, he did not wish to rouse his companion from the reverie till they had passed Tarningham Park; for he judged that the sight of scenes, associated in memory with happy hopes now removed afar, would only add poignancy to disappointment. However, when the park was passed (and the four horses went at a very rapid rate), he commenced the conversation in a way the most likely to lead Beauchamp's mind from the more painful points of his situation, to fix them upon those more favorable.

"Of course, Lenham," he said, with an abruptness that made his companion start, "before you act even in the slightest particular, you will consult some counsel learned in the law. This seems a case in which, with proper management, you have the complete command over your own fate; but where a few false steps might be very detrimental, so far, at least, as delaying the determination of the affair for some months."

"I know not, my dear Hayward," answered Lord Lenham, "how this may turn out; but circumstances have rendered me, once the most hopeful and light-hearted of human beings, the most desponding. I have a sort of impression upon me, that the result will not be so favorable as you anticipate. I have to oppose long practiced cunning and the most unscrupulous use of every means, however base and wrong. I must remember, too, that this business has been long plotting, and depend upon it, that nothing which a perverted human mind could do to obliterate every trace of this former marriage has been left undone. Depend upon it the conspiracy has been going on for some time, and that the concealment of this woman's existence has been intentional and systematic. In fact nothing could be more artful, nothing more base, but nothing more evidently prearranged than all the steps which they have taken within the last two or three months. Even on the very sale of her goods, which took place in Paris about a month ago, it was announced by public advertisement that they had been the property of the late Charlotte Hay, Lady Lenham. I am afraid neither I nor any lawyer, however shrewd, will be found equal to encounter this woman, whose cunning and determination I never knew matched."

"She seems a precious virago indeed," said Ned Hayward; "but never you fear, my dear lord. I don't set up to be a Solomon, but there's a maxim which I established when I was very young, and which I have seen break down very much less frequently than most of his proverbs, that will go in your favor, if we but manage properly. It is this: 'Rogues always forget something.' Depend upon it, it will hold good in this instance. Indeed we see that it has; for these good folks forgot completely the marriage certificate in the hands of Goody Lamb. Doubtless that certificate will be easily verified, so as to put its authenticity beyond all doubt; then nothing will remain but to prove the existence of your predecessor in the fair lady's affections at a period subsequent to her pretended marriage with yourself."

"That may be difficult to do," said Beauchamp.

"Not in the least," cried Ned Hayward. "He has written to the good old widow within two years, it seems. Of course they will try to shake her testimony; and, though I don't think that can be done, we must be prepared with other witnesses. Now, you and I don't, in the least, doubt the old woman's story; and, if that story is true, her husband's cousin, this fair lady's husband, was living, and the clergyman of a place called Blackford, not two years ago. Every body in his parish will know whether this is true or not, and a Scotch minister's life is not usually so full of vicissitudes as to admit the possibility of a difficulty in identifying that Archibald Graham, of Blackford, was the husband of Charlotte Hay."

"You should have been a lawyer, Hayward," said Beauchamp, with a faint smile; "at all events, you prove a very excellent counselor for my hopes against my fears."

"A lawyer! Heaven forefend!" exclaimed Ned Hayward, laughing; "a soldier is a much better thing, Lenham; ay, and I believe, when he knows his profession, more fit to cope with a lawyer than almost any one else. It is alway his business to mark well every point of hi. position, to guard well every weak part; and then. having taken all his precautions, he advances straightforward at the enemy's works, looking sharp about him that he be not taken in flank, and he is almost sure to carry the field, if his cause be good, his heart strong, and his army true."

Such conversation was not without its effect upon Beauchamp's mind. Hope is the next thing to happiness; and hope returned, becoming every moment more and more vigorous, from the cheerful and sanguine character of his companion. At length Ned Hayward looked out at the window, exclaiming,

"Here we are coming to Winterton, I suppose, where we change horses. Devil take those post-boys; if they go at that rate through the crowd, they will be over some fellow or another."

"Crowd," said Beauchamp; and he, too, put his head to the window.

The little solitary inn at Winterton-cum-Snowblast was on the side of the road next to Ned Hayward, but when Lord Lenham, leaning forward, looked out, he saw some forty or fifty people, principally country folks, ostlers, and post-boys, collected round the door of the house. There was a sprinkling of women among the various groups into which they had fallen, and in the midst appeared a common post-chaise with the horses out, while a man, on horseback, was seen riding away at a jolting canter.

"There's something the matter here," said Beauchamp; "I will tell one of the servants to ask."

As he spoke, the chaise dashed on toward the inn-door, and Ned Hayward's prediction of the consequences likely to ensue had nearly been verified, for so eagerly were many persons in the crowd engaged in conversation, that they did not change their position until the last moment, and then a general scattering took place, which, in its haste and confusion, had well nigh brought more than one man or woman under the feet of the leaders.

"Horses on," cried the wheel post-boy, as he drove up, speaking to the ostler of the inn, whose natural predilection for post-horses called his attention to the carriage sooner than that of any other person in the crowd.

"We ha'n't got two pair in," he said, in reply, "without that pair which is just off the shay; we ha' been obliged to send off one this minute to the magistrates about all this here business."

"What is the matter, my man!" said Ned Hayward, out of the carriage window; "what business is it you are talking of!"

"I had better call master, sir," said the ostler, pulling the brim of his old hat, with a somewhat renitent look, as if he did not like to answer the question; "he'll be here in a minute."

"This seems something strange," said Beauchamp; "we had better get out and see. Open the door, Harrison."

The servant, who was standing with his hand upon the silver knob of the carriage-door, instantly did as he was ordered, and threw down the steps with a degree of vehemence customary to lackeys and serviceable to coachmakers. Ned Hayward, being next to the door, got out first, and as he put his right foot to the ground, the landlord of the inn came up, bowing low to the first occupant of a carriage which had two servants behind and a coronet on the panel. The bow would have been much more moderate to a simple yellow post-chaise.

"What is the matter here, landlord? Has any accident happened?"

"Why, yes, my lord," replied the landlord, supposing our friend to be the proprietor of the vehicle, "a terrible accident, too; that is to say, not exactly, either; for it is clear enough the thing was done on purpose by some one, who, it is not for me to say till the magistrates come."

"But what is it? what is it?" said Beauchamp, who followed; "you seem to be very mysterious."

"Why, you see, my lord," replied the landlord, who thought he could not be far wrong in honoring both gentlemen with the same title, "it's an awkward business, and one does not like to say much; but the gentleman got his throat cut, that's certain; and whether he did it himself, or whether the lady did it for him, seems a question. All I can say is, I saw him sound asleep on the sofa five minutes before she came back. He had a glass of brandy-and-water, and two fried eggs, just after she went away with attorney Wharton, and seemed quite in his right mind then, only a little tired with sitting up so late last night and getting up so early this morning; but you don't seem well, sir," he continued, seeing Beauchamp turn a look to the countenance of Ned Hayward, with a cheek that had become as pale as death; "had not you better come in and take something?"

"Presently, presently," said Beauchamp; "go on—what were you saying?"

"Nothing, sir, but the lady seems dreadfully wild, and I can't help thinking she's out of her mind; I always did for that matter."

"Is the gentleman dead?" asked Beauchamp, in a low tone.

"No, sir, not quite dead," said the landlord, "and the surgeon is a-sewing up of his throat; but it's no good, I'm sure, for the room is all in a slop of blood."

"Do you know his name?" said Beauchamp.

"Why, Captain Moreton, I believe, sir," said the landlord; "I've heard so; I don't know it for certain."

"I will go in and see him," said the young nobleman; and he added, seeing a look of hesitation on the landlord's countenance, "I am his first cousin, sir; my name is Lord Lenham."

The announcement removed all doubt upon the good man's mind, and Beauchamp and Ned Hayward walked forward into the inn, guided by the landlord. He conducted them at once up stairs to the rooms which had been occupied by Captain Moreton and Charlotte Hay. At one of the doors on the landing-place, they saw a man standing with his arms folded on his chest; but the landlord led them past to the room in front of the house, first entering quietly himself. It was a ghastly and horrible scene which presented itself, when Beauchamp and Ned Hayward could see into the room. The floor, the carpet, the sofa, were literally drenched with gore; and even the white window-curtains were spotted with dark red drops. On the sofa, with an old white-headed man, and a younger one leaning over him, was the tall, powerful frame of Captain Moreton. His face was as pale as death; his eyes sunk in his head, with a livid blue color spreading all round them. His temples seemed as if they had been driven in; the features were pinched and sharp; the eyelids closed; and the only sign of life apparent was a slight spasmodic movement of the muscles of the face, when the hand of the surgeon gave him pain in the operation he was busily performing. Two or three other persons were in the room, among whom was the landlord's wife; but they all kept at a distance, and the man himself advanced to the surgeon's side, and whispered a word in his ear.

"Presently, presently," said the old gentleman, "it will be done in a minute;" but Captain Moreton opened his eyes and turned them round in the direction of the door. It is probable that he did not see his cousin, for they closed again immediately, but nevertheless his lips moved as if he fain would have said something. Beauchamp did not advance till the old surgeon raised his head, and the young man who was assisting him took his hands from the patient's arms. Then, however, Lord Lenham moved forward, and in a low tone asked the medical man the extent of the injury. At the same moment Ned Hayward, judging that his presence there was useless, if not inconvenient, advanced to a door at the farther side of the room, saying to a person whom he instantly judged to be the mistress of the house,

"I think we had all better go in here for a minute or two."

"The lady is in there, sir," said the landlady; "we have put somebody in to watch her, for Heaven knows what she may do next."

Nevertheless, Ned Hayward, who thought that perhaps some information valuable to his friend might be obtained, opened the door to go in; but the sight he beheld made him suddenly pause, though it had none of those very striking and horrible objects which were presented by the chamber he was just quitting. Yet there was something still, quiet, and awful about its dark features, which perhaps affected the mind still more. The room was a bedroom with one window and a door, which Captain Hayward easily distinguished as that at which he had seen a man standing on the outside. On the end of the bed sat Charlotte Hay, dressed exactly as he had seen her in the church, and nearer to him appeared a strong dull-looking young man seated in a chair, with a constable's staff in his hand. The unhappy woman's position was calm and easy, and she sat perfectly motionless, with her high color unchanged, her hands resting clasped together on her knee, her head slightly bent forward, and her eye with the peculiar dull glassy film over it, which we have already mentioned more than once, fixed earnestly upon the floor. She seemed in deep thought, but yet not the thought of intelligence.

but rather the dreamy, idle, vacant pondering of mental imbecility. There was an undefinable something that to the eye at once distinguished her state from that of deep reflection, and a curl of the lip, not quite a smile, yet resembling one, seemed to mark out the idiot. The shutters of one of the two windows were closed, so that the room was in a sort of half-light, yet on the spot to which the gaze of Charlotte Hay seemed attached the sunshine was streaming gaily, and the contrast between her fate, her prospects, her history, and the warm, pure light of heaven, was more painful than the harmonizing gloom of the dungeon could have been.

When the door was opened by Ned Hayward, though it creaked, as inn-doors will do, upon its hinges, she took not the slightest notice; indeed, she seemed unconscious of every thing; but the constable who had been placed to watch her rose and advanced toward the door to say that nobody could have admission there.

"When the justices come, sir," he said, addressing the young officer in a low tone, "they can do as they like, but nobody shall speak with her till then."

As he uttered these words he heard a slight sound and turned his head, but he turned it too late. Charlotte Hay had instantly taken advantage of his eyes being withdrawn. She was already near the window, which was partly open, and as he darted across to lay hold of her she threw it up, and with one leap sprang out. Ned Hayward instantly closed the door that no sound might reach the other room, and ran forward to the young man's side, who stood with his head leaning out and his eyes gazing down below. The house was built on a slight slope, so that the back was a story higher than the front, yet the height from the window to the stable-yard could not be more than twenty feet, but the court was paved with large irregular stones, and there lay the form of Charlotte Hay still, motionless, and silent. No groan reached the ears of those who looked down from above—not even a quiver of the limbs was to be seen. Some of the men in the yard were running up in haste, and the young officer and the constable hurried down. It mattered little, however, whether they went fast or slow, for when they reached the yard they found three men lifting a corpse. Ned Hayward gazed upon that countenance where fierce and untamable passions had nearly obliterated mere beauty of feature, but no trace of passion was there now. All was mournfully calm, and though the eyelids moved once up and down, there was naught in the eyes when they were for an instant displayed but the glassy stare of death. The bonnet, which was still upon her head, was dented in at the top, and a small red stain in the white silk showed where the blood was issuing slowly forth from some hidden wound received in the fall.

They carried her slowly into the house, and placed her on a sofa in what was called the parlor, while Ned Hayward ran up stairs to call down the surgeon. When he opened the door, the elderly man whom we have mentioned was washing his hands at the table, and Beauchamp was seated by the sofa on which his cousin lay, bending down his ear to catch the faint words of the wounded man, who seemed speaking to him eagerly.

The surgeon raised his eyes as the door opened, and perceiving the sign which Ned Hayward made to him to come out, dried his hands in haste and went to the door.

"You must come down directly," said the young officer; "the unhappy woman has thrown herself out of the window, and though I believe all human aid is in vain, yet it is necessary that some surgeon should see her at once."

The old man nodded his head with a grave look, returned for his instruments which were on the table, and then followed down to the parlor. He paused a moment by the side of the sofa, and gazed upon the face of Charlotte Hay with a thoughtful air, then placed his hand upon the wrist for a few seconds, withdrew it, and said aloud,

"I can be of no use here—life is extinct. I will examine the head, however," and taking off the bonnet and cap he pointed with his finger to a spot on the back of the skull, where the dark brown hair was matted and dabbled, saying, "Look there! I cannot make a new brain."

Ned Hayward turned away with a slight shudder, for though he had faced death many a time himself, and had seen men fall dead or wounded by his side, he had never beheld a woman subject to the fate which man is accustomed to brave.

"This is a terrible business altogether, sir," said the surgeon, following the young officer to the window; "do you know anything of it?"

"Nothing," replied Captain Hayward, "except that I believe the unhappy woman was mad, for her conduct through life was that of a person hardly sane. Do you think Captain Moreton likely to live?"

"Three or four hours, perhaps," replied the surgeon, "certainly not more. She did her work very resolutely and with a strong hand. The hemorrhage cannot be entirely stopped; he has already lost an awful quantity of blood, and he will sink gradually."

"Then you think that there is no doubt of her hand having done the deed?" asked Ned Hayward.

But the surgeon would not exactly commit himself as far as that.

"He did not do it himself," was the reply, "that is quite impossible. The wound is from left to right, and drawn so far round that he could not have inflicted it with his own hand. He must have been lying on the sofa, too, when it was done—probably asleep, for the stroke of the razor was carried beyond the neck of the victim, and cut the horse-hair cover through and through. The gentleman up stairs with him is his cousin, I believe?"

"I believe so," answered Ned Hayward; "but I am not acquainted with your patient, and therefore cannot say exactly."

The next moment steps were heard coming down, and Beauchamp and the landlord entered the parlor.

"Will you have the goodness to go up to Captain Moreton, sir," said the young nobleman, addressing the surgeon, before he saw what the room contained, "the bleeding from the throat has recommenced, and nearly suffocates him. Hayward, I must stay till this is over," he continued, as the old gentleman hurried away; but then his eyes fell upon the sofa, and he caught Ned Hayward's arm, and grasped it tight without uttering a word. For a moment or two he stood motionless, as if turned into stone by the sight before him, and then walking slowly up to the side of the corpse, he gazed long and earnestly upon the face. His feelings must have been strange during that long, silent pause. There before him lay the being who had been the bane of his peace during all the early brighter years of life; the woman who, without ever having obtained the slightest hold of those affections by which the heart, when they are misplaced, is usually most terribly tortured, had, by one infamous and daring act, acquired the power of imbittering every moment of his existence. The long, dreadful consequences of one youthful error were at end, the dark cloud was wafted away, the heavy chain broken. He was free! but by what horrible events was his liberation accomplished! What a price of blood and guilt had they who had enthralled him paid for their temporary triumph ending in complete defeat! He could not but feel, that by the death of that woman, sunshine was restored to his path, and yet pain and horror at the means of his restoration to light and happiness quelled every sensation of rejoicing. Mingled as almost all human feelings are, perhaps never did man's heart experience such mixed emotions.

After what seemed a long time to give to any contemplation, he turned toward Captain Hayward, inquiring, in a low tone,

"How did this happen, Hayward, and when?"

"A few minutes ago," replied his friend; "the constable who was watching her came to the door to speak with me, and taking advantage of his back being turned she threw herself out of the window. Perhaps, Lenham," he continued, with that good feeling which always in matters of deep interest sprang up through the lighter things of Ned Hayward's character—"perhaps it is better that this is as it is. The act was undoubtedly committed in a state of mind which rendered her irresponsible for her own conduct. Had she survived, her fate might have been more terrible, considering another deed in regard to which it might have been difficult to prove her insanity."

"God's will be done," said Beauchamp; "that unhappy man is in no fit state to die, and yet I fear death is rapidly approaching. All his hatred of myself seems to have given place to the implacable desire of vengeance against this poor tool of his own schemes. He says that there is no doubt that she committed the act; that he was sleeping on the sofa, having sat up late last night and risen early this morning, and suddenly found a hand pressed upon his eyes and a sharp instrument drawn furiously across his throat. He started up, crying for help, and beheld the wretched woman with the razor in her hand, laughing, and asking if he would ever betray her secrets again. It is, in truth, a terrible affair; but I fear his deposition must be taken, and if he is to be believed she must have been perfectly sane."

"I wonder if she was ever perfectly sane?" said Ned Hayward; "from all I have heard I should doubt it—but here comes one of the magistrates, I suppose, or the coroner."

It proved to be the former, and the worthy justice first entered the parlor and examined the corpse of Charlotte Hay as it still remained stretched upon the sofa. Country justices will have their jests upon almost all subjects, and though he did it quietly, the gentleman in question could not refrain from saying, after looking at the body for a moment,

"Well, we are not likely to obtain any information from this lady, so we had better see the other person, who is capable of being more communicative. Which is the way, landlord! Have this room cleared and the door locked till the coroner can come, he will take the evidence in this case. I must get, if possible, the deposition of the gentleman whom you say is dying."

Thus saying, with the landlord leading the way, and Beauchamp, Ned Hayward, and one or two others following, he walked slowly up stairs and entered the room where Captain Moreton lay. The surgeon was bending over him and holding his head up on his left arm. But the moment the old man heard the bustle of many feet, he waved his right hand as if to forbid any one to approach. Everybody paused for an instant, and in the midst of the silence that ensued an awful and very peculiar sound was heard, something like that made by a horse taking a draught of water, but not so long and regular. It ceased, began again, and ceased; and the surgeon laid Captain Moreton's hand down upon the sofa-cushion and looked round.

The magistrate instantly advanced, saying,

"I must take the gentleman's deposition, Mr. Abbot."

"You come a little too late, sir," said the surgeon: "he will make no more depositions now."

It was, indeed, as he said. Captain Moreton had just expired; and all that remained for the magistrate, who was soon joined by one of his worshipful brethren, was to gain all the information that could be obtained from the persons in the house regarding the deaths of Charlotte Hay and her paramour. Beauchamp and Ned Hayward answered the questions which were addressed to them, but entered into no unnecessary details. The rest of those who were called upon to give evidence, or volunteered it, were much more garrulous; and as the two gentlemen remained to hear the whole depositions they were detained for some hours at Winterton.

When all was at length over, and Lord Lenham and Ned Hayward stood before the inn-door, they gazed at each other for a moment or two without speaking. At length Beauchamp's servant came up from the side of the carriage, which, having been ordered some time before, was before the house, and inquired, in a commonplace tone,

"Where shall I tell them to drive, my lord?"

There was a momentary look of hesitation in the young nobleman's face, but the next instant he answered in a decided tone,

"To Tarningham Park," and turning to his friend as soon as they were once more in the vehicle, he said, with a sigh,

"I will at least carry her the tidings, Hayward, and then—"

He paused, and Ned Hayward asked, in his usual cheerful tone,

"And what then, Lenham?"

"Once more on the way to London," said Beauchamp, adding gravely, but firmly, "there must not be a doubt in her mind as to the validity of her marriage. I know how one drop of such bitterness can poison the whole cup of joy; but tell me, Hayward," he continued in a more cheerful tone, "when is your own marriage to take place? You have told me nothing of it yet, but you must not suppose that my eyes have been shut either yesterday or this morning."

"I did not mention it because I imagined that you had enough to think of, Lenham," answered Ned Hayward, "not from either want of frankness or want of regard, believe me. But to answer your question—the day is not yet fixed. Mrs. Clifford has consented much more readily than I expected, Sir John when he heard of it was overjoyous, and Mary's two guardians, knowing that their power is soon coming to an end, have determined to use it leniently. Heaven only knows when we first became acquainted, about three months ago, by the side of Mrs. Clifford's carriage, that therein was my future bride. Had I known that I stood in peril of love, and that with an heiress, too, I believe I should have turned my horse's head and galloped all the way back to London. Nay, more, there has not been a day during the last month, till about a fortnight ago, that finding myself in imminent danger, I have not been ready to depart, but circumstances — circumstances, my dear Lenham, those chains of adamant, kept me here till one day, without at all intending it, I told the dear girl I loved her, and she bade me stay, so I had nothing to do but to obey, and now I think in three weeks more, thoughtless Ned Hayward will be the husband of the sweetest and loveliest girl in the world."

"With one exception," said Beauchamp, smiling; "and one of the best husbands in the world will he make her. But one thing more let me say, Hayward: as little as you thought of finding marriage on your onward path when first we met, so little did I think of finding friendship, as little did I hope for or even wish it; and yet there is naught on earth I value more than yours except the love of her I love best. Should the sage lawyers have a doubt as to the validity of my marriage with Isabella, should they even think it better that the ceremony be repeated, with the fair lady's leave we will choose the same day, and stand at the altar like brothers, as we have been to one another for some time past."

CHAPTER THE LAST.

SWEEPING OUT THE BALL-ROOM.

Beauchamp and Isabella were left alone together for a few minutes before dinner, for Sir John Slingsby and the rest of the party were considerate. She lay upon the sofa, still weak from the effects of the fainting fit into which she had fallen, and Beauchamp sat beside her, holding her hand in his. He had told her all that happened, gently and kindly, not dwelling upon dark and horrible particulars, but showing her simply that the aspect of their fate was altered. He then went on to tell her his plans, informing her that it was his intention that night to set off once more for London, in order to ascertain, by the best legal opinions he could obtain, whether their marriage was really valid, and, in case of finding that there was even a doubt on the subject, to have the ceremony performed again; but Isabella changed all his purposes.

"Beauchamp," she said, for so she still always called him, "I think I know you love me, and will not refuse me a request. It is this:—Do not go to London at all; do not make any inquiries about the validity of our marriage. Look upon it as invalid, and let it be renewed. In a few weeks, a very few weeks, Mary is going to give her hand to your friend Captain Hayward. Let us wait till then, and go with them to the altar. There may be some painful circumstances to me, some painful memories. I do not love to be made the subject of conversation and gossip, and in the church the scene of this morning will come terribly back to my mind; but in the mean time you will be with me every day, and that will compensate for a great deal."

So it was arranged; and in six weeks from that time the two cousins were united to the men whom they loved. Difficulties and dangers have their interest in telling; calm and tranquil happiness has too few incidents for record. Ned Hayward and Mary took up their abode with Mrs. Clifford, and the fair bride had never any cause to repent that she had discovered in her husband something deeper, finer, nobler than those who had given him the name of thoughtless Ned Hayward. Certainly there were some changes came over him. He was as cheerful, as sunshiny, as frank and ready as ever; but he was not quite so fond of fishing, shooting, and hunting. He liked a quiet walk or ride with Mary better. He found out for himself a new employment also, and devoted a great part of his time to the regulation of Sir John Slingsby's affairs, easily gaining his old friend's consent, upon the plea that he wanted occupation. His rapid perception of the bearing of all things submitted to him, his strong good sense, and quick, resolute decision, soon brought those affairs into a very different condition from that in which he found them; and Sir John Slingsby found that, by proper regulation, with an income diminished by the careless extravagance of many years, he had really more to spend than when his revenue was nominally much larger.

Isabella and Beauchamp were as happy as the reader has already judged they would be. He was looked upon by his acquaintances as a grave and somewhat stern man; but Isabella had reason to know, that in domestic life he was cheerful, gentle, and kind; for it was only in the heartless bustle and senseless chatter of ordinary society that there came over him a shadow from the long consequences of one only error.

We have but few other characters to dispose of. Mr. Wharton's history has already been told. Mr. Bacon did much better in life than might have been expected. Although he was an honest man, he met with a tolerable degree of success, strange to say. Aiding Ned Hayward in the regulation of Sir John Slingsby's affairs, he became, in the end, a sort of agent or law-steward to the baronet. Beauchamp, who bought the Moreton property in the end, employed him in the same capacity; and two other gentlemen in the county, finding that matters throve in his hands, made him their agent also. He never gave them any cause to complain, and derived a very comfortable income from the exercise of this branch of his profession; but, what is far more extraordinary, in no instance did the property of his employers pass from them to him.

Stephen Gimlet in course of time became the head keeper to Sir John Slingsby, was well to do in the world, and gave his boy a very good education. Widow Lamb lived for nearly ten years after the events which have been lately detailed, and she had the happiness of seeing her poor boy William, by kind assistance given when most needed, and judiciously directed when received, rise from the station in which we first found him to be, at six-and-twenty years of age, the landlord of the White Hart at Tarningham; and often on a summer's evening, when there was not much to do in the place, he would stand at his inn-door, and thinking over all the strange events he had seen in his youth, with a melancholy feeling of the difference between himself and other men, he would whistle the plaintive melodies of which he was so fond in boyhood, as if imagination carried him altogether away into the realms of memory.

There is but one other character, perhaps, that deserves any mention; and, though his career was brief, we may speak of it more at large. Harry Wittingham took possession of his father's large property with title undisputed. A pompous funeral excited half-an-hour's wondering admiration in the people of Tarningham, when the old gentleman was committed to the grave; and for some short time hopes were entertained, even by wise and experienced persons, that young Wittingham would change his mode of life, become more regular and careful in his conduct, and cast away the vices and follies that had disgraced him. For a fortnight he remained almost entirely at home, examining papers, looking into affairs, and showing no small talents for business. A number of small sums, lent out by Mr. Wittingham on interest, were called in rather sharply, and some considerable purchases of land were made, showing a disposition on the part of the young gentleman to become a county proprietor. His reputed wealth, as is always the case in England, whatever a man's character may be, procured him a good deal of attention. People of high respectability and good fortune, especially where there were two or three unmarried daughters, called and left their cards; but Harry Wittingham's chief visitor and companion was his friend Mr. Granty, and two or three county gentlemen of the same stamp, who wore leather breeches and top-boots, rode handsome horses, and sported a red coat in the hunting season. The establishment kept up by old Mr. Wittingham was greatly increased, even within a month after his death. There were two more grooms in the stables, two more footmen in the hall; but this was no sign of extravagance, for the property could well afford it, or even more; but yet there was a sort of apparent uneasiness of manner, an occasional gloom, an irritability upon very slight occasions, upon which neither prosperity nor the indulgence of long thwarted tastes had any effect; and Mr. Granty himself, in conversation with a friend, thought fit to wonder what the devil Harry Wittingham would have, for he seemed never contented, although he possessed as good a fortune as any man in the county.

At length Harry Wittingham gave a dinner-party, and fixed it, without any knowledge of the coincidence, upon the very same day when Mary Clifford bestowed her hand upon Ned Hayward. When he discovered that such was the case, some short time before the party met, he became very much irritated and excited; but pride would not permit him to put the dinner off, and his friends assembled at the hour named. Seven persons appeared punctually as the clock struck the hour, and shortly after descended to the dining-room, where delicacies, and even rarities, were provided in abundance, with the choicest wines that could be procured from any quarter. The soup was turtle, brought expressly from London; but Harry Wittingham himself did not taste it. He ate a good deal of fish, however, and asked several persons to drink wine: but it appeared as if he determined to keep his head cool, for he merely bowed over his glass, and put it down. Mr. Granty, who well knew his old habits, was surprised at his abstemiousness, and thought it hardly fair, for he had himself determined to have a glorious night of it at the expense of Harry Wittingham's cellar, and such conduct in the host seemed likely to chill the drinking propensities of his guests.

"Come, Wittingham," he cried, at length, "let us have a glass of champagne together."

"With all my heart," answered his entertainer, and the champagne was poured out.

"Now, Wittingham, drink fair," said Mr. Granty, laughing; "for, hang me if you have tasted a drop to-day—this way, at one draught."

"With all my heart," answered Harry Wittingham, and raised his glass. He held it to his lips for a moment, and then, with a sudden and very apparent effort, drank the wine; but a sort of convulsive spasm instantly spread over his whole face; it was gone in a moment, however, and, as if to conceal it, he said something sharply to his butler about the wine not being good. "It was corked," he said; and Mr. Granty, laughing, cried,

"Try another bottle."

Another bottle was brought, and the glasses filled all round. Harry Wittingham raised his with the rest, but instantly set it down again, and pushed it away from him, murmuring with a haggard look, "I can't!"

As may be easily expected, this very peculiar conduct had its effect upon his guests. The party was a dull one, and broke up early, every one remarking that Mr. Wittingham tasted not one drop of all the many wines that circulated round his table.

When every one was gone, he rang the bell sharply, and told the servant to go for Mr. Slattery.

"Tell him to come directly,—I do not feel well."

In ten minutes more the surgeon was in the house, felt his pulse, looked at his tongue, asked a few questions, and then said, with a smile,

"A little fever!—a little fever! I will send you a cooling draught, and all will be quite right to-morrow, I dare say."

"Don't send me a draught," said Harry Wittingham, "I can't drink it."

"Oh, it shall be as good as wine," said Mr. Slattery.

"Good or bad, it does not matter," answered the young gentleman, staring somewhat wildly in his face; "I tell you I can't drink it—I drink not at all—I hate the very thought of drinking."

Another quick, short spasm crossed his countenance as he spoke; and Mr. Slattery, sitting down beside him with a somewhat dubious expression of countenance, hemmed for a moment or two, and then said,

"Why, what can one give you, then? But tell me a little more of the symptoms you feel," and he put his hand upon the pulse again. "Have you any headache?"

"No," answered Harry Wittingham, "I have a sort of burning in my throat."

"Great irritation of stomach!" said Mr. Slattery, in a solemn tone. "Have you met with any accident lately? Run a nail into your hand or foot, or anything of that kind?"

"No," answered Harry Wittingham, "but a d—— dog bit me just above the heel six weeks ago, and it is not quite well yet."

"Let me look at the wound," said Mr. Slattery, "it may be producing irritation."

The shoe and stocking were soon removed, and Mr. Slattery perceived four distinct marks of a dog's fangs in the tendon and muscles of Harry Wittingham's leg. At each there was a round lump raised above the skin, and from two of them a small, sharply defined red line was running up the leg toward the body.

Mr. Slattery bled him largely immediately, and telling him he dared say he would be quite well in two or three days, returned home, and sent off a man on horseback to the county town for a bottle of the Ormskirk medicine. The Ormskirk medicine arrived; but instead of being well in two or three days, in not much more than a week after, Harry Wittingham was in his grave.

THE END.

THE

4

FALSE HEIR.

BY

G. P. R. JAMÈS, ESQ.,

AUTHOR OF

"MORLEY ERNSTEIN," "FOREST DAYS," &c.

NEW-YORK:

HARPER & BROTHERS, 82 CLIFF-STREET.

1843.

THE NEW YORK
PUBLIC LIBRARY
499673
ASTOR, LENOX AND
TILDEN FOUNDATIONS.
R 1912 L

THE FALSE HEIR.

CHAPTER I.

I TRUST it is not presumptuous to suppose, that to that Being, who has revealed himself to us as a God of mercy and of love, the sight of human fate and all its vicissitudes, the wandering course of each intelligent creature, the effect of every man's actions upon others during his life, the results that follow from generation to generation unto the end of time, the hopes that are formed but to be disappointed, the disappointments which are in reality blessings, the longings for that which would prove destructive, the joys that kill, and the sorrows that make alive, with all the infinite complications of one event with another from the commencement to the close (which offer to our eyes nothing but a confused, inextricable maze), must be a subject of deep interest, as His all-comprehending view beholds the beginning and the end, and sees creation and all its results rounded in by His own glory. Yes, surely it must be to Almighty love and wisdom a sight of deep interest: for God, in permitting free-will to man, could never leave him without the protection of His tenderness and mercy; and the mere exercise of those attributes implies a care, an interest in his fate.

To our limited view, however, the course of one human being offers matter for meditation and for feeling enough; and to trace the life of a fellow-mortal from the cradle to the grave—wherever we can do so with anything like a knowledge of the actions, the events, the motives, and the thoughts—is, perhaps, the most instructive study that we can pursue. In the history before us, then—a history which all who are acquainted with the annals of France during the last century will know to be a true one—I shall commence with the very earliest period, and begin with the events which preceded the birth of him whose changeful existence I purpose to depict.

In the wide, green court of an old French chateau, surrounded by high walls, with a tall iron gate at one end, and the raised terrace on which the mansion itself stood on the other, were collected, one evening in the month of June, a gay and merry group of peasantry as ever danced upon the grass in that land of light and thoughtless hearts. A great upturned wine-barrel served as a throne for the fiddler, the girls and lads were in their best, and many a joke and jest, with which I will not regale the reader's ears, passed gayly among the groups, circulated chiefly, it would seem, at the expense of a stout, well-looking peasant of about thirty years of age, and a neat-looking, pretty young woman of two or three-and-twenty, habited as a soubrette or lady's maid. These two bore all the shafts of wit which were aimed at them with great glee and good-humour, kept fondly together through the whole evening, and, by the gay attire of the man and the profuse ornaments that decked the girl, it was easy to perceive that they were bride and bridegroom.

It was, indeed, the marriage evening of Gerard Latouches and Marguerite Lemaire — a marriage which had been brought about by the good offices of Marguerite's master and mistress; and now, after carousing through the whole day in the court of the castle, and the gardener's cottage at the side, they were dancing the sun down to the sound of the fiddle, with quite as much wine in their heads as any of the party could carry without approaching to inebriety.

Standing upon the terrace above were a lady and gentleman, themselves in their early prime, the Marquis de Langy being now in his seven-and-twentieth year, and the marchioness several years younger. A fine boy, of four years old, hung at his mother's gown; and a tall, dark man, some eight or ten years older than the marquis, but bearing a strong family resemblance to him, stood near the lady, with the little boy between them, among the curls of whose fair hair rested his strong and sinewy hand.

"A merry scene, my sweet niece," he observed, speaking to the marchioness; "I have not seen a merrier since you made Victor happy with your hand some five years ago."

"Five!" said the lady, thoughtfully. "Yes, indeed, it is more than five, for this dear boy was four last April. But I do love to see you in a gay party, my good uncle; for, though you are so grave yourself, you seem to enjoy it as much as any one."

"I do, Adele," he said; "for I like to see my fellow-beings enjoy the short life that their organization allows them. With us, who think that this life is all, it is pleasant to see the most made of it."

"Hush, hush!" cried the lady, holding up her finger with a look of playful reproach. "I will not hear you upon those subjects."

"You might, safely," replied the other. "Those who think as I do have none of the spirit of conversion about them; and, indeed, we would rather not. We see no reason why other people should not continue in their pleasant delusions. Probably the finest and the most beneficial of all the works of fancy is religion. I would not take a particle of it from you to save my life."

"Come, Victor, come!" cried the lady; "they are all giving their little presents, and we must give ours also. Let us go down. Will you come, Monsieur de St. Medard!".

"We all intend to do the same," rejoined the Marquis de Langy. "With such prudent people as Latouches and Marguerite, money is the best gift one can bestow. I give them a hundred and fifty crowns, and Adele fifty."

"And I have got such a pretty bonbonnière!" said the little boy.

The Viscount de St. Medard bent down his head and kissed him, saying, "I will put ten louis in the inside, and so your uncle's present and your own shall go together."

The child was delighted at the idea, and held out the little ornamented box which he had bought to give to the new-married couple. His father's uncle counted out ten golden pieces into it, and the little party descended the steps of the terrace towards the spot where the marquis's tenantry were enjoying themselves.

Whether it depends on our insular situation, or whether some drop of strange and irritable fluid has mingled by chance in the mixed current of the English blood, I know not; but certain it is, that there is a much greater portion of mauvaise honte—I beg the reader's pardon for using a French expression—in the English character than in that of any other nation upon the earth. That is to say, ten men will feel it in England where one man feels it in France: which is the reason, and perhaps the only reason, why a French peasant does a thousand things with grace and ease, upon which an English one spends a vast deal of awkwardness and trouble.

The good people in the court had gone on dancing, sporting, and laughing, without the slightest restraint, although they knew that the eyes of their lord and lady were upon them; and, even while the party from the chateau was approaching, they ceased not in their proceedings, which were somewhat curious to eyes not much accustomed to witness the habits and manners of the lower classes. Each person had brought with him to the wedding a small present of some kind, as is still very customary in many parts of France; and now, two and two—a man and a woman—they advanced to the sound of the fiddle, and made their little offering to the young couple—the man giving his gift to the bride, and taking a kiss for an equivalent; the woman presenting her's to the bridegroom, and receiving a warm salute in return. Some of the presents were of considerable value; but, in those cases where poverty did not permit of any expensive purchase, the giver covered the smallness of his gift by the ludicrousness of its character, and endeavoured to excite a laugh at his fun, if he called forth no admiration of his generosity.

With every sense of propriety, however, the peasants, as soon as the marquis and marchioness were near enough to make it evident that they were coming to offer their presents likewise, drew back to let them advance, and the bride and bridegroom rose from the chairs in which they had been seated, and received them with all respect.

Marguerite was a pretty-looking girl, hiding a good deal of gay and light-hearted fun under a demure look, while Latouches himself was, as we have said, a stout, handsome countryman; though, to speak truth, he seemed somewhat more abashed by his new capacity of bridegroom than Marguerite by hers of bride.

The marquis and marchioness presented their gifts; and the noble lord, though not a man to carry the droits du seigneur to any unpleasant extent, took a hearty taste of the fair maid's lips, while the bridegroom approached his respectfully to the cheek of the marchioness. The little boy was fondled and caressed by both, as he held out the bonbonnière to his mother's former maid, saying, "There, Marguerite! my uncle's present is in the inside."

The maid opened it, and instantly dropped a low courtesy to Monsieur de St. Medard, while the bridegroom looked over her shoulder into the box with a glistening eye at the sight of the gold, and whispered to her to count it. Marguerite, however, knew better, and, closing the box again quietly, handed it to Latouches, saying, in a low tone, "Fy, you miser!"

The noble party then withdrew to a little distance, and talked to some of the elder people, while the rest of the peasants brought up their presents also, and shouts of laughter continued till the sun went down. The merry scene then closed, and Marguerite and her husband retired to a cottage hard by, while the marquis, his uncle, his wife, and his little boy re-entered the chateau, and talked quietly over the event of the day.

"She is a pretty girl, and, I dare say, a good girl too," said Monsieur de St. Medard, as they walked into the saloon. "Do you know the man well?"

"Oh, yes," replied the Marquis de Langy; "he holds a little farm of mine on the edge of the forest: a stout, hard-working fellow, and will make Marguerite an excellent husband."

"Perhaps so," rejoined Monsieur de St. Medard, with a thoughtful air. "A cunning animal, I should suspect."

"Oh, no," rejoined his nephew; "he is a very good creature, and an old suiter of Marguerite's."

"Constancy is something, at least in this world," said the viscount. "And now, my good niece and nephew, have you any commands for England?"

"For England!" exclaimed Monsieur de Langy, starting; "why, what are you going to do in England?"

"First, to fulfil some of the king's commands," answered Monsieur de St. Medard, "and, next, to see some old friends there. But the truth is, I go as ambassador to see if, by my influence, we cannot smooth down some of the difficulties regarding this commercial treaty."

"They will make a heretic of you in England," cried Madame de Langy.

"That would be difficult," said the viscount; "but, nevertheless, Adele, you would look upon that as something gained from the enemy at least, would you not?"

"No," cried she, eagerly, "no. Better be of no religion at all than a heretic."

Monsieur de St. Medard smiled and looked at his nephew, and the conversation turned to other subjects.

There we will leave it, in order briefly to recapitulate the events of the ensuing year, as far as the family of the Marquis de Langy was concerned. The Viscount de St. Medard returned to Paris on the following day, and thence proceeded to England on the mission with which he was charged. Not long after, the fine boy of Monsieur and Madame de Langy was taken ill with one of the complaints of childhood, and, though he recovered, never regained altogether his health and strength.

During the winter of the ensuing year, however, the fair proportions of the marchioness were seen to change. The marquis seemed well satisfied that his wife's figure had lost its symmetry; and, though he was always a kind and affectionate husband, showed greater tenderness and care than ever. As the spring was coming on, the marchioness sent her carriage to the farm of Latouches, on the borders of the forest of Compiegne, which was nearly a day's journey from the chateau, and the vehicle rolled back again, bringing her former maid, Marguerite, now Madame Latouches.

When the marchioness beheld her, she could not help laughing at the change which had taken place in the poor girl's once smart figure; and she exclaimed, "Alas! Marguerite, I wonder if I look such a round, squat personage as yourself!"

"Oh dear, no, madame," replied the former maid, who had not forgotten the duty of flattery. "You are so much taller than I am; one would scarcely know that you were so."

"There is no doubt of that, Marguerite," said the marchioness; "and, as I promised you in October, you shall nurse the baby."

"Oh dear, I am so glad!" cried Marguerite; "I always did love children, you know, madame, and yours I shall love beyond anything."

CHAPTER II.

Oh! when youth gasps for the object of desire, how gladly would he step over the long hours of expectation as easily as the teller of a tale. How many would at this moment—if immutable fate would let them—annihilate the two or three years to come, which lie between them and fruition, in order to be at once at the bright goal towards which they strain their eager gaze—how many, how many! And yet they all are young; for even middle age learns that half the delight is in the pursuit; and age has found that, often, before we reach that goal, the prize is gone. Happy is it for mortal man that he cannot in life, as I can in this book, blot out the flight of two or three years, and say, in two words, They passed.

Two years and nine months had gone by since the Marquise de Langy and Marguerite, her former maid, spoke of events to which the hopes of both were turned; and now I must lead the reader to a small farmhouse at the edge of the forest of Compiegne. It was eventime in the autumn; the leaves were yellow in the deep wood, and some of them already strewed the ground. The gnat, the shrill trumpeter of the season, whirled high in the air; the partridge was heard calling in the field; a rosy lustre spread warm over the blue sky, and caught some light clouds overhead. There was a coolness in the breeze which told that the breath of winter would soon chill the world; and every sign on tree, on herb, on field, said that the bright time of year was past, and the dark and chilly period at hand.

"Surely nothing dies but something mourns," said the poet; and the death of summer, of all other losses, seems to call forth and to deserve the sorrow of all the earth. Gray sadness steals over everything, and the brightest autumnal day has something solemn and serious in its splendour which speaks of the fleeting of enjoyment and points to the tomb of all dear hopes.

The farmhouse was small and lowly—little more than a cottage, indeed—with a mud wall running around the court and out-buildings; but it was prettily situated on a slight rise, with a deep wood behind, and in front the undulating fields of the farm, with a small but deep stream flowing in the lowest part of the valley which it overlooked. The face of the building turned to the southwest, so as to monopolize the greater part of the light of evening. On the left was a little vineyard, through which the rays of the sun were seen streaming in pleasant lines of yellow lustre, while a small flat green offered a sort of esplanade, from which an extensive and beautiful view presented itself to the eye; and on the right was a little wood, detached from the forest, and belonging to the Marquis de Langy. Beyond the field before the cottage ran a road—not exactly a highway indeed, but one of the second class—and from it branched off a path leading to a small hamlet, above which might be seen rising the spire of the parish church.

Long lines of light and shade, as tree or upland interposed, stretched across the whole prospect; a troop of cattle appeared winding up under the direction of a little girl; and down a distant bank a flock of sheep followed their shepherd, taking their way homeward to the fold. The sound of a voice singing a merry song in the evening came, not altogether cheerfully, on the ear; and the whole scene was peaceful and quiet, but still grave—one might almost say melancholy. At least, so it was felt by a gentleman who walked slowly up the path from the village, and approached the farmhouse.

As was the case then, and is still, with most buildings of the kind in France, the first room that one entered was the kitchen, which is, in fact, the saloon of the lower orders; and in that of the farm of Godard, for so was called the house we speak of, sat Marguerite Latouches by the fire, which was warming the evening soup, watching the progress of the cookery. There was one little boy, between two and three years old, standing at her knee, and another, of the same age, or very nearly so, sitting in the doorway of the farm, sometimes amusing himself by scraping the dust into tiny pyramids with his small hands, sometimes raising his round rosy face towards the sky, and looking at the glowing clouds overhead. The evening was growing cold; and Marguerite, casting some more pieces of wood upon the embers, called to the little boy to come in, a command which he did not seem very willing to obey. She repeated the order in a sharp tone, for Marguerite was now all the farmer's wife; and, though but little more than three years had passed since her marriage, you could scarcely recognise the smart, slim, smooth-tongued, pretty soubrette in the stout, bustling, active, quick-tempered wife of Gerard Latouches.

"Come in," she cried, "come in this minute, or I will give you a drubbing, you little rebel."

The boy looked out of the door a moment longer, and then toddled up to her side, saying, in his childish accents, "Man coming."

"Not coming here," replied Marguerite Latouches, "unless it's papa."

"No, not papa," rejoined the boy; and the next moment, as Marguerite rose and took a step towards the door to see who it was, the gentleman we have spoken of entered the farm-house, and was received with a low courtesy.

He paused for a moment, gazing at Marguerite as if in doubt, and then said,

"Ah! Marguerite, you have grown so stout I scarcely recollected you. Do you know me?"

"Oh yes, sir," replied the wife of Latouches, "quite well, though I did not know you were come back from foreign parts."

"I have been in France three days," replied the gentleman; "and, as I passed this way to Picardy, I resolved I would stop four or five miles short of my proper lodging-place, to see my little namesake, and bear news of him to Victor and Adele. Two fine boys, upon my soul. Which is he, Marguerite?"

The woman paused an instant, hesitated, and coloured. What was it moved her? The reader may learn hereafter.

But, in the mean time, Monsieur de Medard went on, scarcely waiting for a reply. "But I need not ask you: this fair-haired urchin is my little Francis."

"No, sir," replied Marguerite, as the viscount put his hand upon the head of the boy, who had been standing at her knee; "that is my son, the other is your godson."

Monsieur de Medard gazed at the child with a thoughtful look, and then called him, saying, "Come hither, Francis, I am thine uncle, boy; wilt thou love me?"

The child ran towards him without fear or hesitation, and, for his only reply, held up his fair round face and gave the stranger a kiss.

"Well, thou art a dear boy," said Monsieur de St. Medard, holding him to his heart: "let us see thy face;" and he carried him to the doorway, gazing at him intently for a moment or two. "Why, thou art not like thy father, or mother either," he continued; "more like me, I should think, or my poor brother."

"Oh yes, sir, very like the marquis's father," said Marguerite Latouches, approaching.

"Why, do you recollect him, Marguerite?" asked the viscount.

"Oh yes, sir, quite well," replied the farmer's wife. "You know, my brother, who is now the intendant of the marquis, was then a servant of his father's, your brother, sir."

"Ay," said Monsieur de St. Medard, "I remember. The boy is like him. Well, I can safely tell them he is well and thriving. When was his father here?"

"Why, sir, not for a twelvemonth," answered Marguerite, in some surprise. "Did you not know that Monsieur de Langy is with the army of the Upper Rhine, and madame is very ill at Nancy?"

"No, indeed," said Monsieur de St. Medard, with a look both of sorrow and surprise; "I had not heard it. But I have been wandering far and wide, Marguerite; I have been in India."

"In the Great Indies!" cried Marguerite; "that is very far indeed."

As she spoke, a loud cry attracted her attention, and, turning round, Monsieur de St. Medard and herself perceived that the little boy, whom he had at first mistaken for his nephew's son, had fallen into the fire. With a loud shriek the woman darted towards it and dragged it forth; but its clothes were in a blaze; and, had it not been for the presence of the viscount, the child would have been burned to death, and perhaps the mother also; for she held it clasped in her arms, and the flame was catching her own apron. That gentleman, however, who was an old soldier, prompt and ready in every moment of difficulty, unclasped the large blue roquelaure, or coat-cloak, which he wore, and casting it over both mother and child, extinguished the fire in a moment. She herself was uninjured; but the right arm of the little boy was severely burned, though apparently not so much so as to place him in any danger. His cries, however, were very bitter, and, after endeavouring to soothe him for some time, Monsieur de St. Medard left the cottage, saying he would send up a surgeon from the village.

"There is no surgeon there, sir," said Marguerite, "there is no surgeon there; but the curé is a great doctor. He will come up, sir, he will come up. Hush, my poor boy! hush!"

Monsieur de St. Medard walked down towards the village with a rapid step, though in a meditative mood. So much, indeed, were his thoughts occupied, that he scarcely saw the farmer Latouches himself, who was coming up on his return home, till the stout peasant bowed low and uncovered his head, saying, "Bon jour, Monsieur le Vicomte."

Monsieur de St. Medard looked up, and instantly recognised Latouches, who had with him a tall, stout-made, handsome-looking boy of some fourteen or fifteen years of age, with a countenance expressive of talent and activity of mind, yet with a somewhat shy and sidelong look, which is rarely to be found even among the bashful, except there is a consciousness of some weakness, fault, or vice at the bottom of the heart.

Monsieur de St. Medard was something more than a great observer of the human character; he was endowed with that sort of instinctive insight into the minds of others which some men do certainly possess as a gift, not an acquirement. He was cautious in using it; for, skeptical in all his ideas, he doubted its reality and its accuracy, and never relied on his own first impressions of another till those impressions were confirmed and justified by after observation. He had seldom, if ever, found himself wrong, however; and after telling Latouches what had happened at the farm, he walked on, saying to himself, as he thought of the countenance of the lad who was with the farmer, "That will be a bold and powerful fellow, but I doubt that he will be a very honest one."

Without farther comment, he proceeded to the village, found out the good curé, and sent him up to the house of Madame Latouches, after having conversed with him a moment or two in regard to the two children. This conversation brought reflections into his mind which lasted during the greater part of the evening after he had returned to the little cabaret where he had taken up his abode, and which his servants had made as comfortable for him as the circumstances permitted.

Reflections similar to those which occupied Monsieur de St. Medard may perhaps have already crossed the mind of my readers, though of course his thoughts were modified by the circumstances of the times and the country.

"Well," he said, meditating over the scene on the farm, "I cannot help thinking that this custom of ours is both a barbarous and unnatural one, for a mother to give her child into the hands of a comparative stranger to educate as well as to nurse during the first three years of its life—to put it into a cottage, and let it receive its first impressions from persons in a low and ignorant condition. The practice has quite gone out in England; I wish it would go out with us also. The excuse we make is, that the child becomes more robust and healthy than if it were subjected to all the delicate treatment of a fond mother in a wealthy and luxurious house. They say a child's bodily constitution is fixed in the first three years of its existence: they seem to forget its mental constitution altogether. My belief is, that a child's education begins when it is six weeks old, and that every hour after its very first ideas develop themselves roots in its mind some principle which affects its whole existence, implanting thoughts, feelings, tendencies a thousand-fold more difficult to eradicate than those which are received in after life. Seeds planted in a virgin soil shoot far more deeply down, and produce a thousand-fold more fruit than when the ground has been exhausted by repeated crops. If I had a son I could not cast him on the hands of strangers—for years!—no, nor for hours."

Such reflections occupied the thoughts of Monsieur de St. Medard, as we have already said, during the greater part of the evening; for he was one of those whose minds are almost always busy with things of great moment, and, in many instances, his ran before the age in which he lived. Unfortunately indeed, in breaking away from the shackles of evil custom, folly, and prejudice, it overleaped all reasonable barriers, and cast away, not alone the chains that bound it, but the garments with which it was clothed.

The practice, however, upon which he commented was at one time almost universal throughout what were called the civilized states of Europe, and the first two or three years of a child's life were spent in the cottage of some foster-parent, very often as badly chosen as the system itself was badly devised. Mothers, and fathers too, excused to themselves the act on various pretences; but fashion, vice, vanity, were in reality the only foundations. Among a nation where the latter weakness, namely, vanity, has always been the predominant fault in the national character—a fault which, as is very often the case, may lead to some of the ennobled splendours of worldly greatness—it is easy to understand that this bad custom took a firmer root, and lasted longer, than with any other people; and, though it had diminished at the period of the Revolution, it was in full vogue not many years before that event. The eldest son of the Marquis de Langy had been so brought up in the house of one of his tenants; and, when a second son appeared, he, as we have seen, had been immediately given over to the care of the girl who had been his mother's maid.

Of a kind heart and a good disposition, Marguerite had loved him nearly as well as her own child, and both the father and mother had every cause to be satisfied with the treatment which their offspring had received up to the period when the marquis was obliged to join the army on the Rhine, and his wife accompanied him into Lorraine. His prolonged absence and her own illness made her more than once think that it was lucky her little Francis had been placed in such good hands. But, alas! Adele de Langy did not know all that was taking place in the farm of Godard.

Too often does it happen in all the affairs of life, too often does it happen with every class of men, that we content ourselves, that we congratulate ourselves, on knowing that one part of any complicated transaction is going right, without thinking of all the many parts that may be wrong and ruined. It is one of the great evils of the one-sidedness of most men's nature, that they fix their whole thoughts, and direct their whole efforts, to a very small branch of each subject presented to them. A statesman looks at the operation of the law he frames, perhaps, upon one class of people only; perhaps upon one portion of the interests of that class; perhaps upon one portion of the interests of the world at large; forgetting altogether either the multitudes that must be affected collaterally, or the manifold minor necessities of the very beings whom he seeks to benefit, or the innumerable results to society in its moral temperament and its physical state which any law affecting one of the great questions of polity must touch either remotely or immediately.

Again, a father applies himself to the intellectual culture of his son: he loads his mind with knowledge, he teaches him language after language, he feeds him with the dry scrapings of the rind of antiquity; he adds mathematics to arithmetic, and finishes the pile with geometry; he crushes him, in fact, under keys, yet never teaches him to open one door. Another parent looks to the culture of his son's body: he is taught grace and ease of carriage, skill in all sports and exercises; he can ride, he can leap, he can pitch the bar; he can fence, dance, swim with the best. But the heart, reader, the heart is altogether forgotten; the spirit is without its culture, the feelings without their due governance. Or, perhaps, the case may be reversed, though, alas! that is but seldom; for the material things of life offer that which is so much more tangible, that the idleness of intellect disposes almost all men rather to deal with them than with those things that are more difficult to grasp. It is the one-sidedness of our general nature which has retarded the progress of society more than anything else on earth; and that, also, is the defect which, in domestic life and all its relations, causes one half of the miseries that exist. Thank God! a war has at length commenced against this great error, and men have not only learned that every object has its many sides, but that they themselves have each their many powers for examining, considering, and appreciating the various qualities and relations of everything that is submitted to them. Men can no longer limit their views who would pretend to greatness, but, in dealing with the infinite variety of other things, must bring into action the infinite variety that is in themselves. As under the green surface of the ocean, whether it be rising into mountains of foam, or calm as the face of innocent Hope, there are a thousand unseen currents tending different ways, so in every affair of life are there results and tendencies below the surface, and in the breast of every man qualities, capabilities, streams of soul, if we may so call them, which he must seek for, discover, and define, if he would shape his course aright.

To return, however, to the matter from which we have strayed: the Marquise de Langy had placed her son in the cottage of the peasant with the purpose of ensuring to him that health and strength which were then supposed to follow a hardy education in early youth, and she thought of nothing more. She was content to know that this object was secured; and she was neither aware, nor inquired, whether his mind was suffering, nay, nor whether any other of his interests whatsoever were endangered by his residence there. The reader will learn hereafter that they were deeply affected, but how, it is the purpose of this tale to show. For the present, we must return to the farmhouse, and speak a few words of the farther events of that night.

On the arrival of Latouches himself at the cottage, Marguerite did not seem particularly well pleased at the sight of his companion. Her anxiety for the little boy whose arm had been burned, however, occupied her too much for many comments upon the appearance of Jean Marais, as she called the youth who accompanied her husband.

"Some new mischief, I suppose," she said; "I wonder if he will ever be steady!"

"I should think not," replied Latouches; "a young good-for-nothing! However, he must sleep here, Marguerite; for, if he goes back again, his master will half kill him."

"It must be in that room, then," rejoined Marguerite, pointing to a small chamber off the kitchen. "I won't have him up stairs again."

"I can sleep anywhere," said the boy, laughing, with a saucy air; "in the wood, if you won't take me in, Marguerite."

"Ay, and make a fine fricot for the wolves," answered Marguerite. "But don't talk so loud; the poor little man will go to sleep if you will let him."

A few minutes after, the good curé entered in haste, and applied such remedies as he judged necessary to soothe the child and heal the burn. Latouches himself showed great anxiety; and the only one who seemed careless was the youth, Jean Marais, who took the other little boy upon his knee, fondled, played with, teased him, and seemed delighted with the child's bold impetuosity. The poor little sufferer was, after a time, lulled into slumber; and Marguerite then put the other boy to bed also, saying to her unwelcome guest, "Get you to your room, Jean, and to sleep; it's the only way of keeping you out of mischief."

The lad laughed, and withdrew into the little sort of cabin which was assigned to him; and in a few minutes, without much preparation, was safely ensconced under such bedclothes as he could find.

When all was quiet, Marguerite and her husband looked in each other's faces for a moment or two in silence, but with a meaning and somewhat stern expression on both parts. A long conversation ensued, in the course of which Marguerite related the visit of Monsieur de St. Medard, and her husband put various questions to her in an irritable and impatient tone. The conference lasted for more than an hour, and ended by the wife of Latouches going to bed in tears, while he remained for a moment in the kitchen. Taking out four or five louis and a handful of silver, which he had brought from the neighbouring market, Latouches deposited the whole sum safely in the drawer of a large oaken table which stood in the middle of the room, having first counted a small sum which was there before. He then locked the drawer and retired to bed, leaving the fire smouldering on the hearth.

An hour passed without any event taking place in the kitchen of the farm of Godard; but at the end of that time, the door of thin planks which led into the little room tenanted by Jean Marais opened gently, and that good youth himself entered, completely dressed.

"Ha, ha!" he murmured to himself, "I have got hold of a secret, have I? I will keep that for service some future day. But now for my present wants. They must be supplied. I cannot stay at Marcilly, that's clear; and I must make my way off as fast as possible. Now, uncle Latouches, I must borrow a few crowns; and, if ever you ask me for payment, your secret, and all you have robbed me of, will be quittance enough, I think!"

As he thus spoke, he produced half a dozen keys of different forms out of his pocket, and applied them to the drawer. They did not succeed in opening it, however; and the youth then brought forth a large knife, with which he speedily contrived to press down the bolt of the lock. The light of the fire was quite sufficient to show him the object of his search; and, making one clear sweep of the contents of the drawer, he opened the door, and in a minute was walking hastily along the fields.

CHAPTER III.

Once more we must pass over another lapse of time, comprising three years, and, bringing before the reader again the same four persons who had stood upon the terrace of the Chateau de Langy on the marriage day of Gerard Latouches and Marguerite Lemaire, must group them in the saloon of the same chateau, as they sat down to take their coffee on the evening of a summer's day.

Six years had changed Adele de Langy a good deal, but she was still a pretty and interesting woman, with an expression of great sweetness and tenderness, perhaps heightened by being somewhat paler than before. There is something in the aspect of rosy health rarely combined with great gentleness; it gives the idea of the material, the animal part of our being predominating over the spiritual. It is not always so, indeed, for there are some faces, full of the high life of this earth, through which the soul seems to look by the eye; and one who gazes at them, and sees the varying expressions which the heart brings over the countenance, feels as if looking at some magnificent building, and beholding beautiful forms passing across the open windows. Adele de Langy, however, had gained, rather than lost, by her health having been slightly impaired.

Her husband, too, no longer looked the young man: his face had lost its smoothness; there were the lines and stains of exposure and care upon it; and, as he moved to take his seat at the table, a slight degree of lameness was perceptible from a wound he had received in a skirmish some months before. The beautiful little boy of four years old, who, at the period to which we have referred, had stood at his mother's knee, was now grown into the tall, pale stripling of ten; somewhat girlish in look and manner; for the great tenderness called for by delicate health had shielded him from those lessons of privation, activity, and exposure which give, even to boyhood, the manly tone so desirable in every one who is to mingle, sooner or later, with the world.

The person of the whole party who seemed the least changed was the Vicomte de St. Medard, and the only thing which indicated that Time's hand had worked any alteration in him was, here and there, a gray hair, and a slight deepening of the thoughtful wrinkle between his brows. Although not more than by ten years his nephew's senior, he had looked, when we first introduced him to the reader, wellnigh old enough to be the marquis's father; but, since that time, Monsieur de Langy seemed to have gone on in years, while he had stood still, and now one would not have said that there was much more than half a lustre between them. He was somewhat more richly dressed than before, however, though still in military costume; for he had by this time risen high in the service of his country, and many circumstances had contributed to raise his fortune as well as his station. The emoluments of the various posts which he had filled had been large, and his expenses small; and in India he had also acquired considerable wealth, which his habits of moderation and frugality had prevented him from dissipating, as frequently occurred with many fortunes there obtained.

Such prudent conduct was not pursued by Monsieur de Langy, who, according to the extravagant customs of the day, had greatly embarrassed a splendid fortune; nor was he in the way to retrieve his error in any great degree; for, although he had taken the opportunity of quitting the army to diminish an establishment far beyond his means or necessities, yet his income still barely sufficed to meet his expenses, so that the debts already incurred remained a continual charge upon him.

It has been necessary to say thus much in order to show that the wealthy uncle was, naturally enough, an object of great deference to the family of De Langy. I do not mean to say, indeed, that there was anything like servility, for Monsieur de St. Medard exacted nothing of the kind, nor would either the marquis or his wife have been inclined to show it; but, in such circumstances, our wishes and our hopes, without our knowing or feeling their operation, too often affect our demeanour and our tone—ay, even our thoughts and our actions—towards those upon whom our fortunes depend.

The whole party in the Chateau de Langy, then, had seated themselves round the table, while several servants in gorgeous liveries stood ready to pour out the fragrant coffee into cups of that beautiful porcelain for which France was at that time even more famous than now. Monsieur de St. Medard, whose Eastern travels had rendered him a connoisseur in the juice of the berry, was dictating to every one, in a half, laughing tone, the exact proportion of cream and sugar, and the servants, taking their tone from the master and mistress of the house, were listening with profound respect to his critical dictum, when the door of the saloon burst open, and in rushed, with the overflowing joy of youth in his countenance, and a thousand graces and beauties, which, like the flowers of spring, fade away one by one as life's year advances, as lovely a boy as ever was seen, exclaiming, "Oh! my uncle, my uncle, my dear uncle, come hither into the park; there is such a beautiful bird! you must come and see it, and tell me what it is;" and, catching Monsieur de St. Medard by the arm, he wellnigh pulled him off his chair.

"Hush, François," said his mother; "do not tease your uncle in that manner. He cannot come—he is taking his coffee."

"Oh! but he must come," cried the boy, still pulling him by the arm, "or the bird will be gone. He will come, I know; he always does what I ask him."

The viscount bent down his head and kissed the boy's fair forehead, and then looking round with a somewhat rueful smile, as much as to say, "My young tyrant will spoil my coffee," he rose, and, half led and half dragged by the child, went out by a glass-door into the park.

What the bird was, or whether they found it at all, I know not; but in a few minutes little Francis de Langy returned, holding the flap of his uncle's coat, and laughing with the joyous peal of five years old.

"My dear uncle," said the marchioness, as they came in, "you spoil that boy. I must really interfere."

"Nay, Adele," replied Monsieur de St. Medard, "I only spoil him because I have him but seldom with me. Give him to me altogether, and I will not spoil him. Will you go with me, Francis, and be my boy?"

"That I will," cried the boy, springing at a bound on his knee, and casting his arms round his neck; "that I will, and then Victor won't tease me."

The next moment, however, he turned his eyes to his mother's face, and saw a tear upon her cheek.

"But I won't leave mamma!" he exclaimed; "I will be her boy too, and papa's, and yours, and everybody's but Victor's, for he teases me."

"But you shall come and see mamma very often," said Monsieur de St. Medard.

"Every day!" asked the boy.

"Perhaps so," answered his uncle. "Will you give him to me, Adele? Victor, what say you?"

"We will talk of it by-and-by," said Monsieur de Langy, looking first towards his wife, and then towards his eldest son. "Nay, Adele, do not weep; my uncle does not want to separate Francis from us. St. Medard is not so far off but that you may see him every day, as he says. But we will talk of it by-and-by. There, Victor, drink out your coffee, and go and play in the park: take Francis with you."

The two brothers went forth together, though, it must be owned, unwillingly; and, after they were gone, the coffee and the servants were sent away, so that the marquis and his uncle were left with the marchioness, who by this time had wiped away her tears, and remained silent and grave, but not altogether sorrowful. A momentary pause ensued, as if nobody exactly liked to renew the subject; but it was Madame de Langy who spoke first.

"I have but one fear, my dear uncle," she said, giving Monsieur de St. Medard her hand; "perhaps you divine what it is?"

"But you are wrong, Adele," replied Monsieur de St. Medard; "I told you long ago, people who think as I do seek not to make converts. A fool named Vanina once did so, and they burned him for his pains, as he well deserved. But it is clearly shown that he had no fixed opinions of any kind. He was a weak, vain, foolish man. With myself, and I suppose it is the case with others, my convictions are unwilling, and not pleasant to myself; so, depend upon it, that I shall not force them upon another. But, my dear Adele, I am ready and willing to promise you that he shall have every instruction you may think fit in your own particular doctrines and notions. He will be still your son, though he may be my heir; and I take him but as a loan to cheer my solitude, to enliven my leisure hours, to give me an object and an end in life. I cut him not off from the parent stem, I only seek to bend the young tree over a spot that has been too long scorched by the rays of the sun—my own heart, I mean, Adele. You will not make him a bigot, of course—I know you will not; that were a folly that I could not consent to—but make him, if you will, a sincerely religious man. I can desire nothing better. It is a highly enviable state. I look upon religion—I do not mean bigotry—I look upon religion as one of the most beneficial things that the mind of man ever discovered; it in fact supplies the place of those moral laws which, though immutable and severe in their nature, would be effectual upon very few unless enforced by the despotic voice of religion. I therefore think it but right and just, in the absence of all knowledge as to how the mind of any child will turn out, to give him a sound and calm religious education, in order to ensure that he shall have some principles which will guide him aright, if simple ethics can gain no hold upon him. You shall take every care of his religious education yourself, Adele, and I will interpose neither barrier nor objection. Now are you satisfied?"

"Oh yes," replied the marchioness; "I am sure you would not pervert him."

Monsieur de St. Medard turned to his nephew with a laugh and a shrug of the shoulders. "You see how she treats me, Victor," he said; "the very best that she can say for me is, that I will not pervert your son. Will you consent to my adopting him?"

"Right gladly, my good uncle," answered the marquis; "I told you so this morning. Only settle upon him a sufficient sum to make him independent under all circumstances—and, of course, let it be understood that, in case of anything happening to our poor boy Victor before he marries or comes into his succession, Francis shall be restored to us as the heir of Langy—and I will yield him with pleasure and with gratitude. You will make him a good soldier, I know, and an honest man likewise. One cannot well desire more."

"I will try to make him," said the viscount, with a look of conscious integrity, though not exactly of what is called self-satisfaction, "I will try to make him what I am myself, Victor, in every point but one. I cannot say more; for a man can but endeavour to do those things which he thinks right, and the moral sense with which every man is endowed tells me that I have so acted for some years. My views may be wrong in morals as well as religion, but I do not think they are, and I have acted up to them. I will endeavour to teach him to do the same; for, depend upon it, the man who seeks in all things to do that which is right, is seldom without discovering in the end what really is right, even by the very act of seeking it."

The matter was thus settled, and, a few days after, Francis de Langy accompanied the viscount to his estate of St. Medard. He was not told that he was henceforth to be comparatively a stranger to his father's house. Had he been so, perhaps his boyish imagination even might have taken fright at the severing of all those sweet ties with which the kind hand of Nature has attached us to the bosom of paternal love. He might have felt—early as were his years—that there is no tenderness like that which God himself ordained to be the soft resting-place of infancy; that the cradle of our best affections is a mother's heart; that the most impenetrable shelter against the storms of the world are a father's arms. He might have felt it, though not known it; for feeling goes before experience, and outstrips reason. It is the instinct of man, given him as a safeguard for those early years, before the gifts which are bestowed upon him to direct his manhood can be brought into operation; before intellect, from the materials furnished by memory out of the past, forges an ægis to guard his breast against the future.

They told him not, then, and he went joyfully, as if for a visit for a few days. All was new to him, all was happy, and, ere he felt the change, the change was effected. His uncle was all kindness, and the hours passed pleasantly away. Monsieur de St. Medard, with a lively recollection of all that had been imperfect, and all that had been painful in his own education, took care that nothing of the kind should be felt by the beautiful boy whom he had adopted; and, studying his character with an anxious eye, and a keen and discriminating mind, he prepared to repress all that promised dangerous fruit, and to cultivate the many fine and hopeful qualities which were apparent in his disposition.

During the first three or four months Madame de Langy visited her son almost every day, but at the end of that time the season of the capital returned, and though she and her husband both might have been better pleased to stay at their chateau, custom, the great god of France, carried them unwillingly to Paris.

Purposely the Viscount de St. Medard remained in the country, for he was anxious to wean Madame de Langy, as he expressed it, from her child. Two months effected the object that he wished; that is to say, the lapse of time did not diminish her love or her tenderness in the least, but it broke through the habit of seeing him frequently; and when, at length, her uncle and his adopted son followed to Versailles, where the court then was, she herself abstained from that daily intercourse with the boy which she knew could not always go on, and which she had found it so painful to interrupt. The little Francis himself had readily become reconciled to his situation, for his uncle had always been the object of his warmest love; nor was his affection diminished, even in the least degree, by finding that Monsieur de St. Medard, though kind and indulgent, would not, to use the ordinary term, spoil him in the least. The viscount never harassed him by manifold exactions; there were few things that were prohibited to him, there were few things that were required of him; but the directions which he had once received, he soon learned, must be obeyed to the letter; and though his nature was impetuous and his heart full of ardent feelings, yet those feelings were, if I may so express it, thoughtful in their character, and, even as a boy, he would say to himself, 'I will do as my uncle bids me, because he is so kind."

Ere I close this chapter to turn to another page in the history of this boy's life, I must pause for a moment to give a picture of a person who, though not one of the principal characters in this book, had a great influence on the fate of Francis de Langy. I do not mean merely his material fate, I mean the fate of his mind; and, though readers in general are not fond of this sort of portrait-painting, yet I must beg them to pause with me for a moment, assuring them that, however unskilfully the sketch may be executed, it is from nature; and I give it as much in justice to a particular class from which we do not in general expect much good, as to a nation from which we do not expect much sincere feeling. I speak of a French bonne, or nursery-maid.

Louise Pelet had been engaged by Madame de Langy to take charge of her youngest son on his return to his home from the Ferme Godard. She came from the house of a relation of the marquis, with whom she could never agree, but who gave her a character for perfect honesty, sobriety, and another virtue for which her class are not in general very conspicuous. The lady acknowledged, however, in recommending her to Madame de Langy, that Louise had "a desperate temper."

But Madame de Langy knew that her fair cousin was excessively weak, excessively vain, and excessively capricious. It was admitted that Louise was extremely fond of children, and did not show her bad temper with them; and, consequently, Adele imagined that a more reasonable mistress might make a more reasonable maid. She was not mistaken: Louise became devotedly attached to the boy; and though she was what is usually termed free spoken to her mistress, expressing her opinion in the very plainest terms when it was sought for, and sometimes when it was not, she was, nevertheless, perfectly respectful and obedient. She was not fond of her fellow-servants, it is true, and got out of their way with great perseverance and success; but she was neither a tale-bearer nor a slanderer of others, holding her tongue very discreetly when they were absent, though occasionally expressing not very favourable views of their conduct to their face. She was, moreover, activity itself; always employed, never idle, and doing everything with a rapidity and promptitude which did not in the least interfere with neatness of execution. Blithe and cheerful was she always, too, which is one of the best and most necessary qualifications in a person employed about children; for the heart of man in his early years is like one of those prepared plates, invented in our own days, which take a permanent print of the objects placed before them without any operation of man's hands to draw the outline or induce the light and shade. If our minds are as, we are told by great philosophers, but bundles of ideas, the objects that surround us in infancy—when our first impressions, which form the foundation of all the after structure, are acquired—can be of no slight importance, and the cheerfulness and contented character of the persons placed about a child have undoubtedly a powerful influence in giving the same happy tone to his after disposition.

But the most remarkable point in the character of Louise Pelet remains yet to be told. As one of her fellow-servants said of her, "she was destitute of amiable weaknesses." It was very generally admitted by her companions that she had never had a foiblesse for any one, and it seemed, moreover, that she was resolved never to have a tendresse either; so that grooms and coachmen, footmen and valets, nay, butlers and cooks themselves, assaulted her heart in vain. At the greater part she laughed, which is undoubtedly the best manner of extinguishing unwished-for love; but at the rest, if they persisted, she grew angry and impatient, and, indeed, showed very little compassion for the sufferers from the tender passion. Her indifference towards mankind proceeded from no neglect which she had met with from the other sex, for she certainly had been a very attractive personage, with a neat figure, a pretty foot and ankle, and good eyes and teeth; and even at the time that she entered the household of Madame de Langy, in her smart lace cap, her little characteristic jacket, and her red petticoat, she was still pleasant to look on, although she had passed her thirtieth year. Louise was, moreover, a sincere and devout Roman Catholic; that is to say, she had a strong sense of religion, and, of course, adhered to the doctrines in which she had been brought up. She heard mass whenever she had an opportunity, she fasted sturdily upon all days appointed for that purpose; and, although she had great powers of abstinence, she got thin upon the rigid observance of Lent, and somewhat pale before Easter-day. She confessed at the regular times and seasons; but it was always remarked that after confession she was more placable and less sharp in her replies than usual, and, consequently, Madame de Langy imagined that errors in temper formed the great bulk of her sins, and were the especial faults which the worthy priest thought fit to point out for amendment. Louise was a very sensible as well as a very conscientious person, and, having a clear insight into her own little weaknesses, she was always anxious to conquer them. Nevertheless, she was not a bigot, hated hypocrisy, in matters of religion endeavoured to prevent her left hand from knowing what her right did, made her fasting and her prayer both in secret, would hear even a priest blamed with perfect composure, and tolerated a jest at any of the many absurdities with which the folly of men had overloaded her Church.

Such was the personage to whom Madame de Langy had confided the care of her younger son; and, when the little boy was adopted by Monsieur de St. Medard, she stipulated that Louise Pelet should accompany him. The viscount consented willingly enough, as the presence of Louise relieved his mind of the only embarrassment which he anticipated; and, after she had been with him a short time, the esteem he felt for her was so great, that he resolved, if willing to stay, she should never quit his house, even after her charge of the boy was over.

For her part, Louise loved and respected her new master; and the only observation which she was ever known to make in his dispraise was, "It is a pity that he is such a fool as to have no religion, when so good a thing is to be got at every corner."

CHAPTER IV.

Years passed with Francis de Langy: the bark of life floated along the stream of time, filled with all the merry crew of boyhood, shouting on their way at every rock and angle that they turned, singing gay songs to the ripple of the waves, laughing at those whom they left behind upon the bank, though opening their eyes with astonishment, here and there, at the wrecks which they beheld even in those seemingly quiet waters.

Years passed by, and Monsieur de St. Medard's hair grew grayer. Victor and Adele de Langy fell into the slough of middle life. Their son, the young count, became a youth, imitating the faults and follies of men, tasting the first intoxicating drops of vice, and promising to pain his parents' heart with more than an ordinary share of errors and weaknesses. Their eyes often turned with longing and affection towards their second son, Francis, now somewhat past fourteen years of age, and unusually tall, strong, and powerful for his period of life. He was strikingly handsome in person too; and the eyes of Adele saw in his noble features, and still more noble expression, a promise that he would grow up with higher objects and pursuits than his brother, and make up, in pride and satisfaction to his father and herself, for the sorrows and anxieties which Victor was bringing upon them.

The character of the boy seemed fully to justify her in such hopes. The bold, frank openness of his disposition, which was the first thing that had won the love of his father's uncle, had never left him. He was fearless in all things, candid in all things; he knew not what a falsehood is—he scarcely conceived it possible to tell one. With nothing to conceal and with nothing to dread, truth was the first habit of his mind; and with truth there was, of course, cheerfulness. What is there that should prevent the heart from beating free when there is not a fetter upon it! But, although he was perfectly gay, happy, and contented, the continual society of Monsieur de St. Medard had, of course, produced its effect upon the young Francis de Langy. It gave him a thoughtful turn even in his gayety. His light-heartedness was not without reflection; his very cheerfulness proceeded from the pleasantness of his thoughts, not from the absence of them; so that he was, in fact, in mind as well as in body, more advanced than his years. It might be that the course of education which Monsieur de St. Medard pursued with him had produced the same effect upon his corporeal and his mental powers, for the viscount had taught him to examine the opinions he received, to investigate, to analyze, to combine; and, at the same time that he had given him these exercises for the mind, he had instructed him, or caused him to be instructed, in all those bodily exercises which strengthen the muscles and develop the powers of the human frame. At fourteen he was master of almost all weapons, an excellent swimmer, a good horseman, an unerring shot; and, as grace is the child of strength married to activity, there were few persons in whom that quality was more remarkable than in the boy whose course we have been tracing.

There was but one subject of daily interest on which Monsieur de St. Medard never spoke with his adopted son, and that was religion. With conscientious adherence to his word, he not only avoided throwing any doubts as stumbling-blocks in the young man's way, but he himself engaged a clergyman of irreproachable character, a man of sense, of learning, and of firmness, to act as his constant instructer, and to stay with him in the house. The Abbé Arnoux had travelled far, had seen many nations, had mingled with philosophers as well as ecclesiastics, had heard many opinions discussed, combated, and defended, and, remaining calmly firm in those which he had first received, was fully prepared to support them at all times against attack, whatever form it might assume. The viscount, in short, could not have chosen any one so capable of guarding his adopted son against his own peculiar notions as the person he gave him for a tutor; and, at the same time that he did so, he himself obtained for a companion one of the few men, as he expressed it, with whom he could converse reasonably. With the abbé, however, from delicacy of feeling, he abstained from all conversation on religion, as he did with his nephew from respect to his word; and but for the fact of his never setting his foot within the doors of a church, or attending upon any of the ordinances of religion, the boy would not have discovered that his kind relation differed from the rest of the world in his religious views. True it is, he took no great notice of the matter, and the Abbé Arnoux was a great deal too wise and too virtuous to call the attention of his pupil to what he looked upon as a lamentable error in the mind of their mutual benefactor.

Thus had proceeded the course of Francis de

Langy's life up to the period when, having passed the age of sixteen, it seemed necessary to Monsieur de St. Medard to give him a more general knowledge of the world; for, alas! that is a book which every man must study sooner or later, and he who has not some knowledge of it can never take a first place in the class into which he has been put. The viscount having now formally adopted his nephew—a proceeding surrounded with more legal securities in France, at least at that time, than is admissible in England—the king bestowed upon him the title of Baron de St. Medard, which he would have borne had he been actually the son of his father by adoption; and, accompanied by the Abbé Arnoux, with two servants, Monsieur de St. Medard and Francis de Langy set out on a tour through their native land.

It was in the spring of the year, but the spring far advanced, and touching upon summer; a season which in Paris and its neighbourhood is, perhaps, the most disagreeable, on account of the cloud of dust which hangs constantly in the air. The steps of the travellers were directed, in the first place, towards the celebrated baths of Mont d'Or, in order to reach which—as they varied their course according to the objects that they desired to see—they passed through a very interesting portion of the kingdom. But as this work is neither intended for a descriptive tour, nor an account of the principal manufactures of the eastern provinces of France, I shall hurry on with them towards Auvergne, which they approach in the beginning of the month of June.

Monsieur de St. Medard, although he had not prevented his adopted son from visiting any town which was worth his notice in the neighbourhood of their direct road, had nevertheless lost but little time by the way; for a latent desire of seeing some old and well-loved friends had, perhaps, directed his journey to Auvergne in the first place, and now somewhat quickened his movements, without his being aware that such was the case. It were trite to tell the reader that the causes of one half of our actions are unknown to us; for every man, who has at all examined his own mind, must have discovered that very often the motive most apparent to himself at the time was not the real one. But we may go a little farther and say, that, even when we do discover the principal motive, we seldom, if ever, perceive all those accessory causes which modify it in its course between conception and execution. The heart of man is a well of secrets, from which we bring up but one bucketful at a time; and truth—that is, the whole truth—still lies at the bottom.

Francis de Langy had hitherto been busy with the most material things of life, for there are various shades of substantiality in all that we deal with. First, there is the actual matter of the world, and the mere physical actions and enjoyments which spring from the exercises of our corporeal frame, from the indulgence of any of our animal appetites—the operation of matter upon matter. Then come, as another grand class of human objects and pursuits, those movements of the mind, and their subjects, which, though not actually dealing with corporeal substances, nevertheless are not independent of them, taking from them their indications and their terms. This comprises all the sciences, and many of the arts. A third class is still more refined and subtle in its nature and its objects. Though matter must always mingle, more or less, while we hold this mixed being, with all our thoughts and feelings, yet the imaginative powers of the mind are certainly those which receive less aid from the material world in which we live, and have more of the operations of the spirit in them, than any other of our faculties. The most abstract workings of the intellect—those, for instance, which have for their object the eternal truths of the mathematics, which would be if the worlds were not—still are forced to have recourse to material forms, and ideas borrowed from them, for the mind of man to be able to conceive them at all. But the thrilling sensations of the soul—the thoughts of the spirit, which are feelings—when awakened by fine music or called forth by some wide and magnificent scene, deal not at all with the mere material objects presented to our corporeal senses, but receive, as it were, an answer—a message from Heaven. Rightly directed, wisely used, imagination is the greatest gift and blessing of intellectual man. Whether he will or not, it mingles, more or less, with almost all his acts and almost all his pleasures. But how it may be taught to elevate and purify all those enjoyments, would man but give the due ascendency to the finer essence, and suffer it to direct his corporeal energies! How it might raise his tastes! how it might soften his feelings! how it might purify his desires! how it might ennoble his nature! how it might dignify his life! how it might tranquillize his death! for imagination must ever be an ingredient in that power by which we realize to ourselves "the substance of things not seen." To him who has imagination well directed, the whole universe and all its vicissitudes are but an instrument of eternal music, and the hand of God producing infinite harmony at every touch.

Francis de Langy had, as I have said, dealt hitherto with the more material things of life. Sciences he had studied, arts he had learned, athletic sports and vigorous exercises he had enjoyed; but imagination had received but little culture, and a small supply of food. A new world of sensations was about to be presented to him; a spirit that slumbered in his bosom was about to be roused; and the touch that woke her from her sleep was from the hand of Nature.

The three travellers had passed the night at a small and uncomfortable inn, dirty, neglected, and ill-furnished; and, rising early from beds which offered no inducement to remain longer in them than was absolutely necessary, they set out about five o'clock in the morning, intending to go on foot to Clermont, and thence to the Mont d'Or. A thick fog hung over the whole scene for the first two hours of their journey; but at length, after having changed horses in the small town of Aigueperse, they climbed on foot the high hill just beyond that place, while the carriage followed, and some signs of the mist dispersing began to appear ere they reached the top. The Abbé Arnoux was expressing his regret that they should be cut off from the beautiful view of Limagne which the top of the mountain displays, and cited some lines from Gregory of Tours, which afford, perhaps, the first record of a strong sense of picturesque beauty in one of the barbarous kings of the middle ages that we possess.

"Just such a misfortune as that which has befallen us to-day," said the abbé, "befell Childibert more than a thousand years ago. That was quite natural; but what was not quite so much to be expected, is the fact, that poor Childibert felt the disappointment as much as we can do, though he had no Claude Lorraine to instruct his eyes in the details of picturesque beauty."

"I think we shall be more fortunate than the king, abbé," said the viscount; "for, if I mistake not, the mist does not go beyond this side of the mountain. Do you not see the yellow sunshine there, appearing in a long line upon the edge of the sky, like the golden fringe upon the hangings of a throne? The wind sets from that quarter, too; so, take my word for it, we shall have it fine."

"If we were to stop for a minute," said the abbé, "we might, perhaps, have the view from the top; and, in the mean time, look here at this large square stone, one of the traces of a civilization passed away, as great, or, perhaps, greater than our own. We think that the art of printing will prove the elixir of life to our state of beings, and render all our inventions, discoveries, and improvements immortal. A thousand to one the hands which erected these milestones so many centuries ago, thought that the glories of the Roman name had in it as strong a principle of immortality, and that, embalmed in that mighty preservative, all her arts would be transmitted to every after age without decay or loss. 'Tiberius Claudius, Drusi filius, Cæsar, Augustus, Germanicus, Tribunitia potestate quinquies, Imperator undecies, Pater patriæ, Consul tertium, Consul designatus quartum, &c., &c., &c.,'" continued the abbé, reading with antiquarian ease the letters on the old Roman milestone. "The possessor of all these pompous titles, depend upon it, little thought that the pride of Rome would one day be but a page out of a half-forgotten history."

"But at all events," said the viscount, "you will allow, my good friend, that the art of printing is a vast safeguard to all our present discoveries and arts?"

"I really do not know," replied the abbé; "I believe the copies made by hand of many of the celebrated works now utterly lost were as numerous in proportion to the population as those produced by printing; and, if we look into any catalogue of books, we shall find many of them —though printed within a very few years of the present time—which are now scarcely to be procured; some of which there is only one copy known to exist; others, printed less than two hundred years ago, famous in their day and eagerly sought for now, of which only the title has descended to us. No, no; we can perpetuate nothing: there is no such thing as immortality on this side the grave."

"Or on the other," said the viscount in a low tone, as if speaking to himself.

But, nevertheless, Francis de Langy caught the words, and turned round with a sudden start. Monsieur de St. Medard perceived his surprise, and, vexed with himself for having been betrayed into such a speech, walked on, saying, "Come, Francis! Come, Monsieur Arnoux: the carriage will be at the top of the hill long before us, if we stay here discussing old monuments. But you see I was right; the mists have nearly cleared away."

"Would to God they had!" thought the abbé; but he was more careful than Monsieur de St. Medard had been, and uttered not aloud even a word that might shake the respect of Francis de Langy towards the viscount.

He followed slowly, however; while the youth, with his light, active limbs, hurried on before. The abbé's eyes were bent upon the ground, his whole look grave and thoughtful; and Monsieur de St. Medard, pausing for an instant, laid his hand upon his arm, saying, "I forgot myself, Arnoux; but I trust it has done no harm. You know that I would not counteract your efforts by a word."

"I am sure you would not," replied the abbé; "but let me ask once, and only once, my dear sir, whether, feeling, as you do, that such tenets are in themselves an evil you would not inflict on any one you love—whether, I say, it would not be better to endeavour to free your own mind from them?"

The viscount smiled. "It would take a long while, my dear abbé, to give you my reasons," he answered; "but first let me point to you an objection which is unanswerable, that, having discovered the truth, a sane man can never abandon it. His convictions must remain the same, whatever be his inclinations."

"Can truth, then," said the abbé, "ever be an evil a thing, that he, who is perfectly sure of possessing it, withholds it as a poison from those he loves? My friend, I should doubt the genuineness of the drug. I should think that it was some noxious composition, decorated with the title of a precious balm."

"It is the state of society," replied the viscount, "which renders that dangerous which is in itself good; as wholesome food and generous wine are death to a man in a fever."

"Nay, Monsieur de St. Medard," said the abbé, "I have heard you yourself own that there is more happiness, in life and in death, to be derived from what you call the dreams of religion, than from the most calm state of philosophical atheism."

The viscount nodded his head.

"Well, then," continued the abbé, "I will quote the words of one whom you allow to be the wisest man that ever lived, and whom I think wiser than any man that ever lived. He told us that you should know a tree by its fruit: and I contend, with him, that a good tree will bring forth good fruit. It is worth some thought, my friend and benefactor, for every man to ask himself, with Pilate, 'What is truth?' for it is upon that which depends eternity."

The viscount made no answer, but walked on musing, and at the top of the hill they found Francis de Langy gazing with a look of wild enthusiasm upon the magnificent scene that lay spread out before him. His whole features seemed lighted up, his quivering lips were apart, the glow in his cheek was heightened, his very breath withheld. It was the first time in his young life that he had been strongly affected by the beauty of the earth he dwelt in; and now it seemed to come upon him all at once: the impression of a mighty power in nature which he had never known before, but which instantly found a responsive spirit in his own heart, and roused imagination within him never to sleep again.

The landscape he looked upon was indeed most beautiful. The mist, rising like a curtain, hid the tops of the hills; but the sun, not yet half way up to the highest point of his course, poured a flood of radiance over the plain, or rather valley, of Limagne, which lay enchased like a rich jewel, reflecting the morning light with a thousand hues, in the midst of the golden mountains of Auvergne.

Who can describe the first sight of that fair land in the early day, with its innumerable undulations, its banks, its rocks, its soft green pastures, its woods, its dells, its castles, and its thousand streams! At that moment, too, it was perhaps as lovely as ever it was seen: various things have since made changes greatly to the diminution of its beauty; many of the châteaux are gone which once topped the hills, many of the old castles have fallen to the ground, the dull, straight walls of manufactories have here and there disfigured the sweetest parts of the valley, and the progress of a destructive revolution, as well as the advance of arts, and the increase of population, have changed its aspect for the worse. Then nature was supreme; and if man's works were there, if the towers of a distant town met the eye in one direction, or the pinnacles of an old country-house were seen in another, they were but as children nestling in a mother's breast; while the decaying walls of feudal buildings on the rocks and mountains, from which their gray and moss-covered stones could with difficulty be distinguished, seemed to blend both nature, and art, and past, and present, together in one sweet harmony. At that moment, too, the dewy mist, from out her jewelled treasury, had scattered glowing diamonds over the whole plain, and the bright sun, triumphing over the retiring vapours, gathered them as spoils while they glittered in his beams.

Light and loveliness were before the young man's eyes; and, as he gazed, a spring bird in its full song of love burst forth from a tree that overhung the road, and added another voice to the grand music of the whole.

The viscount and Arnoux paused by his side; neither spoke for a moment, for to them the wonder and enjoyment of the young bright being before them were as beautiful as the scene, and indeed its climax. It wanted but the sight of such high pure delight to make it perfect.

CHAPTER V.

A few miles beyond Riom the travellers once more descended from the carriage, though at this time there was no picturesque beauty of any peculiar character to attract them. The sole inducements to travel on foot were a steep hill (which the new road avoids), and the relief given by a change of position. The scenery, indeed, was pleasant enough in its way, as the carriage was at the time passing through one of those large woods, so common in France, which, though principally planted for the sake of profit, add not a little to the beauty of the country and the comfort of the traveller. The trees were old and fine; the frequent streamlets of Auvergne rendered the shades musical with the voice of falling waters; and all the little accidents of rock, and broken bank, and rustic chapel, and greensward brake were there, to please the eye as the party walked along.

"That path cuts off half the hill," said one of the postilions, pointing with his whip, and speaking in the patois of his country; "it takes you, too, by St. Mary's chapel and fountain, which so many people go to see."

"Well, then, I think we will go too," replied the viscount. "We are for seeing all sights; are we not, Francis?"

"Oh, yes, let us see everything that can be seen," cried the eager youth; and on he went at a rapid pace along the path to which the man pointed, and upon which the viscount and the abbé followed him more slowly. It was one of those small narrow paths through a wood, which, to me at least, are so full of temptation that I can scarcely pass by the end of one of them, and gaze down into the green light and shade that it displays, without being seduced to quit the plain highway, and track its winding course at any risk. Alas, reader! they are, too, like the sweet by-ways that branch off at every step from the common road of life; very, very pleasant at their commencement, but too often rough and dangerous before they close, and leading us to things we never dreamed of, and from which it is very difficult to return.

Such, however, was not the case in the present instance. The path continued even and good; a great part of the steep ascent of hill was saved, and the walk was shady and cool, with the trees close enough to hide the traveller from the sun, but not to impede the free air from refreshing his cheek as he walked along. The ground all round, too, was covered with forest flowers, which are so very much more beautiful in France than in this country; and with the strong, impetuous step of youth, which still hurries forward to the exhaustion of all joys, Francis de Langy sped on before his two more aged companions, and was ere long lost to their sight in the turnings of the wood. They could hear his steps, however, for the hard ground echoed the tread; but in a minute or two the sound of his footfall suddenly ceased, and the next instant a loud shout from his well-known voice met their ear.

"Quick, quick! come hither!" he cried, "come hither!" and, hastening forward, they found him kneeling down beside the inanimate form of a girl apparently about his own age.

She was evidently of the higher ranks of society; and though as pale as death, and in fact to all appearance dead, yet as her head rested upon the arm of the young Baron de St. Medard, with her eyes closed, and the long black lashes resting on her cheek, the beautiful line of the eyebrow clear and defined on the pale marble skin, the rich brown hair falling back from the forehead, the delicate mouth with the bloodless lips apart, and the brilliant white teeth glistening below, a more lovely and interesting countenance was never beheld, even among the ancient statues which she looked so like. Her dress was fine, though simple: a golden cross and chain were round her neck; her bonnet, which she seemed to have been carrying in her hand, had dropped beside her; and her garments were only so far discomposed by her fall as to display one small foot and beautiful ankle. She seemed to have received no injury of any kind, but appeared to have fallen down suddenly, either dead or fainting.

Francis de Langy was but little familiar with death, and, as he saw her lie so still, he thought that the spirit was gone forever; but the Abbé Arnoux and the viscount were more acquainted with such things, and the former, kneeling down beside her, soon pronounced that she had merely fainted.

"They talked of a fountain," he said; "let us carry her thither;" and, the moment he had spoken the words, his pupil, without waiting for any assistance, caught her up in his strong young arms, and ran on with her along the path.

At the distance of less than a couple of hundred yards there was a little opening in the wood, with a small shrine of an antique date, in a chaste and simple style of Gothic architecture, displaying a figure of St. Mary Magdalen behind an iron grating. At the foot of the shrine, and only separated from it by a sufficient space for two or three votaries to kneel, was a basin of stone, which seemed as if it had once been the upper part of a font in some church of the middle ages; but now, pierced at the bottom to receive the water from below, it formed a beautiful little well, over the edge of which a small perfectly limpid stream flowed away down the rock, and lost itself in the wood.

It was by the side of this fountain that Francis de Langy stopped; and, laying his fair burden down upon the grass, he had sprinkled her face with water before the viscount and the abbé came up. She did not revive, indeed, but a slight movement of the features filled the boy's heart with joy, by convincing him that she still breathed; and when the abbé joined him he exclaimed, "She is living! Oh yes, she is living indeed!"

The good man smiled. "I never doubted it, Francis," he said. "She will come to herself soon. Do not raise her head, she will be better as she is. We must sprinkle her face again with the tears of St. Magdalen, as the people call this water. You rub her hands, Francis;" and, filling his hollowed palm out of the fountain, the abbé cast the cold liquid suddenly on her face and bosom.

A gasp, as for breath, succeeded; and the youth, taking one of the fair small hands in his, chafed it gently, but anxiously, with somewhat new sensations, as he felt that smooth marble-like touch, and gazed upon those beautiful features. They were strange sensations, innocent and pure, and guileless—calm and cold, indeed, as that soft hand itself, but different from anything that he had ever known before. He had loved his father, his mother, and him who had adopted him; he had felt deep interests towards them—affection, tenderness, gratitude; but it had always been with a looking up, with a reverence for, with a dependance upon them; and, with the heart of man, it is not for those to whom we lift our eyes that we experience the deepest tenderness, it is for those placed a step below us. The sensations of pity, the power of aiding, protecting, defending, supporting, were all new to the bosom of Francis de Langy; and he now felt the thrill of them for the first time. It was as a supplement to the new spirit which had been aroused within him that day by the first sight of Limagne. Imagination! tenderness! what wanted he more of manhood! Love! and that was to come ere long.

Their care was not long in producing its effect: two or three long-drawn sighs, and a slight shudder, soon showed that sensation was returning to the fair object of their solicitude; and, in about five minutes more, she opened her eyes still faintly, and turned them from the one to the other. The first thing they rested on was the soft and ruddy face of youth; the next was the fine countenance of Monsieur de St. Medart, full of calm, grave thought; the next was the mild, benevolent aspect of the Abbé Arnoux; and the poor girl seemed to receive from each some especial comfort and assurance, for a gentle smile came upon her lip as she raised herself slightly upon her arm.

"Lie still, my dear young lady, lie still," said the ecclesiastic; "you will soon be better. You are among friends."

She suffered her head to droop back again upon the grass, and once more closed her eyes, which were of a deep, deep blue; but the increasing colour in her lips, and the faint rose that began to spread over her cheek, like the first blush of dawn in the pale morning sky, showed that the heart was beating more freely, and sending the warm current of life through the veins from which it had been withdrawn.

Oh! how beautiful did she look; and with what intense admiration did Francis de Langy gaze, as the change took place! It was like the statue of the Greek sculptor, when, warming to the prayer of love, the cold limbs softened into life. In a few minutes she once more opened her eyes, and her lips moved. "I am better," she said; "thank you, I am better. I can get back again home now."

"Nay, nay, stay a moment," replied the viscount; "try your strength first, young lady; and, when you are quite recovered, we will aid you home. Is it far?"

"Oh, no," she answered, raising herself again upon her arm, and looking down the path by which they had come with somewhat anxious and apprehensive eyes; "it is very near, not a quarter of a league; but I can go on now, and I would fain get back to the chateau."

The viscount and the abbé aided her to rise; while Francis de Langy stood near and gazed, for a sudden timidity had come upon him, he knew not why. But at length he burst suddenly forth, on seeing her look around as if seeking for something; and exclaiming, "Oh! we left it behind where we found you—we forgot it," he darted down the path.

Some sudden emotion, however, seemed to seize their fair companion, and she cried, "Oh, no, no! Do not go, do not go! Not that way!" while her cheek turned pale again, and a look of terror came over her whole countenance.

"What is the matter?" demanded the viscount. "Is there any danger there?" Has any one injured or attacked you?"

"No," she replied, in a broken and confused manner, "no: I saw something that frightened me, and—and—I fainted, I suppose; for I felt sick, and then everything disappeared."

"Perhaps playing the truant a little, my child?" said the abbé.

"Oh no!" she answered, colouring, and turning her dark blue eyes full upon him. "My mother sent me. I often walk through all these woods alone."

"What was it frightened you, then?" asked the viscount. But she cast down her eyes; the colour left her face; and, before any more questions could be put to her, Francis de Langy was seen coming rapidly back, carrying her bonnet in his hand.

"Now, my child," said the Abbé Arnoux, "take the arm of Monsieur de St. Medard, and let us guide you home. You must direct us on the way, however, for we do not know it."

"Either path will take us to the chateau," replied the young lady, "but we had better take this one;" and, receiving her bonnet from the hands of the young baron, she thanked him in a low voice, while she raised her eyes to the face of Monsieur de St. Medard, as if asking, "Shall we go on?"

The viscount led her on the path before them, while the abbé, seeing that she still walked feebly, supported her on the other side; and Francis de Langy followed. His uncle, however, turned his eyes from time to time to their fair companion's face with a thoughtful and contemplative look; and at length, just as they were coming within sight of the high road, he said, "I cannot but think, mademoiselle, that, by a strange chance, this pretty hand that leans upon my arm is near akin to some I deeply love. May I ask whose child you are?"

She looked up in his face with an expression which was not explained for many years, and replied, "My mother is the Countess d'Artonne."

The viscount took her hand in his, and pressed his lips upon it.

"I thought so," he said; "at your age she was very like you."

"Oh, but she was very beautiful!" cried the girl; "I am sure she was very beautiful!"

The viscount smiled, and so did the good Abbé Arnoux: but the former only answered, "She was indeed;" and then observed, "You speak of your mother only; but your father is alive, and well, I hope. He was so not a month ago, for I heard from him then."

Once more she had turned somewhat pale; but she replied, "Oh yes, my father is well, and here."

The viscount marked the changing expression of her countenance, and he asked himself, "Can D'Artonne be a harsh father! he, who was so full of deep, I may almost say, passionate fondness for those he loved! Oh no, that can never be," he added in his own thoughts; and then, turning to her again, he demanded, "Is the chateau, to which you are now returning, the one you usually inhabit, Mademoiselle d'Artonne! I thought it was on the other side of Clermont."

"No, we always live here," she answered. "I recollect once being at Capelet, but it was only for a month. The Chateau d'Artonne is here above, and the village lies down there below. I have just come from it;" and, after having spoken, she fell into thought again, till the viscount stopped by the side of the carriage, which was waiting for them at the mouth of the little path.

"It will be better, fair lady," he said, "for us all to get in and drive up to the chateau; for I have long promised your father a visit, and intended to-morrow to go to his house from Clermont."

Mademoiselle d'Artonne made no objection; and, the whole party being seated in the vehicle, the postillion drove on quickly, and, in five minutes more, were in the court of the chateau.

On visiting the house of a French gentleman of the present day, if the door be open, which is very frequently the case, one may very often walk into an empty hall, and knock at half a dozen different doors, without finding any servant to answer inquiries, or conduct a stranger to the master or mistress of the house. Such, however, was not the case before the Revolution; and it is necessary to compare the two periods together whenever we wish to estimate the proportion of Americanism that has been infused into the habits of Frenchmen. I say Americanism advisedly; for republicanism is a very different thing, and does not imply a rejection of refinement in the higher classes of society, or want of due attention and respect for those who employ them in the lower. In those days, in the house of every gentleman of wealth and distinction, two or three servants in full costume were to be found waiting in the vestibule to receive any visiters who might appear, and to answer all inquiries. If they were not much better than the servants of our own times in France, they were not much worse, and certainly were very much more pleasant in their demeanour. In the present instance, no sooner did the carriage stop at the door, than two of them instantly presented themselves, but appeared not a little surprised on seeing their young lady handed out by two strange gentlemen.

Mademoiselle d'Artonne had now recovered herself completely; and mixing timid inexperience, not ungraceful in itself, with habits of ease and youthful confidence, which are always graceful, she led the viscount and his companions forward, through the vestibule and the hall beyond, to a small painted and gilded room where her mother usually sat.

The countess was there, as her daugher expected, but rose, on seeing three strangers, and gazed with an inquiring eye upon the face of Monsieur de St. Medard as he advanced. The next instant, however, her whole face lighted up, and she exclaimed, "Charles de St. Medard, is it you! This is indeed a pleasure. Julie, call your father. Call him quick, my love."

The colour had fluttered upon the cheek of Monsieur de St. Medard, like that which we see coming and going in the face of an inexperienced girl at the sudden presence of some one whom she loves; but he stayed Mademoiselle d'Artonne as she was about to go, saying, "You had better send a servant, dear lady; my fair young friend here needs repose and care. We found her fainting in the wood; something had frightened her."

All a mother's anxieties were instantly in arms, and the countess questioned her daughter eagerly as to what could have created such alarm. Julie either would not or could not tell, however. She blushed, turned pale, and faltered: "She could not say," she replied, "'twas something in the bushes—she saw it but faintly;" and her reluctance, while it excited her mother's curiosity, was evidently too strong and too painful for Madame d'Artonne to press her more at that moment.

She turned then to Monsieur de St. Medard, asked him manifold questions regarding his fate and happiness during the last seventeen or eighteen years, welcomed the Abbé Arnoux and his young charge, and, gazing in the face of Francis de Langy, remarked, turning, to the viscount, "He is very like your elder brother."

While she was still speaking, the door opened, and a fine, tall, powerful man, of the middle age, dressed in a hunting-coat of green, with some gold lace about it, entered the boudoir, and instantly clasped the hand of his friend St. Medard, saluting him and his two companions after the ordinary habit of France.

"Julie has been frightened, D'Artonne," said the countess; "frightened by something, she will not say what, and fainted in the wood."

The count turned to his daughter with a look of eager anxiety. "Indeed, my dear Julie!" he cried, holding out his arms towards her; "come to your father, my beloved child. I have scarce seen you to-day. Come to my heart, my Julie, come!"

Julie hesitated, turned pale, then red, and then, casting herself into her father's arms, burst into tears; while the count pressed her to his bosom with tenderness and warmth, which left no doubt of the strength of his affection. Both father and mother now applied themselves to soothe her, and she soon regained her tranquillity; but the Countess d'Artonne thought it would be better for her to lie down to repose for a few hours; and she left the party in the boudoir for that purpose. The count mused as his daughter quitted the room; and the countess said, "It is very strange what can have alarmed Julie in this manner! She has, in general, such firm nerves. Some bear, or some wolf, perhaps; but then why not say so?"

"Very likely an ideal terror, madam," observed the Abbé Arnoux; "and the fear of being laughed at may perhaps be the cause of her silence."

"I know not," anwered the countess, "but she has usually no terrors of any kind. However, it is very strange, and I will question her closely when she is somewhat recovered."

"You had better not, my dear wife," replied the count. "Leave the sweet girl to her own discretion. In our house, St. Medard, we all trust each other; and we have none of us ever had cause to think that trust misplaced."

"Confidence is the first duty of noble minds," said the viscount. "It is only the weak and the narrow-minded who, from the somewhat hard lessons of the world, acquire the false wisdom of doubting those who have never deceived them."

The count gazed at him with a bright smile. "That is so like the St. Medard of other days," he exclaimed; "but the St. Medard of other days is the St. Medard of to-day also. I see you old bachelors are made of hard and unchangeable stuff; but we, who bring domestic sweets about us, get softened and kneaded into new forms. But come, St. Medard, you shall stay a month with us, and see whether the pleasant spectacle of home and family happiness, even in France, may not teach you at length to try your fate in the same way.'

The viscount laughed, and shook his head. "Nay, nay," he answered; "two and fifty years, D'Artonne, are quite sufficient to harden one, as you call it, into a crust that nothing can soften. Besides, here is my son already; and I am afraid that my good friend, the Abbé Arnoux, must supply the place of the lady of the mansion. But we will spend a week with you, D'Artonne, and see all the fair things of Auvergne, if you will show them to us. After that, we must speed on upon our way, for I must take Francis here through one half of France before the winter sets in. The other we must visit next summer."

The count smiled, and vowed that he would detain them no longer; and to this conversation succeeded the arrangement of rooms, the unpacking of the carriage, and all the little bustle of an arrival.

People dined early in those days, especially in Auvergne; and some change of dress and other preparations had scarcely been made by the viscount and his companions, when they were summoned to the dining-room. Monsieur and Madame d'Artonne were alone, their daughter being still in her chamber; and it would seem that the slight illness which had befallen her, and the fear which occasioned it, weighed upon her father more than he liked to show; for, though he affected gayety, and displayed every sign of being rejoiced at his old friend's visit, he fell more than once into a deep fit of thought, and his brow grew gloomy and sad. When dinner was over, and the dessert on the table, Madame d'Artonne rallied her husband upon his gravity. "You are anxious about Julie," she said. "There never was so apprehensive a father, Monsieur de St. Medard. I will go and see how she is, to satisfy you, Alphonse."

"Nay, I will go myself," replied her husband, rising from table. "I will be back in a moment."

But he was gone near half an hour. When he returned, his face bore a look of relief, and he said, "She is better, she is much better; but she is not inclined to say what it was that frightened her, and I do not wish her to be questioned farther on the subject."

"Oh, very well," replied the countess; "I suppose it is as Monsieur Arnoux suggests, some girlish fright that she is now ashamed of."

"Perhaps so," replied the count, and the conversation dropped.

After sitting for a short time, the whole party moved out into the grounds that surrounded the Chateau d'Artonne, and which some skilful artist of the line-and-rule school had laboured zealously, about forty years before, to deprive of everything like picturesque beauty. The fine old woods were cut into stars and crescents, affording, it is true, some beautiful views, every now and then, of the surrounding scenery, with shady walks and pleasant places of repose innumerable, but still quite unsuited to the character of the country round, and to the chateau itself, which had probably been built in the days of Henry IV., or perhaps before. They were, however, the pink of perfection, according to French taste, at the period of which I speak, and received their climax from what was called a jardin

Anglais, which was unlike anything that ever was seen in Great Britain between the Land's End and Ultima Thule. What rendered the park, however, certainly very delicious at that period of the year, was the multitude of streams and fountains that it contained, the waters of which were disposed with great taste, affording a pleasant coolness to the air at every turn, with pleasant sights to the eye, and murmuring sounds to the ear.

After the party had sauntered through the park for about half an hour, the Count d'Artonne was called away by a servant, and Monsieur de St. Medard walked on by the side of the countess, talking over old times. The topic was one which seemed to interest them both deeply; and many a little incident and scene of the past was recalled, which was spoken of with a feeling, one may almost say a tenderness, which had something peculiar in it. They were both grave and calm, two friends conversing upon things that were gone; but yet it seemed as if sensations that were gone, too, mingled with the stream of thought, and gave it a softer, perhaps a sadder character.

There is no reason why I should keep the reader in any doubt upon this subject. Monsieur de St. Medard had been deeply attached to the Countess d'Artonne before she had become the wife of his friend. What had been her own sentiments towards him he did not now, for he had offered his hand and been refused by her parents, who softened the disappointment, as far as such disappointments can be softened, by telling him that they had long before promised their daughter to the Count d'Artonne. St. Medard had instantly quitted the pursuit; and, feeling that his sensations might be more than he could control if he indulged them at all, he had absented himself altogether from the society, not only of the lady whom he loved, but of the friend whose wife he became. Whether d'Artonne was aware of his affection or not, he never knew; and, though it had not been disguised from the countess herself before her marriage, he had too much delicacy of feeling even to refer to it now, though their conversation turned upon the very days when it was at its height. The only glimmering of that tenderness which shone through the shadiness which memory seemed to cast over their conversation, appeared when Madame d'Artonne observed, with a sigh, "Those youthful days are, indeed, happy ones, Monsieur de St. Medard, whatever one may think at the time. But it was very wrong of you not to come to see us long ago."

"Nay," replied the viscount, with a sigh; "nay, dear lady, it was very right."

The moment after, Monsieur d'Artonne rejoined them, with a grave air. "Madame de Jansac," he said, speaking to his wife, "has sent to inquire whether Martin is here. His dog, it seems, has returned alone. Some new folly or vice, I suppose."

"He owes one half of them to his mother," replied Madame d'Artonne, "and is as much to be pitied as blamed. But to dream of our giving him Julie is something too preposterous."

"That could never be," said Monsieur d'Artonne, in a tone so stern and altered, that his wife started, and turned to look in his face.

It was calm, though grave; and Madame d'Artonne continued, addressing the viscount, "You recollect Henriette de l'Orne?"

"Oh! quite well," replied Monsieur de St. Medard, "both married and unmarried; and so the fair Henriette, it seems, has lost none of her amiable qualities."

Madame d'Artonne looked down, and smiled, with a very meaning look; but the count answered, "So far from it, St. Medard, that she has added to them many another, which were, perhaps, indeed concealed in the girl, but are very apparent in the woman. Capricious, coquettish, vain, weak, and false she always was; but now—"

"Hush, hush, hush, my dear Alphonse!" exclaimed his wife; "for pity's sake, do spare her a little. Recollect, my friend, she is a woman, and our near relation."

"A bad woman is worse than a bad man," said the count.

"You think so because they are more rare," replied his wife, laughing; and the party returned to the chateau.

CHAPTER VI.

An hour or two before nightfall, Julie d'Artonne rejoined the party, which had now assembled in the library of the chateau, a fine old room with deep windows, lined up to the ceiling with ancient volumes in rich but faded bindings. The declining sun was shining through the tall, square casements with some portion of the glow of evening in his light, and the warm colour that he cast upon her beautiful features and graceful form seemed to add to her loveliness, as, entering the room with a timid yet graceful step, Julie d'Artonne approached the table where her father and mother were seated conversing with the viscount, conscious that she would be an object of attention and interest to all.

The little embarrassment, however, soon passed away; her father spoke calmly and kindly to her, her mother gayly and cheerfully, and Monsieur de St. Medard, mingling a certain degree of courteous gallantry with fatherly tenderness, soon made her feel as much at home with him as if she had known him from her youth. Francis de Langy said nothing to her, for his was that particular age when there is a sort of timid consciousness of stronger affections yet undeveloped, which ties the tongue by the first influence of the passion, afterward so eloquent. He stood in one of the windows, however, and gazed on her, as she entered, not only with admiration, but interest. Admiration, indeed, forms but a very small part of love; and the boy was, in truth, advancing by very easy steps towards that passion. The Abbé Arnoux was standing near him, examining the illuminated title-page of a book which he had taken down; and the eyes of Julie d'Artonne, when—after speaking to her parents and the viscount for a moment or two—they turned in that direction, might be either looking at the instructer or the pupil.

"You should thank our young friend the baron, Julie," said Madame d'Artonne, "for it seems that it was he who first found you this morning in the wood, and was your first physician, carrying you to the fountain and sprinkling your face with water; a skilful doctor, truly, for one who has so lately commenced practice."

Julie smiled, and, advancing towards Francis, gave him her hand, expressing in graceful language the thanks her mother told her were his due. Girls of that age are almost always less timid than young men, but Francis de Langy, thus encouraged, would not, and did not, let the opportunity pass; but, forcing himself to do what he knew was courteous and right, he told her how happy he was to have rendered her any assistance. In the mean while, the conversation between the rest of the party had turned to other subjects: the Abbé Arnouz had advanced to speak with the Count d'Artonne; and Julie and Francis remained in the window, talking together for nearly half an hour. The ice was broken between them from that moment, and such a cold commodity had never anything to do with their after intercourse through life.

How long their conversation would have continued is not for me to say; for most young people are fond of sweet things, and they found it very pleasant. But it was interrupted, at length, by the voice of Monsieur d'Artonne, exclaiming, "Come hither, come hither, and hear what we have determined. Monsieur de St. Medard will spend a week with us after his return from seeing all the fair sights of Auvergne—"

The face of Francis de Langy looked very blank; for, to say the truth, he thought he had already seen the fairest thing that Auvergne could produce, and he loved not to be hurried away from it. But the subsequent words of the count soon cleared his countenance again.

"This is by far the best arrangement," continued Monsieur d'Artonne; "for it will give us an opportunity of sharing his tour, showing him all the wonders of our province, and afterward talking them all over under the shade of our own trees."

If one might judge by Julie's face, she was not less satisfied with the arrangement than the rest of the party; and her father, remarking the look of pleasure that his announcement called up, added, with a cheerful smile, "We must all take our part in doing the honours of Auvergne, and to you, Julie, I commit the charge of guide, interpreter, and instructer to your young friend there; so, if he be not able to answer a complete catechism upon the beauties, antiquities, and natural productions of the province, and to speak, with the accent of a native, our own round harmonious Auvergnat, I shall call you to account for it."

"Give me time, give me time," said Julie, whose spirits, naturally light and cheerful, were beginning to rise again; "give me time, and I will answer for the rest."

"Oh! you shall have time," replied Monsieur de St. Medard; "we do not travel as some people do, hurrying from object to object without affording them a second look or a second thought: we go really to see, really to think, really to observe, in short; and we wish the impressions of to-day to be gathered as not only memories for to-morrow, but as treasures for the time to come."

"We will all early to bed to-night," said the count, "that we may be up with the sun to-morrow morning. Old Pierrot, who rode courier for us, Elise—do you recollect?—some seventeen years ago, shall go on before and prepare horses for us, and rooms, and dinners, and suppers, and all the comforts of this life; for in Auvergne, you know, St. Medard, one cannot travel as one does in other parts of France, trusting to the providence of innkeepers to have everything ready, even if a whole army were to arrive."

So went on the conversation for some hours, in the course of which the whole arrangements were made for their journey; and the evening passed pleasantly enough. The count evidently exerted himself to show his friend how sincerely rejoiced he was to see him; and though, from time to time, he fell into a fit of deep thought, yet it was never of long continuance, and he roused himself to be as gay as ever. Twice, indeed, during the course of the evening, one of the servants announced that Madame de Bausse had sent to make inquiries if her son had been heard of at the Chateau d'Artonne; and the count answered somewhat impatiently, saying, "Pray, tell her he has not been here. You may add, too, that I have had friends with me all day, or I would have ridden down to see her."

"The man who has come up, sir," rejoined the servant to whom he spoke, and who was an old and privileged person in the family, "the man who has come up, sir, says that his lady thinks the young marquis has been murdered; and she has had his valet, who was out all the morning, arrested whenever he came home."

"Nonsense!" cried the marquis. "I dare say, by their rash acts," he continued, speaking to his wife, "both mother and son have made themselves enemies enough in the country; but by accusing an innocent person of murdering her son, before she knows that he has been murdered at all, she will not effect anything to discover him."

"I doubt not in the least," said the countess, "that the first thing heard of him will be that he is at Paris, overwhelmed with debts and follies. If you remember, Alphonse, it was so just eighteen months ago; and nothing would bring him home again till he was sent back by the king, for some cause, I do not well remember what."

"He drew his sword upon one of the gardes du corps," replied Monsieur de St. Medard, "on the terrace at Versailles; a very gross misdemeanour indeed. In former days he would have been punished more severely."

"Oh he will be found in Paris," exclaimed the countess. But her husband said nothing, and Julie sat in silence, with her eyes bent down upon the ground. Francis de Langy had remarked the words which Madame d'Artonne had used, during their morning's walk, in regard to the pretensions of Monsieur de Bausse to the hand of Julie, and he now asked himself, "Is she pained to hear him thus spoken of? Or is she anxious respecting his fate? Can she, though so young, have felt love towards this man? Perhaps it is so;" and he experienced those sensations rising up in his own bosom, which, whatever may be their primary source in the human heart—whether vanity, pride, or any other modification of selfishness—most men of fine minds have experienced towards those they ove; a degree of jealousy, not so much of acts

s of thoughts and feelings; a jealousy that ex-ends, not alone to the present and the future, ut to the past. He felt that, if love be the tree
f life to the heart of man, the value of the gold-n fruit is injured if any touch but one's own rushes away even the first bloom. Young minds, however, dwell not long upon such hings, and very soon, the conversation taking nother turn, the Marquis de Bausse and all con-erning him passed away from the minds of the reater part of the persons there present, and he evening went by cheerfully till they sep-rated to rest.

The Abbé Arnoux sat for about a quarter of n hour in the chamber of his pupil, for he was very conscientious man, and sought not alone o store the mind of Francis de Langy, but to rain it; and every night he conversed with him or a short time over the events of the past day, ommenting upon all that had taken place in a ild and pleasant, though grave tone; seeking s much to induce a habit of self-examination n the mind of his young friend, as to draw intruction and counsel from the occurrences past nder review. But upon the present occasion he admonitions of the abbé were less success-l than usual, though they were as wise as ever, nd given more in the manner of quiet converation than of serious instruction; but the truth as, that Francis de Langy had two worlds now
o deal with, the world without and the world ithin, and of the latter the good abbé could see ery little. Like the globe which we inhabit, at world had been called into existence in one ay, and Francis de Langy, the Adam of his wn paradise, longed to be alone to examine all at it contained.

When the abbé was gone, a servant presented mself; but he was more easily disposed of;
r, after having taken the dressing-gown from s hands, his young master told him he wanted othing more, and sent him quickly away. Then, asting himself into a large arm-chair, he gave imself up to thought, while his eyes wandered ound the wide old chamber, lined with black ak, and floored with smooth and glossy tiles.

His feelings were certainly strange; for, as e have said, a new world had opened to him, world of sensations altogether fresh. It seem-d as if that one day had given him more than ll the rest of life. It was one of those changes f existence which affect men of eager and en-rgetic character almost always suddenly. Up o that morning, his life had been comparatively nerely animal: the intellect had been awake, it s true, to think, to reason, to act; it was the oul that had slept—the soul, whose task is to eel. His existence had been that of the chrys-lis; but now one gleam of summer sunshine ad burst the cold husk around him, and the ght creature of air had put forth her wings, ever to sheath them again on this side of the omb. Oh, beautiful symbol of the Greeks! ow well dost thou represent man's agitated pirit, fluttering, wandering from hour to hour, eeking thy honeyed food from all the bright hings of God; yet frail and delicate as the owers on which thou restest, wounded by a ouch, defaced by a drop of rain, blown hither nd thither by a breath of wind, crushed by the irst wintry storm! Oh, beautiful symbol of the Greeks, thou art indeed too sadly like the soul!"

He sat for an hour trying to disentangle his own thoughts; but finding them still one bewildered maze, and at length impatient with the fruitless effort, he determined he would cast himself down to rest. There, too, he was disappointed: no sleep would visit his eyelids; and after tossing for half an hour, gazing, by the light of the lamp which he had left burning on the table, at some quaint old heads grinning on the sculptured cornice around, he rose, threw on his dressing-gown, and saying, "I will get a book," he quitted his chamber, and descended the short wooden staircase which led to the ground floor of the house.

He knew the door of the library well; and, crossing the hall towards it, he opened it suddenly and went in, expecting to find it dark and untenanted. To his astonishment, however, he perceived the Count d'Artonne walking up and down the room with his hands tightly clasped together, and his eyes fixed upon the ground. It was but for an instant that he beheld him in this attitude; for the opening of the door made the count look up immediately, and a glance of anger crossed his countenance. When he saw who it was, however, the expression of irritation passed away; and, as Francis de Langy was withdrawing, he called to him to come in.

"What! my young friend," he said; "are you a passer of sleepless nights? I thought that the hours of youth had a hallowed charm against watchful care; and that it was manhood alone, with its anxieties, and disappointments, and satieties, and steril aspirations, that was bound to keep the weary eye wide open, or to close it in vain during the long vigils of the night."

He spoke almost bitterly; but Francis de Langy had neither right nor inclination to inquire farther into the misanthropical tone of his host, and he merely replied, "I know not how it is, but I have not been able to fall asleep. I have seen so many things to-day that I cannot get them out of my head, and so, after trying for some time, I came down to seek for a book to amuse myself."

"And an excellent way, too," answered the count; "I never thought of it. But what book will you choose? Here are plenty of every kind. Here is Corneille; will you take him?"

"No," replied De Langy; "that is not a book to go to sleep upon."

"Voltaire!" said the count. "He is a great favourite of your uncle's."

"Nay," answered the young man; "I did not know that. I have read much of his poetry, but not much of his philosophy; I did not like it."

"Ha!" exclaimed the count: "how so?"

"Why, it seemed to me," said Francis de Langy, "though I am not very competent to form an opinion, that he was always trying to put the universe in a spoon; I mean, that he appeared to think his own mind could comprehend everything, and that, from the little he could see upon this earth, he could judge of the boundless power and wisdom that created it."

"Ha!" cried the count thoughtfully, "ha! Your uncle surely does not teach you such things?"

"Oh no," replied the youth, "he leaves me to follow what course of reading I think best; and, indeed, I never heard him speak upon the subject."

"And the Abbé Arnoux," said Monsieur d'Artonne, "does he prohibit Voltaire?"

"Oh no," replied Francis de Langy. "The only thing I ever recollect he said upon the subject was, that people should beware in reading him, lest they should take a jest for a reason, and receive a doubt where they can get at a certainty."

"He was right," answered the count: "he was right; and yet what is there certain in this world?"

Francis de Langy looked down for a moment, and then said, in an inquiring tone, "I thought many things were certain, the first principles of all things, such as that there can be no effect without a cause."

"You have dabbled in metaphysics," replied the count, smiling. "But, as every cause must be an effect also, we only remove the difficulty by tracing one cause to another."

"I do not well know what difficulty you mean," rejoined Francis de Langy; "but, as each cause may have many effects, we might, perhaps, by tracing back numerous effects to fewer causes, resolve the whole into one cause, which, being the cause of everything, would also be the cause of itself, or, in other words, be self-existent—the first attribute of God!"

The count paused, and looked down upon the ground for at least a minute without reply; and then, turning to one of the book-shelves, he said, "Well, if you will not have Voltaire, here is good Montaigne, the book of all others for a sleepless night. His quiet, mild simplicity makes me always feel, when I open his pages, as if I were sitting over the fire on a wintry night with an old friend. He tells all his feelings with so much frankness that one can scarcely refrain from telling him one's own in return. Take him, then, my young friend: if you have never read him before, you will be delighted; if you have read him before, read him again, you will be sure to find something new in every line."

Francis de Langy took the book, and, thanking the count, was turning away, when Monsieur d'Artonne added, "This good Abbé Arnoux, he seems a very sensible man, I think."

"He is indeed," replied Francis de Langy warmly; and then continued, with a feeling of diffidence in his own opinion, "As far as I can judge, he is a most sensible man; and my uncle, as well as many others, have often told me that they never met a man of better judgment."

"And no bigot?" asked the count.

"Oh! anything but that," replied Francis de Langy; "I have often heard him declare that skepticism itself is scarcely more opposed to true religion than bigotry, and does it less harm."

"He is right, he is right," said the count. "I must have some conversation with him. He does believe in a God, then?"

Francis de Langy started, and gazed for a moment in the count's face with infinite surprise. "As he does in his own existence," he replied at length.

"Ah, my young friend," cried the count, shaking his head, "there is many an abbé and many a priest in France who believe in no God, no soul, no futurity."

The young man laughed. "Then they must be rogues as well as fools," he said; "which does no great honour to their creed. I have heard of such things as atheists, it is true; but I should think there was room in the madhouses of France to hold them."

The count gazed at him for a moment with a very meaning smile; and then, holding out his hand to him, he said, "Good-night! I, at least, shall now go to my bed, and perhaps may sleep the better from having seen you: try you the same plan, and lay old Montaigne down by your bedside. The best of such friends is, that they are nowise impatient. He will wait till you are ready to hear him, without pressing for an audience." Thus saying, he led the way out of the library, and each retired to his own chamber.

CHAPTER VII.

At a very early hour on the following morning the whole party from the Chateau d'Artonne, accompanied by a number of servants, and carrying with them such provisions and luxuries as might be supposed necessary in a very savage country, but in no other, set out for the baths of the Mont d'Or. Their first halting-place was at Clermont, where they stopped to dine; but, as they intended to revisit that town on their way back, they paused only for the meal, and then proceeded on their way in two vehicles, the large, oldfashioned travelling carriage of Monsieur de St. Medard, with its straight sides, but comfortable interior, and a chaise de poste belonging to the Count d'Artonne, much in the shape and form of a large, roomy cabriolet. The count had arranged the party according to his taste, declaring that they would take it in turns, two and two, to journey in the chaise de poste; and, during their first day's expedition, the countess, the viscount, Francis de Langy, and Julie d'Artonne, occupied the travelling coach; while the count himself, perhaps in consequence of his conversation over-night with his young guest, took his place in the chaise de poste with the Abbé Arnoux.

Hard must be the heart, or stiff the exterior, cold the feelings, or very rigid the education, of those persons who can travel together along rough roads and through picturesque scenery without casting away from them the husk of reserve, and becoming familiar, nay, intimate, with their fellow-travellers. Long years of acquaintance, indeed, make us less friendly with another being like ourselves than some forty or fifty miles over stony causeways and amid bad inns. All the little inconveniences that one has to suffer, all the little acts of kindness, attention, and assistance that one has to show, remove everything like distance and stiffness, and create those minor interests, those small gratitudes, those pleasant courtesies, which soften wonderfully the way for regard and intimacy. If Francis de Langy and Julie d'Artonne, when they began their journey that morning, recollected at all that they were a young lady and gentleman approaching that age when early freedom is to be abandoned for the sober proprieties of society, they had both forgotten, before they reached Clermont, that they were anything but boy and girl; and, when they set out again, after a hasty and unceremonious dinner, were wellnigh calling each other Julie and Francis.

If ever the reader have travelled from Clermont Ferrand to the baths of the Mont d'Or, he will know that the road, though, perhaps, not the finest in all Auvergne, is, nevertheless, full of rich and picturesque loveliness; and every one who has passed through the age, or reached it, of love and tenderness, will know what an effect is produced upon the minds of two young persons of different sexes by the grand and beautiful objects of nature, what new sensations, what fresh and happy sympathies are awakened by the sight of splendid scenery with persons of tastes, and habits, and feelings like ourselves. The worst of it is, too, that sympathies, when once set vibrating, extend their influence to all sorts of neighbouring sensations, as the shaking of an earthquake runs along the basaltic strata for an immeasurable distance round the spot where the volcanic shock was given. Oh! it is wonderful how many doors, leading to the most secret chambers of the heart, will be cast open, like that of the Arabian robber, at the sound of one or two magical words!

Such was the case with Francis de Langy and Julie d'Artonne, though they themselves knew nothing of what was going on within them. The reader may look surprised, and exclaim, "What! are you going to make a boy and girl of sixteen or seventeen fall in love with each other—actually in love?"

Dear reader, it is past your power or mine to prevent it. They did!

The day was beautiful: there was no fog, as on the preceding morning; but a light white cloud every now and then swept over the sun, and cast a slow floating shadow over the mountains and the valleys. Every half league of the road made a change in the scenery; some new puy, or tall, volcanic mountain, starting up at each turn, and, as the road wound round its base, presenting strange and varied forms, such as no other country in the world can produce. Sometimes it was a green and velvet slope, stretching up to the foot of the Alpine giant that rose tall and blue behind; sometimes it was a black mass of lava and cinders poured down to the very verge of the road. Here and there appeared a wood fringing the mountain's base; and then, again, a rocky precipice with a thousand streams trickling over its broad face, or a long, dim valley with a white cataract rushing down in foam in the distance.

At every two or three hundred yards Julie had still to cry, "Look there, look there! Is not that beautiful? That is the Puy de Laschamps. That is the village of Salien. Now we are passing the pretty little Sioulet, which rises up that valley. Now we shall have to ascend for some way, and then down to Rochefort."

"Let us get out and mount on foot," said Francis de Langy; "I should like to make every journey through a beautiful country on foot or on horseback, and only get into a carriage when there is nothing to be seen."

Julie was very ready to agree to his proposal; but Madame d'Artonne declined the fatigue, and remained in the carriage with Monsieur de St. Medard. The chaise de poste, however, which led the way, stopped also, and the count and the abbé descended to walk up the hill; but François de Langy and Julie d'Artonne, with their light young limbs, far outstripped the other two, although they stopped every now and then to gaze at the scenery around.

Onward they went, talking cheerfully and lightly of a thousand things, and suffering each subject that presented itself to carry them away into its manifold collateral branches, so that Heaven only knows where their young thoughts wandered before they reached the top of the hill. At all events, when the rest of the party came up, they were both in deep meditation; and both had to rouse themselves, to re-enter the carriage and proceed on the way. The journey was a somewhat long one for the roads and customs of that day; and, consequently, at Rochefort they stopped to examine the curious little town, built, as it were, in the cleft of a rock, and the hill with its old chateau, now, I believe, destroyed, and the basaltic columns in one of the two neighbouring valleys.

Each party had its comment, and its enjoyments of the scenes they witnessed, according to age and circumstances. The elder four looked back to the feudal times when Auvergne had lords of its own, and to the strange changes in the state of all things which had taken place within the last century.

"How much greater a difference," said the Count d'Artonne, "has been made by the passing of the last hundred years than by that of any two or three ages before!"

"It has been effected," replied Monsieur de St. Medard, "by the reign of Louis the Fourteenth."

"And by the government of the Regent Duke of Orleans," added the Abbé Arnoux. "Luxuries and vices effect greater changes in society than even the lightning of war, or the earthquake of political convulsion."

"As the chemists show us," rejoined Monsieur de St. Medard, "that a few drops of acid will corrode and dissolve the steel which the hardest blow could not penetrate."

"Anatomists, too, tell us," observed the abbé, "that, when soft things and hard are placed together, it is the soft that always mould the hard to their own shape. Thus, bones have been affected by the pressure of the muscles."

"Ay," said the Count d'Artonne; "and here, in Auvergne, we see that the waters have everywhere channelled the solid rock to suit their own convenience, making themselves valleys for their course, as we make ourselves roads to travel on."

What was the conversation of Julie and Francis de Langy? It was of the beauty of the scenery, the loveliness of the day, the clearness of the stream that sparkled by, the happiness of the dwelling among such sights of loveliness, where Francis said, truly, that he could remain forever. There mingled, however, with the rest many a wild flight of fancy, many an image and many a thought which poets might have been proud of, springing from the best fountain of poetry that the world possesses—deep feeling, a fountain which is only, perhaps, found very bright and pure before the dust and ashes of earth have fallen upon it and troubled the waters thereof.

So well were they contented with the little town of Rochefort and its wild scenery, that they almost regretted when the time came to journey on to the Mont d'Or; but, as they had some way still before them through a mountainous country, they could not linger long; and, entering the carriages again as the shadows were growing long, they set out, and reached the inn at that famous watering-place just as night was falling.

The two young travellers saw the deep shadows gathering on the hills with regret, but the rest of the party were well pleased to close the pleasant labours of the day in a place which the care of the good old courier, Pierrot, had made as comfortable for them as possible. Everything had been prepared for the most cheerful meal of the day, and about half an hour after their arrival they were all seated round a well-covered table. But, strange to say, all were more grave and thoughtful than during the journey. Once or twice, indeed, as they had driven along, Julie had fallen into a deep revery, but the ever-changing objects had called her quickly from herself till the day's enjoyments and excitement were over. Then she grew sad again, and Francis de Langy also was more pensive. The conversation took a serious turn; and, as he had been encouraged by his uncle to do on all occasions, he mingled with it, though modestly.

Julie listened to him with attention and with surprise, as perhaps the reader might, if we were to pause in order to relate all that he said. It would, indeed, be almost worth while to do so, had we space; for the mixture of youthfulness, almost boyishness, which he showed in all matters where feeling and imagination were concerned, with the deep thought and clear reasoning which had been gained by an education among men, was not a little curious in itself; and it might suggest the question, whether in general with young people we do not make a mistake, and whether it be not necessary to instruct the heart and the mind at the same time, and keep the one in its knowledge upon a par with the other. But we have much before us, and we must go on, closing this chapter here, as the next records an adventure which ought to have an apartment to itself.

CHAPTER VIII.

Several days had passed, and seldom had Time, whose wings, in moments of happiness, are always those of the swallow, darted on more rapidly than he had done with Francis de Langy and Julie d'Artonne. Julie, for her part, seemed now to have forgotten whatever was the cause of those passing clouds, which, as we have shown, hung upon her when first she was brought before the eyes of the reader. The light-heartedness of character natural to her age and her disposition had all returned, everything like the reserve produced by newness of acquaintance had passed away, and she and her young companion were as old friends as if they had known each other twenty years. It may be asked if Monsieur and Madame d'Artonne saw all that was going on, and if they approved of it; if Monsieur de St. Medard marked the boyish fondness of his adopted son for the beautiful girl with whom he now passed his whole time. The answer is very simple: they all saw it; they all approved of it; they all desired the union of Francis de Langy and Julie d'Artonne. It was to some far future day they looked, it is true; but still it was a pleasant scheme, which had struck them all the moment they had seen those two bright young beings standing side by side in the window of the chateau. Madame d'Artonne had whispered it to her husband; the count had laughed, and told it to St. Medard; and the viscount had grasped his friend's hand, and replied, warmly, "With all my heart!"

Never did the flower of love, which, frail and delicate as it looks, will grow up amid storm and tempest, and bud and blossom, how fairly and how often, amid wintry desolation, never did the flower of love first rise under a warmer or more genial sunshine, with a promise of a brighter and a fairer summer. But it may be often remarked, that, when it comes forth under such favourable circumstances, when an unseasonable warmth nurses it from the ground, and everything promises it a fair and happy season, the flower seldom lives to cast its petals and to change to fruit. Either, sickly and delicate in itself, it fades speedily; or else it withers in the fire of the sunshine in which it was born; or else some summer-day tempest comes upon it with thunder and with hail, and beats the broken blossom to the earth from which it rose. Seldom, very seldom, does it live long; but, if it does, it affords to us human beings one of the few bright proofs that we have of such a thing as happiness being possible upon earth.

All then smiled upon the kindling affection of Francis de Langy and Julie d'Artonne; they were all delighted to see that an alliance, which they so greatly wished, would have in it an ingredient so seldom found in the marriages of France—love. Monsieur de St. Medard had known that passion, and had been disappointed; he therefore longed to secure the child of his adoption against that bitterness in the cup of life which he himself had tasted. Monsieur and Madame d'Artonne had also felt love—love for each other—and, knowing the greatness of the blessing, they eagerly sought it for their child. Thus they gladly saw, as I have said, the future union of Francis de Langy and Julie d'Artonne founded upon the basis of early attachment, and they had so far yielded to the custom of their country as to determine on it without consulting them.

The love of boys and girls is an object on which gray-bearded men vent much spleen and scorn; but depend upon it, reader, where it exists in reality, it is the sweetest thing that ever life knows; it is the violet of our short year of existence. The rose is beautiful, richer in hues, full of perfume and brightness, as she flaunts her gay bosom in the ardent sun of June: but give me the violet, the dear early violet, that scents with her odorous breath the air of unconfirmed spring; the soft, the timid violet, retreating from the gaze with her blue eye cast down; the first sweet child of the sweetest season, the tenderest, the gentlest of all the flowers of the field, the emblem of earnest and innocent affection.

No, there is nothing like it! In all after years we may lay our hand upon what joy we will—pure and innocent it must be, to bear the comparison for a moment—but I say, we may lay our hand upon what joy we will in after existence, we shall never find anything on the earth like the first flower of the heart.

Thus it went on, then, with every encouragement that it could receive from all who beheld the growing love of the two young people who have been placed before the eyes of the reader. The encouragement was not open, indeed; that is to say, there were no words spoken, no hints given of that which was in contemplation between the two families; but every facility for being together was afforded, and every opportunity for enjoying in the society of each other those calm but high-toned pleasures which might so entwine their mutual love with bright and everlasting memories as to add to the mortal passion those feelings which seem born for immortality.

Madame d'Artonne was not a prudent woman; she was something far better, a good one. She was one of those who preserve in their heart, notwithstanding some intercourse with the world, the brightest of the three jewels which form the crown of Charity—the thinking no evil; and, as the greater part of her life had been passed at a distance from the court of France, the shackles which that court and its habits imposed, even upon the education of a daughter, had not taken hold of her mind. Thus Julie, as we have at first shown her, had never, in the midst of her wild native mountains, been subjected to the constant superintendence of the gouvernante or the bonne; but had roamed about at large, guarded by principles which had been carefully instilled into her young heart, and trusted by her parents entirely to the supervision of the best of all guides and rulers—conscience. The same course was pursued still; and neither her father nor her mother thought it at all more necessary that they should have a watchful eye upon her, because Francis de Langy was her companion.

The short visit of the party to the baths of the Mont d'Or had been completed; everything in that neighbourhood which could be seen had been examined; and sweeping round—with various excursions to different points—from the eastern to the western side of the hills, and making a considerable part of the journey on horseback, they had reached the little town of Pontgibaud, on the road from Aubusson to Clermont, not without some fatigue to the elder part of the family.

"Well, Monsieur Arnoux," said the count, as they sat discussing their plans for the following day, "business will take me to Pontaumur, and Monsieur de St. Medard accompanies me in the chaise de poste; so we must have you either to stay and entertain Madame d'Artonne, who is too tired for any fresh expeditions, or to find something curious to show these two young people, and accompany them to see it."

"That will be easily done," replied the abbé, "for one of the most remarkable objects in Auvergne lies in this neighbourhood. Francis must visit it, but I do not know whether Mademoiselle d'Artonne may not find it too fatiguing."

"Oh no, no!" cried Julie, eagerly, "I will not be left out of the party."

"We shall have to ride a considerable part of the way," said the abbé, "and the rest of the journey must be performed on foot, unless, indeed, they have improved the paths since I was here before. You will have a walk of two good hours, Mademoiselle d'Artonne."

"Oh, Julie is the best walker in the province," replied the countess.

"Besides, Monsieur Arnoux," cried Julie laughingly, alluding to some mistakes which Monsieur Arnoux had made at the Mont d'Or, "what would you do for an interpreter if I were not with you? You would never get back to Pontgibaud: whenever any of our good Auvergnats told you to go to the right, you would think he meant to the left. No, no; you must have your interpreter."

So was it settled. Three of the small horses of Auvergne were hired at Pontgibaud on the following morning; and, at an early hour, the abbé, accompanied by his pupil and Julie d'Artonne, set out in the direction of the little village, or rather hamlet, of Chalucet, for, when I saw it, some half dozen houses of an extremely poor character were all that it contained; and probably it was not a place of much more importance at the time of this tale, though I remember having seen some old walls, half fallen down, which indicated that there had been more and probably better houses in the place in times long past.

However that may be, beyond Chalucet the horses could not go; and leaving them in the care of one of the peasants, whose jargon was perfectly incomprehensible both to the abbé and Francis de Langy, the former asked, through the interpretation of Julie d'Artonne, whether they could not have a guide to accompany them. The old man, for such he was, replied that every one was out tending their herds in the fields. "If you go down to the valley," he said, "and you cannot miss your way down that path, you will find a man fishing in the stream. He can show you about, I dare say.; for, though he's a stranger here, he seems to know the country well enough."

"I am afraid," said Julie, laughing, after she had translated this reply, "I am afraid that this is your only chance, for our good people of Auvergne are not fond of quitting their flocks."

"Oh! I can find the way myself," said the abbé; "it was only for greater security; so let us go;" and down the steep path they accordingly proceeded, winding in and out through some of the most curious scenery that they had yet seen. Rocks of black lava swept round on every side, and large detached blocks here and there seemed resolved to obstruct the forward progress of the path; which, nevertheless, like the perseverance of a quiet but firm spirit among the difficulties and obstacles of the world, pursued its way onward unceasingly, turning round those obstructions which it could not surmount.

"Hark, Francis!" said Julie, stopping, and laying her beautiful hand upon his arm, after they had gone some way laughing and talking; "hark, Monsieur Arnoux! do you not hear a loud sound? It cannot surely be thunder! If so, we had better seek shelter immediately, for our storms in these mountains are not like those of any other place. Many people and cattle are destroyed by them every year."

"Oh no, it cannot be thunder," exclaimed Francis de Langy: "there is nothing but a light cloud here and there, and, besides, it goes on."

The abbé had listened to what they said with a smile. "It is a singular sound," he replied, at length, "and one I never heard anywhere but here. Is it not like the roaring of a volcano?"

"Oh! I know what it is," cried Julie: "it is the noise of a cascade."

"No," answered the abbé, "it is simply the murmuring of the River Sioule, which, flowing over a bed of lava, and winding in and out among a thousand rocks of the same resonant material, seems as if it were imitating, for us of modern days, the voice, which it must have often heard, of the fierce volcano at the foot of which it runs. The sound rises, however," he added, "and seems to gather its greatest strength about this point, for it becomes much fainter when you reach the bank of the river below."

As he spoke, he led the way on, and in a few minutes they reached the valley of the Sioule, which presented to their eyes one of the most extraordinary, wild, and interesting scenes that it is possible to find on earth. On one side of the valley rose a stupendous mountain of granite, round the base of which flowed a beautifully clear stream, scarcely more, at the time I speak of—which, it must be remembered, was in the middle of summer—than a foot in depth at any place, and in general not above five or six inches. But few trees, and those scattered at great distances upon small patches of vegetable mould, stood out from the cold, gray mountain, serving in their insignificance to afford some measure of its tremendous height.

On the other side of the valley appeared, however, the object for which the abbé had brought them thither. This was one of those enormous masses of lava which characterize Auvergne: a mountain in itself, completely hiding from the eyes below the still higher mountain behind it. On its strange wild face were seen several deep caverns, blacker than its own blackness; at least, so they appeared as the sun then fell; and from them, distinct and clear, as if actually pouring forth in molten fury, were several tremendous streams of lava, now hardened into rock, but marked out from each other by wide, irregular slopes of the fern and heath which carpeted the mountain. Two of these streams especially caught the eye of the travellers, sweeping round upon the right and left, like the ruined walls of some vast amphitheatre, and apparently bounding the irruptions that had taken place, for all the lesser torrents of lava seemed embraced within those two gigantic arms.

As if to form the strongest contrast possible with the magnificent wildness of the mountain scene above, the banks of the stream on either side were covered with exquisite soft turf of a vivid green; while the clear waters between those velvet banks sparkled with the brightness of a diamond over the fragments of dark stone that formed its bed. Julie and Francis de Langy gazed with astonishment, wonder, and awe; and although the abbé had seen this extraordinary spectacle before, he could not behold it even a second time without being strongly and strangely moved by a sight which has, perhaps, no parallel in nature.

But one object in the whole prospect diminished the effect upon the mind, which was the figure of another human being. It was a scene which required perfect solitude to bring out all its beauties, and that one object undoubtedly detracted greatly from the general effect. Neither was his occupation one of those the nature of which at all harmonized with the objects round. He was casting the dull line into the clear water; and certainly, whatever charm beautiful scenery may give to the sport of fishing, the sport itself adds nothing to the poetical beauty of the scenery. A shepherd, a goatherd, any of the objects of pastoral life, might not have jarred so harshly on the sight; but when the abbé, after gazing round for some five minutes in perfect silence, at length said, in a low tone, "There is our guide, I suppose," Julie could not refrain from exclaiming, "I wish he were away; he spoils the landscape sadly."

"He does, indeed," replied Francis de Langy; "neither is his costume particularly picturesque. The plain brown cloth of Auvergne would suit such a scene as this better than that smart-looking Parisian frock."

"We must speak with him at all events," rejoined the abbé; "for although, as I said before, I believe I could find the way about the place myself, yet it may save you fatigue, fair lady, to have the shortest road pointed out to us."

Thus speaking, he advanced towards the stranger; but, ere they had taken half a dozen steps, Julie exclaimed, "Why, that is strange; 'tis surely Jean, one of the servants of Madame de Bausse."

Intent upon his fishing, and his ear filled with the murmur of the stream, the man had not remarked their approach. When he did so, however, a sudden look of surprise passed over his countenance, perhaps not altogether unmingled with alarm. If there was any such feeling, it passed away in an instant; and, pulling off his hat as he recognised Mademoiselle d'Artonne, he said, "Ah, Mademoiselle Julie, is that you! Who would have thought to see you here!"

"Or you either, Jean Marais!" she answered. "How is it that Madame de Bausse has parted with you!"

The man paused for a single instant ere he replied, but he then said easily, "Why, Mademoiselle, the young marquis being away, you know she had no great use for me; so I took a day's holyday to bring these sleek gentlemen out of the Sioule;" and he pointed to some fine trout which lay upon the bank.

Julie made no answer, but cast her beautiful eyes down to the ground and remained in thought for a moment or two, at the end of which period Francis de Langy perceived that her cheek turned very pale. A painful feeling that he could not define to himself came again over his heart; and, the abbé being at that moment in conversation with the servant in regard to his capability of guiding them over the mountain, the youth resolved he would satisfy himself at once, and put a question which no age after seventeen would have ventured to utter.

"You seem greatly interested in this Marquis de Bausse, Mademoiselle d'Artonne," he said. "I suppose you are much attached to your cousin?"

Julie started, and replied, with the same youthful frankness which had characterized his question, "Oh no! I dislike him very much;" and the colour mounted in her cheek again. "I was only thinking," she said, "that all this is very strange;" and again she fell into thought.

In the mean time, the abbé had asked the fisherman to quit his occupation for the moment and guide them over the hill; but the valet laughed, saying, "I don't know ten steps from the banks of the stream, so that it would but be the blind leading the blind, Monsieur l'Abbé."

"You must be better acquainted with the country than we are," rejoined the abbé; "for I am the only one of the party who has ever visited it, and that was twenty years ago."

The man, however, seemed unwilling to give up his sport; and the travellers, after wandering for some way along the course of the valley, turned to take another view of the precipitous steep from whose caverns, unnumbered centuries ago, poured forth the torrents of fire which have left such extraordinary vestiges behind them. What was the surprise of Julie and Francis de Langy to behold, from the point at which they were now placed, the scene entirely changed! For an instant they could scarcely help believing that the dead volcano had suddenly rekindled into angry life, for several of the caverns in the mountain—while some still remained sombre and dark—had assumed a fiery glare, as if flames and torrents of lava were about once more to burst forth.

The abbé saw and enjoyed their surprise. "It is from this side only," he said, "that you really see the caverns; before they were cast into deep shadow, and the red ochreous colour, which has been produced by combustion, was concealed till we got into this position."

Julie gazed almost awe-struck. "It is beautiful," she said, "but very fearful. What a sight it must have been to behold such furnaces in activity!"

"It looks like the mouth of the infernal regions," said Francis de Langy.

"And doubtless," replied the abbé, "from some such scene as this the poet took his picture of the entrance to Pluto's kingdom. It is, indeed, sublime. But what think you, Mademoiselle d'Artonne? You are a good climber; will you venture up to the caves themselves? It is a difficult and not a very safe ascent, if I recollect rightly."

Julie laughed. "Oh! where you and Francis go, Monsieur Arnoux," she answered, "I shall find no difficulty. Mine are mountain feet, more accustomed, a great deal, to tread the rocks and lava of Auvergne than the terraces and streets of Versailles and Paris. I should not wonder if I had to help you both; but whatever we do must be done quickly, for I am afraid there will be a storm before night."

"Oh no," said the abbé, looking up to the sky, "I do not think so; and I am a meteorologist, you know," he added, with a grave smile at his own pretensions.

"But I am an Auvergnate," answered Julie, laughing; "and we all learn these things in our country, Monsieur Arnoux. We have plenty of practice in marking the changes of weather, I can assure you; for we often see three completely different climates in one day, and very seldom have the same for three days together. However, if a storm did come on, we could find plenty of places of shelter here, for Nature has provided us with houses in the rock."

"As she almost always does," said the abbé, "wherever there is an evil or a danger, affording a remedy or an escape; even as God," he added—always willing to inculcate a lesson—"even as God never suffers us to be tempted without affording us a warning and offering us a resource. But come, my dear children, the easiest way, if I recollect, lies round that large stream of lava: there is a little path runs through the heath, which carries us easily half up the ascent."

The road was readily found, and the greater part of it presented no serious obstacles. In the end there was, indeed, some difficult climbing to be accomplished; but, as Julie had foreseen, her mountain habits rendered the ascent more easy to herself than to either of her companions. Francis de Langy, it is true, full of youth, vigour, and activity, surmounted all the impediments in the way without much trouble: the only difficulty, indeed, that he met with proceeded from his employing more strength than was needful, and by a bolder spring or heavier tread displacing here or there a mass of the lava, which went rolling down into the valley below. The good abbé, however, found that twenty years had made a great difference in his agility, as most men do who try; but proceeding slowly and cautiously, he went on without danger, refusing all aid from his younger companions.

Often, indeed, was he obliged to stop for a moment, but yet the good man would look up well pleased to the rock above him, where they stood waiting his coming; while Julie's eyes sparkled with pleasure and excitement, and her fair cheek glowed with exercise; her small, full lips panting all the while with the pure breath of youth, and the curls of her hair driven back from her forehead by the quick blast of the mountain wind. Even age, the sad diluter of all admirations, could not prevent the abbé from saying in his own heart, "Well, for a being of this earth, she is certainly very lovely."

Monsieur Arnoux, however, was not the only one who admired; and Francis de Langy, as he stood beside her, or made an excuse to render her aid where she needed it not, gazed with deeper and more glowing feelings still upon his lovely companion, and, plunging into the whirlpool of thoughts which their situation suggested, soon lost himself amid a thousand bright but vague sensations.

Thus going on, they at length reached the mouth of one of the first caverns, and there paused for some short time to rest themselves, studying curiously, as they sat upon a block of lava which had taken the form of a natural bench, the innumerable curious lichens and mosses which had gathered in the shadier parts of the rock. The next they came to was all bare; and the entrance, which was exposed to the heat of the sun, was so scorched, that the lava, which has a peculiar property of absorbing and retaining heat, actually burned the hand that rested upon it. The air in the inside of the cave, too, was suffocating and oppressive; and Julie, when she felt it, again shook her head, saying, "We shall have a storm, Monsieur Arnoux."

Nevertheless, forward they went upon their way, examining all the curious objects that surrounded them, comparing them with other creations of nature or productions of art, and in the sportive revelry of unrestrained imagination deriving a thousand beautiful figures, a thousand wild speculations, a thousand bright conceptions, from the world of wonders through which they passed. Circling round the front of the great volcanic mass, they at length reached the very summit, and then saw that it was but as the first step to another giant mountain behind, apparently of granite. But a different object instantly attracted their attention: an immense heavy cloud rolling from the base of that other mountain towards them, and seeming to sweep the little plain on which they now stood.

"We shall have a fog, I think," said the abbé.

"No, no," replied Julie, with a look of apprehension; "there is a storm coming, a storm of hail, I think. Let us get down to one of the caves as fast as possible; we might be beaten to death by the hailstones."

There was no time for delay; for, almost as Julie spoke, a bright flash of lightning blazed over the face of the dark-gray mass; and, running down as fast as possible, the whole party made their way, not without danger, towards the last cave which they had quitted. To say the truth, it was not that which seemed likely to afford the best shelter, being formed principally by a mountain of scoria, cinders, and earth, which appeared to have been driven back by an advancing stream of lava, with which it was partly mingled, and from which it was partly detached. They had no choice, however; for, before they reached it, the hail began to fall with a degree of violence of which neither of the two men had any previous conception. Unprepared for what was coming, Francis de Langy, though young, strong, and active, staggered with the blows; but, almost at the same moment, Julie put her hand to her head, and fell. Tenfold strength seemed to be given to him in a moment; and, catching her up in his arms, he bore her into the cavern, which, though not twenty steps distant, she might hardly otherwise have reached alive.

"Julie! dear Julie!" he cried, as he placed her in safety.

"I am not hurt," she exclaimed; "I am not much hurt. But the abbé? Poor Monsieur Arnoux!"

Francis de Langy darted out of the cavern, and rushed towards the spot where the good ecclesiastic, with his face and hands bleeding, was crouching under the rock, which only in part sheltered him. Half carrying, half dragging him along, his pupil at length got him into the cave, though not till both were terribly bruised.

"Oh, Monsieur Arnoux!" cried Julie, "you are sadly hurt, I fear."

"No, no, my child," replied the old man. "It is but a little blood; one of these dreadful hailstones has cut my lip and my cheek. But you! you fell too, my child; and poor Francis has suffered more than either."

Julie gazed at her young companion with anxious and inquiring look; but he replied, with a light laugh, "Oh, no, no! I am not hurt. I nothing. If you two are safe, I trust to h many a worse beating than this before I Let me wipe the blood from your face, M sieur Arnoux. Julie, are you sure you are hurt?"

"Oh no!" she cried, "no: the hail made stagger, and I stumbled over some stone, I fan but I am not hurt, only a little bruised."

As she spoke she clasped her hands over eyes, for just then came another awful flash lightning, which seemed to fill the whole va with fire.

"Good Heaven, what hailstones!" exclaim Francis de Langy; "they are absolutely mas of ice. That poor fellow in the valley will killed!"

"I trust not," replied Julie; "he knows A vergne well, and would never go far on such day as this without having marked out so place of shelter. I am afraid you are m hurt, Monsieur Arnoux," she continued, as s saw the good abbé bending down his head up his hands.

"No, my dear young lady," answered t abbé, after a moment's pause; "I was thankin God that I am not much hurt. Turn your ey from the lightning, my son; it might blind you."

"Come away, Francis; come away," ex claimed Julie d'Artonne, laying her hand upon the arm of her young companion, who was gazing out from the mouth of the cavern upon the strange but magnificent sight afforded by the valley at their feet: "do not stand rashly there in the full glare."

There are few dangers to which Francis de Langy would not willingly have exposed himself to hear such words as those; and, drawing back with Julie into the farther part of the cave, they seated themselves on a pile of volcanic fragments near good Monsieur Arnoux. The storm every moment grew more and more terrible; the flashes of the lightning were incessant, and of a fearful vividness, glancing round and round the cave, and exposing to the eye all the grim features of those innermost recesses which the light of day never revealed. Julie d'Artonne drew closer and closer to her lover's side; and, as fear ever makes one of us weak beings cling to another, breaking down all the barriers which custom places between man and man, she put her arm through his, and in trembling apprehension hid her eyes upon his shoulder, while he soothed her with all those tender caresses which nothing but the terrors of the moment would have imboldened him to offer. He supported her with his arm, he kept her hand clasped in his; and though he could not but feel that it was a dreadful hour, the termination of which to all of them no one could tell, he tried to persuade his dear Julie, as he called her, that there was no danger, and that the storm would soon pass away.

"One could fancy it the end of the world," said the Abbé Arnoux; and so, indeed, one might have done; for the rocks and mountains of sonorous basalt, which had multiplied the low murmurs of the Sioule till they had sounded like thunder, now echoed the voice of the thunder itself from rock to rock, and cavern to cavern, ll the very mountain seemed to shake, and one ould feel the vibration of the air upon the cheek well as on the ear. The falling of the hail ded to the roar, and the gush of accumulating aters mingled therewith, so that never, proba- y, did the ear of man, except in some of those st convulsions which, with intervals of un- mbered ages, change the face of the whole obe, hear such a combination of terrific sounds then echoed through the valley of Chalucet.

Sheltered as they were, however, the hail was o longer to be feared, and the thunder was ore awful than dangerous; but a greater peril an any they had yet undergone awaited them, ven at the moment when they thought them- lves secure. The hail gradually became min- led with rain; then ceased, and gave way to a eluge that poured down from the sky. The rge lumps of ice, which lay piled up more than foot in height at the mouth of the cavern, be- an to melt. Large drops of water, percolating hrough the arch of the cave, dropped with a eavy splash upon the ground; some pieces of the rock of the vault fell likewise; and at the ame time a rushing sound, differing from all which had been heard before, came suddenly upon the ear. A rivulet was first seen trickling along the path at the entrance of the cavern, driving away the hail before it; and then, with a hissing, foamy rush down from the hill above, swept an actual torrent, rising, as it passed, somewhat above the level ground of the cave, and pouring in with an eddying whirl so as to cover the feet of the poor travellers with water. Not calculating how high it would rise, Francis de Langy caught up Julie in his arms, preparing to rush forth with her; but paused instantly, seeing that it must naturally flow down the hill, and could not inundate the place of their retreat above a few inches more.

At that instant, however, the abbé started up, exclaiming, "Quick, Francis; quick, my child! Away, away! the cave is falling in!" and on he darted towards the mouth.

He reached it not, however; for, before he could do so, a torrent of falling cinders and scoria poured down from above, and struck him to the ground. There was a sad and terrible cry, the mouth of the cavern was at once blocked up, and all was darkness.

CHAPTER IX.

We must now return for a time to the banks of the stream, and to the somewhat discourteous fisherman, who had chosen to follow his solitary sport rather than accompany the travellers over the mountain. The name by which Julie addressed him must have already made the reader aware that he is not a new acquaintance; but, from the description which we gave of his person when at the Ferme Godard, he certainly would not be recognised at the period of which we now speak. The tall, well-formed, active stripling of fourteen or fifteen had grown into a man of immense powers of body: not much above the ordinary height, being about five feet eleven, but displaying a frame of great breadth; deep-chested, long-armed, thin in the flank, and without the slightest approach to fatness, but muscular to an extraordinary degree. His features were short and small, but good; his forehead large and capacious, but with the back of the head perhaps still more so, and with those parts of the scull in which phrenologists suppose the organs of observation and calculation to lie developed in a remarkable manner. To speak by the card, and employ the technology with which our phrenological friends have furnished us, we will point out, that the organ of reverence in his head, though not absolutely wanting, was very small indeed; but that the organ of benevolence was large and protuberant. Thus, if we might judge by what was on the outside of his scull of what was in the inside, and from both of what was the character of his mind and disposition, we should have a very curious compound of qualities. Considerable intellectual powers, with strong animal passions; not much respect for anything, but a good deal of kindness of feeling. A few more traits, dear reader, would make it a perfect Frenchman.

The expression of the countenance—in which, to say sooth, we put as much faith as in phrenology—bore out these indications perfectly. There was a shrewd, intelligent, keen, and rapid look, with no ferocity or harshness in it, but a great deal of determination; and that sidelong, half-averted glance, which we noticed in him as a youth, was now altogether gone, the place thereof being supplied by a sort of impenetrable, nonchalant aspect assumed upon certain occasions.

The reader must not suppose that any great change had taken place in his character, thus to vary the expression of his countenance. The fact is, that when a youth, though not educated by any of his relations with the soundest principles in the world, yet his faults and vices—and they were not a few—were new to him; and the belief that they must be apparent to and condemned by every one he met with, gave him that downcast look which we have before mentioned.

He had disposed of it, however, in the most natural manner possible; and having discovered two things—first, that his fellow-men were not near so sharp-sighted as he had imagined; and, secondly, that there were a great many as bad as himself, and a great many very much worse, he got somewhat conceited, not exactly of his bad actions, but of the dexterity and courage with which he committed them.

We have said that he was not conceited of the actions themselves; and, in truth, his tendency was rather away from them; for, in reality, they were committed more from a general want of principle than an inherent inclination to wrong; and, as the desires and passions of youth, the love of adventure, and the recklessness of consequences, diminished by slight degrees with years, the temptations were diminished also; and he would just as soon have employed his wit in doing what was right, if the opportunity had presented itself, as in doing what was wrong. Habit, indeed—habit was a strong counterpoise; but a man of good intellect, and not very corrupt inclinations, generally discovers, sooner or later, that the weight of worldly advantages lies on the side of good conduct, as well as all the moral inducements; and thus there is ever something with a reasonable being to counterbalance bad habit, if unfortunate circumstances do not lead him farther and farther into vice, or society by its severity does not drive him to despair.

The lepers at one time were cast out from all communion with their fellow-men; they could associate but with lepers, and the disease increased and spread. At an after period men took them into hospitals and cured them, and the malady was gradually extinguished. Might it not be so with the leprosy of the mind?

To return to Jean Marais, however. He remained fishing in the stream till the party by whom he had been accosted began to climb the hill; and then he said to himself, "Now I will get back to Chalucet, and be off as fast as possible. I do not covet the jail at Clermont, particularly after the specimen I have had of it, where, with our good laws of France, I might very likely remain for nine months to come. No, no; I will keep out of the way till something about this young scapegrace has been discovered. And yet the girl did not seem to know anything of my situation; and a nice girl, too, she is: a great deal too good for my vagabond master."

While he thus meditated, or, rather, murmured to himself—for his thoughts took an audible dress—he was busy undoing his fishing tackle; but just at that moment, luckily for himself and for others, his eye lighted upon a remarkably fine trout, the patriarch of the stream, who, lying not far from the surface, with his snout to the current and his fins moving slowly to keep himself in one place, seemed to invite the angler to try his skill upon him. Jean Marais had too much of the spirit of a sportsman to resist the temptation. He put his rod together again, and cast his fly lightly on the surface of the water, within a few inches of the mouth of his destined prize. For some little time the trout was obdurate, and ten minutes or a quarter of an hour were spent in teasing him to rise. At length, however, as if in a fit of irritation, the fish darted at the fly, was instantly hooked, and, conscious of his powers, darted away, nearly breaking the line that held him. Jean Marais was as skilful a fisherman as Isaac Walton; and, though we will not attempt to describe with our quaint old friend's minuteness the sport that ensued, suffice it to say that it cost the angler nearly three quarters of an hour to exhaust the speckled tenant of the stream. At length, however, he succeeded in landing on the bank as fine a trout as ever was taken in Auvergne, a land justly celebrated for them.

When it was fairly caught, he once more began to pack up his fishing tackle; but he did not do so without one or two wistful looks at the sky, and then at the path by which he had come down the mountain. But the first clap of thunder, which our travellers had heard on the top of the hill, warned him in the valley of what was about to take place.

"No time," he said, "no time! I must get to my rock;" and, gathering up the fish he had caught, his rod, his lines, and his basket, without staying to put them in order, he walked through the stream, ran up the green bank on the other side, and made the best of his way to a spot where a large fragment of granite, in rolling down long ages before, had fallen slantingly against an immense mass of lava, so as to form a sort of hut, somewhat like the foundation of a child's house of cards. Some vegetable mould had gathered, by one means or another, on the top of the rock; and a small stunted ash-tree having planted itself in the crevice where the two stones met, like the feather in a warrior's cap, a wild bird was perched in the branches, singing gayly as Jean Marais approached.

It darted out when he came near; and he exclaimed, with a light laugh, "There, away with you! away with you! I give you two minutes to get home; and, if you don't, the hail will catch you."

Thus saying, he bent himself down, and got under the little canopy formed by the two stones, drawing in his fishing tackle and his trout, and crouching himself into as comfortable a position as he could, without exposing any part of his person or his goods to the pitiless pelting of the storm. The aperture of his little stony hut looked directly upon the black face of the volcano; and he gazed up at it, saying to himself, "I wonder where they have got to?"

The moment after, he saw Francis de Langy and Julie d'Artonne running down the path towards the cave, followed by the Abbé Arnoux. When he beheld the young lady fall, it is but justice to good Jean Marais to say, that his first impulse made him start up, as if to help her; but down he sat again immediately, watching with not uninterested eyes while Francis de Langy carried her into the cave, and then came out to bring in the abbé.

"He's a fine young fellow, that," said Jean Marais. "I wonder who that is?"

As the reader well knows, the limits of a hailstorm are very sharply defined; and, in many districts of France, balls of ice, the size of eggs, will fall on one side of a road, tearing vineyards and cornfields to pieces, while the other side shall be perfectly free in the clear sunshine, without a single hailstone touching it. In the present instance, the storm came sweeping across the valley towards Jean Marais, as if a dim black wall seamed with a number of perpendicular lines were advancing directly against him; and so thick and tremendous did the hail become, that, very speedily, the immense volcanic mountain before his eyes grew indistinct and dark; so that, for full half an hour, the cavern in which the travellers had taken refuge was lost to his sight.

We shall not again describe the storm, which we have already dwelt upon enough in the preceding chapter. The lightning blazed, the thunder roared, the hailstones fell as before; and Jean Marais, well contented with his retreat, looked out, saying to himself, "Now, if I had murdered that young vagabond the marquis, as his foolish mother says, I should be in a great fright, I suppose, and think the devil was going to take me."

In his comfortable place of refuge he amused himself as well as he could; looking at the fish he had caught, rolling up his lines, cleaning his hooks, and taking very little notice of the storm, except, every now and then, to gaze forth for an instant when the thunder was particularly violent, and exclaim, in a mocking tone, "Well, upon my honour!" till, at length, the hail became mingled with rain, the streams began rushing down from the hills, the thunder diminished in frequency and loudness, and the grim features of the opposite rocks began to show themselves more distinctly through the dim gray deluge.

"Ay," cried Jean Marais, "a pretty morning's work, upon my life! But hark! what's that?" and, gazing out again, he saw an immense quantity of stones and scoria, and large masses of rock, come rolling down the face of the opposite precipice, bounding and thundering into the stream.

His eyes instantly ran up towards the mouth of the cave where he had beheld the travellers take refuge. He could no longer see it. He looked to the right, to the left—it was gone!

"Body of life!" he exclaimed, "it must have fallen in upon them!" and, leaving fish and fishing tackle, and everything else behind him, he darted out, rushed through the stream, which was by this time up to his middle, and which, strong as he was, nearly bore him away, and, with the agility of a goat, climbed straight up to where the cavern had been.

The rain was still pouring down in fury, a thousand streams were rushing over all the faces of the rock, but the little path which Julie and her companions had descended to reach the cavern was visible for a considerable way from the top of the hill. Then came a space where everything seemed to be cast into rough confusion, showing clearly where a considerable body of earth and rubbish had slipped down the hill; and then, about fifty or sixty yards farther on, the line of the path could be traced again, winding forward to the mouth of another cave. The cinders and scoria left by the descent of the mass which had fallen rendered the footing between one point of the little way and another both difficult and dangerous. But Jean Marais, without hesitating a moment, sometimes balancing himself with difficulty on his feet, sometimes clinging with his hands and lying almost flat to the face of the mountain, traced on what he conceived the direction which the path had taken, examining accurately every step of ground as if he were looking for some lost jewel. At length, a small projection of the rock gave him a farther hold, and, under a mass of the more solid lava higher up, he perceived a small aperture, scarcely large enough to admit a man's arm. It was somewhat above his head, and the task of reaching it was by no means easy; but at length he accomplished it, and, bringing his face close to the hole, he looked in. All was darkness, however, but he thought he heard something like a low groan; and he exclaimed aloud, "Are you there? are you there?"

"Oh, yes, yes!" cried a voice from within; "help us quick! Give us air, give us air!"

"I must fetch assistance," replied Jean Marais; "keep up your spirits; do not fear, you shall soon be delivered."

"Give us air!" answered the voice: "give us air! She is fainting, she is dying!"

"Oh, no, no, Francis!" cried another voice; "I am better, I am better now. It was hope I wanted."

"Bring help quick, then," shouted the first voice.

"Stay," said Jean Marais, "stay. I can give you air too, perhaps. Here is a lump of rock I can roll down; but I must take care, lest I go down with it;" and, fixing his two hands firmly upon a large block of stone of more than a hundred pounds in weight, he rolled it slowly over, till, freed from the rubbish in which it was imbedded, it bounded down the hill, rushed over the green slope, and plunged into the stream.

"There is a gleam of light!" exclaimed the voice from below: "look! Julie, look! Thank God, there is a gleam of light!"

"Take courage, take courage!" cried Jean Marais; "I will go and bring the folks from Chalucet, and have you out speedily. I must not miss the spot, however," he continued, speaking to himself. "There! that shall be my landmark;" and, taking off his hat, he set it upon the projecting piece of rock by which he had climed up, put a large stone in it to keep it firm, and then set out for the hamlet at a pace which put his life in danger at every minute.

CHAPTER X.

The most serviceable gift in the ordinary course of life is common sense; but in a career of danger and difficulty there is another, which is, perhaps, but a modification of it, and which is termed presence of mind. I have called it a gift, because I believe that it is perfectly innate, and never to be acquired; but, certainly, if ever any one was born with that combination of ready courage, quick calculation, and promptitude of action which is so termed, it was Francis de Langy. The moment that he beheld the abbé stricken to the earth, he perceived that to pass in time was impossible; and, casting his arms round Julie, he drew her suddenly back from the shower of stones and cinders that was falling, not to the part of the cave where they had previously been seated, but at once, and with a bound, to the eastern side of the cavern, where he had remarked, long before, that the solid lava formed, as it were, one side of an arch, under which he rationally hoped for shelter.

He found it as he had expected; but the very first instant of thought made him almost regret that he had obeyed the impulse, and avoided being crushed under the falling mass. All was darkness; he, and the being whom he loved, were shut in, as in a living tomb, within the hard bosom of the mountain! A long, a lingering, a terrible death was before them! Even if the air which they then breathed was not soon exhausted, famine must speedily reach them. He must have the agony of seeing her die by the most painful want, without the power of giving her the slightest assistance or support. Such was the terrible picture that imagination first presented; such the only fate that he believed was reserved for them. Julie clung to him, trembling violently; and he, pressing her to his heart, lifted up his eyes, as if seeking for that heaven which was shut out from his sight, and which he believed that neither would ever behold again. He would have fain said something to soothe and comfort her, but the words of consolation died away in his heart and on his tongue; and, unable to utter a sound, he pressed his lips upon her cheek, as if it was the parting kiss of two beings doomed to speedy death.

At that moment there was a low groan. "Ha, Julie!" he exclaimed; "there is the poor abbé! Perhaps I can extricate him and bring him here. Stay for a moment. I will try."

"Oh, it will fall upon you and crush you, Francis!" cried Julie.

"Nay, nay, I must try, dear Julie," he replied; and, feeling his way forward with his hands, he soon grasped the good man's cassock. His arm and his head were free, for he had been cast backward in falling; but his chest was covered with a large mass of loose shingle, heaped up in a pile, and his legs, up to his knees, were buried in a mass which blocked up the mouth of the cavern.

Francis de Langy easily removed the pile that was resting on his breast; but when he attempted to disengage the rest of his frame, a shower of small stones and cinders fell thick upon him, and wellnigh suffocated him. He persevered, however; and another low groan, as he did so, told him that the abbé still lived. The earth was loose and light; and, as he laboured to clear it away, with his hands, from the body of his poor tutor, a hope sprung up in his bosom of being able to save himself and her he loved.

In ten minutes he had succeeded so far as to be able to draw the body of the abbé away, though another shower of stones upon his head was the consequence; but exclaiming, gladly, "I have freed him, Julie, I have freed him!" he bore the old man slowly and cautiously over the plashy floor of the cave towards the spot where he had left her.

"Julie, dear Julie!" he said, as he approached, though the sensation of the air growing thick and warm almost deadened the hope which had arisen, "there is yet a chance; keep up your courage! The earth is soft and light, and easily moved; I can pull down some part into that side of the cave, and perhaps throw the rest down into the valley."

She made no answer; and Francis de Langy, becoming alarmed, put out his hand to feel if she was there. It rested upon her fair soft neck as she bent her head down upon her hands. Her young lover's heart sunk, and he thought, "The air is growing close, she may faint and die before I can accomplish it."

At that moment, however, a loud voice, coming down apparently from the upper part of the cave, shouted, "Are you there? are you there?" And, oh! was there ever sound on this earth so joyful to the ears of man?

The reader knows the reply, and knows, also, that, in a moment after, a gleam of light broke in upon the weary prisoners in their rocky dungeon. It was like hope; it was hope; and, oh! what is not hope to man? the vitality of vitality, the life of his life, the great motive power of all exertion, the strengthener, the consoler, the stay, the great battle-sword that cleaves through the armour of all adversaries, the conqueror that strikes down opposition, tramples on reverses, bursts open the gates of the tomb, and treads upon the neck of death!

Hope came to them; and though the ray of light was so faint that they could not even see each other's faces by its aid, looking merely like a dim star high up in the blank space round, it was sufficient for support, ay, and for joy; and, casting his arms round Julie, Francis de Langy exclaimed, "Thou art saved!"

Those words, reader, put, as I have put them, in the second person singular, mean more in French than they do in English; but in any language they would have been sufficient to show to Julie d'Artonne what were the feelings of her young lover's heart, that she was his first thought; that her safety was the object first desired; her danger, the anguish far more felt than his own.

"And thou too, Francis!" she said; "and thou too!" and she leaned her forehead on his bosom.

Never did love before or since find its first voice among such scenes and circumstances.

A long hour succeeded—the passing of which we will not attempt to describe—ere any farther sounds gave notice to the young prisoners that their deliverance was near. At length, however, the tones which they had heard before again reached their ear, asking if they were all well.

"No, anything but well," replied Francis de Langy: "the abbé is much hurt; dead, I fear, or dying."

"Matin!" cried the man; and immediately the sounds of pickaxes and spades rang through the cavern, with voices directing and commenting as the work proceeded.

A moment or two after, some of the earth and stones rolled down into the cave, and the aperture through which the light appeared was considerably enlarged. Julie and Francis de Langy turned their first look upon each other; but their second was to the poor abbé; and by the dim glimmer, which was all that yet reached them, they knelt down beside him, and gazed upon his features. His cassock was soiled by mud and dirt, and a good deal of the loose ashes was adhering to his hair; but, as far as they could distinguish, his features were calm and placid, and it was evident that he still breathed, though the groan which had once or twice burst from his bosom had ceased.

The rushing sound of falling earth was now clearly distinguished, mingled with the rolling of large masses of the rock down the face of the precipice. The light grew clearer, the heavy air more free; and soon the arms and chest of a man labouring hard with a spade could be discerned, with the blue sky behind him. The cheerful sunshine, too, shone upon his shoulder and his hand, showing that the storm had passed away entirely; and, oh! what a bright and beautiful sight did that simple gleam seem to the eyes of those who had thought that they should never behold it again! But we must not pause farther upon their sensations. It required the labour of four men, during at least three quarters of an hour, to enlarge sufficiently the small aperture, which the mass of falling earth had left in its descent, for a human being to pass in and out: some masses of stone, which had come down with the rest, obstructing the labour, and requiring both skill and strength to remove. Jean Marais, however, worked like a slave, and, by his better sense and knowledge, effected as much, at least, as all the three good Auvergnats together. At length a sufficient passage was opened; but still it was not an easy one, for the loose shingle and rock had rolled down into the cave, filling up nearly two thirds of the space; and when Jean Marais himself entered to give assistance, he fell twice before he reached the bottom of the mound.

"I will carry her, I will carry her," cried Francis de Langy.

"If you do, I shall have to carry you," cried Jean Marais; but the youth caught Julie up in his arms as lightly as if she had been a child, and, with that strength and power which strong and resolute feeling generally gives, he bore her out, while the stout Picard followed him close, steadying the young gentleman with his arm whenever the stones rolled under his feet.

"Thank God!" cried Francis de Langy, when he once more set his fair burden down in the fresh air. "Thank God!"

But the sudden change was too great for Julie d'Artonne; she turned pale, her head drooped, and she fell back fainting, with the first breath of the wind upon her cheek.

When Julie reopened her eyes, she felt herself gently borne along in a large rough, brown cloak, at that time in use among the Auvergnat shepherds, which had been stretched upon two poles, so as to make a sort of litter for her. A contrivance somewhat similar had been applied to carry the poor Abbé Arnoux; and, two or three of the herds from the mountains having been added to the party who had dug out the travellers, Mademoiselle d'Artonne and the good ecclesiastic were carried by the shortest and most convenient paths to the little hamlet of Chalucet. The women of the village and the neighbourhood instantly surrounded the sufferers; and the abbe was soon stretched upon a bed, with kind female hands tending him, and every simple means applied to recall him to consciousness. As such accidents often happened in the mountains, the treatment of Monsieur Arnoux was not so unskilful as might have been expected, for experience is the best teacher of medicine. On Julie, too, the good women would fain have tried their powers; but she had quite recovered from her fainting fit ere she reached the hamlet, although she felt too weak and exhausted, after all she had gone through, to ride back to Pontgibaud.

For his part, Francis de Langy resolved not to quit her; and all that remained for him to do was to send a messenger to Pontgibaud to seek a surgeon, and to communicate the disasters they had met with, and the state they were in, to Monsieur and Madame d'Artonne. For this double purpose Francis de Langy determined to employ Jean Marais, and accordingly went out of the cottage to which Julie had been brought, in order to look for him. As some time had been spent, one way or another, since their arrival, he found their deliverer with his fishing-rod in his hand, a basket on his back, and a small parcel of clothes crowning the whole, apparently setting out upon some distant journey.

The first words the young gentlemen addressed to him were thanks, and, luckily for his purpose, one of the expressions which he used was, "I look upon it that Mademoiselle d'Artonne and myself owe our lives entirely to you; but you must do us another service, Monsieur Marais. I wish you particularly to mount one of the horses which brought us here, and, riding it to Pontgibaud, send the best surgeon you can find as speedily as possible. I should then feel extremely obliged if you would go to the little inn called the Demie Lune, and communicate, in the gentlest manner you can, to Monsieur and Madame d'Artonne that we have met with a frightful accident, but that Mademoiselle Julie is safe and uninjured. Perhaps Monsieur d'Artonne may not have returned, but you will certainly find the countess there."

The man looked down with a hesitating, or rather calculating, expression, and began his reply by saying, "Why, you see, Monsieur—" but suddenly stopped, and then asked, "Can you not send one of these other men?"

"I can do so, certainly," answered Francis de Langy, somewhat surprised at his reluctance; "but I wish some one to bear the intelligence who will break it with gentleness. Besides, I think you are very well deserving of a high reward for saving our lives, and I am sure Monsieur d'Artonne will be glad to give it when he is aware of the circumstances."

The valet took off his hat and made him a low bow, replying, with a comic air, "Rewards are pleasant things, sir."

He then fell into thought again; but the moment after he roused himself, and put his hat upon his head with an air of mock determination, saying, "Well, I'll dare the adventure! I may want a good friend just now to help me at a pinch. Come, sir, I will do it."

Francis de Langy was totally unaware of those particular points in Jean Marais's history which made him hesitate to go to Pontgibaud and present himself before the Count d'Artonne; but, in replying at a venture, he hit the mark aright, saying, "If you do want a friend in need, depend upon it you will find one in the Count d'Artonne, after saving his daughter from a lingering and horrible death. Nor will my uncle—I may call him father—the Vicomte de St. Medard, be less grateful to you—"

"Monsieur de St. Medard?" cried the man. "Ah, bon Dieu! Is it possible? are you little Francis de Langy, whom I have had upon my knee a hundred times? Well, that is strange enough!"

An explanation, such as the reader may conceive, now ensued; but Francis de Langy made it a short one, although he was not a little interested in the account the man gave of himself, and of his own early years at the Ferme Godard. No farther difficulties were made by Jean Marais; and mounting the horse, which was speedily made ready, he set off at as rapid a rate as the bad road would permit, and reached Pontgibaud in little less than an hour.

As he went—according to a habit that he had—he held a good deal of conversation with himself upon his own situation and prospects. "Well," he said, "I am certainly the luckiest of all unlucky dogs; for no sooner do I fall into a scrape, from which there seems no escape—except to be set free, after many months' imprisonment on account of a crime I never dreamed or thought of—than I stumble upon two powerful protectors, and secure their certain good-will by the merest accident in the world. Well, now, I must manage this matter delicately, and break the tidings to these people as one breaks the top of an egg, little by little. Let me see! how shall I do it? I have it, I have it! But we must send the surgeon first to take care of the good old gentleman in the cassock, though he'll be as dead as a sole before the doctor gets there. There's not as much life in him now as in an empty tinder-box. But sometimes miracles are performed still, and so we'll send the surgeon."

Thus murmuring to himself, rode on Jean Marais, till he reached the little oldfashioned town of Pontgibaud, where he speedily found out the only surgeon that it contained, and who was, consequently, a great man in his way. He despatched him to Chalucet as fast as a horse could carry him, telling him that a count, a countess, and the Bishop of Clermont, had all tumbled down the rocks together, and half broken their necks. He then directed his steps to the inn, where at the door, which looked down upon the stream of the Chalamont, stood a postchaise, with smoking horses, apparently just arrived.

Walking into the kitchen, Jean Marais was in two minutes quite intimate with the host and hostess, the cook, and all the servants, male and female; and it luckily so happened for his purpose that none of the attendants on the party of travellers were at that moment in the peculiar apartment he had selected for his début.

"Now, Monsieur Malot," he said, taking down the load from his shoulder, "I know you have got some guests of quality here, and I have brought you a basket of as beautiful trout as ever you saw to entertain them with. Here are seven magnificent fellows, none of them less than a couple of pounds; and for them you shall give me dinner, supper, a bed, and a breakfast."

The host admired the trout with his eyes, and was taking up the last and largest one which had been caught, when Jean Marais laid his hand upon it, exclaiming, "Not that one, not that one; he is not included. Why, he weighs four pounds if he weighs an ounce, and I destine him as a present from myself to the Count d'Artonne. So give me down a dish, Madame Malot, and I will carry it up with my own hands."

The good hostess very willingly obeyed his injunctions, knowing that the fish must be dressed for her guests to eat it, and that she must make the sauce—which repays a French innkeeper as well as to set brilliants recompenses a jeweller—and, a large dish having been brought down, Jean Marais was ushered up to a room tenanted for the time by the Count and Countess d'Artonne and their guests. He entered in great state, bearing the magnificent trout before him, and found the two gentlemen standing beside Madame d'Artonne, and talking with her on the proceedings of the day.

"Ha! Jean Marais?" cried the count, when he saw him; a shade coming over his countenance, not exactly of displeasure nor of suspicion, but rather, apparently, of sadness. "They told me that you were in prison."

"So I was, sir," said the valet, bowing low, with a smile at the double meaning of the words he was about to use. "So I was, sir, for three days; but at the end of that time they let me out; and, as I have been fishing about the country, and heard you were here, I have brought you this fine trout, as the most acceptable present I could offer you."

"It is a very fine trout indeed," replied the count, looking at the fish; "why, it must weigh four or five pounds. We will have it dressed for dinner to-day, Elise."

"Nay, sir," said Jean Marais, gravely; "I hope you will have it stuffed, and put under a glass case."

Monsieur de St. Medard smiled; and the count replied, "No, really, my good friend; though it is a very fine trout, I do not think it is worthy of quite so distinguished an honour as that."

"Now, really, I think it is," answered Jean Marais; "for this very fish, noble sir, once saved a young lady's life."

The whole party looked at the speaker with some astonishment, and were all silent for a moment.

"You are a jester, Jean Marais," cried Monsieur d'Artonne, at length. But the countess interposed, with a cheek somewhat pale, saying, "He means something, Alphonse. When did it save a young lady's life?"

"This very day, madame," answered Jean Marais.

"Julie!" cried Madame d'Artonne, immediately; "he means Julie! Good God! where is she? what has happened?"

"She is quite well, madame," replied Jean Marais, "and quite safe at Chalucet; but if it had not been for my staying to catch this fish, she would have now been buried in the heart of the mountain;" and, the worst being told, he proceeded to relate all that had occurred.

"Luckily," said the count, when he concluded, "it is to you we owe her safety, Jean Marais, not to the trout; so that we can reward her deliverer. Poor girl! what she must have gone through! And poor Monsieur Arnoux, too! I regret him as much as if he were a brother."

"While there is life there is hope," answered the viscount. "I could spare my right hand better than I could that good old man. Come, D'Artonne, let us go at once to Chalucet, and see what can be done."

"I will go too—I will go too!" cried Madame d'Artonne.

"I fear the road is only practicable for horses," replied Monsieur de St. Medard.

"I will ride, I will walk, I will do anything!" exclaimed the mother; "but I must see my child!"

"You can get within less than a quarter of a league in the carriage," said Jean Marais; "and it may serve to bring mademoiselle back again; for she was not at all hurt, but only faint and exhausted from terror."

His plan was adopted: horses were again put on to the carriage, and in a short time Julie d'Artonne was clasped in her mother's arms; while Monsieur de St. Medard grasped the hand of Francis de Langy, and advanced with him to the bed on which the good abbé was stretched. The surgeon was sitting beside him, and made a sign for the viscount to keep silence; but Monsieur Arnoux was able to look up as he recognised his friend's step, and acknowledged his presence by a faint smile.

CHAPTER XI.

The expedition, which had begun in joy and expectation, ended in sorrow and anxiety, as so many others have done. The poor Abbé Arnoux, crushed and bruised, hung for three or four days between life and death, and perhaps was only saved for the time by the unremitting attention of his pupil and Monsieur de St. Medard. Julie also suffered, though but slightly in comparison, from the terror she had endured and the scenes she had gone through; and, when Francis de Lagny every morning walked or rode over from the little hamlet of Chalucet to Pontgibaud, he had the satisfaction of seeing the colour come back warmly into her cheek, and health sparkle up in her eyes once more.

Having said so much of the principal personages of the tale, we must turn for a moment or two to our respectable friend Jean Marais, who, the second morning after the adventure in the mountains, stood before Monsieur and Madame d'Artonne, giving an account of himself and his proceedings, the whole of which would doubtless prove both interesting and instructive if we had space to lay it before the reader. We can, however, report but a part, and that must be the portion which refers to the present story.

"Why, you know, Jean Marais," said the count, "you know very well that you are a great rogue."

Jean Marais made a low bow, replying, with the most perfect self-satisfaction, "How should I otherwise be fit for the office of valet de chambre to a noble gentleman like the Marquis de Bausse?"

"Well, Jean," replied the count, "in regard to this accusation against you, which I am quite sure is false, and which you say you can prove to have been made without even ground of suspicion, I will take care that the matter be fully investigated, as you desire, within four-and-twenty hours after our arrival at Clermont; and you shall have every opportunity of establishing your innocence, so as not to be detained one moment longer than is necessary. You shall also have a reward of some kind adequate to the service which you have rendered me; but indeed, my good Jean Marais, as to my taking you into our service, that, I fear, is quite out of the question. You know very well that, besides the love-making to the maids, which would be endless, you would do nothing but cheat me from morning to night."

Jean Marais laughed, without showing the slightest symptom either of shame or indignation.

"On my word of honour, Monsieur d'Artonne," he said, "you make a very great mistake. Every man has certain principles upon which he acts, and mine would prevent me from cheating you even of a sous. The matter is very different, indeed, when I am with such a master as the Marquis de Bausse. It was a part of my duty to cheat him, else I render the old proverb of no avail. 'Like master, like man,' noble sir, is much more universally true than people believe. If my master leads the way, as a matter of course I follow; and if he runs very fast, he must not be surprised at my treading on his heels; but with you the matter would be different. I should never think of practising on you any such tricks as are every day played by the fashionable valet on the fashionable master. I would not go out in your clothes and call myself by your name, nor half empty your snuffbox every night into a jar lent me by the tobacconist on purpose to keep my earnings fresh against the time for returning them to his shop. You would never lose four or five canes in a year, and be persuaded that you had left them in a fiacre or in a friend's house. Your shirts would not be frequently mislaid by the washerwoman; your stock of pocket-handkerchiefs would not daily decrease; you would not have an opportunity of seeing how well your own cravats look upon the neck of your valet, nor admire your gloves upon his hands before they had been twice on your own. If your purse remained in your pocket when you went to bed, every Louis would answer to the muster-roll next morning; and the sous would rest in peace upon the edge of the scrutoire. I can assure you I should be perfectly exemplary, unless I saw you begin to gamble or cheat at cards, or say sweet things to madame's femme de chambre;" and he bowed reverently to the countess as he spoke.

"A pleasant picture you give, certainly, of a valet's life," said Monsieur d'Artonne; "but I am afraid, my good Jean Marais, that, even if there was a probability of your keeping all your promises, I could not grant your request, for my servants are old and faithful friends, whom I am not likely to part with, and I have fully as many of them as I want."

"Happy Monsieur d'Artonne," exclaimed Jean Marais, "and unhappy I! But it is always so in life; when we want to escape temptation, we find the door shut upon us: so I shall have nothing to do but to go on with sweet Monsieur de Bausse when he comes back again, which, of course, will be the case when he has spent all his money; or else to get myself a new place with some other noble gentleman of the same kind, where, in duty to myself, I shall be obliged to cheat him from morning till night, or lose my character forever among my friends and companions."

"Well, well, Jean Marais," replied the count, "we will see what is to be done for you; perhaps I may be able to find you a better place than you have; but remember, if I do so, and you dishonour my recommendation, I will cut your ears off with my own hands."

"Sir, they are perfectly at your service," answered Jean Marais, making him a low bow; "but, in the mean time, I may look to you to get me clear of this charge."

"Nay, my good friend," cried the count, "I did not exactly say that; I merely promised that you should have an opportunity of establishing your innocence at once, if you can do so, and should not be kept for months in prison, as is too much the custom in France, whether an accused person be guiltless or criminal."

"That is all I want, that is all I want, sir," replied Jean Marais; "for I know that there cannot be even a cause of suspicion shown against me; and, to tell you the truth, sir, I am afraid of my morals in that place."

"How so?" demanded the count; "I should think, my good friend, that your morals were very safe."

"Oh! you flatter me, sir," answered Jean Marais; "but I can assure you that a prison in France is not the best school of virtue that one can be in. It is only on the outside of the walls that one protests one's innocence; in the inside each one rivals the other in telling how many crimes he has committed."

Jean Marais might, perhaps, have gone on for some time longer entertaining the count with his views of society; but at that moment Monsieur de St. Medard entered, and the valet withdrew. The viscount came to propose a new arrangement, although it had only been that morning determined that they were to stay for three or four days longer at Pontgibaud, in order that the good Abbé Arnoux might be the better enabled to bear a journey.

"You will think me somewhat whimsical," said Monsieur de St. Medard; "but the truth is, I begin much to doubt the skill of our worthy surgeon here, and I am anxious that the abbé should have more scientific advice and better care. We can easily have a litter made, in which his bed may be laid, and he himself carried to Clermont without any fatigue."

"Oh! if he arrives at Clermont," cried the countess, "he must not stop short of the Chateau d'Artonne; and the better care and tendance he will have with us will make up for the short additional distance."

Thus, then, was it settled. The remainder of that day was passed in constructing the litter, and rendering it as comfortable as circumstances would allow; and early on the following morning the whole party set out upon their return, the sick man being borne on the shoulders of four stout Auvergnats, with a relay of bearers following; by which means he was brought without much fatigue to Clermont, and thence to the Chateau d'Artonne.

The viscount and Francis de Langy accompanied him on horseback; but the count and countess, with Julie, had gone on, and were ready to receive their guests on the terrace before the house. While Monsieur Arnoux was carried up to the comfortable chamber which had been prepared for him, and Julie lingered for a minute or two with Francis de Langy in the gardens looking at the setting sun, Monsieur de St. Medard followed his host and hostess into the chateau to examine the contents of a large packet which the count said had been waiting for him for several days, but which the servants had foolishly neglected to forward.

The moment the viscount read the first lines, he exclaimed, "This is very unfortunate! A summons to Versailles, my dear D'Artonne, to give his majesty information regarding Pondicherry. It has reached me somewhat late, and there must be no more delay; we must depart to-morrow without fail."

Julie and Francis were entering at the very moment that he uttered the last words, and would be difficult to describe the look of consternation which came upon those two young faces at the tidings they heard. Madame d'Artonne marked it with a smile, and exclaimed at once, "But the abbé cannot go; and Francis shall not, I declare!"

"Leave him with us, St. Medard," said the count; "he is in duty bound to stay and nurse his tutor. We will keep him, too, as a pledge that you yourself come back, and fulfil your promise to us of staying at least a week."

Monsieur de St. Medard looked towards Francis de Langy; and though the young man cast his eyes upon the ground, and expressed no wish of any kind, yet it needed little skill to perceive that his inclinations turned not towards Versailles.

The matter, then, was settled as the Count d'Artonne proposed; and although we have not said much hitherto of Julie's feelings in regard to Francis de Langy, yet it must be acknowledged that her young heart beat joyfully with sensations she never thought of inquiring into. The age had not come with her for shrinking from the first approaches of love, for trembling at the presence of the new spirit within her. At that age love assumes not his form of power and might, overawing the heart and mastering all the senses; but, on the contrary, he comes in the sweeter and gentler form of the winged child, his quiver hidden, and his bow behind his back. Young, happy friendship is the name he takes; and all Julie thought she wished to keep was the kind companion whom chance had thrown so fortunately in her way. Perhaps she might think it a little strange that she was so very, very glad he was going to stay; but then that was easily accounted for: he was so noble, he was so kind. He was the first companion, too, whom she had ever had; the first to whom her heart and mind had opened, the first who had entered into all her thoughts and feelings, the first who had taught her what it was to have a brother. All these reasons were summed up in a moment in the mind of Julie; and so little idea had she of what was beneath them all, that she expressed her joy warmly and openly; while Francis, on the contrary, said not a word, though his looks were quite sufficient.

A messenger had been sent forward for the most skilful surgeon in the neighbourhood; and in about half an hour he arrived at the chateau, much to the satisfaction of Monsieur de St. Medard, who was anxious to hear some really good opinion upon the case of the poor Abbé Arnoux. Unwilling, however, to give any bias to the man of healing, he suffered the surgeon to visit his patient alone, and waited in a neighbouring chamber for his coming forth for nearly an hour.

When the surgeon at length appeared, his opinion of the case was very doubtful. "I have hope," he said, "I have much hope that a perfect recovery may be effected. But still, I will by no means assure you, sir, that such will be the case; the injuries received have been very severe, the consequences will be long and difficult to deal with, and the result, I must say—though I hope for the best—is uncertain."

"Do you believe that conversation may be hurtful to your patient?" demanded the viscount; "for, as I am unexpectedly obliged to go to Versailles, I should like to sit with him for an hour to-night."

"Oh! you may do so," replied the surgeon; "it will not injure him, if you leave him whenever you see he is becoming fatigued."

CHAPTER XII

It was between nine and ten at night when Monsieur de St. Medard, having been told that the Abbé Arnoux had obtained an hour's sleep and was much refreshed, entered his room to bid him farewell before his departure for Paris. Approaching his bed with a quiet and cautious step, the viscount sat down on a chair at his side, and, looking at the calm and placid though worn features of the good ecclesiastic, he said, "You look better, Arnoux; your journey seems to have done you good."

"I feel much better," replied the abbé; "I feel much better, my dear friend. I seem to breathe more freely here. I thank God for it most sincerely, Monsieur de St. Medard; and I can assure you, whatever you may think, that it is the greatest of all comforts to be able to bless and thank God for any happiness or any mere relief that He sends us."

The viscount smiled. "I admire religion very much, you know, abbé," he said, "and think it an excellent thing; but yet I cannot see how it makes any difference. A man is happy, or unhappy; he suffers pain, or is relieved; but it matters very little to him, methinks, whence the relief or the happiness comes."

"Not at all!" replied the abbé, with a degree of eagerness which conquered his corporeal weakness: "it matters in the most essential degree. The higher and the finer emotions of the heart are all of them the sources of our most intense delight, and none more so than gratitude. A slight difficulty of breathing is easily borne, and to be relieved from it is a very ordinary comfort looked at abstractedly; but when we trace it up to the mercy of God, and look upon it as a fresh motive for thankfulness to Him who has given us a thousand others, a more expansive joy takes possession of the breast. The satisfaction is doubled by gratitude to the hand whence the relief comes; ay, and moreover, in each indication of mercy towards us, we find the materials of confidence, hope, and expectation."

"My good abbé," said the viscount, "you know I never like to talk upon these subjects; not because I wish in any degree to shut my own ears, but because I never like to say one word which may shake the faith of other people—a faith in which they are happy, and which I have no right to disturb. But when you speak upon this subject, one must answer you; and I will only point out that you, good devoted gentlemen, are like our loyal grandfathers in the time of Louis the Fourteenth, who used to go to the Bastile with the most humble resignation, and experience all the pleasures of gratitude when they were let out again after two or three years' imprisonment. He who has now sent you relief rolled down the rocks upon you; your gratitude in the one case would be naturally counterbalanced by your indignation in the other, if you did not regard God as a despotic king, like our Grand Monarque in the eyes of our countrymen a century ago."

"We regard Him as an all-wise one," said the abbé; "and that, my dear friend, makes a very great difference. Those who look upon a mere mortal as all-wise commit a very great sin, taking from the only Being who can possess such an attribute a part of his glory to robe a human idol withal. But if, in our belief of God's infinite wisdom and infinite goodness, we feel our hearts raised with joyful thankfulness for every act of mercy, the same convictions bring resignation, and deep confidence, and humble hope, at every act of chastisement which He may perform. Thus, every pleasure is heightened, and every pain diminished, by tracing each to the same great Source of wisdom and goodness."

The viscount paused thoughtfully for a moment or two. The truth of what the abbé said was apparent, but he would not grasp it, as Monsieur Arnoux wished, and he ended his revery by replying, "Yes, I know it is a very pleasant thing; I always thought so, and ever wished that I possessed it; but one's will has no power over one's convictions, my dear abbé, and my mind has been made up many years."

"But upon good grounds?" demanded the abbé. "How many changes in our views, Monsieur de St. Medard, take place in twenty years; how do our powers of reasoning become acuminated by time and exercise? Do you think that the same arguments would convince you to-day that convinced you a quarter of a century ago?"

"I really do not know," replied the viscount; "I am very hard to convince, my dear abbé, and am growing more and more so every day of my life. But what I wished to talk to you about," he continued, very willing to change the subject, "was quite another affair. I came to tell you that I have received a summons to Versailles, and may not return for a fortnight or three weeks. In the mean time, Francis will remain here with you; and, at my return, I hope to find you perfectly well again."

The abbé shook his head. "Francis was here a minute ago," he said: "he told me you were going; and that is the reason, my dear friend, that I venture to speak with you upon a subject very near my heart. Pray, listen to me for a few moments patiently. I believe, St. Medard, that we shall never meet again: I had wished that you might see me die, for I believed that the sight of how a fellow-being can meet the approach of death in Christian hope and faith might produce at least a new train of thought which would lead you to quit the fatal errors which you have imbibed, and which render the grave a dark and gloomy abode indeed."

"You mistake, my dear friend," answered the viscount; "we philosophers, I can assure you, do not look upon the approach of annihilation with the horror that you, perhaps, suppose:* believing that death is but a more complete sleep, I could lay my head down to-morrow in the grave with as little care as upon my pillow this night."

"And without the hope of awaking?" demanded the abbé.

The viscount nodded his head.

"And with no fear of that waking?" said Monsieur Arnoux.

"None," answered his friend.

"I am sorry for it," replied the abbé: "what hopes do you not exclude yourself from; what glorious expectations do you not shut out; what sources of high and generous feeling do you not batten down and forcibly repress? I speak merely of this world, even supposing that there were not another. By the loss of its promises, its principles, its objects, you lose fully one half of the joys which man may derive from the abundant springs of felicity in his own mixed nature."

"I am inclined to believe that we do, my dear abbé," said the viscount: "at all events, we lose a great deal; and, among other things, we lose those barriers, and those inducements, which supply the place of a fine moral sense to at least three quarters of mankind. It is for this very reason, because I believe religion to be both a very happy and a very beneficial ingredient in the cup of life, that I never give voice to my own opinions, and would very willingly see the promulgation of such doctrines prohibited by law."

"Then what," asked the abbé, in return, "what do you hold to be the origin of all religion? How did it arise; whence did it spring? Here is what you acknowledge to be a principle which gives happiness and virtue; which is strong enough to supply the place of moral sense, where it is wanting; which is beneficial to society, and excellent for man himself; and yet it is altogether false, wrong, absurd! If it is a falsehood, it is an immorality; and by your own rules, as I have heard them a thousand times expounded, that which is immoral must be baleful in its effects. Whence did this extraordinary and anomalous excellence spring?"

"According to my belief, my dear abbé," replied the viscount, "from the heated imaginations of the East, fashioned afterward into a peculiar form by some very wise and very good men, and receiving additions and alterations, from time to time, as the necessities of society required such changes."

"And all these very wise and good men," said the abbé, "while every one of them condemns the slightest deviation from truth, is engaged in promulgating falsehoods, ay, and in manufacturing them wholesale."

"But for the very best and greatest purposes," cried the viscount, a little heated.

"What!" exclaimed the abbé; "the good and the wise are to have a monopoly of falsehood, according to your code, and to use it for their purposes, and theirs alone? I am afraid, my dear viscount, that your ethics somewhat halt, and that your idea of good and wise men teaching lies, and at the same time denouncing lying, is not a bit less anomalous and inconceivable than that of a whole system of falsehood and absurdity unworthy of the belief of any reasonable man, producing, when called religion, the happiest effects for individuals and society. One proposition or the other must be true: either religion is false, wicked, and detrimental, and those who framed it shameless impostors; or it is beneficial, blessed, and excellent, with God for its origin, and truth for its foundation."

"My dear abbé," replied Monsieur de St. Medard, after musing thoughtfully for a moment or two, and apparently finding a difficulty in reconciling the admissions he had made with the conclusions naturally deduced from them: "my dear abbé, it is not for me to explain how these things are. You asked me how I thought religion arose: I say what I suppose to be possibly the case; I do not mean absolutely to assert that it is so. If I am to be convinced, you must bring forward proofs to show that what you believe is true, and not attempt to puzzle me by making me explain a state of things I see exist, but to the origin and history of which I have paid but very little attention."

"My first object, my dear friend," replied the abbé, in a low tone, "is to puzzle you. Nay, answer me not with a jest, St. Medard! You unbelievers have a great habit of jesting with your own minds, killing an argument with a sarcasm, and dismissing an unpleasant truth with a sneer. My first object, I repeat, is to puzzle you; or, in short, to cast your preconceived notions upon these subjects into confusion. I know that you will not leave them so; I know that your first task will be to search, to inquire, to examine. Your mind is too clear, too precise, too strong to rest in doubt; and I believe that in the search, if you can but throw the prejudices of years behind you, you will find truth—that which man should seek beyond anything else."

* Very nearly the same words have been ascribed to Gibbon; but such opinions were common just before the first French Revolution.

"Indeed, my dear abbé," replied the viscount, "you cannot love it better than I do; but I will not suffer you to go on to-night, such discussions are too much for you."

"Nay, nay!" cried the abbé, eagerly, raising himself up on his arm, "you must, indeed, hear me to-night, St. Medard, or you will leave me unhappy; you will darken my bed of death. Only give me a little of that drink, and hear me."

The viscount gave him the glass, and sat down again by his bedside; and, after a momentary pause, the abbé went on again.

"My object," he said, "is to prompt you to search—to search with a mind devoid of prejudice, with a heart clear of passion, with a spirit full of humility, with a mind open to truth. In the first place, then, I have sought from your own principles to make you doubt that religion springs from the imaginations of men, moulded into certain forms to suit certain purposes by men of genius. I think I have made you doubt it."

"You have," said the viscount, gravely; "and I will examine into that matter."

"Do," rejoined Monsieur Arnoux; "and the more you examine, the brighter will be the light that breaks upon you. You will find religion in some shape in every age and tribe of intellectual beings. You will find it becoming purer and purer as it approaches nearer to that grand stream of doctrine which all who have dispensed it assert to flow direct from God. You will there find everything imbodied that morals can require, and the whole concluded and distinguished by the doctrine that God is truth. I call upon you, as a reasonable man, to satisfy your own mind of how religion rose in the human heart, of how this peculiar religion which Christians profess was first received, and how it has been transmitted. Remember, I speak of the religion itself, and not at all of the comments of men, which have sometimes, perhaps, elucidated, but often embarrassed it. This is my first object—to make you doubt and examine. If you find that you have not been right upon this point, you may perhaps doubt and examine some others; and then the first great inquiry, on which rests all others, will of course present itself once more to your mind, 'Is there, or is there not, a God,' who has given this knowledge of his existence to every tribe of earth; and who, it is asserted, has revealed himself, his attributes, and his will to some particular nations?"

"And why not to all?" demanded the viscount.

"That you may discover," replied the abbé, "as you go on; though I do not say that every question which you ask may be answered."

"And why not?" inquired the viscount.

"Because, my dear friend," replied the abbé, "there never yet was a man upon this earth whose mind could comprehend a thousandth part of the phenomena that are going on in this little globe—still less of those which are taking place in all the millions of worlds that roll in what we call the sky—still less in the Infinite beyond. When you can comprehend all these things, explain, discuss, and judge them, it will be then time for you to say to the God who made them, 'Why didst thou thus, and thus?' but not before."

The viscount paused for a moment, fixing an intense gaze upon the blue star-lit heaven, which might be seen through the window of the sick man's chamber, and to which he had pointed as he spoke.

"That would close all inquiry," said Monsieur de St. Medard, at length.

"Not so," replied the abbé; "not so. You must first learn to believe in God before you can justly reverence him. All I seek is to make you approach that inquiry with the humility and the awe that are becoming; not to start away at vague objections, but to see whether there be not sufficient proof that there is a God—proof irrefragable, demonstrable; and, having arrived at that point, your mind is too logical to reject the notion of his existence because you cannot comprehend the motives of his actions."

"Certainly, certainly," exclaimed the viscount: "once afford me a clear, satisfactory proof that there does exist a God, and to his governance of the world we must bow without inquiry. Give me a proof of his existence, that is all that I require."

"It is in every herb and every flower," replied the abbé; "in every fruit and every seed, in every being and in every thought, in every limb and feature, in every bloodvessel and every nerve, in every grain of sand and in the universe, in every part, and in the whole! Search, search, my dear friend; go forth and search, and God will meet you everywhere. Whenever the heart of man demands, in sincerity and truth, 'Where art thou, God?' the Almighty answers, 'Here!'"

"I do not exactly understand you," replied the viscount, "although I perceive that you mean to impress generally that God is to be traced in what you call his works. I see not how you will prove that all the phenomena that we behold are not attributable to any other self-existing cause. Why should I at all suppose that what is to-day was not yesterday? Or, if there has been a change, as we know there has, in society and other things, why should I not attribute that change to the ordinary operation of one material substance upon another? We know that motion is produced by substances in certain relations to each other, and with motion and matter the whole seems to me to require no other explanation. There is nothing observable in the whole world that cannot be referred to these two causes."

"Yes," replied the abbé; "there is the most important of all."

"And what is that?" demanded Monsieur de St. Medard.

"Design," answered his friend: "the adaption of particular means to a particular end, which is observable in every part of the universe, but more especially in the highest classes of organized beings: which proves, beyond all possibility of doubt, the existence of an intellectual Agent proposing a particular object to be attained in the construction of a certain being, and arriving at that object by the most complex and wonderful machinery that it is possible to produce—machinery which shows in every part some of the attributes of God, his almighty power, his infinite wisdom, his unceasing love for the creatures that he forms. Design, my dear friend, design, that is the proof of the Godhead, which you cannot attribute to matter and motion."

The viscount remained in deep thought for several minutes, and at the end of that time he replied, "I will search, I will examine, my dear abbé. One should always hold one's mind open to conviction; and if I do find proofs of design, so conclusive as to convince me that the ordinary self-arrangement of matter in motion has not produced the effect, it will go far to make me believe there is a principle of some kind, which you, perhaps, may call God, and which imagination may invest with various attributes or qualities; though I, perhaps, may look upon that principle as an established geometrical law, without passions, feelings, sensations, but operating through all nature by fixed rules."

"I will never cavil at words," replied the abbé; "and I understand what you mean: though the very difficulty of expressing your views—nay, the impossibility of making them clear, without a contradiction in terms—should in itself lead you to believe that, in flying from some difficulties, you plunge into still greater. You speak of a law: where was there ever a law without a lawmaker? You talk of a rule: who laid it down? You have no answer to any of these questions, but that it was an inevitable necessity! Inevitable necessity does not design, does not adapt means to an end; and if you admit, as you must and will do, that there has been one great Creator of all things, you will soon see his attributes issuing as a natural consequence from his existence, and displayed in his works. You, who look upon intellect with such high and proud esteem, will not be long, after you have admitted the existence of a God, in admitting also that he must be the perfection of intellect; and that he who raises you yourself above the brute by so many noble qualities must possess in himself the acme and essence of all those gifts with which he has endowed you. But I have now gained my object; you have promised to search, you have promised me to examine. I require nothing more, unless it be that you examine with humility, and remember how very little of the whole subject you can comprehend; although every man can comprehend fully enough to perceive that—whatever be the truth in regard to a thousand accessory circumstances—the grand doctrines of religion must be true. I speak as a dying man, my friend; as one who, in all probability, is about to part with you here forever, but one who, nevertheless, hopes to meet with you in another world, where time, and doubt, and change will all be at an end."

The viscount pressed his hand kindly, saying, "I will not continue the subject with you now, my friend, for in your zeal you have somewhat already exhausted yourself; and I, who, unhappily, entertain little hope of that meeting in another world, would fain enjoy your society a little longer in this. The surgeon, however, gives me good hope of you; and you must try all you can to live, abbé, in order that you may guide my researches: for it is a wide and trackless ocean that lies between this world and another, if there be such a thing; and the ignorant voyager much needs some one better instructed to give him a chart."

"It is, indeed, a wide ocean," said the abbé, "full of waves and dangers, storms and tempests; and, like the Atlantic before the adventurous Genoese first crossed it, no one comes back to tell us what is beyond. But as to the eye of Columbus, enlightened by true genius, it was self-evident that, to harmonize with the known world in which he dwelt, there must be another continent beyond the wide Western sea; so, to the eye of the religious man, enlightened by revelation, it is self-evident that beyond the ocean of time there must be another world to equalize all that is unequal in this."

The figure that the abbé used, though an imperfect one, had fully as much effect upon Monsieur de St. Medard as all the rest of his reasoning: for so constituted is the mind of man, that it with the greatest difficulty grasps abstractions, even when the most accustomed to their consideration; and an immense number of mistakes in metaphysical reasonings are to be traced to man's tendency to employ material facts, or the terms that represent them, as a sort of covert illustration of abstract ideas; for metaphysical science has not even yet an accurate technology.

However, the viscount once more repeated, "I will examine, my friend; and, should I find that I have been mistaken, I will not scruple to own it; for if it be a credit to any man to overcome the prejudices of others, it is still a greater credit to overcome his own. But now, my dear abbé, I will leave you, trusting most sincerely that you may be restored to health, and that I shall find you well at my return."

"Farewell!" replied the abbé: "it may be so; and if it be, I trust that it will be for the purpose of seeing some fruit rise from the seed that has been sown this night."

Once more the viscount pressed his hand, with a faint smile at the good man's zeal, and left him.

CHAPTER XIII.

"As you please, my dear Francis, as you please," said Monsieur de St. Medard, with his foot upon the step of the carriage; "the fellow is a rogue undoubtedly."

"I know it," replied Francis de Langy; "but I think his roguery only goes to a certain extent; and a valet de chambre, my dear uncle—"

"Must have a certain quantity of roguery," said Monsieur de St. Medard, "as a hair-dresser must have a pot of pomatum; ha, Francis? Well, my dear boy, I leave it entirely to yourself: only let him be perfectly cleared of this other business, let there not be the slightest doubt upon that score; and then if, out of gratitude for the service he has rendered, you choose to take him as your personal attendant, do so. Some reward he must certainly have, but consider the matter well, and you have my full authority either to receive him as your valet, or to give him a hundred Louis as his recompense."

"Perhaps," answered Francis de Langy, after a moment's thought, "perhaps the best plan will be to offer him his choice, whether he will take the hundred Louis or the place."

"Oh! he will take the hundred Louis," replied the viscount.

"Then I shall be the better satisfied not to give him the place," said Francis de Langy; "and it will be some sort of test of his character."

"But scarcely fair, I think," rejoined Monsieur de St. Medard: "you owe him a recompense of some kind, Francis; and now, though every office is venal in France under the government, it has not become so in gentlemen's houses, and we do not put for sale to the best bidder at charge were no sombre looks, there was no air of despair, there was nothing of the dark and hideous aspect of imprisonment about them. Loud and uproarious laughter was ringing through the court; every group was grinning, chattering, talking, sporting; and, if it had not been for the prison-dress, the soiled and ragged coat, half-gray, half-black, which many of them wore, and the indescribable, but not to be mistaken, expression of habitual vice which appeared in the countenances of the greater part of those there present, one might have supposed them a party met for merry-making. Everything upon the superficies, in short, was not only cheerful, but gay; the misery was in the heart, and they kept it there. Too often, indeed, do we see it so in life. I recollect an old picture in which one had a sort of allegorical section of the earth; and what is below? The upper half showed a beautiful landscape, and gay groups dancing, with some of the follies and some of the faults of life; the lower half represented the grave and hell, with corruption, remorse, and punishment; and I never see reckless gayety in a bad man without thinking of that picture, and asking myself, What is below?

The group in front of the prison-yard consisted of four or five men, sporting together with somewhat rude jocularity: one suddenly leaping over the head of another; his companion, again, tripping up his feet; a third, almost a giant in size and strength, lifting the least of the party from the ground by the waistband, and holding him out at arm's-length, as men hold out a lap-dog; and all of them, though sometimes receiving a bruise or a cut, and swearing at each other with foul and blasphemous oaths, resuming the tone of sport the moment after, with as much good-humour as if they had never injured a fellow-being in their lives. A little farther on, a small monkey-faced man, perched upon an inverted pail, seemed holding forth to a large auditory with a great deal of extravagant gesticulation, but with the gravest and most solemn countenance possible; while all his hearers were rolling, convulsed with immoderate fits of laughter, and even a guard, who was standing near on duty, grinning from ear to ear. As Francis de Langy passed by them, he found that the mimic was preaching, as he called it, to his dear flock; parodying a sermon with a torrent of filth and blasphemy such as was never heard by man but in a similar place.

A number of other groups were scattered abroad; but the eye of the young gentleman at that moment fell upon one in the corner of the yard, consisting of three or four persons, whereof Jean Marais was one. Here, too, all was gayety; and Jean seemed to be entertaining his hearers by some story fully as much as the preacher was amusing his by the sermon. Two of his companions, however, deserve a brief description; and they shall have it. The first was a tall, athletic young man, probably not more than two or three and twenty, with a frank and open countenance, but a certain sort of daring and determined expression, which augured no great scruples in following out his own views and purposes. There was, indeed, a look of thought about his eyes and brow, which was visible even through the laugh which he was bestowing upon Jean Marais's tale; and as he sat in the shade with his hat on his knee, twisting round and round some eagle's feathers which were stuck in the front of it, Francis de Langy fancied that his mind would fain have wandered away to other things, if it had not been for the sort of conventional indifference which men in his situation believe themselves bound to assume.

He was not dressed in the prison garb; he another, who was seated by him, displayed indication of some serious offence. He was so tall as the other by nearly three inches, was gigantic in depth of chest and breadth shoulders. His countenance, which was somewhat pale, with a dark bluish beard, wore a and good-humoured expression, without slightest trace of care or anxiety. He laughed loud and merrily; and the only thing which could show that the mind was not in a state perfectly placid repose, ready to submit itself implicitly to any pleasant impression that might offer, was the wandering glance of the keen eye, which seemed continually searching for something that it did not find. The face of Jean Marais was turned obliquely from Francis de Langy, so that the worthy valet de chambre did not see the young gentleman approaching; and he went on with his narrative in the same tone he had been using, in order to rise above all the multitudinous sounds with which the court of the prison was ringing. The ear of the visiter thus caught several sentences, and Francis was not a little pleased to find that there was none of the profane and ribald licentiousness in his conversation which he had just heard poured forth from the mouth of the man who was preaching. Jean Marais was relating his early adventures in the house of Madame de Banasse, and the picture he gave of that good lady herself, her frivolity, her malice, her affectation, was so clever and so droll as to compel an unwilling smile upon the lips of his unperceived auditor. The subject was, at that moment, the marchioness's first anxiety at the prolonged absence of her son; and Jean Marais mocked her tone, and her words, and her looks, as he described her calling up all the men-servants, one after another, to communicate her apprehensions to them; hinting, moreover, that her vanity was not insensible to the admiration of the lowest footboy in her household. He took off, too, her whole demeanour: he wriggled, he hemmed, he panted, he rolled his eyes about, he sighed, he fluttered, and, laying his hand upon his left side, he exclaimed, in the shrill treble of mock sensibility, "Ah, my poor heart!" Then starting up, he prepared to tear his hair; but suddenly perceiving the young gentleman standing near, he stopped, crying, "Ah! Monsieur le Baron, you have woke me from a delicious dream; I was just then Madame de Banasse, enjoying the excitement of her son's disappearance."

Francis de Langy now took him aside, and gave him the information he had been sent to communicate; at which Jean Marais seemed a little pleased, saying, "I shall be glad enough to get out, for we have not the best school of morals here, sir, and my virtue is of a somewhat delicate constitution; yet, after all," he added, "I am not sorry I came in again, seeing that I met with that poor lad, who sits there with his hat in his hand, and who wants a little counsel and consolation. I wish, sir, you could speak to the Count d'Artonne about him."

"Who is he?" demanded Francis de Langy, eyeing the man with the eagle's feathers in his hat; "who is he, and how came he in here?"

Jean Marais drew him a little farther away and then replied, "He is a poor devil who has been brought in for poaching—upon the count's lands, too. I am very much afraid he's guilty; in fact, he does not deny it."

"That is a serious offence," said Francis de Langy, who naturally entertained the prejudices of his class and his times in regard to the rights of the chase; any infringement of which was at that time regarded in France as a crime nearly equal to murder, and certainly very much deeper than the breach of some commandments in the decalogue.

"It is, indeed, sir," replied Jean Marais; "and yet it is a wonderfully tempting thing to see a nice, soft, gray roebuck within forty or fifty yards of the muzzle of your gun. However, this lad has a better excuse; and I am sure, if he did not poach, I don't see what he was to do."

"How so?" demanded Francis de Langy. "What excuse has he to allege?"

"Why, in the first place, sir," replied Jean Marais, "you know there are certain provinces in France where every one has the right of killing and eating whatever wild animals he likes, and this young man came from one of those. In the next place, you see, poor devil! there was nothing else for him to do: he and the rest of his people, some two years ago, took a little farm belonging to Monsieur d'Artonne, up among the hills; but, being Huguenots, the people around, who were all Catholics, would have nothing to say to them. They are in a state of complete excommunication, though they are as good souls as ever lived. Late in the spring, and during the summer, there is plenty of work upon the farm; but during a great part of autumn, all winter, and two thirds of the spring, there is nothing to do in that country but to walk about the hills and woods with a gun. He kept himself from bears, and wolves, and beasts of prey, for a long time; but it is hard to refrain a shot at a buck or a doe, a hare, or a wild boar, especially when a man's hungry and is fond of venison."

"It is," said Francis de Langy; "and I will speak to Monsieur d'Artonne about him. I should not think he was inclined to deal harshly with any one. Was he apprehended by the count's people?"

"No, sir," answered Jean Marais; "he was apprehended by the maréchaussée. They caught him with a roe over his shoulders, and took him in the fact. It was on a part of the count's ground so far distant from the chateau, that Monsieur d'Artonne takes no pains with the game upon it."

"I will speak to him, I will speak to him," said Francis de Langy; "and, if he has any power, I doubt not he will have him set free. Who is that other man with whom you were talking just now? He has not the air of an Auvergnat."

"Oh, pardie, no!" replied Jean Marais: "he is from the north; one of the écorcheurs you may have heard of; a brave garçon, nevertheless."

Francis de Langy heard him with some surprise; for, perhaps, among all the bloodthirsty villians that Europe has produced, there never was a race so remorseless and sanguinary as the écorcheurs of France in the eighteenth century. "I should suppose," he said, with a grave and displeased expression of countenance, "that there was nothing good to be found in such a man, and no advantage in his companionship."

Jean Marais smiled. "Not much, perhaps, sir," he answered; "but, when I am put in a place like this, I am obliged to choose the best society it affords; and the prison of Clermont, sir, is not the saloon of Versailles, or even the salle-à-manger of the café Regnard."

"But you do not mean to say," cried Francis de Langy, "that he is among the best that you could have found here?"

"In good truth, I do, sir," replied Jean Marais. "The three men with whom I was talking are the three most respectable people in the place. We four are the only part of the congregation who do not talk blasphemy and obscenity from morning till night, which is none the wittier in my ears because it is wrapped in argot.* Now, we four have amused ourselves by telling our histories in good plain French, laughing a little at our betters, perhaps, but saying nothing here which we should be ashamed to say in any other place; though some of us might not like, indeed, to make such full confessions. As to the écorcheur, he is one of the best born and best educated among us; the son of a great farmer in Picardy, who bred him up to the trade he followed, and taught him to cultivate the fields by day and to rob houses and passengers by night. All we Frenchmen have very little care for human life; we don't much mind losing our own, or taking that of another; and Jacques Braye assured me, not an hour ago, that he never thought there was any great harm in what he was doing, till his father was broken on the wheel about three months ago, and he himself escaped with difficulty into Auvergne. He then began to fancy that it was not quite right, after all, to take men's money, and, perhaps, their lives too; though the only thing he had ever objected to before was once when his father broiled an old Jew alive, in order to make him confess where he had hidden his money. It is very shocking, sir, I acknowledge; but yet, if you will compare him with the other men in the place, you will find him one of the honestest persons in it. I will answer for it, that, except the four who were sitting in the corner there together, there is not a man who repents of anything that he has done in the past, or proposes anything for the future, but to be revenged upon society by some new crime as soon as he can get out. Now, poor Jacques Braye does repent very heartily, though he'll be broken on the wheel within a fortnight from this time, if they bring him to trial. But, at all events, I can assure you, sir, that a man who has committed even a very great crime, but has not long habits of vice, is a less dangerous companion than one who has worn away every good feeling as well as good principle in the practice of small delinquencies, and is only prevented from doing something worse by fear or caution."

Francis de Langy thought there might be some truth in Jean Marais's observation; but, before he could reply, his companion gave him a hint that it would be better to get out of the court as fast as possible.

"That old foul-mouthed Escrve," he said in a whisper, "has had his eye upon you for the last minute, and he is now whispering with some of his companions. I know what it means very well, and in another instant you will be stripped of everything that is worth having upon you."

While he spoke, Francis de Langy moved towards the door; and, luckily, at the same moment the guard crossed over towards them; for there was a sudden movement among the prisoners in that direction, which showed that their operations were about to commence. A howl of mortification and derision met the young gentleman's ear as he entered the passage leading away from the court; and with not a little satisfaction he quitted the den of thieves, in which his future valet had been placed for the completion of his education.

* Otherwise slang.

CHAPTER XIV.

The most corrupt invention of the corrupt race to which we belong—and we certainly did for many generations go on from one stage of moral putridity to another—was devised in France. It was neither more nor less than the venality of the officers of justice. All posts, in fact, were venal during several centuries in that country; and, although one might have expected that common sense and common honesty would have preserved the magistracy from such a taint, alas, it was not so! and those who were destined to administer the law among their fellow-subjects purchased their offices as they would a farm. Now, if a man chooses to buy the right of being shot at, and wearing a red or a blue coat, either by land or sea, there can be no great harm in letting him do so, especially where his appointment to any important command depends upon persons responsible for their conduct; but to sell the office of a judge is but in other terms to sell justice, and we may be very sure that the article will be adulterated before it comes to the general market.

The intendants of justice, police, and finance, as they were called, were personages sent from Paris into the various provinces of France to preside over certain districts with a curious, somewhat indefinite, and very extensive power. They were generally chosen from among the Maîtres de Requêtes, and were but too frequently subjected to any other influence than that of Themis. Corruption, as a machine, indeed, does not always work so ill as men may imagine; and though at first sight one would suppose that a system, in which an officer, purchasing his post at an enormous sum, and very often obtaining leave to purchase it only through the interest of a harlot, was sent down to dispense justice in a large district, must necessarily soon come to a stop by the general abhorrence, disgust, indignation, and resistance of those upon whom he exercised his functions; yet the thing went on for many years, and men were found—ay, men of gravity, station, and wisdom—to say of this, as of more than one iniquity in our own country, "It works well!"

Little less than kings in their own particular provinces, the intendants lived sumptuously, fared luxuriously, and had magnificent houses; and into the saloon of one of those dwellings, in the town of Clermont, we shall introduce the reader, in order that he may see and hear Monsieur d'Artonne and the intendant of that generality chatting over the events which brought the former thither. Nothing could be more exquisite and luxurious than the furniture of the apartment. Every article had been brought from Paris, and an artist of celebrity had come from the capital for the express purpose of painting and gilding the panels of the wainscot. It was not difficult, in short, to fancy one's self in one of the royal chambers at Versailles; and as Monsieur d'Artonne looked around him when first ushered into the saloon, which was then vacant, he could not help asking himself, "How is all this splendour obtained?"

In a moment or two after the intendant himself appeared. He was a man of about forty-five; thin, but well formed; with keen, dark, black eyes, an atrabilious complexion, and raven hair without a single thread of silver mingling with it. His manner was calm and mild, but impressive; his step noiseless, but firm; his voice sweet in tone, but very penetrating; his words well chosen, but studiously indefinite. One was convinced that he was a man of great abilities, yet one knew not why; one was pleased with his demeanour, yet felt that he was unapproachable. There was nothing repellent, indeed: you might see him; you might question him, you might argue with him, without any fear of a rebuff, but you would discover nothing more than the outside. He was like some object encased in crystal, which you may handle and look at forever without being able to touch. On the present occasion he was dressed, as usual, with the most scrupulous neatness, but all in black. He was a man full of proprieties, and would not for the world have appeared either in a garb of a gay and glittering character, or in one in the least degree discomposed, or inferior to his station. His coat was of the richest and most expensive velvet, fitting his person beautifully, without ply or wrinkle. His black silk stockings were the finest that could be made for money; his buttons were of jet, with a small diamond in the centre of each. The very hilt and hangers of his sword were of the same grave hue, but exquisite in their workmanship; and it was clear that he looked upon his functions as too important and solemn not to require a dress and demeanour perfectly harmonizing therewith.

Approaching the count with quick but easy and regular steps, he made him a low and ceremonious bow; then took his hand, and assured him, with a face which expressed fully as much pleasure as if it had been sparkling with smiles, that he was delighted to see him; and Monsieur d'Artonne had every reason to think that it was so; for the intendant, ever since that officer had come down to Clermont—now somewhere about a year and a half—had shown him the most marked respect and attention. Indeed, nobody in the whole surrounding country had received such testimonies of distinguished regard; and, to say the truth, as the count was unaware of any power to serve or please that great personage, his civilities seemed somewhat extraordinary to the object thereof.

We may as well let the reader into a part of the secret, however. The intendant, on being despatched to that district by the king, had made accurate and scrupulous inquiries as to the fortune, character, and family of every gentleman in the vicinity. He had found that the count possessed large property, that he was a man very generally loved and respected throughout the neighbourhood, that he was not easily swayed by passions or prejudices of any kind, and that he had an only daughter, who was almost certain of being the heiress of very extensive estates. Now, the intendant might well calculate that, by some one or other of these qualities, the friendship of Monsieur d'Artonne might in future be very serviceable to him. His mind rested with complacence upon the idea of being son-in-law to his noble friend, receiving a rich dower with the count's daughter, and allying himself to an old and distinguished family. Monsieur d'Ar-onne's countenance and support, too, in the execution of his functions, might be of no small value; and, at all events, pleasant society and friendly intercourse with people in high station were things very desirable in the eyes of one who himself had risen from a family not of the most elevated class, for at that period there were many grades in the French nobility, with some difficulty in stepping from the one to the other.

It must not be supposed, indeed, that he had laid any definite plan for seeking the hand of Julie d'Artonne. He very well knew that under existing circumstances such a thing would not be listened to for a moment; but, to use a not very elegant but expressive form of speech, he always considered what was upon the cards. Thus, there was probably no one in the province who had more influence with him than the count.

After various ceremonial greetings, such as the customs of the day required, Monsieur d'Artonne opened the business which brought him here by saying, "I come to speak with you, Monsieur l'Intendant, upon the case of a poor man who has been charged by Madame de Bausse with the commission of a crime upon apparently the most frivolous and absurd motives. Being not very fond of a prison, and somewhat impatient of the law's delay, he made his escape almost fortunately for me, I must say; for he was accidentally the means, during our late tour, of saving my daughter's life. By my advice, he has surrendered himself yesterday, and I come to request that you would cause him to be examined yourself, would look into the nature of the charge against him, and see whether there is sufficient cause for detaining him in prison any longer. If I could prevail upon you personally to investigate the matter, I should, I confess, be much gratified; for one cannot expect either such discrimination or such decision from inferior officers as from a gentleman of your eminence and authority."

The intendant heard him to an end without any reply, even by the movement of a muscle. With the greater part of the world, men are constantly making some sort of answer, false or true, as the case may be, while another is speaking to them, either by some interjected words, some gesture, or some change of countenance; but every now and then we find an individual who possesses from nature, or has acquired by art, a screen impenetrable to all eyes, by which he shrouds his thoughts from those the most anxious to discover them. The face of the intendant was one of these screens; he listened to whatever was said to him gravely, attentively, but without the slightest variation of look. His eyes even did not wink; and, whether the subject was grave or gay, pathetic or risible, all remained still. One would have thought he was a man destitute of all emotions.

As soon as Monsieur d'Artonne, however, had concluded, he replied, "It gives me the greatest satisfaction, my dear count, to hear any wish of yours, for to hear is but to satisfy. I will have the man brought before me immediately. Madame de Bausse is now in the town, for I saw her carriage pass some ten minutes ago. She shall be sent for too, and the matter shall be instantly investigated. She is, I understand, in sad distress, poor lady! at the disappearance of her son; and you, I think, my dear count, must be somewhat deeply affected by this affair, if report speaks true that an alliance was in contemplation—"

"Report does not speak true, Monsieur l'Intendant," exclaimed the Count d'Artonne, interrupting him with some vehemence. "In disposing of the hand of my daughter, I shall be guided but by one consideration—virtue, honour, and high qualities. I need not tell you that Monsieur de Bausse possessed none of these."

The intendant had quite good enough an opinion of himself to imagine that he had a fair chance, and, of course, his prepossessions in favour of Monsieur d'Artonne increased rather than diminished. His countenance, however, retained its impassibility; no one could have told that the count was not describing to him the building of a cowhouse, so gravely indifferent was his face; and his only reply was, "We had better, perhaps, proceed with the business immediately."

Some attendants were summoned by the tinkling of a small silver bell which stood upon the table, and an order in due form was sent to the lower prison for bringing Jean Marais to the intendant's house. A messenger was then despatched to seek Madame de Bausse through the town of Clermont; after which, the high officer and his guest sat chatting over the news of the day. Scarcely had five minutes elapsed, however, when the doors of the saloon were thrown open, and the Bishop of Clermont was announced, which, perhaps, was not satisfactory to the Count d'Artonne; the prelate being the brother of Madame de Bausse, and one very likely to adopt and support her views, not from any conviction that they were right, but from a tender regard for certain good things which the fair marquise had at her disposal.

We shall not have much to do, dear reader, with the estimable Bishop of Clermont; but, having an infinite horror of all those capricious rules and regulations by which ancient critics endeavoured to tie men down and to prevent them from following the course of the great teacher Nature, I shall take the liberty of giving a full-length portrait of a personage who had, it is true, no great influence upon the fate of our principal characters, but whose class—a class, luckily, now nearly extinct—had a very great influence, indeed, upon the whole world, both in a political and religious manner. In doing this, I repeat, I do but follow Nature: for how often is it in the march of life that a personage suddenly appears before us, strongly engaging our attention, remarkable in every respect, worthy of philosophical contemplation, and occupying the whole of our thoughts and attention for a short period; but then passing away immediately from our eyes, never being seen again, and affecting us in no other manner than by that moral influence which is exercised upon each human creature by the characters of those with whom his mind is brought in contact, either as a subject of their operation, or an active agent itself?

The Bishop of Clermont was a man of good family, some five years older than Madame de Bausse. He was now the head of the house; his elder brother having died childless, but not until he himself had entered the Church, and obtained considerable preferment therein. His family was poor in relation to their station in society; and, consequently, even after he had succeeded to his brother's estates, he experienced no regret at having embraced a profession in which celibacy was obligatory. At first, as a young man, he had felt very little disposed to become an ecclesiastic; for his character was worldly, his passions were strong, his taste for pleasure acute; and he would have resisted, had it been according to the usages of his country and his times for the son of a noble family to show any choice in regard to the pursuits which lay before him. He had thought it very hard, while at the seminary where he was brought up, to forswear those indulgences for which he felt a strong propensity at an early age; but very soon after he had received the tonsure he made a world of discoveries in regard to the facilities of clerical life, which taught him to laugh at his former objections, by showing him that his pleasures only obtained an extended sphere by the gown that hid them.

As soon as this perception came upon him, he set himself to consider how he might best, in the circumstances which surrounded him, enjoy life and prolong its enjoyment; and, being of a shrewd, keen, and unscrupulous character, he speedily saw that the path had been clearly marked out by personages of his own views and inclinations, so that he had nothing to do but to follow upon a very beaten track. Decency was the first thing to be attended to; and accordingly, though a somewhat zealous director of fair penitents, he contrived to avoid scandal. The inconvenient rules and regulations which abridged the pleasures of the table were, without difficulty, evaded by any ecclesiastic who knew how to make a friend of his cook; so that public abstemiousness was fairly compensated by private indulgence. A number of other little sins, very pleasant to deal with, found a very convenient cloak in the robe of the Church: grasping avarice might allege charity as its excuse, and the hand that swept up louisd'ors might cleanse itself by the distribution of livres; the daily alms covering the daily exactions. Pride, too, might be quietly gratified by sinking the man in the ecclesiastic; and the honour of religion and the Church might be the watchword, when the real object was that for which angels fell.

He comprehended the whole scheme at once, and acted upon it with great skill; taking care, as the very first point of the plan, to smooth down all asperities, and to dress up each of his passions in a garb the most opposite to that which it wore with other men. Slander and malice were unknown to the good bishop; but sometimes they took the form of paternal reproof, sometimes that of benign unguardedness: he would let drop a word, that rankled for years, with a smiling and placid countenance; he would disseminate a calumny with an inefficient expression of disbelief. He would inquire into the most indecent particulars, and regale his imagination with prurient images, from zeal for the purity of his flock; and he would encourage the licentious jest by a tone of gentleness in his reproof. When it was necessary to persecute and to destroy, the spirit of religious fervour would seize him; and when he wished to favour and indulge, Christian charity and moderation were upon his lips.

Nature, however, has always provided herself with tell-tales; and the hypocrite has generally physical witnesses against him, which are difficult to silence. Thus our Tartuffe was "gros et gras, et se portoit à merveille." See him, dear reader! see him as he enters the saloon of the intendant, with that slow, calm, and dignified step, stout, and overflowing with animal health, somewhat corpulent, but not greatly so; his rosy countenance close-shaved and smooth, his fat and luscious lips bearing a pleasant smile, his watery and erotic eyes possessing that peculiar fatness which the inspired writers have pointed out as the characteristic mark of the licentious! Look at the well-furnished double-chin hanging upon his smooth, plaited band; and mark those large animal ears, that rise on either side of his calotte! Do not overlook either the large, rounded, weighty calf of his leg, and the fine, small ankle, before he drops his robe over it, as soon as he finds that there are no women in the room; and consider well the graceful benignity with which he salutes the intendant, and the brotherly love with which he embraces his dear cousin D'Artonne! Oh! he is a worthy pillar of the Church! a noble preacher of a religion of abstinence and self-denial! a proper follower of the meekest and mildest of men!

Hark, too, how he declares to the count that the pleasure of his visit to the intendant is doubled by the unexpected satisfaction of finding him there! It is true that his eyes were fixed upon the door of the house from one of the windows of the episcopal residence at the very moment that Monsieur d'Artonne dismounted from his horse; it is true that the servants of that gentleman, each of whom he well knew, were then standing in the square; it is true Madame de Bausse was at that precise time in his own oratory, had remarked the count's visit to the intendant, and had wondered aloud what he could want there! But, of course, wrapped in heavenly musing, the bishop had neither seen nor heard, and was quite taken by surprise at finding his cousin in the saloon.

Monsieur d'Artonne understood him as well, perhaps, as one man can understand another; and, therefore, from the worthy bishop's asserting that he was surprised, the count was naturally led to conclude that he came thither for the purpose of seeing what he was doing. His reception of the prelate's gratulations was certainly somewhat cold—perhaps a little embarrassed. It is not always, indeed, easy to know how to deal with a disingenuous man; but the intendant saved Monsieur d'Artonne any explanations with the bishop, by inquiring, after a few brief words, if he could tell where Madame de Bausse was to be found in the town, and stating the business they were about to proceed with.

"I left her at the Evêché," replied the bishop: "I will see in a minute if she is still there;" and, without waiting to give ear to the intendant's entreaties that he would not take the trouble, and offers to send over a messenger to the marquisé immediately, the bishop walked out of the room, bowing, with a thousand smiles, and saying that he would be back again without delay. A considerable time, however, elapsed, without his making his appearance; and before the prelate had returned, it was announced to the intendant that the prisoner, Jean Marais, had been brought up, according to his directions. An order was given to keep him below for a few minutes longer; and in the end the folding-doors were again thrown open, and Madame de Bausse entered, leaning on her brother's arm. She was the picture of a faded coquette: her dress, which was not of mourning, for she had not yet given up the hope of seeing her son return, was in the height of the Parisian fashion, and might have become a girl of eighteen or twenty; nor had anything been omitted that art could do to lighten the load of years, at least in appearance. She was at least forty years of age; and, as her spirit was not the most quiet and gentle, those forty years had wrought more serious ravages than is usually the case; but still, what between assistance from the perruquier, and abundant, but judicious dispensation of rouge and other pigments, padded additions to various parts of her person, shadings of lace, and ornaments of silk, Madame de Bausse might very well pass for thirty-five at the utmost, and usually called herself thirty-three; leaving in a sort of misty indistinctness the fact that she had a son whose twentieth birthday would return no more, and not attempting to explain the phenomenon. She did, indeed, usually term the young gentleman her boy; but, if his follies were those of extreme youth, his vices smacked strongly of manhood.

On the present occasion she was fluttered and agitated. Her shrewish black eyes sparkled, her thick silk petticoat rustled, and her lip quivered; so that, although she bore a smile upon her countenance, having been exhorted to moderation by her brother as they came, the expression was sour and petulant, and she evidently met Monsieur d'Artonne with not the most placable feelings, seeming to entertain no great gratitude towards him for interfering on behalf of poor Jean Marais. The face and manner of the count, as he met her, were peculiarly grave and serious, so that she could not accuse him of regarding the painful apprehensions which she entertained in respect to the fate of her son with anything like levity; but yet she displayed, in their very first salutation, a degree of irritability which somewhat embarrassed him.

Having greeted her kindly, and inquired into her health, receiving but a peevish answer, the count, as if for the purpose of doing something—which, as the reader well knows, is not very easy under all circumstances—stretched forth his hand to pat the head of a large dog which had followed her into the room, calling the animal by its name, as if familiar with it. The dog, however, seeming to take his tone from his mistress, instantly growled, and flew at him; and was only driven off by a severe kick, and the interference of the servants, who were closing the doors of the saloon.

"Ah!" exclaimed Madame de Bausse, with a bitter smile; "poor Noble knows very well that you were never a friend of his master, Cousin d'Artonne, and that you have come here now to protect his murderer."

The count started, with an angry and indignant look. "I come here for no such thing, Henriette," he replied; "you yourself are not even convinced that any murder has been committed at all; and, if the slightest cause could be shown for supposing the man guilty, I should be the first to require that he be proceeded against in a regular manner. But, from all that I have heard, I do not believe that such is the case. He saved my daughter's life, as I wrote to you some days ago; and all I desire is, that Monsieur l'Intendant may examine into the affair at once, in order that the poor fellow may not be kept in prison, which is in itself sufficient punishment for a great crime."

"Ay!" cried Madame de Bausse, "you think a great deal about your daughter, but nothing about my son; and as for the rest of the matter, I say this man ought to be kept in prison till we can find out who did murder him, and who did not."

"Such will be the course, madame," said the intendant, in his calm, grave manner, "if there is just cause of suspicion against the prisoner. All that the count requires is immediate investigation, and that I feel I have no right to refuse. The inquiry shall be carried on in your presence, and I doubt not that you will be satisfied with the result."

"I think my word might be sufficient," replied Madame de Bausse; "I am not supposed to be a person, am I, Monsieur l'Intendant, to accuse a man wrongfully?"

"Certainly not, madame," answered the intendant; "and it must be very satisfactory to you to have an opportunity of stating the motives of your accusation fully and immediately."

"True, my son," said the bishop: "but you must recollect that this lady may have strong moral causes of suspicion, which do not amount to absolute proofs: she may wish to have time to investigate and develop fully the evidence against this man, without making indiscreet revelations, which might perhaps tend to frustrate the ends of justice."

"The police," replied the intendant, "are the persons best fitted by habit, as well as entitled by law, to carry on such an inquiry; and, in stating the cause of her suspicions to me, Madame de Bausse will put the matter in train for arriving at a just result. She may do so, if she pleases, before the man is brought up, and I will give all due weight to the facts she adduces. Pray be seated, madame, and inform me whether you have discovered anything more than is stated in the first procès verbal upon which the prisoner was arrested. I have read the papers, and find it therein recited that, on the day of the supposed murder, he was absent from the house for two hours; and that a spot of blood, or something like blood, was found upon the breast of his shirt. These, I think, are the only facts from which we can infer a suspicion."

"And quite enough too, I should think," exclaimed Madame de Bausse.

"When joined with the unaccountable absence of his master," added the bishop, "the certainty that they went out in the same direction together, the knowledge which we have that all the other servants were in the house, and the fact of my poor nephew having reproved this very person severely on the preceding night, receiving, we understand, a very insolent and threatening reply. Far be it from me, however, to insinuate that he may not be able to prove his innocence; or that my good Cousin d'Artonne suffers himself to be moved by even the pure spirit of gratitude to favour a base assassin, because that man saved his daughter's life. It has been currently reported, it is true, that the count had always a dislike to my poor nephew, that he said at various times very harsh things of him, that he magnified any juvenile follies, and depreciated his many good qualities and virtues; but I do not believe a word of it. I believe that the count may have been actuated solely, in any severity he showed towards my nephew, by high notions of the necessity of restraining and reproving youth; and I do not give the slightest credit, I assure you, to one half of the anecdotes that are told of Monsieur d'Artonne's intemperate expressions regarding the poor boy."

The prelate might have spared his malignant eloquence; it was pouring water upon a rock, as far as the intendant was concerned. That officer heard him tranquilly to the end without the slightest appearance of interest, and then returned to the point. "The chain of facts," he said, "is important, and unless they can be accounted for, or at least some of them, may afford grounds for such suspicion as to justify the detention of this man; but, as they are all points susceptible of explanation, it is right that we should hear what he has to say upon the subject. If he refuses, or is incapable of giving such explanation, the case will be very much aggravated; and, on the contrary, if his account of all these transactions be satisfactory, the suspicions themselves vanish; and therefore, my lord, we have the strongest motive for inquiring into the matter immediately."

As he spoke, he rang his bell and ordered Jean Marais to be brought in. The first act of the intendant, when the prisoner appeared between two archers, was to gaze at him fixedly for a moment or two with keen, considering eyes, in a manner which might have abashed many a very innocent man. Jean Marais, however, was not a person very easily abashed, and he underwent the scrutiny with the most perfect composure, waiting till the intendant had taken a full survey of his features and person before he made the slightest movement; and then merely bowing to Madame de Bausse with a placable smile, as he said, "Bon jour, madame!" in a tone which certainly implied no malice.

"Ah! don't speak to me, you wretch!" exclaimed the marquise; "I abhor you! Noble, come hither; don't go near him!" But the dog, without attending to her commands, walked up familiarly to Jean Marais, and put its broad nose into his hand.

"Jean Marais, attend!" said the intendant. "You were absent from the house of the Marquise de Bausse for two hours on the seventh day of the present month. Where were you during that time, and what were you doing?"

"I walked into Clermont," replied Jean Marais, without the slightest hesitation; "I went along the bank of the river till I came to the path through the fields, by which I proceeded to Clermont. I met fat Peter Beuvron, and I said to him, 'Bon jour, gros papa!' to which he replied, 'Bon jour, ganache!'"

"The walk took you half an hour," said the intendant; "what then?"

"Not quite half an hour," answered Jean Marais; "I go fast, sir, when I put my feet to the ground. But what I did next was, to take my master's hat to have a new feather-band, according to his orders. I gave it to Martin Grange, the hatter; that was the business which took me to Clermont, and he can tell whether I was with him or not."

"That did not occupy much time," said the intendant. "What did you do next, my good friend? You will still have near an hour to account for by your own statement."

Jean Marais paused for a moment, and the eyes of Madame de Bausse glistened at what she thought his hesitation; while the bishop sat with his two hands on his broad knees, and stared in the poor fellow's face with an intensity that had something of triumph in it.

"Well!" continued the intendant, after waiting an instant.

"Well, sir," replied Jean Marais, "if the truth must be told in this reverend society, I spent the missing hour with Jeannette Cottille, the little couturiere, whom madame knows, for she makes her gowns for her, and puts in the pads about the breast and shoulders."

Madame de Bausse looked spears and lances at him; but Jean Marais himself was as grave as a judge, and the intendant also. A sly smile, however, stole over the round, rosy face of the bishop; and he gave a sidelong glance to Monsieur d'Artonne, who looked down, and played with the fringe of his sword-belt.

"Will Jeannette Cottille swear that you spent an hour with her on that day?" demanded the intendant.

"I really don't know, sir," replied Jean Marais; "it depends upon whether she is in a humour for telling the truth."

"And when you left her," continued his interrogator, "what did you do then?"

"I walked back again," answered Jean Marais.

"Did you not quarrel with your master the night before?" demanded the intendant.

"No, sir," replied the prisoner, "but he quarrelled with me."

"Give your own account of what occurred on that occasion," said the officer.

"Oh! of course he will tell a fine string of lies!" exclaimed Madame de Bausse.

"No, I will not, indeed, madame," rejoined Jean Marais: "merely out of policy I will tell the whole truth; for falsehood, in a dangerous case, such as mine, is like paint upon an old woman, soon found out, and making that which it rests upon look all the uglier. I did not tie Monsieur de Bausse's cravat to his taste, and he vowed I did it on purpose. I assured him I did not, and we tried it again, but it was worse than before; and then he got very angry, and struck me on the face, which made my nose bleed: so then I told him that I was a servant, but not a slave, and that I would not remain with him."

"'Tis all false together," cried Madame de Bausse, with her eyes flaming and her cheeks red. "I knew you would manufacture a lie; but, if his mere word is to be believed, there is no use of any inquiry at all. It is all false together, Monsieur l'Intendant."

"It seems very like it, indeed, madame," said the intendant, in his usual tone. "It is scarcely possible to believe that the Marquis de Bausse should so forget himself to a servant; and, if the servant made him such a reply, why did he not send him away directly?"

"Because I knew too many of his secrets," answered Jean Marais, in an indifferent tone; "and as for this part of the story, I related every word of it the same night to Morris the lackey. He is now in the town with madame's carriage, for I saw him as I came along from the prison. You can send for him and inquire; he will tell you the same tale."

"If he does, I will discharge him that minute," cried Madame de Bausse.

The intendant looked at her, but said nothing. The expression of his countenance could scarcely be said to change, so slight was the difference; and yet it was easy to see that he thought the lady a great fool.

"I find it asserted here," he continued, addressing Jean Marais after a momentary pause, "that you and Monsieur de Bausse left the chateau together, and took the same road. Where did you part from him?"

"At the end of the avenue," replied Jean Marais. "He stopped to speak with Allard the farmer, and they walked away together on the Riom road, while I went on my way to Clermont."

At this moment the bishop, who had been conversing in a low voice with Madame de Bausse, rose, as if to take his leave, saying, "As I think that this matter is very likely to affect the man's life, Monsieur l'Intendant, it does not become me, as a bishop of a church of mercy, to take any farther part in the proceedings."

"Stop one moment, Monsieur de Clermont," replied the intendant. "Take away the prisoner, archers, and keep him below for a little. One of you go to the carriage of Madame de Bausse, and bring hither the lackey named Morris, not suffering him to interchange a word with any one by the way. Let another be sent for Jeannette Cottille, the couturière; and mind—"

"I really must take my leave," said the bishop; "my time is growing short. I have duties to perform, my son."

"So have I, reverend sir," replied the intendant, holding him by the edge of the robe; "but I really mus: detain you for one minute. Do as I command you," he continued, addressing the archers, who had lingered as if in doubt. "I really must detain you for one minute to perform an act well becoming your sacred character; which is, to persuade your fair sister not to discharge this servant of hers for telling the truth, as she threatens. You will easily perceive that it will give an appearance of injustice and passion to her proceedings, of which they are doubtless totally devoid, and, at the same time, it will be unchristian and unjust. Moreover, I fear, if she do not withdraw the threat, that my office will compel me to take unpleasant measures in regard to a person thus endeavouring by menaces to turn aside the course of justice."

"Oh! it was but an ebullition of anger," replied the bishop, "easily excused in a mother who has lost her son. It was never intended seriously, of course; and I am sure she will refrain from any expression of the same kind in future."

The bishop sat down again by Madame de Bausse to speak with her for a moment, and there he remained, notwithstanding his previous anxiety to depart. What had been his purposes we must not take upon ourselves to assert; but it is clear that, as soon as he found that the archers were too far gone for him to reach the Evêché before them, he was less desirous of quitting the saloon than before.

Jeannette Cottille and the lackey Morris arrived at the same time, but the intendant thought fit to examine the fair couturière first. She was a pretty-looking young woman, apparently not overburdened with modesty, though frank and simple enough in her demeanour; and, when asked if Jean Marais had lately passed any time with her, she replied at once, "Ah, pauvre garçon! I know they have been accusing him of things he never committed, and I'll tell the truth, whatever comes of it; for it can do him no harm, I'm sure, though it may do some to me. The last time I saw him was on the seventh of this month; and then he came and spent an hour with me."

"You have learned your tale, child!" cried Madame de Bausse, in a sharp tone. "How should you recolleet so pat it was the seventh?"

"Oh! I can tell you very well, madame," answered the girl; "I had promised your maid Mathilde to send home, on that day, your false—"

Madame de Bausse waved her hand, impatiently exclaiming, "I dare say you knew all about it."

The seamstress was about to reply, and her rejoinder might not have been much to the satisfaction of Madame de Bausse, but the intendant interposed gravely, demanding, "At what hour did you see him?" and on Jeannette replying, "At twelve o'clock exactly; I know it quite well, for my two girls had just gone to their dinner," he nodded his head, slowly saying, "That will do; you may retire. Bring in the lackey."

Morris was accordingly ushered into the saloon, looking somewhat white at finding himself in the hands of an archer. Madame de Bausse fidgeted upon her chair, and went the length of nodding, winking, and shrugging at him. The intendant, on the contrary, told him to tell the truth, and that he had nothing to fear; adding, with a degree of sternness in his tone, "The slightest prevarication will convey you to prison. Now mark!" he continued, "I find it stated that a quarrel took place between Monsieur de Bausse and his valet, Jean Marais, on the night of the sixth of this month. Do you know anything of it?"

"Yes, monseigneur," replied the man: "a quarrel did take place, and a very bad quarrel, too, for—"

His eye caught the expression of Madame de Bausse's countenance at that moment, and he paused and hesitated.

"Were you ever in prison?" demanded the intendant; "if not, you are very likely to be there within five minutes, should you suffer a sign from any one to prevent you from telling the truth. Finish out what you were about to say."

"I say, then," continued the man, "that it was a very bad quarrel, too; for Jean came down with his nose bleeding, and told me his master had struck him."

"Was the blow a severe one?" demanded the intendant; "was it bleeding much?"

"Oh no," replied the lackey; "a drop or two had fallen upon the breast of his shirt, and there was some on his handkerchief, but it soon stopped."

"Do you know if the valet threatened his master in consequence?" demanded the intendant.

"Oh yes," exclaimed the lackey, "he threatened to leave him immediately; at least, so he told me."

"But do you think," inquired his interrogator, "that the marquis had any particular dislike to this man, Jean Marais, which made him strike him?"

"Oh no, sir," replied the man; "he has done the same to us all at different times, but we did not mind it. He once threw a boot at my head."

Not a muscle of the intendant's face moved; but, telling the lackey he might retire, he ordered the prisoner to be brought before him.

"Jean Marais," he said, as soon as he appeared, "you have been accused of a serious crime, and in consequence of that accusation you have been committed to prison till such time as it was possible to investigate the grounds of the charge against you. You foolishly and rashly made your escape from the hands of justice, and might have subjected yourself to severe punishment on that account. But your subsequent voluntary surrender may be received as atonement for the offence; and, the accusation having been now sifted and inquired into, I find that there is not the slightest motive or cause whatsoever for suspecting you of the crime with which you have been charged. You are, therefore, from this moment at liberty, and may go whithersoever you please."

"Mighty well!" cried Madame de Bausse, rising indignantly; "mighty well! So, I am told I have brought an unfounded accusation, am I? Well, I will take care that this is made known. I wish you good-morning, sir! I wish you good-morning! This is fine justice, indeed, when a lady of my rank and station is not to be believed against a valet de chambre."

"Good-morning, madame!" replied the imperturbable intendant, bowing low and calmly; "good-morning, Monsieur de Clermont! Monsieur d'Artonne, I am obliged to you for urging me to give this case immediate attention. Is there anything else I can do to serve you?"

CHAPTER XV.

It was in the afternoon of the same day of which we have just been speaking that Francis de Langy, and his friend the count, stood in one of the oldfashioned rooms of the Chateau d'Artonne, relating to the countess and Julie what had taken place at Clermont. The count touched upon the particulars but lightly, indeed, and came rapidly to the conclusion of Jean Marais's exculpation and liberation. Julie remained somewhat thoughtful; and, though she expressed much satisfaction at the result, Francis de Langy could not help fancying that she was somewhat more grave than might have been expected. The gratification of Madame d'Artonne was much more apparent and vivacious, and the girl of fifteen seemed to have changed places with the woman of seven or eight and thirty.

While the countess was thus congratulating herself upon the deliverance of the person who had saved her child's life, one of the servants, who had not accompanied the party on their tour, entered the room to announce that Jean Marais had arrived at the chateau, according to the orders he had received from Monsieur d'Artonne.

"Send him in, send him in," cried the count; and, the moment after, our respectable friend, Jean Marais, stood bowing before the assembled party, with a face full of perfect satisfaction, and, though respectful, certainly impudent enough.

The count received his thanks with grace and dignity, merely saying, with a slight inclination of the head, "I merit no gratitude, my good friend, merely having fulfilled my promise."

"That is what I am so grateful for, sir," replied Jean Marais; "as it is what no one has a right to expect from another in this world."

"Now, Francis," whispered the count, "let us see the result of your experiment."

And Francis de Langy, with a little of the embarrassed timidity of youth, looked round, and then said, "Well, Jean Marais, Monsieur d'Artonne has acquitted himself of his share of gratitude towards you."

"Not quite," cried Monsieur d'Artonne; "but never mind—"

"I have yet done nothing to show mine," continued the young gentleman; "and I have the permission of the viscount to do the best I can to testify my sense of the service you lately rendered me. You expressed a great wish to enter into my service, or that of the Count d'Artonne. Now it is not convenient for him to receive you into his family, as he has no vacant place; but I will offer you your choice of two things. Here is a purse containing a hundred Louis; I will either give you that at once, as a reward for what you have done, or I will take you as my valet de chambre. But I must warn you that in the latter case, your conduct must be somewhat more strict and regular than, perhaps, it has hitherto been; for Monsieur de St. Medard, though he is a kind and liberal master, and not at all inclined to be severe upon venial errors, is of a determined and immovable nature, and will not pass over anything that he may consider an indication of a bad and depraved heart. Your wages will be the same as those of his own valet; and, having stated the matter fairly to you, you can now make your choice, and either take the place, such as I have represented it, or the gold, and with that little fortune seek another situation, where, perhaps, you may be more at your ease. Will you like some time to consider your determination?"

"Oh no, sir," replied Jean Marais, laughing; "I do not want even a single moment to consider: my determination is made already. First impulses are not always the best, but they are always the pleasantest to follow."

"Then I suppose you will take the purse, and leave the place?" said Monsieur d'Artonne.

"Oh dear, no, sir," replied Jean Marais; "I will do nothing of the kind. The place for me, if you please; and the purse for the baron's pocket."

"I thought so," cried Julie, with a well-pleased smile, little fancying that, to an observant eye, the look and the words, common and meaningless as they might seem, would betray more of the secrets of the heart than she might be very willing should appear.

Jean Marais saw all about it in a moment; and Madame d'Artonne said to herself, "The girl who thinks the situation of his servant so desirable would not very much object to be his wife."

The valet, however, bowed low to the young lady, replying, "Thank you, mademoiselle, for doing me justice. I could not hesitate a moment, under any circumstances, between a good situation, which I hope long to retain, and a hundred Louis, which would be, most likely, gone to-morrow. But besides, I take a very particular interest in this young gentleman, and have more motives for attaching myself to him than one."

"Indeed!" said Francis de Langy; "may I ask what?"

"Oh! sir," replied Jean Marais, with one of his light, but somewhat sarcastic laughs, "they are, first and foremost, because I think you a very charming and excellent young gentleman; and, secondly, because my family are not a little indebted to yours. An excellent relation of mine, now Marguerite Latouches, formerly Marguerite Lemaire, was once femme de chambre to the marquise, your mother, who married her to my good uncle Gerard."

"Indeed!" cried Francis de Langy; "are you their nephew? As you must know well, then, she was, moreover, my foster-mother."

"Exactly," said Jean Marais, somewhat drily; but the moment after he added, in a very different manner, "Ay, sir, and many is the time you have sat upon my knee, when you were a child, and I was a youth younger than you are now."

There is something in the memory of early years and young affections which wakes up in the breast, even of the hardened and criminal, and still more in the heart of the light, the thoughtless, and the vicious, sweeter and holier feelings; which, however transitory they may be in themselves, still have a purifying influence of shorter or longer duration, according to circumstances, but ever tending, through regret, towards repentance. Those feelings, for the time, too, affect the outward man; and though he may struggle against them, and strive to cover them with the light and sparkling veil of careless gayety, or the thick cloak of dogged resolution, they will still give a more thoughtful or a tenderer character to the look and manner of him who experiences them, and tell the beholder that the heart within is touched. Such was the case in the present instance with Jean Marais; and, as he uttered the words, "Many is the time you have sat upon my knee, when you were a child, and I was a youth younger than you are now," the light air of gay effrontery died away, his tone was softened and saddened, and, dropping his eyes to the floor, he fell into a fit of thought.

"Well," said the Count d'Artonne, after a moment's pause, "all these circumstances will form a bond between your young master and yourself, which, I trust, may lead you to serve him faithfully and well; and now you must make my steward take care of you, while we have still the honour and the pleasure of his company at the Chateau d'Artonne."

"I will serve him, sir, better, perhaps, than he thinks," replied Jean Marais; and, making a low bow, he was retiring from the room, when Francis called him back again, saying, "I must not make my poor service your only reward, Jean Marais; that will not be sufficient recompense: here are fifty out of the hundred Louis for you; and I may promise at the end of the year, if your conduct receives the approbation of Monsieur de St. Medard, he will bestow upon you the other fifty, both as a reward for the past and an encouragement for the future."

Jean Marais took the money without the slightest affectation of reluctance, replying, gayly, "I will be a very good young man, indeed, sir. I have heard folks declare that virtue is its own reward; and, like other hard-working people, she has but poor pay, it is true; but, depend upon it, she never works so well as when she has something to work for."

"I have an account to settle with you, too, Jean Marais," said the Count d'Artonne; "but I really hardly know what to offer you as a recompense. However, if you will think over the matter, and let me know anything that you desire, if it be in reason, I will not deny it to you. Take time to consider!"

"No, sir, I do not want time," replied Jean Marais; "being now a rich man, and well provided for, I have but one thing to ask of any body under heaven, and am only afraid that you mayn't think it quite reasonable."

"Let me hear what it is!" said the count.

"Oh! it's a long story, sir," replied Jean Marais.

"Always an unreasonable thing in itself," answered Monsieur d'Artonne. "However, we have a little time before the intendant comes to dinner; so, if it be not so long as one of Mademoiselle de Scuderi's romances, we shall get through it."

"Well, then, sir," replied Jean Marais, "there is a poor fellow in the lower prison at Clermont, named Antoine Bure, who is charged with poaching on your lands—"

"Oh! I know all about that story," exclaimed the count; "but what is your request?"

"That you would withdraw the charge, sir," said Jean Marais, boldly. "Poor fellow! he is as good a creature as ever lived."

The count waved his hand. "You need not enter into the question," he answered, gravely; "I am sorry to say I cannot grant your request. You must think of something else."

Jean Marais looked down and bit his lip; Francis de Langy turned his eyes upon the count, with some mortification and disappointment in his countenance; and Julie gazed at her father for a moment with evident surprise, but then caught his hand with a gay smile, exclaiming, "He is jesting, he is jesting. I see it on the corner of his lip; he is jesting."

"No, indeed!" said the count, smiling likewise; "I am speaking the plain truth, Julie: I cannot withdraw the charge, because—I have withdrawn it already. It was made during our absence, without my consent; and, as I think the punishment in this country very much too great for the offence, the moment I heard of it I gave orders to stop all proceedings on my part. Jean Marais must, therefore, think of something else; for I trust that Antoine Bure will be at liberty to-morrow."

"I have thought of something else already, sir," cried Jean Marais. "You shall let me carry him the news, sir; and tell him that you did it by your own act, without any solicitation."

"That as you please," replied the count; "but as I see you have not yet decided upon the recompense for saving my daughter's life which you would most desire, take time, as I said before, to consider of it, and let me know when you have made up your mind."

Almost as he spoke, the sound of wheels rolling over the stones of the courtyard announced the coming of a visiter; and, going out with ceremonious politeness to receive him, the count met the intendant at the door of the chateau, and returned with him to the room where the rest of the party were assembled. It is scarcely possible to describe the manner of this worthy officer of the crown as he entered, and paid his respects to the Countess d'Artonne and Julie, without combining incompatibilities. It was perfectly easy, and yet it was restrained; but it was with that sort of restraint which depended upon his own will, upon his own habits: it was not in the slightest degree the restraint of awkwardness or uncertainty. You saw that he was doing nothing by impulse; that in the smallest as well as in the greatest he had a guard upon every word, and look, and movement; that his mind was present in everything; that he did all that he wished to do, and yet did not do one half that other men would have done who sought to make themselves agreeable. I am not sure that there is any English expression by which I can convey to the reader exactly what I mean, and even in French I must do it by negatives. To borrow an expression from that language, however, he had no abandon; and yet there was something powerful and striking in the very quiet mastery of himself which he seemed to possess. All that is deep and unapproachable, whether moral or physical, is generally impressive. It matters not much whether it be great or whether it be little, whether it be pleasing or whether it be displeasing; the very act of baffling our efforts to penetrate it implies power, and the idea of power is almost always more or less productive of the sublime. Sometimes, indeed, the smallest image which can be presented to the human mind, when combined even remotely with the fact of power, gives birth to the sublime in the highest and most overwhelming degree; and, of all the images by which the Hebrew prophets and poets have endeavoured to convey to narrow humanity some conception of the Almighty, the most awful is found in "the still small voice."

But to return to lower things. In seeing the man we speak of, one felt from his very aspect that there was a mind of no ordinary power beneath. There might also be violent passions: one suspected it: one fancied that it was so; and yet one could not tell why. It was, in fact, as when one gazes on a tiger walking calmly and majestically up and down his den, with a step as noiseless as that of a cat; we see the terrible strength that lies in those gliding and easy limbs, and divine the fierce and bloodthirsty spirit that dwells in that tranquil and graceful form.

We cannot pause upon all that took place during dinner, nor give even any specimen of the conversation that passed between the parties there present. With every one but the intendant the reader is already well acquainted, and therefore it is upon his conduct that we must principally dwell. He did not speak much; but what he did say was always to the point, clear, accurate, and sometimes brilliant; but the most sparkling things he uttered were so easy in manner, that the hearer was impressed with the conviction that he could say more sparkling things still; and so little did he seem to value the powers which he displayed, that one felt inclined to suppose he showed but a small part of the treasures of his mind. To Madame d'Artonne he paid marked and peculiar attention, listened to her with that silent flattery which is so captivating, and answered but briefly, more in comments on what she had said than by observations of his own. To Monsieur d'Artonne his demeanour was the same as we have depicted it in the morning. With Julie he conversed only once or twice, but then with a bland smile and look of interest. Of Francis de Langy he took no notice whatsoever, and he did so on purpose. If the young gentleman spoke upon any occasion, he never interrupted him, he showed him no rudeness whatsoever; but, the moment Francis had done, he broached some new topic, as if he had not heard a word the other had uttered, or judged his observations unworthy of any attention.

Had Francis de Langy been of a vain or conceited character, he would have been bitterly mortified; as it was, he was not pleased. But though he was by no means self-sufficient or arrogant in disposition, yet he felt within his own breast powers of mind and energies of character which the supercilious inattention even of a man of great intellect could not keep down. To him the dinner passed off unpleasantly. But let us inquire what was the effect upon the mind of Julie d'Artonne. It was very strange; in listening to the words of the intendant, in marking his demeanour, there was something that she shrunk from, she knew not what; and yet she could not help listening, she could not help observing with eager interest. There was a sort of fascination about him unpleasant, yet strong; stronger, perhaps, than if he had paid her marked attention, and mingling in some degree admiration with dislike. It was like the fabled fascination of the serpent upon the bird, and was, in fact, painful; yet, though she strove to withdraw her attention, she could not do so.

But let not the reader suppose there was anything uncommon in her feelings; the same effect is produced every day by the same qualities, though perhaps not always to the same extent: it is woman's nature to look up, and great powers have always great command over her. Whether there be such a thing as animal magnetism or not, there is certainly such a thing as mental magnetism; but it happens, sometimes happily, sometimes unhappily, that in the breast of woman love and admiration are two perfectly distinct things. They may be combined, but, far from being always so, are very often separate; and the man whom a woman admires the most is not unfrequently the one of all others for whom she could feel the least tenderness.

Did Julie, then, admire the intendant? After a certain fashion she assuredly did; she did so more than he deserved, but not in the way he would have liked. It was the admiration of astonishment rather than of pleasure; nor was it unnatural that, while she gave him little credit for qualities of the heart, she should give him too great credit for high qualities of the mind. The fair and soft companions of our troublous path are, by Nature's will, beings of trust and confidence; they need hard teaching in the ways of life to make them think that things are not as they seem. Where man will pause till he has examined, will try talent and genius by a thousand touchstones, and not be satisfied till he is sure that it is gold indeed, woman will but too often take unweighed, uncriticized, a gilded bauble, and hold it as a jewel of high price, till it tarnishes under her touch, and she finds too late how worthless was the thing she valued. The air and the assumption of great abilities, unless the hollowness of the pretence be very apparent indeed, is generally enough for her; and it is not wonderful that in this case, where there was indeed an intellect of great power, Julie should give him who possessed it credit for more than really belonged to him, and take upon trust all that he assumed. But she never dreamed that any other feeling could ever be supposed to have a share in her breast towards a man some thirty years older than herself; and, luckily for them both, neither did Francis de Langy. He disliked the intendant with that sort of keen distaste which a young man of genius always entertains towards a supercilious though talented man of the world who under-estimates his abilities, with that longing for strife with him, either physical or intellectual, which an eager spirit always feels towards the arrogant assumption of superiority; but jealousy had no share in his sensations. He was glad, however, when the intendant retired, which was about an hour before nightfall; and still more glad when Julie d'Artonne reminded her mother that she had promised to walk round the gardens and the park.

Each sensation of the human heart seems naturally to require some peculiar and appropriate place for its full development, and none more eagerly than love. The counterfeit passion may reign in gay saloons and lighted halls, or in darker and more confined dwellings, and revel amid noise and confusion, the vain clatter of tongues, and all the empty luxury of art, feeling itself there most at home where nature is most excluded; but the pure high love of the young and unperverted heart always longs for the presence of calm and sublime things—the free air, the wide sky, the sunny verge of the sparkling ocean, fields, mountains, woods, and all those objects that make the soul thrill with vague memories or fancies of an earlier and a holier state, when love was the brightest flower of paradise. The narrow and confined walls of houses built with hands seem to oppress and keep in the divine spirit within us, and Francis de Langy longed to be with her in the midst of the splendid scene that surrounded them.

Madame d'Artonne replied that she was too much fatigued, but bade the two young people go themselves; and Monsieur d'Artonne promised to follow them soon.

They went out together, the lover and the beloved—so young, so very young, to feel such emotions, and yet experiencing them strongly, deeply, truly, with no difference between their sensations and those of manhood's love, except the purity of early youth. They wandered on, they saw beautiful scenes, they heard the sweet sounds of evening, they gazed upon the glowing sky, and, drinking in from the cup of Nature deep and congenial draughts of Heaven's own poetry, they lived for a brief space in that dreamy enjoyment in which there is no current of thought, no distinctness of idea, but that mere sensation of enjoyment which perhaps may approach near to the happiness of an after state, when all the glory of God shall give full fruition to the unfettered souls of the blessed.

They were seated side by side upon a fragment of basaltic rock, with a wild ash-tree waving its feathery branches above their heads, the giant mountains of Auvergne stretching blue upon the left, the gorgeous setting of a summer day's sun, flooding with rosy light the glowing sky before them, the sparkling stream glistening in the valley beneath, love in their hearts and tranquillity all around, when Julie's father approached, seeing them before he was seen, and looking upon them with the mingling tenderness of memory and hope. When they did notice him, neither of them moved, for they had nothing to conceal, nothing that shunned the eye of those whom they revereneed. Julie held out her hand to her father as he came near, asking, "Is not this beautiful?" and replying, with more than one meaning in his words, he said, "Beautiful indeed, my dear child!"

Monsieur d'Artonne sat down beside them, and gazed in silence for several minutes over the prospect. At length his eyes filled with tears, for it is only to the breast of youthful innocence that such moments bring enjoyment unmingled with regret. Each step that man takes forward in life tramples down some flower; and, when he pauses for a moment to look around him, he must needs give a tear to all which those footsteps have destroyed.

The emotion was transitory, however, from whatever cause it sprung; and, banishing all memories, the count joined with the two young beings beside him in the enjoyment of the present hour. He gave himself up to happiness; and, when he turned to walk back with them towards the chateau, a feeling of repose and peace reigned in his breast, as well as theirs.

How rarely in this life is such a sensation anything but the harbinger of agitation and care! Whether it was, or was not so in the present instance, the reader who goes on with me will know.

CHAPTER XVI.

"Rest you merry!" says one of our friends in Shakspeare; but, assuredly, it would have been a very unnecessary benediction if addressed to our good friend Jean Marais, for his was a nature in which merriment was so inherent, that it would have needed an ocean of sorrow, and a bucketful of philosophy, to drown out the sparkling flame of his gayety.

"Not at all, not at all," he cried, as he sat in a chamber of the Chateau d'Artonne, which served the purposes of what we call the servants' hall in England, with Madame d'Artonne's pretty lady's-maid beside him, a somewhat grim-looking valet de chambre opposite, and three or four other servants round. "Not at all, my good friend; fortunate, instead of unfortunate, in having been in a prison without deserving it. It shows one life, and makes one love liberty the more. Besides, what has been the result? If the bird had not been in a cage, it would never have escaped from a cage, and I should have been jogging on in the service of Madame de Bausse, as dull and plodding a fellow as thyself, Peter."

The other servants chuckled; and Peter himself, with a grim and not very well pleased smile, replied, "Plodding, but not dull, Master Jean Marais, as you may some day discover."

"Discover!" cried Jean Marais, laughing aloud, and turning a merry glance at the femme de chambre, between whom and the valet there existed an unconfirmed tendresse, which was likely, unless nipped in the bud, to bear the fruit of matrimony. "Does the fellow take me for Christopher Columbus? No, no, I am no discoverer; and if I did go upon such a voyage, it would be into some deeper sea than your brains, Master Peter."

"The discovery may come upon you, whether you like it or not," replied Peter, significantly, and with a good many of the passions that we pray against very busy in his breast, for no man is insensible of the danger of being ridiculed in the presence of a woman whom he loves. But Jean Marais was not a person to pay the slightest attention to either hostile hints or glances; and the only effect which the valet's indignation had upon him was to make him commence a series of very decided, and, to say the truth, somewhat successful gallantries towards the pretty lady's-maid, which kept the blood of his rival in a vehement ferment for the next half hour.

Now this Peter, as he was called, otherwise Peter Neri, was by no means a despicable opponent in point of personal strength. His father had been an Italian, settled in France in days of yore, and exercising the worshipful trade of posture-master and sword-player—some said, indeed; that he had added other vocations, which did not so much covet the light; and from his happy union with a femme de chambre, who had, to use a familiar phrase, feathered her nest somewhat better than might be expected, sprang the individual who now occupied the important post of valet de chambre to the Count d'Artonne. He was a tall and sturdy personage, possessing united the high qualities of his father and his mother; but, at the same time, it must be acknowledged to his honour, that in the service of his master, which he had graced now for nearly ten years, he had shown no greater inclination to pilfer than was justified by the customs and privileges of his calling. He was of a sullen and somewhat morose disposition, and, as many men are found to be in this world, unattachable by any feeling but one, and that an animal feeling. Thus, as may be supposed, he was not greatly loved by any one in the household except the lady's-maid, whom he had singled out for the object of his solitary affection; and the other servants were glad to see him annoyed, while her partisanship was neutralized by the gay blandishments of Jean Marais.

The reader, if he have seen even but little of the world, will very easily conceive the gradual progress of a quarrel from taunts and irritation, through various stages, to the climax of a corporeal encounter; and, at the end of half an hour from the time at which we opened the scene whereof we now treat, Jean Marais walked round the table and seized Monsieur Pierre by the throat. The women screamed and called out, all the men talked and endeavoured to part them, and they themselves struggled together with a fierceness and vigour which threatened speedily to end the contest by knocking the brains of either one or the other out against the wall. The room in which this scene took place was a long, narrow hall, with a door at one end and a window at the other; which window looked out into a little green patch shaded by lime-trees, and separated from the rest of the park by a road which led up towards the hills.

It so happened that, in the very height of the contention within, Julie, Francis de Langy, and the Count d'Artonne were walking slowly and thoughtfully along this very road, on their return to the chateau; and, the windows being open, the mingled yell issued forth and reached their ears.

"What is the meaning of this?" cried the count; "our quiet house is seldom disturbed by such noises as this. Go on, I will follow you directly;" and, approaching one of the innumerable side-doors which decorated the French chateau of that period, he entered the house and walked straight to the hall. For a moment the belligerent parties did not perceive his presence; but a cry of "The count! the count!" from the rest of the servants made them pause for an instant, and Jean Marais took his hands from his adversary's throat. Peter Neri, however, thought he had gained an advantage by this movement which was not to be lost, and darted upon him again like a tiger, under the very eyes of his master. But he had made a mistake. Jean Marais was perfectly prepared to receive him; and, catching him by the middle, he lifted him from the ground, and cast him headlong back upon the pavement, with a fall that left him giddy and bewildered.

"What is the meaning of all this?" demanded the count, who had observed the whole.

"Why, simply, sir," replied Jean Marais, "that my good friend Peter, here, is very hospitably inclined towards me, and commenced his civilities by kindly telling me that I was unfortunate in having been put into prison and accused of murdering my young master, for that the charge would stick by me all my life; and he just now ended his kind speeches by calling me a thief and a jail-bird."

"I did not," said Peter, rising surlily from the ground.

"Oh yes, Peter, you did," cried the lady's-maid.

"I heard him! I heard him!" exclaimed several of the other servants.

"Well, I spoke no more than was true, if I did," muttered Peter.

"Silence, sir!" said the count; "you have behaved very ill, and I will not have you insult the servant of a gentleman who is staying in my house. I shall speak to you farther upon the subject to-night; and, in the mean time, I insist upon your behaving civilly to him. If I hear that you utter one offensive word, I will discharge you. You know me, and I will keep my promise." Thus saying, he turned, and quitted the hall.

About an hour after the party in the saloon broke up, and the count retired to his dressing-room; where, in a few minutes after, he was joined by his worthy valet; and the count immediately bestowed upon him a very severe admonition in regard to his conduct towards Jean Marais, saying that he had a great mind to discharge him. The man smiled, with somewhat of a sarcastic turn about his lip, which surprised Monsieur d'Artonne and excited his indignation; nor was his anger at all assuaged by the reply which accompanied this expression of countenance, and which was to the following effect:

"I don't think you will discharge me, sir."

"And, pray, why not?" demanded the count, controlling his feelings.

"Oh! sir, you know I have been a long time in your service," answered the valet with an indifferent air; "and an old servant always gets into his master's ways—and into his secrets. But I was going to ask you, sir," he continued, as if to change the subject, "whether I had not better sponge your habit de chasse all over, for the drops of blood that you washed out about a month ago, on the day that Monsieur de Bausse was first missed, still show a little."

The count turned as pale as ashes; but, commanding himself, he replied, after a momentary pause, in a calm and cold tone,

"Oh no, there is no need of that; it will soon be spotted in the same way the first time I go out to shoot. But take notice what I have said to you about this man, Jean Marais; for, if I find that you behave any more as you have done this night, I will discharge you as sure as I live."

The valet smiled again, but made no farther reply; and the count soon after dismissed him for the night. When he was gone, and the door closed, Monsieur d'Artonne clasped his hands together, and then struck his clinched fist upon his forehead. The next moment he cast himself down upon his knees, and, leaning his arms upon the seat of a large arm-chair, he buried his eyes in his hands, and remained thus for nearly half an hour, while the agitation of his mind might be traced by the heaving of his chest and the writhing of his whole frame. Then came an instant of comparative calm; and rising up with a face pale, sunk, and death-like, he waved his hand sadly, saying,

"It is gone, it is gone forever; there is no more peace for me on earth."

CHAPTER XVII.

In the summer season of our lives, as in the brightest period of the year, there come days full of soft and sleepy balminess, when the happy heart, moved by no fierce desires, seems to fall into a dreamy slumber, and the hours flit by us almost unmarked as they go. Who has not known them so sweetly present, yet so rapidly gone, that we have awaked from the pleasant vision, and doubted whether it were true or not?

Thus passed the few following days to Francis de Langy and to Julie d'Artonne: the only thing that even brought a shadow over the sunshine of the latter being to observe a heavy shade upon her father's face; while, with Francis de Langy, the only interruption of his dream took place during the hours which he spent in the chamber of the good Abbé Arnoux. In the mean time, the abbé himself made some slight progress towards convalescence: it was very slight indeed, for although he improved a good deal one day, he fell back again the next; and his recovery still seemed doubtful, and promised, at all events, to be slow.

It was the seventh evening after the departure of Monsieur de St. Medard, when the courier from Paris, passing through Riom, among other letters addressed to the chateau, left one for the Abbé Arnoux, in the handwriting of the viscount; and we must beg the reader's permission to give it here, protesting against the supposition that this work is a novel or a romance, a tragedy, or any other kind of composition which requires an author to embarrass himself by unities. It is simply the histories of certain personages whose fate was closely linked together; and the picture of Monsieur de St. Medard's mind, in all its phases, forms as much one of our objects in writing as any other matter that we shall touch upon in the course of the work.

"My dear abbé," he said, "I have reached this great city without any impediment; and I write to you, not to give you any account of the rolling of my carriage along the highway, the changing of my horses, or of any other of those events which are so frequently communicated by one friend to another, either because he has no thoughts that are worth the transmission, or that he does not think his correspondent worthy to share them; but, on the contrary, to tell you how my mind has travelled, since we last met, upon a road on which you yourself directed it, and what discoveries it has made by the way.

"I perceive, then, that the first thing I have to combat is a certain peculiar habit of thought, which would fain lead me away from your course of argumentation to my own; for custom, I find, is as powerful over the actions of the mind as over the body, and, as good old Montaigne remarks, 'C'est, à la vérité, une violente et traistresse maistresse d'escole que la Coustume,' who establishes in us, little by little, and without our knowing it, her authority; but, having by this gentle and humble commencement planted and fixed it by the aid of Time, she soon makes a furious and tyrannical use of it, against which we have not even power to raise our eyes. I have been amused at making this discovery of myself; and think I perceive in others, also, that we, who call ourselves philosophers, somewhat narrow our path by never reasoning but in one direction. I am making a vigorous struggle against custom in my own case, however; and will endeavour, as far as possible, to follow a fresh plan in regard to the subject of inquiry which I have promised you to investigate anew. I will attempt to clear my mind of all preconceived opinions upon the subject, to start from the point of perfect ignorance, to ask myself what is there in all I see around me, throughout the universe, that should make me believe in the existence of a God at all: then, what is there in any book to make me believe that God has thought fit to reveal his will to man, and to suppose that it is a record of truths regarding things beyond this world more than other composition of man.

"Although I have had plenty of time to reflect, as I have rolled along this dusty road towards the capital, yet at present my thoughts upon this subject are still in confusion; and I am, as it were, sweeping out the house. But I will confess to you—with a sincere wish that you would help me to get rid of it—that there is one old customary conclusion from which I cannot divest myself, and which will prevent me, as long as it remains, from ever looking upon the Bible as anything else than a collection of highly poetical works by various very clever Jews. I cannot conceive such a Being, as we are told God is, so meddling with the affairs of man at all. But I must go to the bottom of my objection, in order that, if possible, you may remove it. My mind, then, is repugnant altogether to the idea of a special Providence; even admitting your first great principle, the existence of a God! Taking it for granted that there is such a Being, and that He is, as you represent Him, with all the attributes in which Christians believe; does it not seem beneath the majesty of Jehovah to superintend the minor concerns of mortal men, and of things still less in the scale of creation? But, still more, is it not totally inconsistent with the idea of an Omniscient Being to suppose that He would interrupt the course of his general laws for any individual object? Is it not absurd to conceive that a Being, equally just, powerful, and wise, would be turned from his purpose, or assuaged in his wrath, by the prayers or repentance of man? An English poet, not long dead, has said, with more truth than poets generally display, 'God rules by general, not by partial laws;' and, indeed, the geometrical principles, which we discover in the portion of the universe within our ken, show us one universal rule, which, supposing, as we do for the moment, that there is a God, must be his law, from which there is no reason to believe He would deviate. It seems to me, in short, my dear abbé, that you Christians make your God act in a manner inconsistent with the very attributes that you assign to Him. If you can say anything to remove this difficulty, pray do.

"I write this in the trust that you are much better than when I left you, for I have just received a letter which Francis wrote on the day after I left Riom. So his friend, Jean Marais, has stood the trial, and is installed in the high post of his valet de chambre! I trust that it may turn out well, but I doubt: you know that I am a great doubter of all things unproved. But do you, my dear abbé, never doubt that I am "Your most sincere friend,

ST. MEDARD."

On the evening when this letter arrived, the abbé was not so well as he had previously been; but the good old man read it eagerly, and declared he would write an answer without delay. Francis de Langy, who was sitting with him at the time, tried hard to persuade him to put it off for two or three days; but the abbé had his peculiarities, as well as other people; and one of his notions was, that when a man pauses and procrastinates in doing what is right, fate generally steps in and prevents him from doing it at all. He persisted, then, in his resolution of answering the letter immediately; and, as it was evident to Francis de Langy that he could not accomplish it with his own hand, the young gentleman had no course left but to take the pen and write the reply, while the abbé lay in his bed and dictated as follows:

"My dear Friend,

"Your letter has given me great pleasure, as it shows me, beyond all doubt, that the clouds are about to be dispersed from your mind, and that the light of truth, reason, and religion will soon shine in. To all your objections touching the nature and the character of the Deity, and of how He would or could act under certain circumstances, I might reply, that neither we nor any one else know anything upon the subject, and can only judge of what we see. I might add, that in reasoning abstractedly, and independent of revelation, it is just as absurd and unfounded a conclusion to say that God acts by certain geometrical laws, because we find that these laws obtain in certain parts of the creation within our sight, as to say that He acts by irregular impulses, because we see what appears to us to be infinite irregularity in many of the phenomena of nature; and I might point out to a philosophical mind that the principles of his actions are as much beyond human comprehension as the idea of unlimited space, or any other of those extraordinary facts to which we are obliged to assent without being able to comprehend them. But I will make no other use of such a course of argument than once more to inculcate deep humility in approaching, with the very narrow faculties of humanity, a subject of infinite extent. Of that subject a very small portion is all that is necessary for us to consider, and, indeed, is all that we have even the capability of investigating. If we attempt to carry our view beyond that limited horizon, we shall find that everything becomes, in the moral as well as in the physical world, indistinct and conjectural. I may, however, deal with your difficulties in another way; not, indeed, bringing forward proofs of a system in which I myself believe, for all your assertions are but negative; and it would be endless to answer every such objection that man's vanity or ingenuity might suggest, and impossible to prove a thousand things which are neither within the scope of our faculties, nor necessary to our conviction in regard to the great truths of religion. I will only offer a few observations upon the points you have suggested, which may serve to sweep such stumbling-blocks from your way, and reserve whatever I may have to assert as positive for some future occasion; when, if God spares my life, I trust to find your mind prepared to receive the great fundamental proofs on which our faith is founded.

"Your mind, you say, is repugnant to the idea of a special Providence—perhaps, I might add, to God's moral government of the world—at all events, to the supposition that He is moved by our prayers, softened by our repentance, ready to avert from us the evil consequences of our own acts or those of others, or, in short, to care for the pitiful animal man, who is but a minute insect in the midst of creation; and you persuade yourself that these objections spring from a vast idea of the dignity and powers of God. You will be surprised when I assert that they are founded, on the contrary, upon a very limited and petty notion of the Divinity. If you can but stretch your mind to conceive that to Him all things are forever present, and every being stands at once in his sight, that time and space to Him do not exist, that to Him nothing is small, nothing is great; you will behold the same Almighty and Omniscient Being superintending every part of his creation, from what we consider the greatest, to what we term the smallest, with the same infinite care which created them at first; seeing—or foreseeing, if you will—the sin and the repentance, the necessity and the prayer, in the same ever-present instant, and providing for each and all by one act of volition, passing along the complicated, but unentangled chain of cause and effect, from immemorial ages in the past, to events and epochs in that dark night of futurity which his sight alone can penetrate, but which to Him is as much in being as anything that is or has been. Far be it from me to say that the Almighty does not rule the universe upon some vast and general scheme; but, that a special and superintending Providence is a part of that scheme, forms with me an object of humble trust and most confident belief.

"Of all the objections which have been stated, that which at first sight appears most plausible is implied by the assertion that we cannot conceive an Omniscient Being interrupting the course of his general laws for any individual purpose; but to this there are two answers. First, that, from the infinitely minute portion of the infinitely vast whole which we can see, it is impossible for any one to say whether those very facts which we assume as instances of interruption are not, indeed, harmonious parts of one great scheme; and, secondly, that the daily convulsions in the universe, moral and physical—nay, every hourly change in the arrangement and disposition of things around us, except certain motions in which we have detected a degree of regularity, are evidences of that apparent interruption of general laws which is all that is necessary to the idea of a special Providence.

"It is that our understanding is too narrow, and our utmost knowledge too limited, to grasp the idea of a scheme so vast, that the some thousands of years to which our history extends, and the millions of worlds which we faintly descry, are but the most minute parts of a grand whole. It is but this narrowness of comprehension, this angina mentis et animæ, which makes us doubt even for a moment that the Almighty rules individually the fate of everything created. Even in speaking of the powers of God, our incapacity evinces itself by the very language that we use; and we are obliged to apply the terms, which finite creatures have invented for the purpose of expressing finite objects, to the attributes and operations of an Infinite Being. We say 'in the beginning!' but, to God, when was the beginning? Yet, if we speak of the creation of our globe, or of the system to which it belongs, or of the constellation whereof our sun is a small star, or of the myriads of constellations which we descry, or of the countless and unnumbered multitudes from which not one small ray has ever visited this earth, the very fact of their creation was in itself an act of special Providence; and as great a deviation from any existing laws that we know of, or can conceive, as the manna sent to the children of Israel in the wilderness, the plagues which punished the obduracy of Pharaoh and his people, or the dispensation which wrought reconciliation between God and man. If the universe was created at all, and it is demonstrable that it has been created, that fact was a special Providence, or, in other words, a distinct act of the Almighty, taking place at a fixed and appropriate time, for a certain and definite purpose; and there is as much reason to believe that the earthquake which shakes one half of the world, and the fall of a sparrow, though brought about by agents with which science or habit has rendered us familiar, are operations of the will of God, as to believe that He hung the firmament with suns, or rolled the globe through space. Those acts in which the immediate operation of Divine volition becomes more plainly visible to human eyes by a deviation from an ordinary and expected course of events, and which are displayed particularly in the history of the Jews, so far from being rendered doubtful by any just use of human reason, can only be considered as historical illustrations of that constant superintendence of the Almighty over every part of his creation which our reason shows to be an absolute consequence of the existence of an all-wise and all-powerful Being; and without presumption I may be permitted to say, that one of the most remarkable effects (if not one of the chief objects) of those evident acts of Divine agency has been to keep alive a just notion of the Divinity through ages of darkness, and, during a long period of moral infancy and error, to afford to the nations selected as the depository of revealed truth a constant and tangible proof of important facts concerning the attributes of God, and thus, through times when all people were idolatrous and ignorant, to support revelation till wisdom was mature.

"That there were other and still more glorious objects in the miracles displayed throughout the Hebrew history, I humbly hope and devoutly believe. But even putting aside those manifestations of the active superintendence of the Almighty, afforded by the history of the Israelites, which a skeptic may hesitate to believe, and the vainer part of men of science, without denying, attempt to explain away, it seems to me that, even to our simple, unassisted reason, it is impossible to conceive that a Being who created all things, from the greatest to the least, and who knows all things, from the beginning to the end, and who has power over all things to the utmost verge of creation, does not rule, and guide, and superintend throughout the whole. While reason leads us to such a conclusion, the face of nature, at every step, affords us proofs that it is so. The very fact of creation, the very fact of change in anything, the very variations of the earth, the seasons, the events, from one ordinary and constant state, or regular and fixed recurrence, show that the will of the Almighty is in active, not in passive operation; and though there are some occurrences, which, by their regular return, we have been enabled to form into a system, the great mass of events affecting ourselves is governed upon principles which we do not understand, but which clearly betoken a special Providence over all things.

"Were I to push the subject farther, it would soon lead me into the question of the origin of evil; upon which I should not like to enter at present, even as a matter of humble and speculative inquiry. Remember, my dear friend, that I am not bold and impious enough to fancy that I can explain the mysteries of God; nor, I trust, will you seek to comprehend things clearly above human comprehension. I know that, if you strive diligently, you will find such a body of facts, susceptible of distinct proof, as to establish beyond all doubt, to any unprejudiced mind, the existence of a Great Intelligence, which, having created all things, governs all things; and upon that vast foundation I do not fear to see built up the fabric of true faith in the great scheme of our salvation, the grand and crowning act of that special Providence in which it is my greatest comfort to believe.

"I will add but one word more, and that is upon the subject of the extraordinary repugnance of man to believe in an intelligence higher than his own. He sees the effects of it in every work of nature; he can trace design in the structure of every flower and every animal; he can perceive contrivances calculated with the utmost nicety to accomplish certain ends; wherever he turns his eyes, he finds these infinitely varied and infinitely extensive; and yet, as a refuge for his own vanity to escape to from the conviction that the powers of his own mind are nothing when compared with those of God, he attributes all this to an inevitable necessity in the nature of things, and strips the Creator of all those qualities of which he himself is most proud, namely, reason and volition.

"Enough for the present, my dear friend: I knew you well, and am aware that with you to search is to find, to be convinced is to believe. That you may do so from your heart, and derive all those comforts from that belief which nothing but faith can give, is the sincere prayer of your devoted brother,

"CHARLES ARNOUX."

CHAPTER XVIII.

WHY should there not be railroads in everything? through time and space, as well as from London to Manchester—across the waste of history, and across the desert of Suez—along the highway of politics (with one door always locked, as on the road to Bath), and pierced through the hard depths of science (with tunnels as deep and as badly lighted as any between Devizes and Bristol, or Liege and Cologne)? Why should there not be railroads in everything? In truth, reader, are there not?

Oh yes; the moral follows the material in accelerated speed; and we drive over roads—along which we once crept, observing everything as we went—at the railway speed of fifty miles an hour; seeing nothing but the station from which we start, and the terminus at which we arrive.

Jump in, reader, and away! We are bound for Paris; the distance is only three hundred miles, and you shall be there in a minute.

Doubtless, you recollect the Marchioness de Langy? A very pretty and an amiable person she was. She was a Frenchwoman, too, altogether; but a Frenchwoman of the best kind, and, consequently, none the worse for being of that country: for when a woman, in the midst of many vices, remains pure; in the midst of much infidelity remains faithful, she surely establishes, on the score of temptations overcome and evils resisted, a sufficient balance in her own favour, on the great account with the world, to justify a few little extravagances and frivolities. In the account with God it may be a different thing. The Marquis de Langy, too, was an amiable man in his way. They were two people well matched; and had, what was rare at that time in the world, and especially in France, a great deal of tender and kindly feeling. I say especially in France; because that tender and kindly feeling is there, not only as in other countries, ground down upon the heavy grindstone of interest and worldly pursuits, melted and dissolved away, as in other countries, by luxuries and vices, scattered and broken to pieces, as in other countries, by passions and contentions; but is also, as in no other country, blown to the four quarters of heaven by the light winds of persiflage and mockery. As the reader well knows, nothing can go down in France which has not a grand air; and at the times we speak of, to have given the heart any importance in the affairs of life, one would have had to put a sword by his side and to make him a Marquis.

However, the Marquis and Marchioness de Langy had both too much good feeling to be able to hide it, and too much good sense to try; but it would have been very much better for both of them if that good sense had extended so far as always to guide their good feeling in the proper direction, and to limit it to the proper extent. In most ordinary cases it did very well; they loved each other tenderly and affectionately, yet always with due decorum; but in regard to their children they carried their parental fondness to a pitch which stopped not a step short of weakness. This was especially the case with their eldest son, who, being always with them, of course engrossed the greater part of their attention; though the mind of both the marquis and marchioness often turned with the yearning of parental love towards him whom, for his own benefit, they had consigned to the care and guardianship of another. In regard to their son Victor, however, their misdirected affection went to the length of vicious indulgence; and, as may easily be supposed, such conduct towards a young man of strong passions and not very strong mind produced the natural fruits of self-will, licentiousness, and violence.

At the early age which he had reached when his brother Francis set out for Auvergne, Victor de Langy had already twice called upon his father to pay very considerable debts, and had still more frequently required his aid to extricate him from the consequences of irregular and vicious conduct. Monsieur de Langy, it is true, had never come forward to his assistance without remonstrance and reproof; but these were so gently applied as, even in the first instance, to be listened to with little attention, and, in the end, to be heard with impatience and disrespect.

It was one morning, then—while the younger son of that noble house was dreaming sweet dreams by the side of Julie d'Artonne—that Monsieur and Madame de Langy were sitting together in a chamber of their hotel in Paris. It was a large sunny room, with tall windows, which nearly reached the ceiling, but did not descend lower than three or four feet from the floor; and a great deal of ornamental furniture, a splendid bed, looking as if it were never intended to be slept in, marble tables, so covered with clocks and vases that nothing else could find a place, and chairs, stiff and stately, ranged around the wall, gave the room that appearance of cold untenantedness which was the general characteristic of all the chief apartments of the day.

It is a strange fact, but no less true than strange, that the moral characteristics of a nation, as well as of an individual, show themselves remarkably in the style of furniture that they choose; and in the ornament without comfort, the mixture of coldness and glitter which the French saloons of that period displayed, we find no bad image of the heartless vanity and splendid emptiness of the people and the times.

Monsieur and Madame de Langy were alone, talking together of the future, that grand object of the human thought on which all the mind's energies are so vainly spent—the future, on which man so idly reckons as his possessions, when it, and all that it comprises, are God's alone. Their anxieties were for their elder son, for his advancement in life, for a marriage they were planning between him and some girl of wealth and expectations; and they saw, in their baseless calculations, the injuries which their property had sustained more than repaired by her dowry, and a long race, bearing their noble name, marching on through coming times, which they fancied would be just like their own.

They were discussing the matter eagerly—perhaps a little sharply; for the marquis and marchioness differed upon one or two points, and the lady was, of course, resolved to have her own way. She was saying, "No, indeed: Victor shall carry the proposal himself, and I will school him into showing some degree of devotion and attention; I will answer for it, all will go right if you will but let me manage it."

Even as she spoke, there was a considerable noise below, and upon the stairs the unpleasant moving of many feet, and the murmur of voices in tones eager, yet subdued—the sort of sound which tells one instantly that something has happened—something that agitates and excites, yet is to be concealed from somebody. We naturally think that it is from ourselves; and Fear, the veiled but constant companion of Hope, pushes before her bright and beaming fellow, and tells her tale of sorrows, and misfortunes, and distress, often as false as those of the deceitful goddess of expectation.

Madame de Langy started, for the sounds were coming up the great staircase, and Monsieur de Langy stepped forward and opened the door. A groan mingled with the rustle of the approaching feet; and, as soon as those who were coming up beheld him, there was an exclamation of "Ah, monsieur!"

Madame de Langy darted into the corridor, and perceived her son carried in the arms of four men. His coat was thrown lightly over him, as if it were a mantle, and the sheath of his sword was empty. His hat, too, was gone; and the curls of his hair, those beautiful curls with which his mother's hand had played so fondly in his childhood, fell back from a face now covered with the ashy hue of death; while down his left arm, which hung, as if powerless, by his side, streamed the red blood, appearing here and there through the fine sleeve of his shirt, dabbling the ruffles at his wrist, and dropping from the tips of his fingers.

"Good Heaven! what is this?" cried Monsieur de Langy; while his mother, with a distracted scream, rushed to the side of the wounded man.

"Why, sir," said one of the servants, "he met this morning with Monsieur Eugene de Launay, whose sister, you know—"

Monsieur de Langy waved his hand. "What happened? what happened?" he demanded.

"Oh! carry him in, carry him in, and stanch the blood!" exclaimed Madame de Langy. "Here! here! lay him on this bed. Send for surgeons; bring the nearest first; then run for Robert! Oh dear! oh dear! how terrible this is!"

The unhappy young man was borne into the room where his father and mother had just been sitting talking over his future prospects. He was placed upon the couch; and his head, which had drooped forward, fell back upon the bolster. The coat of morone-coloured silk, that had been thrown over him, was drawn aside, and the shirt soaked in gore exposed. It, too, was torn open by the trembling and eager hands of his parents; and there, in his right breast, was seen a small triangular wound, from which no blood was streaming, while on the left side appeared a corresponding aperture, pouring quickly forth the warm current of life. Madame de Langy strove to stop the bleeding by pressing her handkerchief tightly on the wound; and the marquis, who in his military career had seen death in many shapes, gazed hopelessly on the pale face of the stripling, merely pronouncing the word "Water!"

An ewer was immediately brought, and some drops sprinkled on his brow and lips. The application produced some effect, for he opened his eyes, and they turned with a faint and heavy gaze upon the marchioness. His lips moved, too, for nearly a minute, and he seemed to fancy he was speaking; but the only articulate sounds that he uttered were the words "My mother!" with which the effort ended, and then came a low moaning sort of sigh. His eyes closed and opened again, while a strong convulsive shudder passed over his frame. His hand, which he had raised as if to grasp at something, fell heavily by his side—and all was still!

The signs were not to be mistaken, but still a mother's hopes clung round the form of the dead. She believed she saw the bosom heave, long after the last breath was fled; she thought she saw the light of life in those fixed glassy eyes, long after the lamp was out; she fancied motion in the lips, she dreamed even the colour was returning to the cheek. Her husband stood, and gazed with tearless lids and a heavy, frowning brow; but he did not deceive himself; and when a surgeon entered in haste and approached the bedside, he took his wife by the hand, cast his right arm around her, and saying, "Come!" drew her away.

"Oh! let me know if there is any hope," said Madame de Langy, as he supported her towards the door.

"Hope?" said the marquis in astonishment, for he knew not how a mother's heart can deceive itself. "Hope? He is dead!" and the marchioness fell back upon his arm as unconscious of all life's woes as he whom they had just left.

Monsieur de Langy gave her over into the hands of her women, and returned immediately to the chamber of death. Still there was not a tear in his eye; but a strong and bitter curl of his lip, and heavy contraction of the brow, told plainly that anger aided him in mastering his grief.

"He is gone, sir," said the surgeon, as soon as the marquis entered; "I am sorry to say life has departed."

"I know it," replied Monsieur de Langy, abruptly; "do you think I never saw a dead man before? How did this happen?" he continued, fiercely, turning to one of the servants: "François, you knave! you have pandered to all his vices. If you have had any share in this, wo be to you!"

"Indeed, sir," answered the valet, "it was not my place to stop Monsieur Victor in what he thought right to do. If you did not disapprove, I had nothing to do with it."

"You are right, scoundrel! you are right," cried the marquis; "a weak parent is chargeable with half a child's faults. Would to God I had sent you to the Bagne when first I found out what you are! How did this happen, I ask? Let me have the truth, if there be anything like truth in you."

"Why, sir," replied the man, sturdily, "I can only tell you what I have heard. They say the count went somewhat too far with Mademoiselle de Launay last night, and offered her some violence; believing that a petite demoiselle like that might think herself honoured by his notice. She resented it, it seems; and, meeting her brother Eugene this morning in the garden of the Tuileries, Monsieur Victor retired with him to the open space behind the traiteur's. I had been watching to prevent mischief; but I came up too late, for their coats were off and their swords crossed; and, before I could get up, young De Launay lunged, and ran him through the body. But I should think the king would never suffer a pitiful lieutenant of the line to kill a man of Monsieur Victor's rank without—"

"Order out the carriage instantly!" cried Monsieur de Langy. "Stop! I will take a fiacre. Come with me, sirrah!" and away he strode, cast himself into the first vacant vehicle he could find, and drove with all speed to the palace.

He was admitted immediately to the presence of the king; and, casting himself at his feet, the marquis exclaimed, "I come to crave justice, sire! One of your officers has killed my son!"

"I know it, Monsieur de Langy," replied the monarch; "and most sincerely and deeply do I feel for you, the more especially as in this instance I cannot act as I could wish. Your son, sir, offered a gross and flagrant insult to a young lady who deserved it not; a brother drew his sword to avenge his sister; and although I greatly disapprove of any one daring to take the law into his own hands, yet my sense of the provocation is too strong to permit of my visiting the fault with all the severity that, under any other circumstances, I would have shown. De Launay and his son have been here—"

"And my cause is prejudged!" exclaimed Monsieur de Langy, rising.

"I pardon you, sir," replied the monarch; "your loss deprives you of your reason. I have banished him, sir, from Paris, and that punishment shall suffice. But I have determined to bring this system of duelling to an end altogether. The law has already put down those premeditated meetings which once disgraced our country; it is now, however, evaded upon the pretence of accidental encounters. These, too, I will stop; and therefore I give notice—mark me, gentlemen all, and make it generally known I will never pardon again any action of this kind, be the offender who he may. No pretence shall be available; and, if one French gentleman kills another in vengeance for a private injury, the matter shall be looked upon as any other murder, and treated accordingly, from this day forth."

The marquis muttered something between his teeth: for, although he was naturally of an easy and placable disposition, the fact of his child's death was fresh upon him, and that terrible thirst of vengeance, the drop of the blood of Cain which is in all our hearts, burned in his veins, and as yet had not had time to cool. He would pursue the murderer himself, he thought; he would spill his blood as he had spilled that of him so dear. But, as he drove back to his own house, anger gave place to sorrow. He wept, and the tears softened the bitterness of his heart.

Wiping the drops away, that his servants might not perceive them, with a false sense of what is manly and becoming, the bereaved father entered his dwelling amid the silence of all around. But, as he mounted the stairs to seek the chamber of his afflicted wife, Memory, obtrusive Memory, with her peculiar malice, called back a thousand images of happier days, and contrasted the hopes and the joys of the bright past with the grief and anguish of the dark present. He heard the voice of his son, as in infancy and boyhood it had prattled within those walls; he saw the sunny face of the child, and the expanding graces of the youth; he recalled a thousand traits which had touched the parental heart with emotions never to be forgotten. Everything that was bright and promising was carefully culled by the hand of Remembrance to swell his sorrow, and everything that was evil and weak was cast away.

As he approached the apartment to which Madame de Langy had been removed, he heard a voice talking to her, and concluded that a priest had been sent for; but on entering he found her leaning her head on the shoulder of Monsieur de St. Medard, and weeping calmly, though bitterly.

"Speak not, my dear Adèle," the viscount was saying as his nephew entered: "speak not as if you were utterly bereaved and childless. Remember, you have still a son, one every way deserving your tenderest affection. Ah, Victor! this is a terrible blow; but if you entertain that faith and religious feeling which you have both of you always professed to cherish, you will derive consolation from it now."

As he himself spoke, Monsieur de St. Medard's eyes fell towards the ground. The sources of consolation which he pointed out to his nephew seemed, at a moment of sorrow and anguish like that, to acquire an importance and a depth which, in the current of an even and a prosperous life, they had never seemed to possess. Thought glanced like lightning over a thousand topics which he had lately been considering; and those longings and aspirations for immortality, which, if anything be innate in the heart of man, we have every reason from their universality to suppose are so, made him ask himself if it were not a far grander, a far more magnificent and sublime conception to believe in the existence of one great and all-creating Spirit, filling the human breast with tender affections and kindly sympathies, and, after trying them in the fire of a disastrous and disappointing world, giving them full fruition in a brighter and purer state of being, than to imagine that all things here below, the material world around us, our thoughts and feelings, the pleasures of the mind, the loves of the heart, are the perishable productions of a cold inevitable law which calls them into being without volition or object, an them to annihilation without regret or c shrunk from the consequences of his o cherished doctrines, and for the first tim to believe.

For a moment or two, the words, whi sieur de Langy spoke in reply, fell upo unheard; but then, rousing himself, the applied all his energies to console his and niece under their bereavement. H some degree successful: thought, which lost in the tumultuous sensations of afflic turned after tears had had their course; night, Monsieur de Langy and his wi busied with their kind relation in mal those sad preparations which the terrib of the day had rendered necessary. On first steps was to send off a courier to A to summon Francis de Langy back to P all speed.

CHAPTER XIX.

The sad solemnities of the funeral ken place before Francis de Langy coul Paris, but still his meeting with his fat mother was a very painful one. In m spects he was unlike the dead, taller more powerful in frame, though sever younger, darker in complexion, with more marked and manly; but still the him was enough completely to overset th of equanimity which the marquis and m ness had regained, and to recall with p anguish the memory of his brother a shock of their loss. Gradually, however impression wore away, and nothing re but the consolation of his presence. seemed to cling to him even more fond they had done to their eldest son; and t rental affection, which, like a fresh-trans shrub, had appeared to languish and fad day or two, revived, and bloomed brighte ever in the new soil when once it had root. On his part, the hero of our tale that the gentle kindness of a feeling hea a delicate mind could do to soothe and c his parents under their deprivation; and, they might still experience deep regret they thought of him who was gone, they not but acknowledge that their survivi was far his superior in every quality of and understanding.

Calm tranquillity was thus soon resto the house of the Marquis and Marchion Langy; but yet in the breast of each m of the family rested a something on whic were unwilling to fix their attention—a those questions to be determined on whi much is staked, that we fear to agitate i our present peace should be lost. The and mother could not but remember that had given over their right in their son other; that Monsieur de St. Medard ha mally, and with their consent, adopted h his own. Could they, then, with honour, o propriety, take him from one who had be parent and guide of his youth; and yet they consent to part with him for such le tervals as those which had hitherto occur their communication with their son? Thi a frequent subject of thought with both er dared to speak to the other upon it, nor ffer the viscount to see that their minds agitated by such considerations.

quently, too, did Monsieur de St. Medard ate upon the same difficult point, but an- subject mingled with the current of his tions when they turned that way. His ion for Francis de Langy was of a less kind than many even of our purest at- ents. The viscount could have made his up to resign his unquestionable claim, if doing he could really have benefited his d child; but that was what he doubted. gh he knew the good qualities of his neph- d niece, he knew their weaknesses also; e asked himself, if their foolish indulgence ompletely ruined the disposition of their son, was it not likely that their daily in- ng love towards the one who was left lead them to the same errors, and have, egree, the same effect? He was aware, l, that the mind of the youth whom he ought up was originally of a firmer and er nature than that of his brother; he be- that the education he had received was ated to strengthen and improve that mind, did not fear that Francis would ever be- like the youth whose vices had brought upon his own head and sorrow upon his s. But he had taken a pride as well as a re in forming the character of his neph- on upon principles long considered and inately chosen. He trusted that those les, if followed out, would evolve all that ood in his disposition, correct all that ad; that the flowers and the fruit of the would be nourished and protected, the removed, and the blight destroyed. It asily be supposed, then, that he did not see his plans frustrated even in a de- that he dreaded the effect of over-tender- ven upon a character prepared, as far as ne would permit, to resist it; and al- his affection towards Francis, his fond- or his society, and the interest which he n cultivating and directing his mind, not have prevented him from relinquish- right at once, yet the apprehension of g his adopted child himself made him and hesitate, and, finally, determine to no absolute abandonment of the claims he possessed. Much more important re- an he foresaw hung upon his decision; this place I must beg the English reader llect that, in France, the adoption of a vas regulated at that time by different rom those established in any other coun-question, important as it was, and af- , as a matter of course, his whole future ough it did certainly cross the mind of s de Langy from time to time, was not hich occupied his attention the most. ader may easily divine what it was, at f he knows anything, or ever has known g of love. It was of Julie d'Artonne thought; and often and anxiously did himself how he ought to act, what he to do. Feeling how young he was to in such sensations, there was a timidity, of apprehension in his breast, which made rink from speaking of them even to Monsieur de St. Medard, with whom he was accustomed to have no concealment in regard to any of his thoughts; and yet he was afraid of trusting to the dark, capricious, uncertain future, lest some incident should supervene to destroy all his hopes forever. He knew how early many a marriage was arranged in France; he knew, too, that very often they were decided long before, as a mere matter of business between parents, without any consultation with the parties most interested, and sometimes even without informing them. He feared, therefore, that such might be the case either with Julie d'Artonne or with himself; and he was well aware that such an engagement once entered into, either by his father or hers, would be irrevocable, and place an eternal bar between them.

On these considerations he resolved to speak of his attachment to Monsieur de St. Medard. He knew that he could trust in his affection, in his kindness, in his judgment; [redacted] though there was nothing in his adopted [redacted]'s manners, demeanour, or character, no word that he had ever heard him utter, no act that he had ever seen him perform, which had in it the slightest touch of what is called romance; though he was a man of sound and practical sense, of calm, cool reasoning, displaying in all his actions thought rather than passion; still there was something, an indefinable something, which told Francis de Langy that the kind friend of his youth had at some time loved deeply, and could still feel sympathy, strong, generous, and tender, for such sensations as those in his own bosom. And yet, though he resolved to speak day after day, he shrunk from the task of telling his attachment and explaining his wishes.

As fate will often have it, whenever he had made up his mind, and went to seek the viscount, Monsieur de St. Medard had gone out to the council, was busy with papers, or had some indifferent person with him; and then, when accident threw them alone together, either he could not summon resolution to introduce the subject abruptly, or some interruption took place just as he was about to commence the tale.

Thus passed on nearly three weeks. The rest of the young man's time was generally spent with some youths of high family who were studying under an old officer of invalids some of the practical parts of the science of war. They usually met in a ground set apart for the purpose, at a distance of about four miles from Paris; and there, in forming bastions, redoubts, and field-works, and receiving instructions for their attack and defence, several hours were passed every day.

It so happened, on one of these occasions, that after the exercises of the morning were over, and the officer whose lessons they had been practising had left them, Francis de Langy, with some ten or twelve of his companions, stood together near the gate of the field, with a number of grooms and other servants holding their horses. The day was very hot and sultry, they were all fatigued and thirsty, and Francis had sent Jean Marais to a small cabaret on the other side of the little green to bring some wine and water to refresh them after their exertions.

He had scarcely left them, when an old woman in poor apparel, tall, coarse, and forbidding in appearance, and of a yellow, tanned complexion, came through the gate, and with the common whine of the race which the French call Bohemians, and which we name Gipsies, asked one of the young gentlemen to have his fortune told. The lad immediately held out his hand, and gave the woman the piece of silver she demanded; in return for which he received a very flattering account of his future performances in love and war. Several of the rest followed; and, at length, the fortune-teller turned to Francis de Langy, who had hitherto shown no disposition to consult her art.

"Come, my sweet young gentleman," she said; "cross my hand with silver, and I will tell you your luck. You will be a fortunate man, I am sure; I see it in your beautiful face. Why, you are taller than the rest by a head, and you will not refuse a poor Bohemian a little crown."

"Come, come, De Langy," cried one of his companions, seeing him shake his head. "You are not afraid of having your fortune told, are you?"

"Oh no," replied Francis de Langy. "I put too little faith in the matter to be afraid. There, my good woman, there is a crown for you, and there is my hand, if it please these good gentlemen to hear my fortune."

The woman pocketed the money, and then took his hand in hers, gazing steadily into the palm for a minute. The next moment she dropped it with a look of contempt, and, taking out the crown again, thrust it back upon him, saying, "I did not come to tell the fortune of such as you. I came to talk with young gentlemen, not with a peasant's son. Keep your money; you will want it some day."

All his companions burst into a loud laugh; and one exclaimed, "Why, you old fool! don't you know this is the Count de Langy!"

"I don't know what he is called," replied the old woman, "but, count or no count, he is the son of a peasant;" and, as she spoke, she turned away, and left the group of gentlemen, directing her steps towards the little cabaret which we have mentioned. Just at that moment, Jean Marais, followed by a boy carrying wine and glasses, was seen coming across towards them; and Francis de Langy exclaimed, laughing, "I have a great mind to bid my servant stop her, and make her tell me something more, as she is so learned; but I fear, Auxerre, you have spoiled the sport for to-day by telling her who I am."

"Bid him bring her back! bid him bring her back!" cried several of the others; but the woman seemed to divine their intention, for she turned shortly and quickly out of the way of Jean Marais, and took a path which led round a little garden at the back of the cabaret.

The incident which we have described produced, at the time, no more important effect than some laughter among the young men who were present. One of them advised Francis de Langy to inform the marquis that he was found out to be a peasant; another asked him, jestingly, to produce his letters of nobility; and the young gentleman himself seemed as much amused as any one, for he looked with too much contempt upon the woman and her tale to attach sufficient importance to the matter even for anger. When he told his father the story at dinner, however, Monsieur de Langy was highly indignant, and declared that he ought to have had the woman arrested immediately for offering such an insult to a French noble. In the capital, too, and at Versailles—there happening to be no piece of pleasant scandal, or idle gossip, or public news of great interest current at the time—the story of the Bohemian and the young Count de Langy was circulated from mouth to mouth, and supplied the place of other conversation at least a day and a half.

On the evening following this event, however, not to lose sight of any of the personages of our history, Jean Marais, whether among the servants of the house of Langy, or waiting upon his master at dinner, or assisting him to undress when he went to bed, displayed a degree of thoughtful gravity not at all usual in his case. He seemed abstracted, uneasy, restless; and twice he was heard to say to himself, "Well, it is no business of mine."

At night, Francis de Langy remarked the singular conduct of Jean Marais; and, after having had to speak to him more than once whenever he wanted anything, he asked him, in a kind manner, what was the matter, adding, "You seem very sad and thoughtful to-night, Jean. Has any misfortune happened to you?"

"Oh no, sir; not at all, not at all," replied Jean Marais. "I am as merry as a lark. Misfortune? God bless me, no! On the contrary, I fancy a cousin of mine has come into a fortune, and I was thinking of asking your permission to go into the country for two or three days to see my relations."

"By all means," said Francis de Langy. "Can I do anything else for you, Jean?"

"Well, sir," answered Jean Marais, "with an impudent man—which I hold myself to be, and thank God for it—one favour granted always begets another to be asked. May I make use of the horse that usually carries me to carry me now? It will save me a Louis in conveyance, or half a Louis in shoe-leather."

"Take him," replied Francis de Langy; "but do not override him, my good friend. Remember, though he is a strong beast, you are a heavy man."

"Ah, sir, you don't do me justice," said Jean Marais; "I have a heavy hand upon an adversary's head, but a light one upon a horse's bridle. I should certainly have liked a few words with that old woman there has been so much talk about to-day."

"Indeed!" cried his master, somewhat surprised at the abruptness with which he introduced the subject; "what can you want with her?"

"Oh! to have my fortune told, of course," replied Jean Marais, with a laugh; "I expect to turn out a very great man some of these days."

"Why, you are not foolish enough to suppose she could tell you anything about your fortune?" rejoined his master.

"I don't know, sir," answered the valet; "she said one very true thing to-day, if she said no more."

"And pray, what was that?" demanded Francis de Langy, with his surprise not diminished.

Jean Marais paused a moment ere he replied, but then answered, with a low bow, "She assured you that you were a very fortunate gentleman, I am told, the moment she looked at you; and that you will certainly admit is very true. First, you have an excellent father, who is very fond of you; so you are lucky in that. Then you are lucky in an excellent mother; and an uncle as good as either; lucky, too, in fortune, rank, figure, health, disposition; and also in having the very best valet de chambre that was ever born and educated, in the person of your most humble and obedient servant, Jean Marais."

"Well, well," said Francis de Langy, laughing; "you are right in all the first particulars you have mentioned, and I trust you will prove yourself right in the last also. So now good-night to you. Tell one of the other servants to take your place for the time being, and let him call me early to-morrow, for I wish to catch my uncle before he goes out."

Thus saying, Francis de Langy retired to repose, like all the rest of the world, in happy ignorance of the events which were coming rapidly forward out of the dark future to alter the whole complexion of his fate. Each man, when he lays down his head upon his pillow to rest, has a volcano underneath him. It may remain still and tranquil during his slumber: for hours, for days, for months, for years, it may show nothing but peace, and calm prosperity may stretch around. But it may wake him ere morning with the lava or the earthquake, and burn up the harvest of his hopes, or scatter the vineyard of his fortunes to the wind.

CHAPTER XX.

We must return, dear reader, to a spot which we have abandoned for many years, and to persons whom we have not seen for some time; but we go back with none of those feelings of affection wherewith one revisits the scenes of one's youth, with none of those warm and kindly associations which the memories of happiness enjoyed are sure to produce. In returning after long absence to the home of our early years, we may, it is true, find ourselves disappointed; a part of the brightness is almost sure to have passed away, and our eyes are changed, even if the things they looked upon have remained the same. The persons whom we loved, too, are sure to have altered, and rarely for the better; for, even if they be still upon the bright side of life, the rose-bud is generally more beautiful than the rose; and, if they be on the autumnal side of the hill, we shall have to mark many a leaf that has fallen, many a flower that has faded away.

In going back, however, to the Ferme Godard, neither have we ourselves any great interest in the place or the people, nor, to say the truth, had Jean Marais. Nevertheless, he judged it necessary to visit the home of his youth, dear reader; and, as we do not feel ourselves to be competent to censure his conduct or restrain his actions, we, too, must follow him thither, to see what he was about.

It was hot summer weather, as the reader well knows, and Jean Marais thought—he was a very reasonable and calculating gentleman—that it would be much cooler, both for himself and his horse, if he made his little expedition by night rather than in the daytime; and accordingly, within two hours after he left the bedroom of Francis de Langy, he was going soberly along the road in a direction varying from northwest to northwest and by west. As nothing in the world happened to him except his horse getting a stone in his shoe at the distance of about five leagues from Paris, we shall not dwell upon the events of his journey, till, at about half past eight o'clock in the morning, he rode out of the little village which was seen from the farm-house, and took his way slowly up the hill. Although the recollections of childhood in the breast of Jean Marais were not full of unmixed pleasure, and the sweeter parts were altogether connected with himself; although he had lost his parents early, and had fallen to the care of Gerard Latouches, who, to say the truth, was not the kindest of cousins; although he had been put to labour, as soon as his hands were capable of work, with a harsh and suspicious master, who gave every encouragement that distrust and severity can afford to make a servant outwit him he serves; yet, as Jean Marais rode along and looked round upon the scenes of his early years, he could not but experience some of that melting tenderness which seldom, if ever, fails to rise in the heart of man when any circumstance, either of sight or sound, recalls, in a more tangible and vivid form, a period of comparative innocence and gentleness of feeling. Memory brings its own light with it; but that light, which, like the lustre of the moon, is a reflected one, partakes the character of the period from which it flows. When we look back, in our latter day, towards the joyous activity and energy of first manhood, the evening seems to be brightened for a moment by the splendour of noon; and when, in the full summer-day of maturity, we pant under the heat of our passions and the excitement of strife and endeavour, the calm, fresh gleam of the morning appears to fall refreshing upon our hearts as soon as we turn our eyes to the softer hours of childhood.

Such feelings took possession of the hero of this chapter as he went on towards the farm, but they did not hold him long, and his mind speedily resumed its ordinary habits. Now the mind of Jean Marais, dear reader, was a very peculiar one; an active, eager, bustling intellect, which was always busy about something, inquiring, finding out, setting to rights, arranging its goods and chattels, or bartering them against those of other people with a great degree of sagacity and shrewdness. There are as great differences in the demeanour and conduct of the mind as in the character and bearing of the outward man. Indeed, the fleshly creature seems but the corporeal type of the thinner essence which is boxed up within each of us; and, just as much as there are slow and sluggish frames which move with difficulty and unwillingness, busy and bustling bodies that are always in a state of fuss and locomotion, graceful and beautiful forms, that, whether in activity or repose, present themselves in sweet and agreeable attitudes, active and powerful shapes which require robust exertion and energy as the natural result of their structure, so have we minds possessing precisely the same qualities, and exhibiting themselves precisely under the same aspects. It does not follow, indeed, at all, that the body should represent the mind that is within it. In truth, alas! the contrary is frequently the case; and I have often been tempted to think—and might have given way to the temptation, too, had not revelation put a bar to the vagaries of fancy—that, according to some heathen superstition, the bodies and minds of men were originally made separately, like an instrument and a case, and were then laid by, to be put together as they might be needed. Going a little farther still, I could have fancied that in this sort of arrangement it was not judged of much importance which spirit was put into which case; so that a very fine instrument was not unfrequently found in a coarse, inconvenient, or damaged cover.

Such was in some degree the case with Jean Marais; that is to say, his corporeal and mental qualities were very different. Strong, powerful, and active he certainly was in frame; but no one would have imagined, from his somewhat light and careless demeanour, that his mind was so thoughtful and busy as it was, especially at those moments when his limbs and muscles were in the most quiet and tranquil state. Had the outward and inward man acted at all together, our friend Jean could not have gone up the hill at the slow and sauntering pace with which he proceeded; for his fancy was employed with a thousand different inquiries, and was flying from one point to another with a rapidity truly marvellous.

As he came nearer to the Ferme Godard, however, he laid by speculation, and took to observation. The first thing that struck him was a look of great improvement, and an increased neatness about the building, and all that lay around it. His cousin had evidently prospered in the world, and Jean Marais remarked it with a smile. He did not in the least wish Gerard Latouches any evil, he was not sorry to see his fortunes improve; but, if the truth must be told, he had considerable doubts as to the means by which that improvement had been effected. He had no great confidence, in short, in the peculiar honesty of his cousin; and he had some cause, to say sooth, to doubt Gerard Latouches' mode of acquisition.

Riding up to the house, he entered a farm-yard which had lately been added and enclosed with walls; and, tying his horse to a ring which was fixed in the side of the house, he opened the door quietly and went in. The first person his eyes fell upon was a maid-servant, an appendage which the farm now owned; and he was about to ask for his relations, when Marguerite Latouches herself came out of the back room, and for a moment seemed scarcely to recollect him, though, perhaps, he was less changed than she was herself. He had, indeed, become a stout, powerful man, instead of a tall, well-grown boy; but a very different sort of alteration had taken place in her appearance. In the first place, she had completely lost the smart air of the lady's-maid, and had sunk down in dress and character into the small farmer's wife. In the next place, every vestige of beauty was gone; the pretty girl had become the plain woman, brown, and somewhat shrivelled with time, exposure, labour, and care; but the saddest change of all was from health to sickness. There was still some colour in the face, it is true; but that colour centered in one small spot in either cheek, and the rest was all sallow and sickly. The lips were pale and bloodless, the features sharp and thin, and there was, moreover, a look of anxious thought, as if something were pressing continually upon her mind.

As soon as she recognised her husband's cousin, Marguerite Latouches welcomed him with a faint smile, but told him, at the same time, that Latouches was absent. "He has been away five days now," she said.

"I thought so," replied Jean Marais, much to her surprise. "Pray, where is your son?"

"He is at school," answered Marguerite Latouches; "Gerard is bringing him up for a lawyer."

"For a lawyer!" repeated Jean Marais; "that is an honest profession! But what hopes has he in making the young man a lawyer? He can but be an avoué, or a notary; and, without some relation in that line, a peasant's son will never get on."

"Ay, but you forget," said Margaret, "that your cousin Martin, Gerard's brother, is intendant to Monsieur de Langy, and can do a great deal for him. But come, Jean, you must break bread in the house, though you seem to have grown a very fine gentleman. What will you take?"

"Nothing but a cup of water with a dash of wine in it," replied Jean Marais; and then added, abruptly, "I should have liked to see your son."

"Thank you, thank you, Jean," answered Marguerite: "you were always kind to the boys; and I used to say you had a good heart, though a wild head."

"I should have liked to see him," repeated Jean Marais; "I want to know which of his family he is like, Marguerite."

At that moment the good woman turned away to get a glass out of the cupboard; and Jean Marais added, in the same sort of abrupt manner in which he had before spoken, "I always thought your husband had great intentions for his son."

Marguerite turned and looked at him steadily, while the bright colour came up into her sallow cheek. There seemed to be a struggle in her mind as to whether she should reply or not, and after a momentary pause she said, "Jean Marais, some day or another—"

But just at that moment a horse trotted rapidly up to the front of the farm, and with a nervous look in that direction she hastened to draw some wine from a barrel, leaving the sentence unconcluded. The next instant the door opened, and Gerard Latouches entered, looking round him for the guest whose horse he had seen standing without. Jean Marais sat still gazing at him with an unconcerned air, and an expression of countenance which might be translated "Here I am! how do you like me?" but it was evidently by a great effort of memory that Gerard recollected his cousin.

"On my life," he cried, at length, "on my life, I believe it is that worthless scapegrace, Jean Marais!"

"No other, if you will believe me," said Jean Marais, with the utmost nonchalance: "I do not wonder at your not knowing me, Gerard; I am very much changed in all things since I left you. I have got to a new school, and have turned an honest man."

"Then the philosopher's stone has been discovered," cried Gerard Latouches; "for nothing but a transmutation of metals could do that."

"Why, it is true, I am your first cousin," replied Jean Marais, "and they say what is bred in the bone will never go out of the flesh; but still I am trying to be as honest as the bad blood in my veins will let me."

"Then be so good as to pay me the ten Louis which you stole out of my table when you went away," exclaimed the farmer, "or I will have you taken up for robbery."

Jean Marais laughed. "Come, come, Gerard," he said, "thou always wert the most impudent of men; and how I come to be so modest I cannot tell, considering I was brought up by you. Answer me one question, Gerard Latouches: did you not pocket everything my father left when he died? Did you not sell the two cows, and the horse and cart, and the field, and the furniture, and the house? I only helped myself to a part of my own; and, if we come to reckon, I think you will have to put your hand in your purse."

"Who fed and clothed you, and placed you at school for three years?" cried Gerard Latouches. "You cost me much more than ever you brought, and were always in mischief from the time you were twelve years old."

"Will you go into an account before a notary?" asked Jean Marais.

"Stuff and nonsense!" answered his cousin. "Besides, if there were a few Louis more or less, you had no right to break open the drawer. You could be marked on the shoulder for that."

He spoke much more diffidently, however, than he had done at the beginning; and, in the end, he thought it better to change the conversation, saying, "Well, where did you get all your fine feathers, and your horse? Have you been plucking some young gull, or robbing on the highway?"

"Neither, my good friend," replied Jean Marais, who well knew all the little intricacies of his cousin's character, and was aware that, among other not very singular opinions, he held wealth to be virtue, and poverty to be vice; "neither: you mistake my position altogether. I hold a capital situation, which fills my purse and covers my back; and all that I have got to say is, that if you have any claim upon me whatsoever, and are ready to enter into an account with me, I will discharge my debt in a moment, be it what it may."

Thus speaking, he put his hand into his pocket and drew forth a well-filled leathern purse, much to the surprise and admiration not only of Gerard, but of his wife, neither of whom could by any effort of imagination conceive how he could have possessed himself of so much wealth.

"No, no, Jean," replied Gerard, who was not at all fond of entering into the reckoning which his cousin talked of, "let the past be the past. I forgive your breaking open the drawer with all my heart; and as to the money, it is no matter. I never thought to see you again, and so I kept no account. But what is this situation you have got? I should like to hear."

A moment's consideration made Jean Marais resolve not to tell his worthy cousin what was the nature of his employment, and by whom he was employed; although he was well aware that, sooner or later, Gerard, from his connexion with the house of Langy, would find the facts out for himself.

"You will excuse me, Master Gerard," he said; "my situation is one of trust and confidence, and I think it better not to mention anything about it. Thank you, Marguerite," he continued, taking up the glass of wine and water which she had placed on the table before him; "here's to your health! Gerard, your health! I must be going."

"Nay, nay," exclaimed Gerard, "you must stay and take a bit of dinner with us. My wife will put a fowl in the pot, and we will have a merry meal of it. Your horse looks tired, too; we will have him round to the stable. How far has he come this morning?"

Jean Marais would not give the slightest indication of his place of abode, and simply replied, "A good many leagues." In the matter of dinner, indeed, he suffered himself to be prevailed upon, staying an hour or two for the purpose of gaining rather than affording information. From Gerard Latouches very little was to be obtained, that worthy gentleman not having received from nature a communicative disposition. Small signs and symptoms, however, to an inquiring eye very often discover great truths; and, among other matters which Jean Marais perceived, was the fact that poor Marguerite stood in awe of her husband to a degree that could only be produced by some great severity on his side. Everything like love appeared to be out of the question between them. She had expressed no satisfaction at his return, nor he any pleasure at seeing her again; and though, like a slave, she hastened to obey his lightest word, the anxious glance of her eye showed that it was the obedience of fear, and not affection. Various other little particulars became apparent to the keen scrutiny of Jean Marais: and before he left the house he was tolerably well satisfied in regard to several questions on which he was doubtful when he entered their doors. As soon as the meal was over he took his leave, and left his relations, with some pity for the wife, but no great reverence for the husband.

Such feelings would have been not a little increased could Jean Marais have seen the events which occurred immediately after his departure. Gerard Latouches waited till the sound of his horse's feet died away; but, the moment that such was the case, the husband opened a drawer in the old walnut commode which stood near, and took out a paper covered with writing on two sides. His wife watched him with a look of fear and anxiety, and, on his turning round and approaching her, seemed ready to sink into the earth.

"You shall sign the confession, woman," said Gerard Latouches, "whether you like it or not. I don't mean that I will use it, but have it in my own hands I will."

"I told you before," answered Marguerite, in a low voice, "that I will never do it. If you kill me, I will not."

"We will see," replied Gerard Latouches, and at the same time he struck her a blow on the side of the head with his open hand, which made her reel and wellnigh fall.

"Now will you sign it?" cried her husband.

"No!" she replied, bursting into tears, and casting herself into a chair. "If you touch me again I will scream till the people hear."

"Let them," said Gerard Latouches, and once more he struck her as she sat, more severely than before.

Marguerite uttered a long and piercing shriek, and then began coughing violently. In an instant her mouth filled with blood; and, the cough continuing, every effort brought up more, apparently from the lungs. Gerard Latouches was now alarmed; and, calling to some of the labourers, he sent them instantly down to the village, in which, by this time, a surgeon had established himself to do those offices for the sick which, in former days the good priest of the place had performed with little less skill than himself. The son of Esculapius soon arrived, and heard from Marguerite herself the ill treatment Gerard had given her; for, with natural indignation, she was not at all unwilling to show that her husband had been instrumental in killing her. The surgeon, who had attended her for some time for a complaint in the chest, and who had a reverence for all the rich farmers in the neighbourhood, declared that the blows she had received in the face could not have ruptured a vessel in the lungs, and, consequently, that her own screaming must have produced that result. Nothing he could do, however, seemed to stop, or even to diminish, the pouring out of blood; and, drawing Gerard Latouches aside, he informed him that his wife would not see the next morning.

"That is unfortunate," replied Gerard Latouches, in a very indifferent tone, "for I must absolutely return to Paris to-night. If you have got anything else to do, my good friend, go and do it, and then come back and attend upon her while I am absent. But are you perfectly sure that she will die?"

The surgeon informed him that there was not the slightest hope of her surviving; and Gerard, after having seen him depart, returned to his wife's chamber, and remained with her in conversation for nearly an hour, notwithstanding an injunction to keep her as quiet as possible. The surgeon brought back with him, two or three hours after, both a sick-nurse and the priest; the latter of whom was received by the farmer with a very sad and wobegone countenance. He declared his deep regret that he was obliged to leave his poor Marguerite under such circumstances; but, on mounting his horse, and riding away from the door, the clouds passed off from his face very soon; and any one who had marked it accurately might have seen a strong inclination to laugh curling his lip.

CHAPTER XXI.

Francis de Langy was disappointed in seeing his uncle on the day after Jean Marais's departure. Monsieur de St. Medard had gone out before his nephew arrived, and during the whole day he did not visit the Hôtel de Langy, where the young gentleman had taken up his abode on reaching Paris. The next morning, however, as his adopted son was sitting in his own room about an hour before breakfast, calculating whether it would not be better to speak to the marquis at once on the subject of his wishes, rather than wait in order to trust the communication to his uncle, Monsieur de St. Medard himself opened the door and came in.

"I am glad to find you alone, Francis," he said, taking a chair which his nephew placed for him: "there are two matters on which I wish to speak to you; and on one of which, my dear boy, I think you have wished to speak with me, yet seem to have hesitated to do so. In the first place, then, let me advise you, Francis, with those whom you love and respect, never let timidity prevent you from going straightforward to the point regarding anything that you desire. Mental courage is as necessary to a man as corporeal courage: they are the two great guardians of truth; and when you have well considered a matter, and have made up your mind that it is right to do it or to say it, have no hesitation in putting your resolution into execution, nor attempt to prepare the way by any preliminaries, except such explanations as are absolutely necessary."

"I was doubtful, my dear uncle," replied Francis, with the colour somewhat high in his cheek, "I was doubtful whether it was really right and necessary to do that which I wished to do."

"I am not blaming you, my dear boy," said his uncle, "but giving you advice for the future—two very different things. But to the point. You are now an only son; and my belief is that, although you are too young at present, according to the customs of the world, to marry, your father will wish to form an alliance for you as soon as possible. My wishes in that matter will go with his, for various reasons. In the first place, one cannot altogether free one's mind from prejudices which have been instilled into us early, and every man in our station of life desires to see the house to which he belongs carried on by direct heirs. It is a foolish inclination, perhaps, and has no very reasonable foundation; but still I must feel with the world in this respect, and should be sorry to see the honours and estates of the house pass away to remote kinsmen of whom we know little or nothing. In the next place, I am a great advocate for early marriages where both parties have been educated in the principles of virtue and honour. I look upon a man's attachment to a woman who deserves it as the greatest possible safeguard to him in his dealings with the world; it keeps him from all those small vices which unfettered youth thinks little of, but which certainly, though slowly, undermine the foundations of better things, till in the end the whole fabric of right and wrong gives way under the assault of temptation. I myself owe more in life than you can imagine to an early and honourable, though unrequited affection. Now, from your conduct and demeanour towards Mademoiselle d'Artonne, I am inclined to believe that a union with her would not be disagreeable to you."

"I love her more than any being upon earth," replied Francis de Langy.

"I am glad of it," said his uncle, "for I think she is worthy of your love; and I am not the least offended, my dear boy, at your not making any exception in my favour in regard to the exclusive attachment you profess for her, for Nature never intended that man should love any other human being with the same devotion which he must feel towards her who is to be the companion of his whole existence. I am glad of it in another respect, too; because I think that, merely in a worldly point of view, the alliance is one which your father would himself desire, and because I also know that there will be no obstacle on the part of Monsieur d'Artonne. That fact I had already ascertained before your brother's death; and, if he did not object when your position was much less favourable, he certainly will throw no impediment in the way under existing circumstances."

It may easily be conceived that such intelligence gave extraordinary joy to a bosom full of the warm enthusiasms and eager affections of early youth. A thousand dark apprehensions and misgivings had hung between the eyes of Francis de Langy and the future, making him fearful to look upon it. He had fancied that his father might object, or even Monsieur de St. Medard himself; that Monsieur d'Artonne might oppose; that the hand of Julie might even be promised to another; or, at the best, that all parties might treat his attachment coldly on account of his youth, and interpose long delays to chill the eager hopes of love. Such apprehensions, however, were now all swept away in an instant. It was as if a dark and sombre curtain had been suddenly removed, and one scene of unclouded brightness and splendour opened before him as his future prospect. The presence of age almost always chills more or less the fire of youth. Had Francis de Langy been alone, he might have given way to almost any sort of joyous extravagance to vent the exuberance of his satisfaction. A young man is not worth much who could not jump over a chair or a table when he is very happy, just to expend a part of the superfluous excitement. But Monsieur de St. Medard being present, Francis de Langy restrained himself, and only kissed his uncle's hand warmly to show his gratitude and his joy.

"Well, well, my dear boy," said the viscount, "I see you are satisfied with the arrangement I propose, and therefore, without a word more, I will go down and speak to your father about it. Stay here, and I will let you know the result."

There is in the human mind a want of faith in happiness, which, I believe, is inherent, not acquired. What we long for we tremble for; and even the child snatching at the fruit or flower has fear in his eagerness, as well as desire. We know, without being taught, that everything on this earth is mortal; and that, of all mortal things, joy is the most frail. The moment his uncle was gone, the feeling of apprehension again took possession of the heart of Francis de Langy. He knew of no cause for dread, and yet he dreaded that some unforeseen obstacle might still intervene. He was not long kept in suspense, however, for the viscount was not gone five minutes, and his air and manner on his return at once showed that all was as he could have wished it.

"Your father is delighted, Francis," said Monsieur de St. Medard, "and your mother not less so. Go to them, my dear boy, and then make preparations for a journey. It is determined you shall be your own ambassador; and as you have selected your future bride yourself, contrary to all our absurd precedents in this country, you must even ask her hand of her father also."

At an early hour on the following morning Francis de Langy was concluding his preparations for his new expedition to Auvergne, aided by the servant who had supplied Jean Marais's place during his leave of absence, when suddenly the worthy valet himself entered the room, exclaiming, in grief and astonishment,

"Going to Auvergne, sir, and I not going with you!"

"Why, my good Jean," replied Francis de Langy, "I have business of importance to transact, and could not wait for you."

"Wait!" cried Jean Marais; "I am ready this moment, sir. You can never go to Auvergne without me. Is not a real, genuine, unadulterated valet de chambre as much a part of his master's person and identity as his right leg, without which he cannot walk, but only hobble? I will answer for it, sir, that if you were to set out for Auvergne without me, you would get into some scrape in two minutes, from which no one could extricate you but myself; and in taking me with you, as I fully intend you shall, you will find cause every hour of the day to thank the lucky stars that furnished you with Jean Marais. What is a gentleman without a valet de chambre, indeed!"

Francis de Langy laughed gayly, with a heart so full of its own gladness that everything else seemed of minor importance; and, leaving the other man and Jean Marais to settle the matter between them as to which should accompany him, he saw it speedily arranged to the satisfaction of both parties, the lackey being quite as much pleased to remain in Paris as Jean was to journey into Auvergne.

Ere half an hour was over, Francis de Langy's postchaise rolled out of the porte cochère of his father's house, and was soon on the road to Clermont. If thou shouldst ever be in Paris, reader, and be either enchanted by its gayeties, fascinated by its pleasures, deluded by its apparent wit, philosophy, and energy, or attached to it too strongly by any of the bonds of the heart or the head, and, on leaving it, shouldst desire a brush wherewith to sweep away every feeling of regret from thy mind, go out slowly by the Faubourg St. Marceau: let the sight of its filth and squalor, its crowded abominations and uncheerful horrors, be thy last remembrance of Paris, and, if ever thou dost wish to see it again, thou must have a strong stomach or a bad memory. Nowadays, one can avoid that faubourg, on whatever road one travels, but, at the time I speak of, there was no possibility of getting to Moulins without passing through it; and, as the postillion jogged on slowly over its rough and jolting pavement, Francis de Langy thought he would never get to the end of sights displeasing to the eye, and smells offensive to the nose. But when they issued forth under Menil Montant, and passed through Villejuif, where there was no post at that time, the postillion did not seem to go any faster, or the road to be less tedious. Alas, that the wings of the little blind god, though he uses them sometimes swiftly enough to fly away with himself, should never be of any service to his votaries, even when most eager to proceed upon their way! On went the postchaise at its own pace, notwithstanding all the wishes of Francis de Langy; Fromenteau, Essonne, Ponthierry, Chailly, Fontainebleau, one by one, were reached; and such was the rate of progression on that day, that by the time the carriage rolled into Nemours it was quite dark. Onward, however, the young gentleman travelled till he arrived at Montargis, by which time he had received conclusive proof that the attempt to make much way during the night was of very little use, and tended much more to wear out his patience than to accelerate his journey. At each of the two posthouses between Nemours and the last-mentioned place, he was kept waiting an hour before the people of the place were roused and the horses put to; and as he came into Montargis itself, the town-clock was striking two in the morning, though he was yet less than eighty miles from Paris.

The next day the same took place, and the next again; and the feelings of Francis de Langy were only changed, inasmuch as, when at the end of the third he stopped at Moulins, he was within twenty-one leagues of the dwelling of her he loved. Those twenty-one leagues, however, though in general not what can be called mountainous, were difficult to travel; the road not the best in the world, the horses by no means superexcellent, and the people somewhat slow. As Francis de Langy knew this by experience, he was in his carriage at sunrise, and, perhaps, might have reached the Chateau d'Artonne by daylight, had not the postillion taken it into his head to drive furiously across a gutter in the little town of Gannet; which proceeding dexterously broke the axle of the carriage at the very precise spot most convenient for mending it, opposite to a blacksmith's shop, who, it was remarked by the people of the town, had always strongly opposed any alteration of the gutter which ran across the highway.

About fifty yards farther on there was a little auberge, or cabaret, kept by a cousin of the postillion; and thither Francis de Langy naturally bent his steps, and spent an hour in taking his dinner while the axle of the carriage was being mended. That operation took up at least an hour and a half, and thus the sun had just set when he reached Riom.

Do you remember, reader, having walked with us up a hill not far beyond that city, and through a path in the wood which led to a fountain! If you do, you will also call to mind that Francis de Langy there beheld, for the first time, the beautiful being whom he was now going to seek as his bride. Just as he reached the bottom of the ascent on the present occasion, the moon, which had been somewhat hidden either by the clouds or the hills—I know not well which—shone out bright and clear; and at the same moment the postillion pulled up his horses and asked if monsieur liked to walk up the hill. Francis agreed to do so very willingly; and at the mouth of the little path which he had formerly pursued, with his heart full of the memories of that meeting, he turned away to the left, enjoying at every step the thrilling pleasures of association. He smiled as he recollected how free and easy was his breast when first he trod that little meandering footway, how little he had expected that any incident would occur to beget such a complete change of feeling in his heart; and then he thought of her he loved, and of how beautiful she had looked as she lay senseless upon the path before him; and he called up the glance which she had given around as recollection returned, and the first meeting of his eyes with hers.

Memory might pause for a moment, too, upon all that was strange and unexplained in the events of that day; but his heart was too full of love to permit thoughts of any other kind to hold it long, and he walked on, dreaming of Julie d'Artonne. As he went, the moonlight seemed still to keep him company; for though the path, as we have shown, took many bends round the sweeps of the hill, yet the bright planet was so high that she either shone out full upon his way, or poured her rays in wavering spots of light through the brown leaves and branches overhead.

As the young gentleman was approaching the little fountain, however, he heard a sound as if some one had thrown down a quantity of tools or implements of husbandry, followed by voices speaking in a low, grave tone. He suddenly stopped, for the usual hour of work was past, the labourer retired from the field, the woodman gone home to his cottage, and Francis then perceived, for the first time, that Jean Marais was close behind him.

"What is going on, Jean?" he said in a whisper.

"Perhaps some poachers," answered the man; "and, if it be, we had better go on and take no heed."

"Perhaps we had," replied Francis de Langy; and he accordingly walked slowly and quietly forward, for ten or a dozen steps, to a place where the path became more open, crossing a space of about twenty yards in breadth and forty in length, where some trees had been cut down on the hillside, leaving behind them a patch of underwood here and there, while the rest of the ground was covered with long forest-grass. On the left hand the hill declined somewhat abruptly; and beyond the opening the trees rose tall and thin, with a few shrubs and plants beneath them, not thick enough to deserve the name of underwood.

Here, again, Francis de Langy suddenly stopped, for there was another light besides that of the moon; and the persons from whom the voices proceeded were partly visible at no great distance. They were gathered together just below the path, and were some twelve or fourteen in number. As they stood at different distances down the descent, the heads and shoulders of some, the heads of others, and nearly the whole form of one or two, were visible. The latter was the case with a tall man, dressed in the garb of the maréchaussée, who held a torch in his hand, with the flaming end somewhat bent down. There seemed to be another flambeau, if not more, below, by the red light and smoke which came up, drowning in a gloomy and portentous glare the pure cold beams of the moon.

After gazing for a moment, Francis de Langy fancied that he recognised more than one of the persons before him; and, at all events, his curiosity was too highly excited to permit of his proceeding without ascertaining what they were about. Without any attempt at concealment, then, but with a quiet step, he advanced through the grass to the spot where the group was assembled, followed, as he did so, by Jean Marais. Their approach caused little observation; one of the men turning round his head, looking at them slightly, and then resuming the steadfast gaze with which he had been previously contemplating the proceedings of another personage, who, with mattock and pickaxe, was beginning to dig by the light of the torches held above his head.

What they were seeking the two new-comers could not divine; but it was now clear, not only that the business was of importance, but that Francis de Langy was right in supposing several of those there assembled to be well known to him. Close to the person who was digging stood the intendant, with his arms crossed upon his chest, and a red roquelaure cast over his shoulders to keep him from the night air. He was looking on with his usual calm, cold, impenetrable expression of countenance, steadily, but not anxiously, as one might be supposed to witness a proceeding which excited nothing but mere curiosity. A little nearer to Francis de Langy, but with his back turned towards him, stood the Count d'Artonne. It was evident, from the attitude which he had assumed, that he was gazing at the proceedings with strong interest, though his face could not be seen. One or two of his servants were there also, as well as the préfet of the neighbouring town, who had been pointed out to Francis de Langy during his former visit to Auvergne. The rest of the party comprised two or three labourers, and some servants and officers of the intendant, with several agents of the police, and no less than four servants in the livery of Madame de Bausse. In the front was the large dog which we have mentioned as accompanying that lady on her visit to the house of the intendant, which now stood with drooping ears and tail, the mouth partly open, and the tongue hanging out, watching the process of digging, and every now and then running forward, and attempting to aid the men who were employed, by scratching eagerly with his feet.

The scene altogether was a curious and a solemn one. All were now silent; and the only sounds which broke the stillness were the strokes of the mattock and an occasional low whine from the dog. The sensations of Francis de Langy were by no means pleasant; a cold chill seemed cast over his bright expectations; vague and uncomfortable images rose up before his fancy, and connected the present with many events of the past. He remembered that it was close to that very spot where he had found Julie d'Artonne in a state of insensibility; he recollected the sudden and unexplained disappearance of Monsieur de Bausse; and, he knew not why, his mind would join those events with that which was at present going on, and that, too, in a painful manner. He, too, stood and watched the labourers with a feeling of awe and apprehension, as one gazes at a dark thunder-cloud which is ready every moment to burst upon us. In the mean while the men worked on, removing shovelful after shovelful of earth, till at length the mattock struck the rock, without their discovering anything.

"Work on in this direction," said the intendant; "you have begun too much towards the hill. Let the dog be your guide."

"We shall come upon the water, monseigneur," replied one of the men; "the stream from the fountain comes down there."

"Do as you are ordered," replied the intendant; and the workmen proceeded [illegible] from the spot in which they had been [illegible] or three feet to the right.

The first shovelfuls which they threw up in this place were of a dark soft earth mixed with some volcanic stones, loose and easily moved. They then came to some leaves thickly packed together, and moist with the water of the stream, which, oozing through them, passed under the surface of the ground from the basin of the fountain above, to join the stream down below. Two spadefuls were cast out, and then the intendant suddenly exclaimed,

"Stop! what did you touch there?"

"Nothing, I think, but the packed leaves, monseigneur," replied the man.

Monsieur d'Artonne stepped a little forward, and said—it seemed to Francis de Langy, not without a considerable effort—"Better scrape the leaves away gently: they must have been placed there, as the earth is above them."

His voice was low and hollow [illegible] he spoke, the dog, whom one of the servants had taken by the collar, broke away, and scratched up the leaves with his feet.

The next instant some cloth, apparently the sleeve of a man's coat, was discovered; and the intendant exclaimed, "Hold the torch! hold the torch! Here is the body! Take away the dog, remove the earth and leaves gently, let us see exactly how he lies."

Quickly and in silence the men proceeded with their work, casting off the earth and the wet leaves on either side, and in less than a minute they came to a hilt of a sword; upon which one of them was stooping down to pull it out from the mass that covered the blade, but the intendant stopped him, exclaiming suddenly, "Do not touch it! Remove the rubbish from it with the spade; it is necessary to see whether it be drawn or not."

Very little labour was necessary to prove the fact: the sword was unsheathed, and quite rusty, seeming to have been thrown in after the body had been deposited in its unconsecrated grave. When it was all clear, the intendant took it from the hands of the workmen, and examined it by the torchlight; while every one gazed on him and it, in deep silence and with a contracted brow.

"Go on," said the intendant, and the work was resumed.

In about three minutes more the whole of a human body was exposed to view; but the little stream, trickling on through the leaves, formed with the disturbed earth a muddy pool around the corpse, which prevented anything from being seen, except that it was lying on the side, with the face towards the hill.

The body was easily raised, however; and, being placed upon the open ground, a torch was held close to the face. To the surprise of all, not the slightest appearance of corruption was visible. It would seem that the stream of water, either from some peculiar quality in itself, or from the extreme coldness of its temperature, had entirely preserved the corpse from decay, so that the features were as perfect as at the moment when Death set his seal upon them. They were those of a young and somewhat handsome man, well formed, though not particularly prepossessing. The countenance seemed [illegible] certain degree of expression, wh[illegible]bly more the accidental one wh[illegible] the moment of death, than that which was habitual to it. The brow was contracted, the teeth set hard, and the corners of the mouth drawn down. The right hand had a glove upon it, the left hand none, but one was found under the body. The clothes were rich and expensive; there were rings upon the fingers, and a chain of a watch apparent, with several large seals. No hat was found; and the sheath of the sword was doubled up underneath him, and somewhat broken.

"Do any of you recognise this man?" demanded the intendant.

"I do," replied the Count d'Artonne at once: "it is the late Marquis de Bausse."

"I do, I do," cried several of the persons present.

"Now, then let us see how he came by his death," the intendant continued; "there is no appearance of blood that I can see."

"It must have been washed away by the water," observed some one.

"Open his coat," said the intendant; and, on so doing, right in the midst of the breast was discovered a small round wound, scarcely large enough to admit the point of a man's finger; but, spreading from it on every side like a halo, was a deep blue and yellow bruise.

"Well," said the intendant, after they had all gazed for a moment or two in silence, "two facts are evident. This is the corpse of Monsieur de Bausse, which we have at length found; and he has met with a violent death. Monsieur d'Artonne, I must trust to you to convey this intelligence as delicately as you can to Madame de Bausse, for I intend myself to proceed immediately to Riom, carrying the body with me. I hope too, my dear friend, that to-morrow you will give me your assistance in the investigations which it will be necessary for me to institute in order to discover the perpetrator of this deed."

"Undoubtedly," replied Monsieur d'Artonne. "At what time shall I be with you to-morrow?"

"At ten," said the intendant, "if you can make it convenient;" and some more conversation of no importance took place regarding the arrangements for the next day, and the method of bearing the corpse to Riom.

Francis de Langy, however, waited not to hear it. He felt sick and gloomy: a deeper impression was made upon him—he knew not why—than the mere sight of the dead body could have occasioned; and, turning away, he resumed the path towards the high road without speaking a word to any one. Absorbed in what was going on, no one noticed his departure any more than his arrival; and, when he cast himself into the chaise, he covered his eyes with his hands; but it was long before he could turn his thoughts away from the painful channel into which they had been directed.

CHAPTER XXII.

In this chapter, reader, we will endeavour to fly with the wings of the wind; though, perhaps, we had better say with the wings of the butterfly. But this is a chapter of young joy, which is always eager and rapid, passing like a flash; and the butterfly is the image of calm happiness, sporting in its garden of flowers, and fluttering, half sated in the wantonness of fruition, from sweet to sweet, ere each be fully tasted.

The meeting of Francis de Langy, on the night of which we have already spoken, with Julie d'Artonne, with her father and with her mother, was somewhat checkered with gloom. The scene he had witnessed had cast a shadow over his own mind; it had done so still more over that of Monsieur d'Artonne; and, judging that the count might wish to communicate with his family in private, Francis soon after his arrival proceeded to the chamber of the Abbé Arnoux, whom he found very slowly advancing towards recovery. The good old man was quite contented with his progress, however; he had been up for an hour during each of the two days preceding, and he thanked God for the relief afforded him with the humble gratitude of an earnest and pious heart.

The next morning beamed more brightly; the impressions of the night before had been softened in the mind of the young lover; and, on going down, he found Monsieur d'Artonne also with a more cheerful face. While speaking with him at the foot of the stairs, a servant brought in a letter from the intendant; and, in reading it, a well-pleased smile came upon the count's lip. Francis de Langy thought the moment favourable for his own suit; and at once presented a note, which had been given to him by his father, formally asking the hand of the young heiress of Artonne for the heir of the house of Langy. The count read it with a grave air, and then merely replied, "If you will go into the saloon I will join you in a minute."

A momentary shade of apprehension came over the heart of Francis de Langy. It was in vain that he recalled the words of Monsieur de St. Medard, and the assurances which those words implied; he loved too much to be confident, and remained in doubt and fear till there were steps without, and the count himself came in leading Julie by the hand. Her face was like a rose in the morning, all blushes and tears; but the tears were happy ones, like the dew of the summer dawn; and, when Francis sprang forward to meet her, she gave him both her hands, and he held her to his bosom as a bride.

They were joined the moment after by Madame d'Artonne; who, with a warmth and eagerness very different from the cold and formal manners of the day, expressed the delight she felt at the idea of her daughter being united to the adopted child of one who had been the earliest and dearest friend of her husband and herself. A few minutes of confused joy succeeded, during which neither Francis nor Julie well knew what they themselves or any other person said; and then came calmer considerations as to when this union was to take place. A smile, thoughtful and grave, but yet full of calm and happy expectation, came upon the countenances of Monsieur and Madame d'Artonne when they called to mind how young, how very young, were those two lovers. The only difficulty, indeed, that either of them felt was to make Francis de Langy understand that a considerable lapse of time must pass ere he could receive Julie's hand. That matter, however, was more easily settled than Monsieur d'Artonne expected, for Francis already had come to the same conclusion; so that he offered not a word of opposition, and the matter was left vague and uncertain.

"I must go to Riom immediately after breakfast," said Monsieur d'Artonne, as they were sitting down to the morning meal; "but I will not take you with me, Francis, upon a dull and somewhat sad errand. I have another affair for Julie and you to transact, better suited to your time of life and to your feelings. Do you remember the man who was in prison for poaching—Antoine Bure? He was set at liberty; but it appears that there were other charges of the same kind against him, which have kept him from his home wandering among the mountains for the last fortnight. Now, with some difficulty, I have obtained an order to surseoir, which is tantamount, you know, to pardon; and you two, if you like, may carry up the notice thereof to his father's house. Do you know where it is, Julie?"

"Oh yes!" replied Julie, "I can find it; it is to the left, above Bourasole, among the hills. I never was there; but I heard something about the Huguenots, and that you were angry with the people because they were unkind to them."

The matter was soon and easily settled. Francis undertook that they would easily discover the house, for he would not have given up the promised expedition for a mine in Peru. To be with Julie alone; to talk of love with her who was the object of it; to borrow from the sky, and the air, and the clouds, and the sunshine, and the mountains of laughing Limagne, figures to image forth all the sweet sensations of his heart; to breathe the expansive happiness of his bosom under the free canopy of heaven, was a joy such as man has power only to taste in those few early years of life—so sweet, so fugitive—when all the flowers of the heart are in blossom, before they have been trampled down, or plucked, or have cast their leaves in the summer. Oh, how they pass away, those early years! and, if joy itself be but a point in the vast space of time, how small is the point when joy is pure and unsullied, without the alloy of one regret!

Monsieur d'Artonne set off soon after for Riom, and Francis de Langy and his sweet companion were not long in taking their way up into the hills. There was a little abatement, indeed, of their anticipated pleasure from Madame d'Artonne insisting upon sending horses to meet them as they returned, lest Julie should be tired. Julie felt that, under such circumstances, she could have walked untired double the distance; but something prevented her from saying so, and Francis de Langy would not oppose anything which was supposed to be for her comfort.

They took their way forth, then, alone, about ten o'clock in the morning; and passing through the park that surrounded the chateau, they issued out on the other side into a small bridle-road shaded by walnut-trees, which led in those days from Riom to Portefaix. Here they met a number of countrywomen going on to buy or sell in Riom, and as they wanted no society but their own, they struck off into a footpath which led round the base of one of the mountains between Riom and Clermont, called Chanturgue. They were now lonely enough: the vines were soon left behind them; some orchards full of rich fruits were likewise passed; and then came extensive meadows, stretching out from the mountain foot to the bank of a small rivulet, which wandered on and joined the Ambene above Riom. As they went on the scene grew wilder still: large masses of volcanic stone stood up out of the green turf; few houses were seen, and those far apart; villages and hamlets were at an end; the cottage of the shepherd, the solitary farmhouse, were the only traces of man's habitation, except where a cross upon the summit of a crag, or upon the soft side of the mountain, either showed where some accident had happened, or called the wanderer passing that way to offer up his praises to the God of all, or spoke hope and comfort in the storm and tempest to those who, perhaps, were wellnigh abandoning themselves to despair.

Julie and Francis de Langy made no great haste along the road. One might almost have applied to them the lines of the poet:

> "Slow through the meadows roved they many a mile;
> Toyed by each bank, and trifled at each stile."

It was not, indeed, exactly so; for, of course, refinement in education and in character produced a refinement in their affection which was not to be found in Phœbe Dawson and her lover. They were full of deep thoughts and strong attachment, but pure and high; and Love, too, was in his young timidity with both. But still they prolonged their walk as much as possible, paused and rested, and talked of future happiness till the shadows, beginning to fall the other way, warned them how long they had lingered, and urged them more quickly on.

At length, amid the wildest part of the scenery, appeared a few patches of corn nicely cultivated, a number of young trees planted in sheltered situations, and a low cottage with some small outbuildings seated close upon the verge of a little lake, if it deserved that name, from which issued forth the rivulet that flowed through the valley they had followed. The expanse of water was probably not more than four or five acres at the most, but it was clear, and bright, and perfectly calm, at the moment that

Francis and Julie approached it, so that the hills around, the heavens and floating clouds above, and the little cottage by the side were all reflected brightly from the surface. As they paused upon the edge to look down into the depth of the liquid mirror, in which the hills seemed to contemplate their own beauty and grandeur, they beheld the figure of a woman, apparently well advanced in life, come out of the cottage and gaze earnestly towards them.

Francis de Langy saw, but took no particular notice, and would fain have lingered there for a moment longer, dreaming fond dreams by Julie's side. Love is always more selfish in a man's bosom than in a woman's; and, though she was well pleased to stay there beside him, Julie, as soon as she remarked the old woman watching them, pressed Francis's arm gently with her hand, saying, "I am sure that is his mother, anxious about her son. Come, Francis, do not let us delay giving them any comfort that we can."

They went on immediately, and, following the little path round the tarn, soon reached the door of the cottage, where the old woman stood, clean and neat, with a withered but gentle countenance, which expressed some degree of wonder to see two young people, evidently of high rank, wandering up to the threshold of a remote and lowly habitation. She spoke first, addressing them in a courteous and quiet tone, without any of the patois of Auvergne, though with a touch of the Languedocean accent.

"Will you come in and rest, mademoiselle," she said, "and take a draught of milk!"

"We have come to see you, my good mother," answered Julie; "and so I will go in and sit down for a minute. Is your husband at home!"

"He is just at the back of the cottage, staking in a new cow-shed," replied the old woman. "I will call him in a minute. Father! father! Antoine Bure! Here are a young lady and gentleman want to see you!" and while Julie entered with Francis, and seated herself upon a low settle by the clean white table, an elderly man, the exact counterpart of the good dame herself, came in, putting on his rough short-tailed coat, over a shirt as white as snow. His features were somewhat harsher, and the expression, upon the whole, more stern than that of his wife; but still it was a pleasant and benignant countenance, grave and firm, but kindly withal. In Julie's eyes from the first it was very prepossessing, though she little knew the joy which the sight of that face was destined at one time to give her.

"I am the daughter of the Count d'Artonne," she said, as the old man bowed, and seemed to wait for her to speak, "I am the daughter of the Count d'Artonne, and have come to you by his desire."

"Oh! I know you well, mademoiselle," replied the farmer; "and as for the good count, he has done as much for us as he can in withdrawing his own charge against our poor wild boy. He can't make the other people do the same, I know; though I think the other little lords, such as Monsieur d'Argental and Montvert, might do so too when a nobleman like him sets them the example."

"Oh yes," replied Julie, "my father has done more for your son; he has got an order from Paris to surseoir: so that he is in no more danger, and can come back to you when he pleases. Here is the notice of it from the Greffe."

The old man caught the young lady's hand with a sudden start of joy and satisfaction, and kissed it warmly. Then, taking the paper, he ran his eye over it, and handed it to his wife. But she could scarcely read it for tears. It rarely occurs in England that a man of the lower, or even the middle classes, can express easily any sudden emotion of pleasure or gratitude: it is seldom in France that he has not something well-turned and graceful to say upon the occasion.

"The count is very kind, mademoiselle," cried the old man; "the count is very kind indeed in sending us this notice, and has doubled his kindness by the hand that brought it. I am very grateful, mademoiselle; and, though I am but a poor peasant, it is not impossible, nay, I think it very possible, that at some time I may have an opportunity of serving the count in return."

"Oh! he wants no return," replied Julie; "he is always glad to do any good that he can without wishing for any recompense."

"Ah, mademoiselle," answered the good farmer, in a thoughtful tone, "when I was young, my mother used to tell me a story of a lion that got into a net, and a mouse that let him out. I dare say you know it, for most mothers tell it to their children—"

Julie smiled, and nodded her fair head to indicate that she was aware of what he alluded to.

"Well," continued the Huguenot peasant, "I may be the mouse some day, mademoiselle. God knows, but I trust I may. And who is this young gentleman! The count has no son, I think."

"No," replied Francis de Langy; "I am but a friend, yet one who loves him nearly as well as if he were his son."

"Ah, and will be his son, too, some of these days," cried the old woman, laughing; "I can see how it is very well. Nay, do not let me make you blush, mademoiselle! Happy are those who get the man they love. If it be a blessing in bright days, what is it not when the sky is cloudy or the storm comes down! But, God protect you both, I say!"

"Ah, God protect you both!" cried the old man; "and He will protect you too, for I have always seen a blessing follow such things as you have done to-day."

Some farther conversation of the same kind took place, and, after remaining in the cottage about a quarter of an hour, Francis de Langy and his beautiful companion turned their steps homeward with an additional gleam of satisfaction on their way; for the heart of man, with all its corruption, does find delight in witnessing and promoting the happiness of others; at least before all the efforts of the great tempter, who is constantly about our path in the world, have had their effect in changing those emotions, which God planted in our breast for our own good, to his evil purposes. They returned joyful, then; with peace in all their own feelings, and gladness, moreover, in that which they had communicated to others. The horses met them not far from the little lake, and, entering the chateau, they found that the count had already come back from Riom. He was calm, and even cheerful. Madame d'Artonne seemed to enjoy the sight of their mutual love; and the day, which had risen in brightness, went down without a cloud.

CHAPTER XXIII.

As usual, in the course of all true tales, from the time of Tom Jones down to the present day, the reader is obliged to go backward and forward in this book, from scene to scene, and from place to place, in order that he may lose nothing of that which was taking place, and affecting the history of those in whom he feels an interest. The cause of it is, dear reader, that Fate is ubiquitous, and man the reverse. Fate operating everywhere, each individual is the centre of the circumstances which are attacking him on every side: so that, when we want to see the causes which affect any particular personage, we have to wander far and wide, and then do not discover even one half.

About three o'clock of the very day on which Francis de Langy set out for Auvergne, the marquis, his father, was sitting in a small room fitted up with books and somewhat encumbered by papers. In this he usually transacted business with his intendant or steward, and that worthy functionary had not long left him at the moment we speak of. The marquis, accustomed for many years to find in his son one great object of thought and emotion, now felt himself somewhat lonely in the absence of him who had supplied the place which the death of Victor de Langy had left vacant in his sensations; and, sending for the marchioness, he proposed to occupy the unfilled moments by conversing with her on the various arrangements which they had to make for the future.

She was followed into the room by a servant, who stood silent for a moment while the marchioness spoke to her husband; but her first words were an inquiry to which the man alone could give an answer.

"Who is that handsome, good-looking youth," she asked, "who seems waiting for you without?"

"It is a young gentleman, madam," said the lackey, "who has brought a letter for monsieur, which he will deliver to no one but himself; nor will he give his name, making a curious sort of answer when I asked it, and saying, 'You would know it well, and yet not know it at all.'"

"Let him come in," rejoined the marquis, with a smile; "he must explain his riddle himself."

The servant retired, and the next moment ushered in a very handsome and graceful youth, about the height of Francis de Langy, but not so powerful in frame. His complexion was considerably fairer, his eyes closer together, and the expression of his countenance intelligent and keen, but not very frank and open. He was dressed well, but not expensively; and his coat had somewhat the form used by the student of divinity who had not yet taken even the first step in his profession. He gazed for a moment in the countenance of the marquis with a strange and peculiar expression. It seemed that of wonder and affection; and then again he turned his eyes upon the marchioness with the same marked look.

"Well, sir," said Monsieur de Langy, somewhat surprised, "may I ask what is your business? Pray be seated."

But the young man did not take the chair which the servant had placed for him, advancing towards the marquis, and placing in his hand a letter folded and sealed.

Monsieur de Langy looked calmly at the address; then broke the seal, and proceeded to read the contents. In a moment, however, the look of quiet curiosity forsook his countenance. He turned pale, his eyes strained upon the paper; he cast a hurried glance at the youth before him, then gazed at the letter again, and then anxiously looked at the marchioness. In the mean while, the young man himself was manifestly agitated, the colour had fled from his face, he trembled violently; and the marchioness, surprised at the emotion of her husband and his visiter, advanced to the former, exclaiming, "What is the matter, Victor? Do not conceal anything from me."

"Read, read!" cried the marquis, putting the letter into her hands; and Madame de Langy took the paper and read as follows:

"Ferme Godard, September 17—.

"Sir,

"It is with shame and grief I address you, and only hope for pardon by making a full confession of the wrong in which I have taken part; though it was not originally designed or executed by myself. From the time that Madame la Marquise de Langy confided to the care of Marguerite Latouches her youngest son, my unhappy wife conceived the horrible and criminal design of placing her own child in his room, and obtaining for our boy the advantages of his rank and education. I acknowledge that I suffered myself to be persuaded to take part in this wicked act; but I have never ceased to regret it ever since, and have of late been, every day, more and more confirmed in my determination of restoring your son to his parents. With this view, I have gone to the very extent of my means, and even beyond, in order to give him such an education as will not disgrace his family; and, although I admit that I deserve punishment, and submit myself totally to your will, yet I trust that this conduct may procure my pardon. As long as my wife lived, I was withheld, out of tenderness for her, from blighting the unjust prospects which she had obtained for our child; but her death, this night, sets me free from such considerations, and a conversation with my brother, your intendant, confirms me in my good resolutions. I send you, therefore, your son, who is the bearer of this letter; and only farther beseech you to grant me your forgiveness, and to afford some small means of subsistence to the unhappy youth who has so long occupied a place in your family. I have wrung from my wife, on her deathbed, an acknowledgment of her crime, which you will find written below.

"Your humble and repentant servant,

"Gerard Latouches."

"I do confess and acknowledge that the child taken by me to Madame la Marquise de Langy was my child, and not hers; and that the one brought up by me as my own son is the child of the Marquis and Marquise de Langy.

"Marguerite Latouches."

As soon as the marchioness had read the paper she let it drop from her hands, and gazed for a moment at the young man, who stood with his fine head bent, his hands clasped together, and a look of timid hope upon his countenance. With woman's unquestioning confidence she held out her arms towards him, exclaiming, "Oh, my poor boy! and have you been kept in poverty and misery all this time?"

The youth sprang forward, and knelt at her feet; and, throwing her arms round him, she wept upon his neck with tenderness and joy.

The marquis, however, was not so fully satisfied, nor did he give way to such emotions. He remembered the noble bearing of him whom he had so long considered as his son, his high and generous spirit, his deep affection, his fine intellect; he compared his figure and face with those of the youth before him; and, however prepossessing the latter might be, he felt that there was an inferiority—doubtless the result of education—and, on questioning his own heart, he could not but acknowledge that he would rather have had him, whom he had so long called Francis de Langy, for his son.

"Sit down," he said, giving the young man his hand; "sit down. Let me consider this matter. It takes me by surprise, and overwhelms me;" and raising the paper from the ground, to which it had fallen, he read the contents over again.

And as he did so, his countenance assumed a stern expression; and, turning to the young man, he asked, with a frowning brow, "Who wrote this letter? This is not the style of Gerard Latouches, the farmer?"

"It is not, sir," replied the young man, promptly; "he wrote it, indeed, with his hand, but his relation, Martin Latouches, your intendant, dictated what he was to say. He is an excellent man that Martin Latouches, and persuaded my foster-father earnestly to tell the truth."

"Where is Gerard Latouches now?" demanded the marquis; "is he without?"

"No, sir," answered the youth; "he feared to present himself before you, and remained at the house of your intendant at Langy."

"Well, well," said the marquis, thoughtfully, "do not be alarmed, my poor boy. This shall all be inquired into accurately. At first sight, it seems true; and if so, all that a father's tenderness can do shall be done to make up to you for what you have undergone. In the mean time—"

As he spoke a servant entered to tell him that Monsieur de St. Medard was in the saloon; and the marquis, on the first impulse, ordered him to be shown in, saying, "This will affect him as much, perhaps, or more than ourselves." But the next instant he rose, adding, "No! stay, I will speak with him without;" and, taking the letter in his hand, he quitted the room.

"Why, Victor, what is the matter?" exclaimed the viscount; "you look anxious and alarmed."

"And not without reason, my dear uncle," answered the marquis; "look at that paper, and say how I may best discover whether it be true, or whether it be false. Remember, too," he added, "that extraordinary tale of the Bohemian, and what she said to our poor boy."

Monsieur de St. Medard took the paper without reply, read it from beginning to end in silence, returned it to the marquis, cast himself into a chair, and, covering his eyes with his hands, thought deeply for several minutes.

"I am afraid," he said, at length, "I am afraid, Victor, that this is true. I recollect, when I returned from India, some fourteen or fifteen years ago, having ridden to the house of this woman to see your son. When I asked which of the two boys he was, there was a certain degree of hesitation and embarrassment about her which puzzled me, nay, excited some vague sort of suspicion, which passed away after a time; but I remember it well now. This is a severe blow upon you, and a sad embarrassment to us all. Had it taken place but yesterday, much pain, and disappointment, and anguish would have been spared; for I fear that the friends of Julie d'Artonne will never consent to her marriage with a roturier, and the poor boy will have been raised to the very height of happiness to be dashed down into the depths of misery. It is very unfortunate, indeed! Yet I fear that the tale may prove too true."

"Then nothing remains for me but to acknowledge the youth?" said the marquis.

"Nay, nay, nay!" cried Monsieur de St. Medard, "there is a good deal more to be done than that. Our convictions in this matter are nothing in the eye of the law. This dear boy has been for fifteen years recognised as your son, and it will require very strong evidence to shake him out of his possession of that station. Worthy of it he is in every respect—high, noble, generous; and it is scarcely possible to suppose that the blood of a mean rascal, such as this Gerard Latouches always was, can flow in his veins. I always thought that education did a great deal; I shall now think that it does everything."

"But what do you intend to do?" demanded the marquis; "and what would you have me do? Give me your advice, I beseech you, my dear uncle, for I am bewildered and astounded."

